SELLERS L.J. I, too, would dismiss this appeal. As long ago as 1842 Dr. Lushington, sitting in the Divorce Court of those days, said [in Snow v. Snow[4]] that there was danger in abandoning the general rule. The general rule here is clear, and on the way this case was conducted in the court below and on the findings which the commissioner reached, to which reference has been made in the judgments which my Lords have delivered, I think that there is not sufficient justification for abandoning the general rule and acting on any special circumstances which would enable the husband to succeed in this case.

Appeal dismissed with costs.
Leave to appeal to the House of Lords refused.

* DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC PROSECUTIONS v. MILBANKE TOURS LTD.

Aircraft — Carriage by air — Nationalisation — Private aircraft company—Flights organised by association for own members—Public becoming members of association to participate in tours—"Scheduled "journey"—Meaning—Air Corporations Act, 1949 (12, 13 & 14 Geo. 6, c. 91), s. 24.

The Air Corporations Act, 1949, provides by section 24 (1) that it shall be an offence for any person, other than the corporations or their associates, "to carry passengers or goods by air for hire or "reward upon any scheduled journey between two places of which "at least one is in the United Kingdom." By subsection (2) "scheduled journey" is defined as "one of a series of journeys "which are undertaken between the same two places and which "together amount to a systematic service operated in such a manner "that the benefits thereof are available to members of the public "from time to time seeking to take advantage of it."

The defendants, travel agents, were agents for the International English Language Association, whose objects were the advancement of a greater knowledge of the English language. Any member of the public willing to declare his support for the objects and aims of I.E.L.A. was eligible for membership on payment of an annual subscription of one guinea. I.E.L.A. chartered aircraft from a private company to take their own members on foreign tours which they were legally entitled to do. The defendants advertised and took bookings for their own "Flair Tours." The defendants required permission from the Minister under section 24 (3) (c) of the Act of 1949 to transport their clients by aeroplane. Their applications for permission were refused, but they did not so inform their clients. Shortly before the clients were due to commence their journeys they were informed that they could not travel as arranged, but if they would join I.E.L.A. they could go on the association's tours which were on the same dates and to the same places as Flair Tours. The defendants' clients joined I.E.L.A. and departed on their journeys as arranged. Informations were preferred against the defendants charging that they, not being one of the corporations or associates under the Act of 1949, carried passengers for reward on a scheduled journey contrary to section 24. The magistrates were of opinion that all the persons who travelled on the occasions referred to in the informations were bona fide members of I.E.L.A. and dismissed the informations:—

Held, that on the true construction of section 24 (2) the subsection had to be read as if the words "as such" were inserted after "members of the public"; and that, as all passengers were found to be bona fide members of the I.E.L.A., they were not members of the public as such and, therefore, no offences had been committed.

CASE STATED by Middlesex justices, sitting at Feltham.

Sixteen informations were preferred by the Director of Public Prosecutions against the defendants, Milbanke Tours Ltd., that they, not being one of the corporations or associates under the Air Corporations Act, 1949, carried passengers for reward upon a scheduled journey contrary to section 24 [1] of the Act. informations related to flights between London Airport and Palma on August 15, 22, 29, September 19, 26, and October 10 and 17, 1958, respectively; six informations related to flights between London Airport and Nice on August 17, 24, 31, and September 7, 14 and 21 respectively; three informations related to flights between London Airport and Perpignan on August 10, 24, and September 7 respectively.

The following facts were stated by the magistrates: The defendants carried on the business of a travel agency. Hunting Clan Air Transport Ltd. (referred to as Hunting Clan) owned and operated aircraft and carried on the business of passenger and goods air transport carriers. They were not an associate, servant or agents of the corporations within the meaning of sections 15 (3) and 24 of the Act of 1949. International English Language Association (referred to as I.E.L.A.) was an association formed in 1954 and having as its objects, inter alia, the advancement throughout the world of a greater knowledge of the English language. It published a journal every two months. Any member of the public who was willing to declare his support for the objects and aims of I.E.L.A. and to pay an annual subscription of one guinea was eligible for election to membership. Applications for membership were made by completing a printed form. To obtain the approval of the Minister of Civil Aviation to arrangements to carry parties of passengers on a series of journeys organised as a tour under section 24 (3) (c) of the Act of 1949, application was made to the Air Transport Advisory Council, which council advised the Minister, and the Minister generally granted or refused the application in accordance with that advice. Applications were usually granted if the proposed journeys did not interfere with British European Airways Corporation services.

For the 1958 holiday season the defendants advertised as "Flair Holidays" arrangements for holiday accommodation at certain hotels in Majorca, the Italian Riviera and Spain together with air transport at inclusive prices. For the purpose of providing this air transport Hunting Clan, at the request and on behalf of the defendants, made applications for the Minister's approval of arrangements under section 24 to carry parties on a series of journeys between London Airport and Palma, Nice and Perpignan. Those applications were made in May, 1957, September, 1957, and February, 1958, and each was refused. The defendants were notified of those refusals, notification in respect of the refusal of the last application being made to them on or about May 12, 1958. I.E.L.A. also advertised as available to its members holiday accommodation and air transport, and in connection therewith the defendants acted as agents for I.E.L.A. The hotels so advertised were the same hotels as those advertised by the defendants for its Flair Tours. Particulars of the holiday accommodation and air transport which I.E.L.A. advertised as available to its members were set out in its journal for January–February, 1958. For the purpose of providing air transport for its members I.E.L.A. chartered aircraft from Hunting Clan. Hunting Clan had no knowledge of the fact, if it were the fact, that any persons other than bona fide members of I.E.L.A. were carried by Hunting Clan on the aircraft chartered by I.E.L.A. There were other groups or organisations in the habit of chartering aircraft for carrying their members, which included the Royal Automobile Club and the Ski Club of Great Britain. Between October, 1957, and September, 1958, the defendants accepted bookings for Flair Tours from persons who at the date of booking were members of the public. Sixteen witnesses who had booked for themselves and others a total of 32 Flair Tours were called by the prosecutor, and the evidence which each gave was set out in the case stated. That evidence showed that all except two of the witnesses had paid deposits; that a short time before they were due to depart on their holidays (in many cases after the balance of the fares had been paid) they were informed of the cancellation of Flair Tours. At the same time they were informed of the existence of I.E.L.A. The majority of the witnesses stated specifically that they only joined I.E.L.A. in order to be able to go on their holidays as arranged. They all departed on the same dates and to the same destinations as they had originally booked.

At the close of the prosecution's case a submission was made on behalf of the defendants that on the evidence called by the prosecution there was no case in law to answer and, alternatively, that the evidence was not sufficient to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the offences charged, or any of them, had been committed.

It was contended on behalf of the prosecution that the flights of aircraft constituted scheduled journeys within the meaning of section 24 (2) of the Act of 1949, and that the evidence disclosed that the defendants had committed the offences charged either as principals acting through innocent agents, or as aiders and abettors of Hunting Clan or I.E.L.A.

It was contended on behalf of the defendants that (a) as I.E.L.A. had a bona fide organisation in which all the persons who travelled on the occasions referred to had either applied for or accepted membership, and as travelling on such occasions had been confined to members of I.E.L.A. the prosecution had not proved that the benefit of such systematic service (if any) as there was had been made available to members of the public from time to time seeking to take advantage of it; (b) as the allegation made against the defendants in each case was that they had carried passengers for reward on scheduled journeys, it was necessary for the prosecution to prove that the defendants had in fact carried passengers. That the prosecution had failed to do, as it was manifest from the charter agreements between Hunting Clan and I.E.L.A. that Hunting Clan had carried the passengers, not the defendants or I.E.L.A. Further, the prosecution could not get round that difficulty by submitting that, although the defendants were charged as principals, they could be convicted for having aided and abetted someone else to commit the offences charged, since the only other persons who could have committed the offences were Hunting Clan, and the evidence relating to them was that they had no knowledge of the fact (if it were the fact) that any persons other than bona fide members of I.E.L.A. had travelled on aircraft chartered by that association.

The magistrates were referred to Ackroyd Air Travel Ltd. v. Director of Public Prosecutions.[2]

The magistrates were of opinion that (1) all the persons who travelled on the occasions referred to in the informations were bona fide members of I.E.L.A.; (2) Hunting Clan were entitled to carry such persons as passengers for reward on scheduled journeys; (3) the defendants were not such carriers, and they dismissed the informations without calling on the defendants to call evidence, and ordered the prosecutor to pay five guineas costs on each summons.

Ackroyd Air Travel Ltd. v. Director of Public Prosecutions[2] was referred to in argument.

LORD PARKER C.J. This is an appeal by way of case stated by justices of the County of Middlesex sitting at Feltham, before whom 16 informations were preferred by the prosecutor against the defendants for that the defendants, not being one of the corporations or associates dealt with by the Air Corporations Act, 1949, carried passengers for reward on a scheduled journey, contrary to section 24 of the Act.

At the end of the case for the prosecution a submission was made that there was no case in law to answer, or, alternatively, that the evidence was not sufficient to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the offences charged had been committed. The magistrates upheld that submission and, without calling on the defendants, dismissed the informations.

Before dealing with the facts it is convenient, I think, to refer to the Air Corporations Act, 1949. By section 24 it is provided that, except as therein set out, the corporations and their associates shall in effect have a monopoly. [His Lordship read section 24 (1), (2) and (3) (c), and continued:] By subsection (5), "A person "who carries a passenger, or carries any goods, in contravention "of the provisions" shall be guilty of an offence.

The facts, quite shortly, are these: The defendants, Milbanke Tours Ltd., carry on business as a travel agency at 164, Piccadilly.

[2] [1950] 1 All E.R. 933, D.C.

They were also, in that capacity, agents for a body known as the International English Language Association (referred to throughout as I.E.L.A.), whose objects were the advancement throughout the world of a greater knowledge of the English language. It issued a journal every two months, and any member of the public who was willing to declare his support for the objects and aims of I.E.L.A. was eligible for membership on payment of an annual subscription of a guinea.

I.E.L.A. ran tours, and for that purpose they had entered into charters with Hunting Clan Air Transport Ltd., which was an operating company and was not an associate, servant or agent of the corporations. There is no doubt that in their journal they advertised tours, and tours which would amount to a systematic service within subsection (2) of section 24 of the Act, but so long as it was confined to members no consent of the Minister was required.

As I have already said, the defendants acted as travel agents for I.E.L.A. The material tours with which we are concerned were to take place in August, September and October of 1958. The defendants, in the meanwhile, on their own behalf, advertised tours, and it is significant that the tours which they advertised, and which are referred to as Flair Tours, were tours on the same dates and to the same places as the tours advertised by I.E.L.A. In due course they took a number of bookings for these Flair Tours. Those bookings were arranged as early as January and February of 1958, at a time when they had not, as yet, received the permission which they would have to have under section 24 (3) (c) from the Minister to carry parties on those journeys. Whether that is an advisable practice or not I do not know, but they certainly were advertising these tours without having got permission. Hunting Clan Ltd., on their behalf, applied for permission, and, indeed, applications had been made in May and September, 1957, and had been refused; and in February, 1958, at the time when these bookings were being made, Hunting Clan again approached the Minister for his consent under subsection (3) (c). On May 12, 1958, that was refused, yet the defendants did not then inform the unfortunate people who had booked Flair Tours of what had happened. The bookings were in January and February. May passed, June and July. In some cases, beginning in July, the persons who had booked these tours paid the balance of their money, still not realising that it was impossible for them to be carried as arranged.

Then—whether it was the object all along or not—the idea was conceived of transferring these bookings in effect to I.E.L.A. Thereupon, at the last moment, letters were sent, either by I.E.L.A. or, more often, I think, by the defendants, to the people who had booked, saying in effect: "If you will pay a guinea and "join I.E.L.A. you can have exactly the holiday that you had "planned because I.E.L.A.'s tours were on the same dates and "at the same places as the advertised Flair Tours." Thereupon the 16 people in respect of which these 16 informations were preferred felt that they either had to sacrifice their holidays, because it was too late to make other arrangements, or pay their guinea and join I.E.L.A. They all did join; they received their membership cards; and they went off on the I.E.L.A. tour.

It is perhaps of significance that the price charged, or that was to be charged, by the defendants for their Flair Tours was one guinea more than the corresponding tours of I.E.L.A., so that when the guinea was added to the fare charged by I.E.L.A. it was exactly the same as the price charged by the defendants.

Whether or not that is (and I think it is) highly reprehensible conduct on the part of travel agents—booking tours without knowing whether they can carry them out, then when they hear it cannot be carried out still telling the unfortunate people who have booked nothing about it, and then, at the end, saying: "Well, you either sacrifice your holiday or you join I.E.L.A."—is really not a matter for this court. The sole question is: "Has "it been shown that they are guilty of an offence against "section 24?"

On that a number of matters arise. First of all, was there a systematic service? As to that, Mr. Lawson, for the defendants, admits that there was, and from the table that has been put in I should have thought there plainly was.

The second question is, if there was a systematic service, was it operated in such a manner that the benefits thereof were available to members of the public from time to time seeking to take advantage of it?

Finally, the third question is, did the defendants carry persons on such a scheduled journey or, if they did not, who did, and can they be held guilty of aiding and abetting?

I find it only necessary to consider what I call the second question: Was this a service operated in such a manner that the benefits thereof were available to members of the public from time to time seeking to take advantage of it? The magistrates stated that they found that all the persons who travelled on the occasions referred to in the informations were bona fide members of I.E.L.A. It is, I think, perfectly clear that I.E.L.A.—and nobody suggests to the contrary—was a perfectly genuine, reputable association. There was clearly evidence on which the magistrates could find that all those who travelled were in fact bona fide members of I.E.L.A. Can it then be said, nevertheless, that this service was available to members of the public? I find it very difficult to say that it was available to members of the public. Of course it was available to members of the public in the same sense as when any reputable organisation advertises tours and indicates as one of the inducements to join the association that if the member of the public pays his guinea, or two guineas, or whatever it may be, he could have the advantage of cheap tours. To that extent the service would be operated for the benefit of members of the public, namely, such members of the public as took advantage of their offer and joined the organisation.

I think it is clear that in the provision in section 24 (2) one must read in some such words as "as such" after "public," so that it would read: "a systematic service operated in such a "manner that the benefits thereof are available to members of the "public as such from time to time seeking to take advantage of "it."

Here it was not available to members of the public as such, but only available to such members of the public as joined the organisation—in this case joined I.E.L.A.

One can imagine cases where it could be said that the whole thing was a sham, where, in effect, there was no proper organisation, but where the price of the tour was split up, that is to say, as to £49 fare and £1 fee to join some bogus organisation in an attempt to get round the section. But there is no suggestion of that here, and I cannot see that the magistrates could have held otherwise than they did, namely, that those who travelled were bona fide members of I.E.L.A.; and I would add, although they have not found it, that the only way in which it could be said that it was available to members of the public was that the net was cast pretty wide, and it was made clear that any member of the public who paid his guinea was eligible, and for that guinea he would have the advantage of this holiday.

Reprehensible as the conduct of these defendants may have been, I agree with the magistrates that no prima facie case was made out, and, accordingly, I would dismiss this appeal.

I would only add that in these circumstances I find it unnecessary to consider the further question as to who were the carriers in this case, and whether it can be said that the defendants, if they were not the carriers, were aiders and abettors.

DONOVAN J. I agree, and I add a few words only because of the importance of the case. It is easy to understand the annoyance felt by the prosecutor in this matter because the arrangements made for side-stepping the Act were, as my Lord has said, blatant, but they may nonetheless be effective.

The crucial question is whether the benefits of these services were available to members of the public. They were, says the prosecutor, because anyone can join this association, and the persons here concerned, namely, the passengers, joined simply to get their holiday and, in some cases, as a matter almost of coercion. That may well be true, but the fact that anyone can join an association, and does so not because he wants to further the association's objects but for purely selfish reasons of his own, does not prevent him from being a member once he has joined. The case here finds that the passengers in question travelled as bona fide members of the association.

The contrast which section 24 (2) of the Air Corporations Act, 1949, draws is, in my opinion, a contrast between members of the public as such and persons who can benefit from a service not available to members of the public as such. Here these services were available only to members of the association, and nonetheless so because, as members of the public, they could join the association with ease.

DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC PROSECUTIONS v. MILBANKE TOURS LTD.

Donovan J.

There are, as my Lord pointed out during the course of the argument, a number of perfectly reputable and genuine associations, other than I.E.L.A., who, no doubt, number among their members persons who have joined solely, or principally, for the benefit of the incidental advantages which membership confers—among them, perhaps, cheap travel—and the proposition for which the prosecutor here contends will look very different when it is applied to such associations. Ease of membership and the motive of joining are really, in my view, irrelevant considerations, and in a case like this I think the prosecutor must go the whole length of saying that the association or the membership—either, I think, will do—is a sham or, as has been said in some cases, a mere simulacrum or cloak. That is not being contended here and, indeed, it is expressly found that the passengers were bona fide members, which involves also that the association was a bona fide association.

In these circumstances I also agree that the appeal must be dismissed, and I, too, find it unnecessary to say who in law was the carrier or were the carriers here.

DAVIES J. I agree. In my opinion the magistrates were entitled on the evidence given by the prosecution to make their first finding that all the persons who travelled on the occasions referred to in the informations were bona fide members of I.E.L.A. Applying that to the Act, it seems to me to mean this, that, on the date of each of the 16 carriages, which were the subject of these 16 informations, the benefits of the service were not available to members of the public as such, and therefore the offences charged were not proved.

I also agree that it is unnecessary to consider, and I do not consider, whether the magistrates were right in the opinions they expressed as to whether or not the defendants were the actual carriers.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Premises were used by a company for the construction and testing of prototype vehicles and parts therefor with a view to the development of a new type of transport vehicle; the company was a subsidiary wholly subsidised by the parent company and nothing constructed on the premises was sold. The company contended that it was an industrial hereditament entitled to the benefit of industrial derating. The rating authority conceded that it was a factory within the definition in section 149 (1) (a) [1] of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, but contended that it was not used for factory purposes within the meaning of the proviso to section 3 (1) of the Rating and Valuation Act, 1928.[2]

The Lands Tribunal accepted the evidence of the secretary of the company "that the object of the work done is the construction of "prototypes and parts and the testing of them for the purposes of

HARRY FERGUSON RESEARCH LTD. v. DAWKINS.

"finding out whether an idea is good and practical, and the only "product of the premises is a prototype and parts therefor":—

Held, (1) that on the evidence the primary purpose was to find out whether an idea was good or practical, and by necessary inference the construction of machines was subsidiary and incidental to that main purpose: the premises were not therefore used for factory purposes and were not an industrial hereditament entitled to the benefit of industrial derating.

Grove v. Lloyds British Testing Co. Ltd. [1931] A.C. 450; 47 T.L.R. 308 (H.L.) applied.

(2) That in determining whether the premises fell within the proviso to section 3 (1) of the Act of 1928, it was of no materiality to consider whether or not the work done on the premises was done by way of trade or for purposes of gain.

APPEAL from the Lands Tribunal (Mr. H. P. Hobbs).

By a decision dated October 30, 1959, the Lands Tribunal, on a reference to arbitration in respect of two proposals concerning an assessment of a hereditament described as offices, research establishment and premises at Approach Road, Bagington, Warwickshire, owned by Harry Ferguson Research Ltd. (a subsidiary of Harry Ferguson Holdings Ltd.), held that the hereditament in question was an industrial hereditament.

The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment of Hodson L.J.: The hereditament was a factory building taken by the company in June, 1956, and used by them for the purpose of developing a revolutionary type of transport vehicle. The following facts were proved: "At the date of the first proposal the "hereditament consisted of a machine shop, main workshop, "engine test house, drawing office and other offices and ancillary "buildings together with a car park. By the date of the second "proposal, a new office block had been erected enabling the main "workshop area to be enlarged. The type of work done on the "hereditament consists of the construction and testing of proto-"type vehicles and of the making and testing of parts to go into "those vehicles. This work is in connection with the develop-"ment of a new type of transport vehicle, the ideas for which "originated in the main with the chairman of the company, and "embody patents which were acquired in 1950 . . . The vehicle "is still in the process of research and development and is not "yet available to the public." Further facts proved were: "(a) The work done by the company at this hereditament "embraced most elements of a vehicle but especially the suspen-"sion, transmission, braking and driving. (b) At the date of the "hearing four prototype vehicles had been constructed. These "were all in existence but had not yet reached finality. (c) The "prototype can be used for the purpose of practical demonstra-"tion. (d) For manufacture in bulk outside the hereditament "complete sets of blue prints would be supplied. (e) The "development of the ideas tested in the prototype and the "necessary work of design and drawing took place on the "hereditament."

The member of the Lands Tribunal made an inspection of the hereditament on December 15, 1959, when he saw the drawing office as well as the various workshops mentioned in the decision. The process involved that the inventor's conception had to be expressed in blue prints and the design had to be tested to see whether it worked in practice. It was to this end that prototypes were required. His Lordship found that in those operations something was made which gave the premises a factory flavour.

It was conceded that the premises were a factory within the definition in section 149 (1) of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, and the remaining question was whether they were precluded from being an industrial hereditament by the proviso to section 3 (1) of the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928.

The Lands Tribunal found the following facts: "I [the "member of the tribunal] accept the evidence of Mr. J. R. "Peacock, the secretary of Harry Ferguson Research Ltd., Harry "Ferguson Holdings Ltd. and H. F. Holdings Ltd., that the "object of the work done here is the construction of prototypes "and parts and the testing of them for the purpose of finding out "whether an idea is good and practical, and the only product of "the premises is a prototype and parts therefor." The Lands Tribunal also accepted the evidence of the company's witness when he said: "that the prototype was one of the most important "articles in the business as it was relied upon for the purpose of "demonstrating principles. This is a relatively small works and "is not adapted for manufacture of cars for sale to the public; "as I have said the final product is the completed prototype or "perfected parts; manufacture in bulk cannot be undertaken in "the premises as they now are."

The Lands Tribunal came to the conclusion that the hereditament was an industrial hereditament and the rating authority appealed from that decision.

by saying that he found that the hereditament was an industrial hereditament and not within the proviso. Immediately before the conclusion, as if it were the basis of that conclusion, he said this: "The receipts of the appellants [the company] arise almost "wholly from payments made by the parent company, and I think "that these payments are made not to finance research as such, "but to enable research to be carried out with the object of "placing either a new type of vehicle or new type components or "parts of vehicles on the market, and it seems to me that the "work done by the appellants is by way of trade or for the pur-"poses of gain, though these are indirect and nothing comes out "of the factory which is immediately saleable to the general "public."

With all respect to the Lands Tribunal, I do not think that the question of ultimate gain is relevant to the question under consideration, although, of course, it would be relevant had the question been, are the premises a factory within the definition contained in the subsection which I have read, section 149 (1) (c) of the Act of 1901? It has not been suggested that the activities of the company are altruistic: but the contention before the Lands Tribunal and in this court was that the primary purposes of the factory are not factory purposes but research purposes, the work being of an experimental nature involving the making and perfecting of a design, and it is contended that the purpose of the operation is to produce a design, the end product being a blue print which can be used elsewhere in practice.

Reliance was placed on a decision of the House of Lords in Grove v. Lloyds British Testing Co. Ltd.[1] In that case, there was a conflict of judicial opinion in the lower courts on the question of whether the hereditament was a factory; but the matter relevant to this case appears in the speech of Lord Dunedin. The factory in question, a cable testing station occupied by Lloyds British Testing Co. Ltd., was engaged in testing cables and anchors, and it was used for forging links to join up chains which had been severed in the process of testing. When the admission was made that the premises were a factory, the argument turned on the question whether or not the primary purpose was a factory purpose. Lord Dunedin said[2]: "Undoubtedly, there is in the "works the forging of links to join up the chains which have been "severed, and that forging gives to the premises the character "of a factory. The Attorney-General admits this in his case, "but then he says: 'True, it becomes a factory, but it is not an "'industrial hereditament because it is struck at by clause (f) "'of section 3 (1), namely, being primarily occupied and used for "'other purposes which are not those of a factory or workshop.' "Now, the question, put in this way, was, as I have said, not "dealt with in the courts below. In answer to the argument of "the Attorney-General, Mr. Comyns Carr presented an argument

"to this effect: 'This is,' he said, 'admittedly a factory, but this "'factory has only one purpose, to wit, testing. Therefore, it "'cannot be said that it is mainly used for a purpose which is "'not a factory purpose.' This argument is very ingenious, and "seems, at first sight, difficult to answer, but, on consideration, "I am satisfied that it is unsound. One must begin by remem-"bering that, in considering this argument, testing alone is, ex "hypothesi, not a factory purpose. The purpose of a particular "factory must be gathered from that which makes it a factory. "If it was made a factory because it fell within an actual descrip-"tion in Part I of the Schedule, you must gather the purpose "from that description. Here the hereditament is made a factory "because of the manufacture of articles of metal. Therefore, "so far as this hereditament is a factory, its purpose is the manu-"facture of metal. But the hereditament is, without doubt, "primarily occupied and used for the purposes of testing opera-"tions, and such operations are, ex hypothesi, not factory "purposes, consequently the case falls within the words of the "exception, and the hereditament, although a factory, is not an "industrial hereditament."

It is submitted by the valuation officer, upon whom is the burden of showing what the primary purpose is, that research, like testing, is not a factory purpose, and he emphasises that the word "research" does not appear in any of the definitions of a factory. If testing is a primary purpose it matters not that articles are made, such as prototypes. The work carried on prior to manufacture is no more a factory purpose than, say, the testing in the Grove case.[3] Making the article is an incidental part of the research process, and, as it were, the middle part of the operation.

Mr. Widdicombe, on behalf of the company, seeks to distinguish the Grove case[3] on the facts by emphasising that the Lands Tribunal has inspected the factory and has come to the conclusion that, whatever may be the position of the testing of anchor chains, where admittedly factory operations were carried out, the manufacture of the prototype is truly a primary purpose of this factory.

In my view of the evidence, which was accepted by the Lands Tribunal, which I have read, that is to say, the evidence of Mr. Peacock, the question has, I think, been answered in favour of the rating authority by the finding that the object of the work being done was the primary purpose, or, as it is put in the finding of fact, "the purpose is to find out whether an idea is good or "practical." This is entirely different from saying that the construction of the prototype is the primary object of the factory. In my judgment, the conclusion which the Lands Tribunal finally reached is inconsistent with the conclusion which was foreshadowed by an acceptance of the evidence of Mr. Peacock, and, accordingly, I would allow the appeal.

HARRY FERGUSON RESEARCH LTD. v. DAWKINS.

WILLMER L.J. I agree that this appeal must be allowed. The sole question raised by the case is whether the tribunal came to a correct decision in law in finding that this hereditament is an industrial hereditament within section 3 (1) of the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928. By that section an industrial hereditament is defined as a hereditament occupied and used as a factory, subject to the proviso that the expression does not include a hereditament occupied and used as a factory if it is primarily occupied and used for any of a number of defined purposes, including purposes which are not those of a factory. By subsection (2) the expression "factory" is given "the same "meaning as in the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1901 to 1920."

It is admitted by the rating authority that the company's hereditament is a factory within section 149 (1) (a) of the Act of 1901, in that it comes within the description contained in paragraph (13) of Part I of the Sixth Schedule, as consisting of premises in which mechanical power is used for moving machinery employed in the manufacture of machinery or articles of metal. Mr. Widgery did not admit, though he was not concerned to deny, that the hereditament might also be a factory within paragraph (c) of the same section, in that it comprises premises wherein manual labour is exercised by way of trade, or for purposes of gain in or incidental to the purpose of making any article or part of an article. He contended, however, that this is not a relevant question; for once it is admitted that the hereditament is a factory under paragraph (a) it matters not whether it is also a factory under paragraph (c). The only relevant question, he contended, is whether the hereditament, assuming it to be a factory under one paragraph or the other, falls within the proviso to section 3 (1) of the Act of 1928, so as to be excluded from the definition of industrial hereditament.

It appears that a good deal of the argument before the tribunal was directed to the question whether the work done in the company's hereditament was done by way of trade or for purposes of gain. I agree with Mr. Widgery's submission that this question, while directly relevant in considering whether the hereditament be a factory, is of no materiality in determining whether it falls within the proviso to section 3 (1) of the Act of 1928. The member of the tribunal, however, having found that the work done is by way of trade or for the purposes of gain, went on to find that for that reason the hereditament is an industrial hereditament. This appears to me to be a complete non sequitur, for the question whether a factory is an industrial hereditament within the Act of 1928 does not depend on whether the work done there is by way of trade or for the purposes of gain.

Let it be assumed that the company exercises labour by way of trade and for the purposes of gain (albeit indirectly) in the making of articles, such as the prototypes and parts thereof, in their hereditament. Let it be assumed that this supplies an additional reason for concluding that the hereditament is a factory within the meaning of the Act of 1901. The question still remains whether, being a factory for the purposes of that Act, it is primarily occupied and used for purposes other than factory purposes. Following the dictum of Lord Dunedin in Moon v. London County Council,[4] I construe "primarily" as meaning "mainly." The question which then has to be answered is, what is the main purpose for which the hereditament is occupied or used? I venture to draw attention to the use by the draftsman of the word "purpose." This, to my mind, connotes the subjective intention of the person occupying or using the hereditament. The question has to be solved by considering the purposes of the occupiers. If their main purpose is to make articles, then, without question, that is a factory purpose, the proviso to section 3 (1) of the Act does not apply, and the hereditament is plainly an industrial hereditament. But if the main purpose is something other than the mere making of articles, different considerations apply.

On this very point there was fortunately direct evidence before the tribunal, namely, that of Mr. Peacock, which was specifically accepted. Accepting this evidence, the tribunal found "that the "object of the work done here is the construction of prototypes "and parts and the testing of them for the purpose of finding out "whether an idea is good and practical." I would venture to italicise the words "for the purpose of finding out whether an idea "is good and practical," because it seems to me that the finding of this purpose is really conclusive in favour of the rating authority. It is a finding which involves, as a necessary inference, that the manufacture of articles, i.e., the prototypes and parts, is subsidiary and incidental to the main or primary purpose. In my judgment, this finding renders the present case indistinguishable in principle from Grove v. Lloyds British Testing Co.[5] In that case the hereditament in question was admittedly a factory within the meaning of section 149 (1) of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, because, in the course of testing the chain cables, articles, namely, additional links, were manufactured. But this work of manufacturing links was found to be merely incidental to the main purpose for which the hereditament was occupied and used, namely, the testing of cables. Since testing of cables was not a factory purpose, it was held by the House of Lords that the hereditament fell within the proviso to section 3 (1) of the Act of 1928, so that it was not an industrial hereditament.

In my judgment, the same result should follow in the present case. As in Grove's case,[5] so here, the main or primary purpose for which the hereditament is occupied and used is experimental. Manufacture takes place only for the purpose of aiding, and as incidental to, the work of experiment, which is not a factory purpose. On the finding of the tribunal, which I have already quoted, as to the purpose of the work that is done, only one conclusion is, in my judgment, open, namely, that this hereditament is primarily occupied and used for a purpose which is not a factory purpose, and, accordingly, it is not an industrial hereditament.

It follows, therefore, that the appeal succeeds.

DEVLIN L.J. Is what is going on in this factory the making of prototypes or the trying out of a new idea? The obvious answer is both. But the Act requires that one of the two should be put first. Are prototypes being made for the purpose of testing the idea, or has the idea been conceived for the purpose of making prototypes? When, as here, all the facts are known, I think this is a question of law, because the answer to it depends on the meaning and intent of the Act. The matter hardly admits of elaboration. There is nothing to be done on a question of this sort except to answer it one way or the other according to the best of one's judgment, and I say that the prototypes are being made for the purpose of testing out the idea. If this be so, it is not disputed that the appeal should be allowed, and I, therefore, agree with the judgments which my Lords have delivered.

Appeal allowed with costs; hereditament to go back to Part I of the Valuation List at the agreed figures.
Leave to appeal to the House of Lords.

PRACTICE NOTE.

Company—Winding up—Appeal from liquidator—Rejection of proof by liquidator—Whether court should consider rights of claimant in light of evidence before liquidator—Whether matter to be considered de novo—Companies (Winding-Up) Rules, 1949 (S.I. 1949, No. 330 (*L.*4)), r. 108.

MOTION.

A petition to wind up a company, Kentwood Constructions Ltd., was presented on April 24, 1958. At about the same time the claimants, Stoy, Haywood & Co., chartered accountants, were employed to investigate the company's affairs. On June 12, 1958, at an informal meeting of creditors, it was resolved that the company's business should be carried on thereafter under the supervision of Cyril Metliss, a partner in the claimants' firm. On February 2, 1959, the company was ordered to be wound up.

On March 24, 1959, the claimants lodged a proof of debt in the winding up for £525 for professional services rendered to the company during the year 1958 to 1959. The liquidator rejected the proof on August 10, 1959. On August 25, 1959, the claimants issued a summons asking that the decision of the liquidator might be reversed and the proof be ordered to be admitted in full. The claimants filed an affidavit in support of their claim exhibiting three files of documents in connection with the company's affairs. The liquidator filed an affidavit in answer and the claimants a further affidavit in reply. The registrar dismissed the claimants' appeal from the rejection of their proof, and they moved the court to discharge the registrar's order.

This case is reported only as to the functions of the court on an appeal from a rejection of a proof of debt by a liquidator.

Morris Finer for the claimants.

John Bolland for the liquidator, Henry Charles Treby.

No cases were cited in argument.

BUCKLEY J. considered issues in the motion not relevant to this report, and continued: Counsel for the claimants submitted that, in proceedings such as this, the court must decide what amount was proper to be paid on a quantum meruit basis in just the same way as it would in an ordinary action for remuneration based on a quantum meruit. Counsel admitted that the onus initially rested on him to establish that he had done work meriting the amount of remuneration which his clients claimed; but he contended that on the evidence he had discharged that onus, or that, at any rate, he had discharged it to a sufficient extent to shift the onus to the liquidator to show that the amount claimed was in fact excessive and unreasonable. He said that the case which he had come to meet was not that the claim was insufficiently substantiated by evidence but that the amount claimed was excessive, and he argued that the liquidator was not justified in rejecting a proof in whole merely on the ground that the claim was excessive, for, if the liquidator regarded the claim as excessive, he must by implication at least, be bound to admit the claim in part, although he might be entitled to reject the proof because he had not been provided with sufficient evidence to quantify that part. It was argued on behalf of the liquidator that the question before the registrar was simply whether the liquidator was right or wrong, on the evidence available to him at the date when he rejected the proof, in rejecting the proof.

I do not think that is really the function of the court on an appeal from a rejection of a proof. When application is made to the court to reverse a decision of a liquidator in rejecting a proof, evidence is filed which is very commonly much fuller than the evidence available to the liquidator at the time when he decides to reject the proof; and the court is bound to decide the rights of the claimant in the light of the evidence which is before the court, and not merely to express a view as to whether the liquidator was right or wrong in rejecting the proof when he rejected it. It is, perhaps, significant that the Companies (Winding-Up) Rules, 1949, provide by rule 108 that if a creditor or contributory is dissatisfied with the decision of the liquidator in respect of a proof, the court may, on the application of the creditor or contributory, reverse or vary the decision. It is not merely the function of the court to say that a decision is right or wrong; it may vary it in any way it thinks necessary in the light of the evidence before the court. The court must approach the question de novo and determine to what extent the claimants ought to be allowed to rank as a proving creditor.

[His Lordship then reviewed the evidence before the court and held that the claimants were entitled to be admitted as creditors of the company for £525, the full amount claimed.]

Order that the order of the registrar be discharged; that the decision of the liquidator be reversed, and that the proof be admitted in the winding-up for £525. Claimants' costs to be paid out of the assets of the company.

By an Inclosure Act of 1801, and an award made under it, certain corn rents were vested in the rector of Scremby and his successors, now, by virtue of the Tithe Act, 1925, and the Church Commissioners Measure, 1947, the Church Commissioners. The Act provided that the amount of the rents, inter alia, should be determined by reference to the "average price of good marketable "wheat in the County of Lincoln during the term of 21 years "ending at Michaelmas, 1799," which price was ascertained by the award to be 5 7/10ths shillings per Winchester bushel. The Act further provided that the amount of the rents payable should be varied at intervals of 21 years as declared by an order of quarter sessions if from the report of three arbitrators it appeared that the "average price" of a Winchester bushel of good marketable wheat in the County of Lincoln for the 21 years then last past was more or less by threepence than the average price set out in the award.

The corn rents payable were last varied in July, 1896, when the average price was found to be 4s. 3½d. On March 5, 1959, on the application of the Church Commissioners, quarter sessions appointed three arbitrators to inquire into and ascertain the average price of a Winchester bushel of good marketable wheat for the last 21 years. The arbitrators found that such average price was 10s. 1d., and that, in addition to the sum received from the purchaser, the grower received deficiency payments under the Cereals (Deficiency of Payments) Order, 1955,[1] which for the 21 years ending March 5, 1959, averaged 11d. a Winchester bushel, and they awarded the average price for the 21 years to be 11s. Quarter sessions were of the opinion that the deficiency payments should not be included in the average price, and ordered that the rents be increased in the proportion that 10s. 1d. bears to 5 7/10ths shillings. On a case stated by quarter sessions in which the question for the opinion of the court was whether the deficiency payments ought to have been included as part of the average price and which set out alternative orders:—

Held, (1) that, although the matter might appear to be administrative in that there was no obligation to hear any parties, the fact that Parliament had given the decision to a court which had power to consult the judges, showed that quarter sessions in making the declaration and order were acting judicially and, therefore, had power to state a case.

was the consideration which the buyer agreed to give and the seller to accept and that, on the construction of the Act, the scheme of which was not that the land should be revalued, but that the rents should be paid whether or not the owners grew any wheat, there was no reason to extend the meaning of the word to include the deficiency payments which bore no relation to the value of the wheat. The decision of quarter sessions, accordingly, was correct.

Per Donovan J. The ordinary and natural meaning of the word "price" does not include a subsidy which a third person may or may not decide to pay after the transaction is concluded.

CASE STATED by Lincoln, Parts of Lindsey, Quarter Sessions.

On hearing, on July 2 and September 15, 1959, an application by the appellants, the Church Commissioners for England, for an order and declaration that the Scremby Corn Rents, yearly corn rents payable to the Church Commissioners by virtue of an award made pursuant to Act of Parliament, be increased in the proportion that 11s. bears to 5 7/10ths shillings, quarter sessions refused to make the order and declaration, but ordered and declared that the Scremby Corn Rents payable be increased in the proportion that 10s. 1d. bears to 5 7/10ths shillings, subject to the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice on the following case.

By an Act of Parliament passed in 1801 (41 Geo. 3, c. CXXIV), entitled "An Act for dividing, allotting and inclosing the open "common fields, meadows, pastures and other commonable lands "and waste grounds within the parish of Scremby in the County "of Lincoln," and by virtue of the award made under that Act, the Scremby corn rents were vested in the rector of Scremby and his successors for the time being, and by virtue of the provisions of the Tithe Act, 1925, and the Church Commissioners Measure, 1947, were now vested in the Church Commissioners.

It was provided by the Act of 1801 that the amount of the Scremby Corn Rents should, inter alia, be ascertained by reference to the average price of good marketable wheat in the County of Lincoln during the term of 21 years ending at Michaelmas, 1799, and by the award such price was so ascertained to be 5 7/10ths shillings per Winchester bushel. It was further provided by the Act that the amount of Scremby corn rent payable by virtue of such award should be varied at intervals of 21 years as declared by an order of the court at the appropriate general quarter sessions of the peace if from the report of three arbitrators or referees appointed by the court pursuant to the Act, it appeared that the average price of a Winchester bushel of good marketable wheat in the County of Lincoln for the 21 years then last past was more or less by threepence than the average price thereof set out in the award. The Scremby corn rents payable by virtue of the award were previously last varied by an order and declaration of quarter sessions made on July 3, 1896, when the average price of a Winchester bushel of good marketable wheat in the County of Lincoln for the 21 years then last past was found to be 4s. 3½d.

On an application, made on March 5, 1959, to quarter sessions, and on proof that notice had duly been given as required by the Act in the "London Gazette" and in a newspaper usually circulated in the County of Lincoln of the intention to make the application, an order was made appointing three arbitrators or referees to inquire into and ascertain in accordance with the provision of the Act the average price of a Winchester bushel of good marketable wheat in the County of Lincoln for the 21 years then last past. In their report [attached to and forming part of the case] the arbitrators found: "1. The average price of a Win-"chester bushel of good marketable wheat in the County of "Lincoln during the 21 years ended on March 5, 1959 (excluding "payments referred to in the next succeeding paragraph) to be "the sum of 10s. 1d. 2. That in addition to the sum that the "grower receives from the purchaser, the grower receives "deficiency payments under the Cereals Deficiency Payments "Scheme, and that in the 21 years ended March 5, 1959, these "deficiency payments averaged 11d. per Winchester bushel," and they awarded and determined "that the average price of a "Winchester bushel of good marketable wheat in the County of "Lincoln for the 21 years now last past . . . to be the sum of 11s."

The price and the sums of money referred to in paragraphs 1 and 2 of that report were correctly ascertained.

It was contended on behalf of the Church Commissioners that the report of the arbitrators was binding on the court, and the court was bound to accept their purported award and determination, and that, on the true construction of the Act of 1801, the payments made to the growers of wheat under or by virtue of the Cereals (Deficiency Payments) Order were properly included by the arbitrators when ascertaining the average price of a Winchester bushel of good marketable wheat in the County of Lincoln during the 21 years ending on March 5, 1959.

Quarter sessions were of the opinion that they were bound to examine the report of the arbitrators and to decide any questions of law which arose on its face; that the deficiency payments did not form part of the price in that (1) they were made at the discretion of the Minister; (2) they bore no direct relation to the price of wheat in the County of Lincoln; (3) they were a subsidy or bonus; (4) by virtue of regulation 5 (4) of the order the Minister could withhold deficiency payments, and (5) the word "price" in the Act referred to the price at which wheat was in fact sold in the County of Lincoln during the 21 year period, namely, the average realised price and not the standard price fixed by the Minister. They therefore ordered and declared that the Scremby corn rents be increased in the proportion that 10s. 1d. bears to 5 7/10ths shillings.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether that order and declaration of sessions was right, or whether the 11d. received by the grower of good marketable wheat under the Cereals Deficiency Payments Scheme ought to have been included as part of the average price of a Winchester bushel of good marketable wheat in the County of Lincoln for the 21 years ending on March 5, 1959. If the court should be of the opinion that the order and declaration of quarter sessions was right, then it was to be affirmed; if the orders were wrong, and the 11d. ought to have been taken into account, then the order and declaration was to be varied and the Scremby corn rents payable to the Church Commissioners by virtue of the award were to be increased in the proportion that 11s. bears to 5 7/10ths shillings.

The following cases were referred to in argument: In re Oliver[2]; Johnston, Fear & Kingham and The Offset Printing Co. Pty. Ltd. v. The Commonwealth[3]; Overseers of the Poor of Walsall v. L. & N. W. Railway Co.[4]; Rex v. Southampton Licensing Justices, Ex parte Cardy.[5]

LORD PARKER C.J. This is an appeal by way of case stated by the General Quarter Sessions of the Peace for the County of Lincoln, Parts of Lindsey, who determined the corn rents to be paid for the future in the parish of Scremby. The appeal is by the Church Commissioners and as, by the very nature of the proceedings, there are no respondents, I have had considerable doubt whether quarter sessions had power under the Act of 1801 to state what is, in effect, a consultative case for the opinion of the court. I say that because, on one view of the matter, quarter sessions were acting in an administrative capacity. They did not have to hear anybody, and the matter was largely a matter of discretion. Although under the old common law, which was dealt with by Lord Cairns L.C. in his speech in Walsall Overseers of the Poor v. London & North Western Railway Co.,[1] quarter sessions always had the power to state a case, I wondered whether, acting in this special jurisdiction, they were really acting judicially at all. However, I have come to the conclusion on the whole that they were, and that Parliament, by giving the duty to the court of quarter sessions, showed clearly that they were giving the decision not to an administrative tribunal but to a court, and a court which then, as was well known, had powers of consulting the judges. Accordingly, I assume for the purposes of this judgment that quarter sessions had power to state the case which they have done.

The matter concerns corn rents payable under an Act of 1801, passed in the 41st year of the reign of King George III, and entitled: "An act for dividing, allotting, and enclosing the open "common fields, meadows, pastures, and other commonable

"lands and waste grounds, within the parish of Scremby, in the "County of Lincoln." Under that Act, commissioners were appointed for a number of different duties as described in the title and, amongst other things, it provided for the abolition of tithes from the lands in the parish. It was enacted: "That the said "commissioners shall, and they are hereby required, . . . to value "all the residue of the said lands and grounds hereby directed to "be divided and enclosed, and also all the old enclosed lands and "other premises aforesaid within the said parish, which at the "time of passing this Act are liable to the payment of tithes." That was the first step the commissioners were to take. Then they were "From the London Gazette, or by such other ways "and means as they shall think proper, inquire and ascertain "what has been the average price of good marketable wheat in "the County of Lincoln during the term of 21 years, ending at "Michaelmas, which was in the year of our Lord One thousand "seven hundred and ninety-nine." That was the second thing they had to do. Thirdly, they "shall in and by their award or "instrument hereinafter directed to be made, ascertain, and "distinctly set forth what quantity of such wheat shall in their "judgment (according to such average price as aforesaid) be equal "in value to one-fifth part of the arable land, one-seventh part "of the meadow land, and one-ninth part of the pasture land "within the said parish of Scremby." Then, when all that had been done as provided by the Act, "there shall be payable to the "said rector and his successors, for the time being, out of the "lands and estates of the several proprietors in the said parish "of Scremby, such sum and sums of money as shall be equal to "the value of the quantity of wheat so to be ascertained by the "said commissioners, and apportioned upon the respective estates "of each proprietor, according to the average price aforesaid."

By their award the commissioners ascertained that the average price of good marketable wheat during the 21 years ending Michaelmas, 1799, was 5 7/10ths. shillings per Winchester bushel The Act then provided: "It shall be lawful for the said rector or "his successors for the time being, or the owner or proprietor, or "owners or proprietors of the lands and hereditaments, out of "which the said rents are to issue, or the greatest part in value, "by writing under their respective hands, to apply at the first "quarter sessions of the peace to be held in and for the Parts of "Lindsey in the said County of Lincoln." There had to be notice of the intended application in the "London Gazette," and the application was to take the form of having "three persons "named or appointed by the justices then and there assembled, "to be arbitrators or referees for inquiring into and ascertaining "by, or from or by means of the London Gazette, or by such "other ways or means as they shall think equitable or proper, the "average price of a Winchester bushel of good marketable wheat "within the said County of Lincoln, for the 21 years then last "passed, which said three arbitrators or referees, or the major "part of them, shall, by their report to be made and delivered to "the Court of Quarter Sessions to be held in and for the said "Parts of Lindsey . . . and in case it shall by such report appear "that such average price of a bushel of such wheat is more or "less than the average price thereof set forth in the said award by "the value of threepence, the said respective yearly tithe rents "shall be increased or diminished, as shall be declared by the "order of the said court."

The Church Commissioners are the successors of the rector referred to in the Act. On March 5, 1959, they duly applied to quarter sessions, after the necessary advertisement, to have arbitrators appointed, and three gentlemen were so appointed. In due course they made a report to quarter sessions, and the report, so far as it is material, is in these terms: "We find: 1. The "average price of a Winchester bushel of good marketable wheat "in the County of Lincoln during the 21 years ended on the 5th "day of March, 1959 (excluding the payments referred to in the "next succeeding paragraph) to be the sum of 10s. 1d. 2. That "in addition to the sum that the grower receives from the pur-"chaser the grower receives deficiency payments under the "Cereals Deficiency Payments Scheme, and that in the 21 years "ended the 5th day of March, 1959, these deficiency payments "averaged 11d. per Winchester bushel." They end up: "We "award and determine that the average price of a Winchester "bushel of good marketable wheat in the County of Lincoln for "the 21 years now last past the date of our appointment, namely, "Thursday the 5th day of March, 1959, to be the sum of 11s.," 11s. being the 10s. 1d. which they had found to be the average price between buyer and seller and the 11d. the average of the deficiency payments.

In due course quarter sessions considered that report, both on July 2, 1959, and on September 15, 1959. On the latter date they decided and declared "that the Scremby Corn Rents be increased "in the proportion that 10s. 1d. bears to 5 7/10ths shillings." In their case stated the question for the opinion of the High Court was whether the order of declaration of sessions was right. In other words, quarter sessions took the view that the price which fell to be considered as the average price was the price between buyer and seller, which the arbitrators had found to be 10s. 1d., and that it did not include the average deficiency payment of 11d. The case stated for the opinion of this court is whether, in effect, they were right in taking the 10s. 1d. or whether they should have taken the 11s.

A point was raised before quarter sessions and, indeed, is referred to in the case, whether quarter sessions were not bound to accept the award of the arbitrators, which was for 11s.; bound in the sense that, the arbitrators having reported, all that the court had to do was in effect to give a rubber stamp. That point has been abandoned and, I think, rightly abandoned, in this court, because it is clear from the passages in the Act which I have read, that once the report of the arbitrators is received, it is for the court to consider the matter and make their own order and that, in doing so, they have a discretion whether they should award the full amount of the increase or not.

The main question, whether they were right in taking 10s. 1d. or ought to have taken 11s. is very much more difficult, and I confess that my mind has wavered from time to time on the matter. Quite shortly, the question is whether "price" referred to in the Act of 1801 in this connection means the price obtained by the grower from the purchaser, or whether it includes all that he obtains in relation to a Winchester bushel not merely from the purchaser but from the Minister under the Cereals Deficiency Payments Scheme.

Before considering that, it is necessary to refresh one's memory as to what the scheme is. Section 1 (1) of the Agriculture Act, 1947, provides: "The following provisions of this Part "of this Act shall have effect for the purpose of promoting and "maintaining, by the provision of guaranteed prices and assured "markets for the produce mentioned in the First Schedule to this "Act, a stable and efficient agricultural industry." By section 4 (1) it is provided, so far as it is relevant, that the Minister may by order provide: "(b) for bringing into operation . . . such "provisions as appear to him expedient for providing guaranteed "prices or assured markets." Pursuant to those powers the Cereals (Deficiency Payments) Order, 1955, was passed. That Order deals, amongst other commodities, with millable wheat, and it is apparently conceded that millable wheat as defined in that Order is equivalent to good marketable wheat as the term appears in the Act of 1801. Regulation 3 provides: "In respect of each "year and in respect of each of the following cereals, that is to "say, millable wheat, millable rye, oats and barley, the Ministers "shall (a) in the light of their conclusions from a review held under "section 2 of the Agriculture Act, 1947, and with the approval "of the Treasury, specify a standard price; and (b) determine, in "such manner as appears to them proper in the respective "circumstances, an average realised price." By regulation 4 (1) it is provided: "If in the case of any year the average realised "price of millable wheat or, as the case may be, millable rye is less "than the standard price thereof, the appropriate Minister may, "if he thinks fit, and subject to such conditions as he may from "time to time with the approval of the Treasury prescribe, make "a payment of an amount equal to the difference in respect of "every hundredweight of millable wheat or, as the case may be, "millable rye which is shown to his satisfaction to have been "dispatched or delivered during that year to, or in accordance "with the instructions of, a purchaser thereof."

It is to be observed, therefore, that under this scheme the

SCREMBY CORN RENTS, In re.

Lord Parker C.J.

Minister does not guarantee a standard price, but that he provides that a farmer, whatever price he sells for in the market, will get in addition the difference between the average realised price as determined and the standard price. It really works out in this way, to take hypothetical figures: If the standard price is 12s. and the average realised price is 10s., then the farmer will get from the Minister 2s. If, therefore, he has been lucky enough to get 11s. in the market, which is 1s. over the average realised price of 10s., he will get his 2s. and, therefore, 13s. in all. On the other hand, if he has failed, perhaps because his wheat is not of high quality, to get more than 9s. in the market, which is less than the average realised price, he will still get 2s., and in that event will get a total of 11s.

That is the scheme, and the question is whether the payments that farmers received under it are to be included in the "price "of a Winchester bushel of good marketable wheat" in the Act of 1801. Quarter sessions held that "price" did not include those sums, and they set out a number of their reasons. I do not propose to deal with those reasons seriatim, but my approach to the matter is to consider, first of all, the ordinary meaning of the word "price" to be found in the Act of 1801. Prima facie, in looking at that Act, passed in 1801, at a time when there were no such things as deficiency payments, one would think that the word "price" there had its ordinary meaning of the price obtained as between buyer and seller.

But the matter does not end there, because, as has been pointed out, a possible meaning, and certainly a more possible meaning in 1801 than today, is that "price" means "value" or "worth," and it is said that, read in that sense, "price" in the Act really means the value which the farmer gets from one source or another for each Winchester bushel of wheat, namely, so much from the purchaser and so much under the deficiency scheme. It is also to be observed that in the first instance the corn rents are fixed, in effect, by what the land in question will produce. It is to be equal to the value of one-fifth of the arable land, one-seventh of the meadow land and one-ninth of the pasture land, and, of course, the value there will depend upon what those lands can produce. But the scheme of the Act was a scheme for the future. It is not a scheme under which the land is to be revalued from time to time, but it is a scheme under which, whatever the value of the land becomes in the future, whatever it produces, whether it be still corn or still wheat or potatoes or tulips, or anything else, the rents once fixed in 1801 are to be paid subject to review every 21 years.

In those circumstances, it seems to me that there is no justification for departing from the ordinary meaning of the word "price." Price was to be the yardstick for the future, whatever the value of the land and however it was farmed. The yardstick was the price, which undoubtedly at that time could only mean the price between buyer and seller.

One further point influences me, and that is that on the figures I gave earlier it is quite clear that the deficiency payment is in no sense an increment to the value of the wheat because it bears no relation thereto. In the illustration I gave, the 2s. is a common increment, whether the wheat be wheat which is sold at 11s., or whether it be wheat at 9s. Looked at in that way, it can well be said that the 2s., the deficiency payment, is much more in the nature of an encouragement to a farmer to grow wheat than an increment, in any sense, to the value of the wheat he has sold.

For these reasons I have come to the conclusion, although not without considerable hesitation, that quarter sessions was right, and that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

BYRNE J. I have shared the hesitation to which the Lord Chief Justice has referred, but I have come to the same conclusion and for the same reasons. In those circumstances, I do not desire to add anything.

DONOVAN J. I also confess that my mind has fluctuated in the course of this case. I was impressed by the phraseology of the Agriculture Act, 1947, which, in effect, does describe the totality of what the farmer is to get as "the guaranteed price." It may be, of course, that that is no more than convenient nomenclature. Again, it is not conclusive against the appellants that agricultural subsidies were unknown in 1801, because the language of a statute may be apt to apply not merely to the present but to future circumstances as well, however different they may be. But it is clear that the effect of the Act of 1801 may be, as the Lord Chief Justice has said, to require a landowner to pay rent to the rector even though the landowner may grow no wheat at all. In these circumstances, there seems to me to be good reason for not extending the meaning of the word "price" beyond its ordinary natural meaning, unless the language of the relevant enactments clearly requires that to be done. The ordinary and natural meaning of the word "price" is the consideration which the buyer agrees to give and the seller agrees to accept for his wheat. The ordinary and natural meaning would not include a subsidy which a third person may or may not in his discretion decide to pay after the transaction is concluded. The existence of this discretion, I think, is a legitimate consideration to take into account in determining the meaning of the word "price" in the Act of 1801, notwithstanding that the calculation is looking at what has actually happened in the past. It is still a factor bearing on the true construction of the word, because the question always is: When Parliament used the word "price" in 1801, did it really mean to cover this kind of discretionary payment by a third party? I do not think that the language of the Act of 1801 and the Act of 1947 requires such an extended construction to be put on the word "price," and, in the end, I have come to the same conclusion as that expressed by the other members of the court, and also for the reasons contained in the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice. I therefore agree that the appeal must be dismissed.

The appellant, William Nicholls, was convicted at the Central Criminal Court on an indictment charging him with "warehouse-"breaking contrary to sections 26 (1) and 27 (2) of the Larceny "Act, 1916." He was sentenced to three years' imprisonment. He appealed on the ground that the indictment was bad for duplicity.

BYRNE J. The appellant was at the Central Criminal Court charged upon an indictment which was framed in this way: Statement of offence: warehousebreaking contrary to sections 26 (1) and 27 (2) of the Larceny Act, 1916, and the particulars of offence alleged that on January 11, 1960, he broke and entered a warehouse at Bridport Road, Edmonton, to steal therein and stole therein 22 overcoats, the property of the Dunlop Clothing & Waterproof Co. Ltd. The verdict of the jury was taken in this form: "Members of the jury, are you agreed upon your verdict? (The "foreman of the jury): We are. (The clerk of the court): Do "you find the prisoner, William Nicholls, guilty or not guilty of "warehousebreaking on this indictment? (The foreman of the "jury): Guilty." The maximum penalty for breaking and entering and stealing is 14 years; the maximum penalty for breaking and entering with intent to steal is seven years, and thus it would obviously be of great importance to know what the verdict of the jury really meant. It is plain on looking at the record that no one would know whether the jury had in fact convicted the appellant of an offence which earned a maximum punishment of 14 years or an offence which earned a maximum punishment of seven years. Sections 26 (1) and 27 (2) are separate and distinct sections of the Larceny Act, 1916. If the indictment had contained two separate counts, the matter would have been plain, and the verdict returned would have indicated quite plainly what the finding of the jury was, but as it is, these two sections of the statute have been linked together,

Husband and Wife—Practice—Service of notice of charge on named woman—Allegation by wife of improper association by husband with named woman—No application to intervene—Costs.

Where in a divorce suit a wife makes a charge of an improper association between the husband and a named woman, and notice of that charge is served on the named woman, she must, if she desires to intervene in the suit, obtain leave to do so. If she omits to obtain such leave, costs may not be awarded to her, even though the charge involving her is rejected.

DEFENDED SUIT by the wife for divorce on the ground of cruelty.

The wife's allegations of cruelty included one of an improper association between the husband and Mrs. Irene Davies. The husband, by his answer, denied the charge of cruelty, and denied any association of any kind between himself and Mrs. Davies. A copy of the petition and notice of the proceedings, together with a memorandum of appearance was served on Mrs. Davies. This memorandum of appearance was completed by Mrs. Davies's solicitors, and stated that she intended to deny the charge made against her. Although she had not obtained leave to intervene in the suit, this memorandum of appearance was accepted as effective at the district registry in which the cause was proceeding. Thereafter, she was treated as an intervener. She filed an answer denying that she had associated with the husband in any way, and prayed to be dismissed from the suit with costs. The registrar granted his certificate under rule 30 of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1957, and the cause proceeded to hearing, Mrs. Davies being described in the cause list and during the hearing as an intervener. The charge of cruelty was proved and the wife was granted a decree nisi, but the charge against Mrs. Davies was dismissed. Application was then made on behalf of Mrs. Davies for her costs, but no application was made for her position to be regularised by her being granted leave to intervene. The case is reported only on the questions whether she was to be regarded as a party to the suit, and on costs.

MR. COMMISSIONER GALLOP Q.C. I deal, as counsel requested me to do, with the matter of Mrs. Irene Davies's costs. She ought not to be involved in any costs. The wife, a woman with no responsibilities, earns about £8 a week and I should be disposed to order her to pay all Mrs. Davies's costs, but the matter is difficult. I am told that the solicitors in this suit have been uncertain how to apply the decision in Green v. Green and Partridge.[1] I have been told the same thing at other courts. That was a case in which Karminski J. had to consider charges against a husband of improper, but not adulterous, association with a number of women who were named by the wife. Those charges were relied upon to revive condoned adultery. Karminski J. said[2]: "First she relies "on an association with a number of other women; they are five "in succession starting in 1948 or thereabouts. I do not propose "to give the names of these women in the course of my judgment "and for this reason: In this case (as, I think, unfortunately), no "effort has been made to find out and to serve these women, who "might, if served with notice of these charges, have applied for "and have obtained leave to intervene. It is right to say that one "or two of them seem to have disappeared, but I deplore the "introduction of people in charges of this kind (admittedly short "of adultery, but discreditable) without some effort to find them. "I want to make it as clear as I can that, if I thought that the "justice of the case had required it, I should have adjourned this "matter for the service on the women who have been named in "the answer, with possibly certain consequences as to costs "as against the person alleging, but not serving these charges. "For that reason I propose to refer to these women, when necessary, by their Christian names."

That reference to costs no doubt involves that a litigant might be ordered to pay the costs thrown away on an adjournment. A party finding himself in that position might attribute the blame to the solicitor who had omitted to serve notice if it is in law required. The second supplement to Rayden on Divorce (7th ed.) accurately says: "It is to be noted that the rules do not require "such service to be effected [the word 'require' is in italics]; but "if no attempt is made, there is the risk that the trial judge may "adjourn the case for this to be done."

COLLINS
v.
COLLINS.

Mr. Commissioner Gallop Q.C.

I have not succeeded in reconciling the observations of Karminski J. with that which was said in the Court of Appeal in D. v. D.[3] That was a case where the husband petitioned for divorce on the ground of cruelty, alleging unnatural practices by the wife with another woman. The woman applied under section 31 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, for leave to intervene in the suit. Barnard J., reversing the decision of Mr. Registrar Long, refused leave to intervene. The Court of Appeal, however, restored the registrar's order. Singleton L.J. said: "Barnard J., we "understand, took the view that it was not right to apply the "terms of [section 31 of the Act of 1950] to a case in which the "allegation on the file was one of cruelty. I agree with him to "the extent that I think it is very seldom that such a position can "arise in a cruelty case, and, in any event, I feel that the "powers given by the section should be applied sparingly, but in "the present circumstances there is an allegation on the file of "cruelty of a most unusual kind." Even if it is possible to attach a sufficiently determinate meaning to the words "improper associa-"tion," I must say with the greatest respect that I do not really see the value of an automatic obligation to serve notice of charges if the outcome is to be that leave to intervene will only be granted sparingly, or in other words will usually be refused. Within the principle of D. v. D.[3] I should have thought that Mrs. Davies need not have been served, but having regard to Green's case,[4] the petitioner's solicitors could scarcely have taken the responsibility of omitting to create an opportunity for her to apply for leave to intervene by some form of notice at any rate.

I would have made an order for costs against the wife and given leave to appeal, but there is yet another happening. The wife's solicitor served the entire petition on Mrs. Davies. I doubt whether that is what Karminski J. had in mind, but I cannot criticise any solicitor for being very careful. The next step, in my view, could only have been for an application to be made for leave to intervene under section 31, which provides as follows: "In every case in which . . . the court may consider, in the "interest of any person not already a party to the suit, that that "person should be made a party to the suit, the court may, if it "thinks fit, allow that person to intervene upon such terms, if "any, as the court thinks just." What was done in this case was not only to serve the entire pleading upon Mrs. Davies but to serve her with the document called "Memorandum of Appear-"ance; co-respondent, party cited, or person named." That was completed on her behalf by her solicitors, and Mrs. Davies said, not unnaturally, that she did intend to deny the charges of association, but no application was ever made for leave for her to intervene.

The result is that I cannot regard Mrs. Davies as a party.

Therefore, she does not require to be dismissed from the suit. The associate tells me, however, that her name appears in the title of the suit, and that it cannot be taken out without an order. I suppose that the best thing for me to do, if that is so, is to dismiss her from the suit. I do not see how I can order anyone to pay her costs.

The plaintiffs, a married couple, agreed to purchase from the defendants, who were also married, freehold premises, together with the goodwill of the business carried on by the defendants on the premises. In this action the plaintiffs claimed damages for fraudulent misrepresentation on the sale of the business. Stable J. found that fraud was established and awarded to the plaintiffs £350 as damages. On being informed that both the plaintiffs and the defendants were legally aided, he refused to make any order as to costs, except to direct the taxation of the parties' costs in accordance with the provisions of the Act. The plaintiffs appealed against the refusal of the judge to award to them costs. The contribution payable by the plaintiffs under the Act was assessed at £5 each payable by instalments. The male defendant's contribution under the Act was assessed at £47 10s. payable by instalments, and the female defendant's at £200 to be paid by a single payment. Both parties were legally aided on the appeal:—

principles on which such discretion was normally exercised and that since, if the parties had not been legally aided, the defendants would have been ordered to pay the plaintiffs' costs, the defendants should be ordered to pay the costs subject to the limitation imposed by section 2 (2) of the Act.

(2) That on the evidence and on the basis of the assessment of their contributions under the Act, the male defendant's liability to pay the plaintiffs' party and party costs should be limited to the sum of £47 10s. payable by instalments, and the female defendant's liability to pay the plaintiffs' costs should be limited to the payment of a single capital sum of £200.

Decision of Stable J. reversed.

APPEAL from Stable J.

The plaintiffs, Mr. and Mrs. Blatcher, brought an action against the defendants, Mr. and Mrs. Heaysman, claiming damages for fraudulent misrepresentation on the sale to them of freehold premises at Tonbridge, Kent, together with the greengrocery business carried on on those premises. Stable J., who tried the action, found that the defendants had been guilty of fraud and he awarded to the plaintiffs £350 as damages. On being informed that both parties to the action were legally aided, he refused to make any order as to costs other than the usual order for taxation in accordance with the provisions of the Third Schedule to the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949.

The plaintiffs appealed against that part of Stable J.'s order refusing an order for costs against the defendants. The grounds of the appeal were (1) that there were no materials upon which the judge could exercise his discretion as to costs so as to deprive the plaintiffs of their costs; (2) that the judge failed to exercise his discretion judicially; (3) that the judge misdirected himself as to the law in holding that the fact that the parties were assisted persons under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, was a fact on which he could exercise his discretion so as to deprive the successful plaintiffs of their costs.

The facts and the judgment of Stable J. are fully stated in the judgment of Lord Evershed M.R.

Gerald Owen for the plaintiffs.
Mark Smith for the defendants.

No cases were cited in argument.

LORD EVERSHED M.R. This is an appeal related solely to a question of costs. Having said so much, it is plain that the court would not normally entertain such appeal; but it is here the case of the plaintiffs that the judge did not exercise the judicial discretion which is vested in a judge in this matter of costs. Nor has it been objected by Mr. Mark Smith, for the defendants, that this is an appeal which we should not entertain on that ground.

The case was one in which the plaintiffs, as were the defendants, were husband and wife. It related to a greengrocery business which the defendants were seeking to sell and which the plaintiffs had contracted to buy. The nature of the case was that in their advertisements, and in their instructions to their agents, which were passed on, as was obviously intended, to the plaintiffs, the defendants, or one of them, had made dishonest and fraudulent misrepresentations as regards the takings of the business. The plaintiffs' claim was for damages based on fraud.

The business itself changed hands, that is to say, the plaintiffs did not take the point that because of the misrepresentations the contract was at an end. They preferred to rely upon their common law remedy, if they could make it good, namely, to claim damages for misrepresentation.

It is quite unnecessary to pursue the details of the claim because Stable J., in a full and careful judgment, came, without any hesitation, to the conclusion that the first defendant had in truth dishonestly represented the weekly takings of the business, and, further, that the plaintiffs, having relied upon the misrepresentations, were entitled to recover damages at common law for the fraud. So he ordered payment by both the defendants of a sum assessed by way of damages of £350.

Mr. Owen, for the plaintiffs, read us the judgment and the point was taken at the end of this part of it, should both the defendants be rendered liable by the order to pay damages? The judge, quite naturally, if I may venture to say so, took the view that, although the female defendant was not herself guilty of any personal dishonesty, still she was a seller with her husband, had associated herself with him in the sale and had been a party to defending the action, and he ordered that there should be judgment against both the defendants in the sum of £350.

Mr. Owen naturally enough then asked for costs and stated: "In this case all four people are legally assisted." It is quite obvious that on that information being imparted to him the judge expressed himself with the refreshing vigour characteristic of him. He said: "If what I am invited to do is to make some sort of "contribution for the legal aid fund, I am not going to do it. I "have said for years and years and years that until they pay "costs to the successful defendants when they lose they are "going to get no assistance from me." In the context, I think the word "they" was a reference to the legal fund or those who are responsible for its administration. It is, I think, quite plain that the judge holds, and strongly holds, the view that under the legal aid scheme serious injustices may sometimes be done to an unaided party in a suit in which the other party is legally aided, if the non-aided party wins and is thereby disabled from recovering any costs. That is a point of view which it is legitimate for me to say has recently received a certain amount of publicity and no one can deny the possible injustices in these cases to parties to law suits with legally aided litigants who themselves are not so aided. It is the fact that such parties may sometimes suffer from being unable to recover any costs in asserting or defending what the court holds to be their just claim. I would add that that injustice, if such it is, is certainly no less when a case comes to the Court of Appeal and the non-legally aided party may have to find (for the second time) the money for his own costs after he has successfully defended in the Court of Appeal the judgment that he has already obtained. That is a matter beyond doubt proper for public and parliamentary consideration. Still, the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, imposes duties on the court, and I am bound to say that I think that the service which is rendered to the community by the scheme and by the Law Society in its administration of the scheme is highly creditable. I would also point out that the scheme is, after all, on its face, a contributory scheme. Parliament has very recently seen fit, by the Legal Aid Act, 1960, to alter and amend the Act of 1949 by substantially expanding its scope, so that persons with incomes far greater than those contemplated by the Act of 1949 may be able to get legal assistance. But they do so on contributory terms. It is also, of course, wrong to suggest that the scheme is one which can be looked at as being in any sense for the advantage of the particular fund or the society that administers it. Still, the judge clearly feels, and feels strongly, that there is under this scheme, as is obvious, a possibility of injustice. But the passage which I have read and which is restated on the following page of his judgment, seems to me to show that he felt that, until the law was altered, it was not right that he should, as he expressed it, make any order which would either give anything to the fund or would diminish the fund. He added: "I "was brought up in the school of law that regarded maintenance "and champerty as bad things; I still think they are." I also was so brought up and I have read what the judge has said; but I hope he will forgive me for saying that I cannot help thinking that it may have had the effect of his not having in mind the fact that, if an order for costs were made against the unsuccessful defendants (one of whom, as he says, was a dishonest defendant) it would not make the slightest difference to the legal aid fund or to the Law Society. By the statute, the society, which is responsible to account to Parliament for the administration of the fund, has a first charge on any property recovered in an action. In this case, it would be a charge on the sum of damages. So far as I can see, the society, in execution of its public duty, would be bound to enforce the charge; otherwise the amount concerned would fall upon the taxpayers generally. I must, therefore, dissociate myself from what the judge said when he seemed to indicate that the society would not in this case execute the charge. He said: "In this case there will be no order as "regards costs on either side, each party being legally aided, and "if the plaintiffs do not get their damages I hope we shall hear "more of it."

The effect of the failure to make any order as to costs was merely to benefit the defendants, one of whom, as I have already said, he found to be deliberately dishonest. So, while I certainly respect the view that the judge took of the working of the scheme, I am bound to say I cannot agree that his decision does justice to the scope and purposes of the Act, and in any case it seems to me impossible to say that the judge properly exercised his discretion in this matter by confining himself to the views which he expressed.

By section 1 (7) (b) of the Act of 1949 it is expressly provided that "the rights conferred by this Part of this Act on a person "receiving legal aid shall not affect the rights or liabilities of "other parties to the proceedings or the principles on which "the discretion of any court . . . is normally exercised." That imposes upon the court, as I conceive, the duty of considering the question who is to pay costs in accordance with the principles on which such discretion is normally exercised. If that be the right premise, it seems to me unanswerable, I confess that, prima facie, these defendants ought to have been ordered to pay the costs of the action. If no parties had been legally aided, the conclusion in the case which I have read quite manifestly would have led to the result that the defendants would have been ordered to pay the costs. Therefore, I think that, subject to the limitation which the next section imposes, the inescapable result here is that the defendants, one of whom, as I repeat, was held to have deceived the plaintiffs, should pay the costs. But, then, by section 2 (2) it is provided: "Where a person receives legal aid "in connection with any proceedings . . . (e) his liability by virtue "of an order for costs made against him with respect to the "proceedings shall not exceed the amount (if any) which is a "reasonable one for him to pay having regard to all the circum-"stances, including the means of all the parties and their conduct "in connection with the dispute." As regards the last few words, "and their conduct in connection with the dispute," there is, plainly, no ground for altering what would be the normal incidence of costs. I must, therefore, look and see what, on the evidence before us, it is reasonable for the two defendants in this case to pay having regard to all the circumstances, including the means of everybody concerned. The material before us shows that substantially speaking the plaintiffs have no means and their contributions would be negligible. The only relevance of that is to emphasise the point that if the defendants are not bound to pay costs, then the damages which the plaintiffs have been rightly awarded will, for the most part, be expended in the payment of costs. The defendants appear to have carried on in collaboration this greengrocery business—I do not use any more precise term, because I know not whether there was anything in the nature of a partnership or how they regarded themselves as beneficially interested. It appears, however, from the certificate obtained in the usual course from the National Assistance Board that the male defendant, when he obtained that certificate, had an income

v.
HEAYSMAN.
Lord Evershed M.R.

of £251 and a capital of £4. I do not read section 3 (1), which specifies the limits of the disposable income relevant to the total of the income. It is sufficient to say that the relevant committee of the Law Society assessed the proper contribution that the male defendant should make towards his own costs at the rate, broadly speaking, of £4 a month for 12 months—the total was £47 10s. His wife, though herself innocent of any dishonesty, was perhaps more generously treated when the proceeds of sale were received, for the finding in her case was that her disposable income was £346 per annum and her disposable capital was £491. On the basis of these figures an assessment of her liability was a single capital payment of £200. I need hardly add that, if her own costs and those of her husband's costs came to less than the sum total of those two amounts, they would be entitled to a refund of the balance. If the costs exceeded the total of their contributions, then the excess would fall upon the general assets of the fund.

Those being the data in front of us relevant to our consideration, under section 2 (3), the question then arises what order ought we now to make? After considering the matter with my brethren, the conclusion which I think is the right one is to take as broadly correct the assessment which the Law Society made for the purposes of the defendants' own costs. I would therefore make an order as regards the costs in the court below upon the two defendants jointly to pay between them the costs of the plaintiffs of the action, subject to the limitation that the taxed costs payable should not exceed the sum total of the contributions in the case of the male defendant corresponding to that which he was ordered to make of roughly £4 a month—the exact figure will be put in the order—and in the case of the female defendant of the single figure of £200. The effect of that, be it observed, will be that, when the costs are taxed, they will be apportioned between the two defendants, and each will be only liable to the extent of the contribution which I have mentioned. If the costs when taxed do not amount to the sum total of the two sums, then each will be naturally relieved to the extent to which that total is not reached. If the taxed total exceeds those two sums, then the two defendants' liability will be exhausted when they have contributed the amounts I have stated. I think that there should be no practical difficulty in working that out. It may be, from what Mr. Owen says, that the costs will be in excess of the sum total I have mentioned, and it follows to that extent that the plaintiffs will suffer the excess to be discharged out of the damages, but I should hope that the excess, if there be an excess, will not be as great as Mr. Owen has intimated. However that may be, I think, applying myself as best I can to the obligations imposed by section 2 (3) of the Act, that is the order as to costs which I would make.

When I have spoken of costs, I mean costs taxed as between party and party. That will be the costs which the defendants would, subject to the limitation I have mentioned, be bound to pay. That disposes of the matter subject only to the costs in this court. Mr. Owen can justly say that he was not only bound to come, but was entitled in the result to come, to this court, and, therefore, he is entitled, in accordance with the practice of this court, to an order that his costs here as between party and party be paid by the defendants. But, following our usual practice, the order will contain the proviso that no step will be taken towards enforcing that order without leave of the court and there shall be liberty to apply.

ORMEROD L.J. I agree and I have nothing to add.

SALMON J. I agree.

Appeal allowed with costs. Adjourned to a Master of the Queen's Bench Division to determine the amount of costs proper to be paid by the defendants. No order as to costs to be made without further application to the Court of Appeal.

section 11 (1) of the Prevention of Fraud (Investments) Act, 1958,[1] directing that no advertisement for capital should be made by the society. The notice was accompanied by a letter stating the grounds on which the registrar proposed to make the order, and informing the society that they could make representations thereon, both orally and in writing. Representations were made by counsel on behalf of the society on March 18, 22 and 25, 1960. On March 28, 1960, the registrar made up his mind to make the order and to ask for Treasury approval pursuant to section 11 (1), and formal application therefor was made on March 30. Treasury approval was given on April 6.

On April 1, the society's auditor had an interview with the executive registrar at the latter's invitation in respect of a question arising on the society's accounts. During that interview some discussion took place on matters which included those which the registrar had been considering. This interview was reported to the registrar.

By this application the society applied for a writ of certiorari to bring up and quash the registrar's decision to make the order under section 11 (1) of the Act. Their principal contention was that at the interview on April 1 reference was made without the society's knowledge or consent to matters relating to the order, and that fresh prejudicial material was introduced there, of which the society had no notice, and on which they had no opportunity of making representations; and further, that the registrar, who was acting in a quasi-judicial capacity, thus failed to act in accordance with judicial principles. The registrar contended, inter alia, that he was not acting in a quasi-judicial capacity, or that if he were acting in a quasi-judicial capacity it ended at the latest on March 28 when he decided to make the order.

Held, (1) that the registrar was acting in a quasi-judicial capacity from the moment when he gave notice of an intention to make an order on February 19, 1960, until Treasury approval was given on April 6, 1960; and his judicial capacity could exist notwithstanding that he was not conducting a full form of judicial inquiry inter partes, and representations were being made to him only by the party against whom he had signified his provisional intention to make an order.

(2) That so long as the judicial or quasi-judicial capacity existed it was no answer to say that justice was done, it was necessary to examine what took place and see whether, when the matter was examined objectively, there was any likelihood of injustice resulting therefrom.

(3) That no matter was raised at the interview on April 1 beyond legitimate illustration of the points which, in his administrative capacity, the registrar was entitled to raise; no fresh evidence was received by him relating to matters on which he was acting judicially, and nothing took place which on any reasonable view could be regarded as likely to prejudice the conclusion which the registrar had to embody in his final order; and although it was indiscreet to consider matters, which had been raised on the hearing, it was not a case in which the court was obliged to exercise its discretion to make an order of certiorari to quash an order (post, p. 685).

Semble, the Court of Appeal had no jurisdiction to forbid the publication of the society's name (post, p. 689).

Decision of the Divisional Court upheld.

APPLICATION for an order of certiorari.

The following statement of facts is taken substantially from the judgment of Lord Parker C.J.: In May of 1959, the Registrar of Building Societies served on the applicant building society a notice under section 11 (3) of the Prevention of Fraud (Investments) Act, 1958, requiring the society to produce books, accounts, deeds and other documents, and to furnish him with certain information. Thereafter, the registrar carried out an investigation of the affairs of the society until February, 1960, and on February 19, 1960, served on the society a notice under section 11 (1) of the Act in the following terms: "Notice is hereby given "pursuant to the provisions of subsection (1) of section 11 of the "Prevention of Fraud (Investments) Act, 1958, that it is the "intention of the registrar to make an order directing that no "invitation to subscribe for, or to acquire or offer to acquire, "securities or to lend or deposit money shall be made by or on "behalf of the above-named society. Any representation that "the society desires to make to the registrar with respect to the "proposed order must be submitted to him within the period of "one month from the date of the service of this notice." That notice was accompanied by a letter of the same date stating: "The principal grounds upon which the registrar proposes to "make an order are as follows" and there were then set out the four following grounds:

"(1) The unsatisfactory reserve position in relation to the "total assets of the society.

"(2) Inadequacy of security for the advances in respect of the "'Oak Farm' properties, resulting in a position of potential loss "which would jeopardise the society's solvency.

"(3) Division of mortgages artificially thus avoiding disclosure "of details in the schedule of the annual accounts.

"(4) The unauthorised deposit of large amounts of the "society's 'liquid' funds on terms which require up to six "months' notice of withdrawal.

"With regard to (2), the registrar has received from the district valuer a provisional valuation of the Oak Farm Estate at a "total figure of £149,000 compared with the society's valuation "of £370,000."

The letter ended by saying: "Representations in respect of "the proposed order may be made both orally and in writing. "If representatives of the society wish to attend before the "registrar for this purpose I will arrange an appointment upon "hearing from you."

As a result, on March 18, exactly within the month, a hearing took place before the registrar, when the society were represented by leading and junior counsel. In the course of that hearing counsel for the society traced the reserve position from 1955, covering the years 1955, 1956, 1957 and 1958, with the object of showing that year by year the reserve position was improving despite enormous increases in capital. It appears he was about to move on to the year 1959, the accounts for which were not due until March 31, 1960 (after the date of the hearing), when the registrar said: "Yes, we have no accounts whatever for 1959," and "I cannot really listen to representations on current accounts "until I have had them laid before me and until I have had a "chance to peruse them. If you want to make further repre-"sentations on that, Mr. McKinnon, you can come again, but "until I have had an opportunity to consider the state of affairs "as disclosed by these accounts, it is premature to hear repre-"sentations on them." A little later he said: "I do not think "it would be right to offer you a general adjournment on all "matters, but on this particular matter of the accounts if, when "you yourself have seen them, you want to make observations "on them, I shall be prepared to listen to you on a further date "on that particular point."

A further hearing took place on March 22, when the accounts still were not available. Finally, there was an adjourned hearing on March 25, when the accounts were produced together with a special report from the auditor. Those accounts had only come forward that morning shortly before the hearing. Mr. McKinnon had not had an opportunity to go through them in detail, but they were put in, and the registrar said: "But it was because you "referred to the accounts in your submission and representations "that we thought we would like to see them." Counsel said: "Yes, sir; I make no complaint. I dare say I have brought this "on my own head by referring to them, and as I say, I am not "making any complaint. But when those accounts are examined "you may think that if there is any further point, having regard "to the importance of this matter, upon which you want any "representation from the society, that can be done, because "although we have now gone over the statutory period"—that was referring to the fact that more than a month had elapsed since the notice of intention had been served—"I cannot com-"plain, and the society would not dream of complaining if there "was any further information you wanted; but as far as I can "say with my limited knowledge of accounts, I am prepared to "rely on the certificate of a man like [the auditor], who knows "about these things, and he has made a special report." Later on counsel said: "Inasmuch as it has only been delivered today, "if there is anything that requires explanation I do not know "whether there are any representations you would like to hear "from the society in respect of it, and, of course, there is this "about it, that the representations which I made to you on the "first occasion, dealing with the specific matters dealt with in "the notice—my argument, you will recollect, was that supposing "for the sake of argument, at the time when those transactions "arose and in view of what has happened since, if an order had "then been made, what has happened since would justify an "application for the revocation of the order; that was my "contention." Finally, counsel said: "Subject to anything "arising on the accounts or on the correspondence, you may think "that the matter is now closed and for you to deal with," and the matter ended there so far as the hearings were concerned.

The registrar thereafter considered the matter and, as he said in his affidavit did consider the 1959 accounts and the special report, and on March 28 made up his mind to make the order. On March 30 Treasury consent was asked for, and on April 6 the consent was obtained and the order in question was made.

Meanwhile, on March 31, the auditor wrote to the registrar, being concerned about a point in regard to the way accounts should be certified under the Act: there was a new Bill before Parliament, and he wanted to take up the matter with the registrar. His letter, however, was headed in the name of the applicant building society, and said: "You will be aware that we "have submitted a special report on our audit of the accounts "of the above-named society for the year ended December 31, "1959. The preparation of that report and the signature of the "form A.R.11 caused considerable difficulty because of the "wording of the printed certificate on the form A.R.11. It "became necessary for us to consult leading counsel and the "opinion which he gave to us was such that we would like to have "the opportunity to report to you thereon. In our opinion the "matter is of concern to all auditors of building societies, despite "the advent of the new Act." That letter was received on March 31, not by the registrar, but by the executive registrar, who, thinking that a point of general importance was likely to arise on which it might be necessary to take urgent steps, the matter being before Parliament, spoke to the auditor on the telephone. During that telephone conversation it was arranged that the point in issue should be illustrated by reference to the accounts of the applicant society. An appointment was made, and on April 1 the auditor spent some hour and a half with the executive registrar, in the course of which reference was made to the affairs of the applicant society. After that interview the executive registrar reported to the registrar, who said in his affidavit: "After I had taken my decision to make an order against "the society under section 11 and had instituted an application "for Treasury approval thereto, . . . the executive registrar "reported to me the interview that he had had with the society's "auditor on April 1. I considered whether I should advise that "any action should be taken in relation to the Bill"—that was the Bill before Parliament—"in view of the problem raised by the "auditor. I took note of the comments of the auditor about "the society's accounts. Those comments had no effect upon my "mind in relation to the question, already decided, whether an "order under section 11 should be sought from the Treasury."

The society sought leave to apply for an order of certiorari to bring up and quash the registrar's order of April 6, 1960, under section 11 (1) on the grounds (i) that the registrar had refused to consider representations made on behalf of the society unless and until there were produced to him accounts for the year ending December 31, 1959, which accounts were not due to be produced until March 31, 1960; (ii) that the registrar on production of the accounts and of a special report prepared thereon by the society's auditor, considered matters contained therein which did not relate to the representations made on behalf of the society, and which introduced fresh prejudicial material of which the society had not notice, and upon which they had no opportunity of making representations; (iii) that the registrar, after the conclusion of the representations made on behalf of the society, by his assistant, the executive registrar, without the knowledge or consent of the society, interviewed a third party, the auditor, with reference to the accounts and to the special report, and thereafter gave the society no opportunity of making further representations thereon; and (iv) that the registrar gave no or no sufficient particulars to the society of the allegations upon which he proposed to make the order.

On April 12 and 13, 1960, the Divisional Court (Lord Parker C.J., Ashworth and Salmon JJ.) gave leave to apply for the order subject to certain cross-undertakings being given, one having the effect that the name of the society should not be published meanwhile.

LORD PARKER C.J. In these proceedings Mr. McKinnon moves for an order of certiorari on behalf of a building society to bring up and quash an order dated April 6 of this year made by the Registrar of Building Societies pursuant to his powers under section 11 of the Prevention of Fraud (Investments) Act, 1958. That section gives the registrar somewhat drastic powers in order to safeguard the interests of persons who have invested or deposited money in building societies. [His Lordship read the relevant parts of section 11 (1) and (2) and continued:] Subsection (3) provides for machinery whereby the registrar may require in advance all the information that he thinks necessary from the society, and call upon the society "to produce to the registrar "such books, accounts, deeds and other documents."

As I have said, the powers of that first subsection are drastic. Once an order is made, whether published or not, the knowledge that it is being made will no doubt get round, and not only will further invitations for money be stopped but there is a real likelihood that withdrawals will result, causing considerable damage to the society. Such safeguards as there are must be found in the proviso which I have read, and clearly it is of the utmost importance that the procedure envisaged in the proviso is meticulously followed.

[His Lordship stated the facts set out above, observed that the position on March 28, when the registrar made up his mind to make the order, was that having, on information obtained between May, 1959, and February, 1960, evinced an intention to make an order, the registrar was satisfied that he had heard nothing since which would cause him to change his mind, and continued:] In those circumstances, three points are taken on behalf of the society. The first point, and perhaps points 1 and 2 rather go together, but I propose to deal with them in three stages, is that the registrar refused to hear representations as to the 1959 accounts as he had promised to do. I am quite satisfied that, looked at baldly in that way, there was no refusal by the registrar whatsoever to hear representations. On March 18 he had promised that counsel should have an opportunity when the accounts were prepared of making representations. On March 25, when the accounts were forthcoming and were produced, counsel, so far from then desiring to make representations in the passages I have already read, was stating that the matter so far as he was concerned was closed unless the registrar required any further information after studying the accounts. There, the matter was left. The bald ground that representations as to the accounts were refused, in my judgment, wholly fails. The only way in which it can be put, and this is really, I think, the second ground, is that in operating the procedure in the proviso to section 11 (1), natural justice demands that the registrar should state either in writing or orally to the society every ground and every matter which is operating upon his mind in order to give the society a lead as to the sort of representations which might be useful. It can be put in this way, that it is quite impossible for a society to make proper and adequate representations unless they know the case they have to meet. It is said that natural justice demands such a course, bearing in mind particularly the drastic powers that there are under this section, and the serious results to the society if an order is made.

In this connection, reference has been made to most of the leading cases in this field of law, beginning with Board of Education v. Rice,[1] and going through Local Government Board v. Arlidge[2] and the other cases up to and including Franklin v. Minister of Town and Country Planning,[3] dealing with the New Town at Stevenage. I would like to say at once that I always find the expression "natural justice" very difficult. There is no one code of natural justice which is automatically imported into any procedure of a judicial nature. What is imported by way of natural justice depends entirely on the tribunal or official in question, the nature of his functions, and, perhaps most important of all, the exact words of the statute, because Parliament may by suitable words provide for a procedure which conflicts in many respects with the concepts of natural justice which one would find adopted by the courts. Each case must depend upon the nature of the function and the exact words of the statute.

Mr. Cumming-Bruce, for the registrar, has suggested that this is one of those extreme cases, of which Franklin's case[3] is one, where the official concerned is acting in an administrative capacity from first to last, and where there is never a stage when he is acting in a quasi-judicial capacity. As at present advised I cannot accept the full length of that contention. It seems to me here that the natural approach where an official is given the power of life and death—because it almost amounts to that—over a building society, is that one would expect to find that at some stage of the proceedings he should act in a quasi-judicial capacity.

and although I find it unnecessary to come to a final conclusion in the matter, I think that from the moment he enters upon a hearing and up to the time when the order is made, he is acting in a quasi-judicial capacity. As I say, I find it unnecessary to decide it, because even assuming that that is so, I go on to the next stage and ask myself in what, if any, manner the registrar in this matter of representations on accounts has acted in conflict with any principle of natural justice. He started by giving the notice, accompanied by the principal grounds which moved him to think that he ought to make an order. There has been some argument as to whether that was a necessary step. In particular, reference was made to section 6 of the Act of 1894, which provide particularly that the grounds for cancelling or sustaining the registration of a society should be specified; and it is noteworthy that in the section with which we are now concerned there is a complete absence of any such provision. Nevertheless, for the purposes of this argument I am willing to assume that natural justice demands that the registrar should inform a society in these circumstances of the sort of matters which are passing through his mind, and on which he wishes to inform himself by representations from the society. That was done. I am also prepared to assume that if, in the course of the hearing or the inquiry, some new point, some new ground, should come to light, then clearly, and I think that this is conceded, fairness would demand that the society should be informed of that matter and given an opportunity to make representations in regard to that new ground. But that is not this case. What happened here—and this is the scheme of the whole matter—is that the registrar makes up his mind in advance that, as at present advised, it is his intention to make an order, and he gives his grounds. In the course of the proceedings reference is made to the later position, namely, in 1959, which he has not had an opportunity heretofore of considering. As I have said, he has only dealt with the years 1955 to 1958. Reference is made to 1959. He quite rightly says that he must see the accounts. He sees the accounts, and nothing which he sees in the accounts alters his mind as to the provisional intention he has formed having looked at the years 1955 to 1958. I can see no ground for saying that natural justice should demand that, having looked at the accounts himself, accounts which did not affect his mind at all, he should nevertheless call upon the society to make representations with regard to what he has seen in the accounts, and the same, of course, applies to the special report of the auditor. It seems to me that the whole of the argument on this point on the facts of this case is quite artificial. The matter was left entirely with the registrar to say whether there were any points upon which he wanted any further information. Counsel had ample opportunity either of making representations at once on the accounts or, if he felt that he was not in a position to do so, to ask for an adjournment, and no adjournment was requested.

Lord Parker C.J.

The third ground relates to the interview which took place between the executive registrar and the auditor. Quite shortly, it is said that this is a case akin to that of Errington v. Minister of Health[4]; in other words, that an investigation or a hearing was continued in the absence of and behind the back of one of the parties, and yet no opportunity was given to that party to deal with the matters elucidated in that private investigation. The principle laid down in Errington's case[4] is still good law, and it is beyond doubt that when there is a lis or a quasi-lis, matters being dealt with inter partes, it is wrong for a Minister or a tribunal to hear evidence from one party in the absence of the other, or to get outside information which may tell against one of the parties without giving that party an opportunity of dealing with it. But this, as it seems to me, is quite a different case. Granted that the registrar was acting in a quasi-judicial capacity, the position had arrived when he had, in the light of the years 1955 to 1958, said that he intended to make an order. The accounts for 1959 were introduced. Those accounts for 1959 did not cause him to change his mind, witness the fact that on March 28 before the auditor ever had his interview he had decided that nothing in the 1959 accounts caused him to change his mind. In those circumstances, supposing that, contrary to what the registrar says, the auditor had produced some damaging evidence, if I may put it that way, in connection with the 1959 accounts, supposing that had happened, one asks oneself how that can affect the matter if the 1959 accounts, without the prejudicial evidence at the interview, had not affected the registrar? I cannot see how in those circumstances natural justice demanded that the society should have been informed of what the auditor had said and been given an opportunity of dealing with it. Incidentally, it was not done, it is only right to say, in any hole-and-corner way because the society were in fact informed that this interview had taken place. In my judgment the last ground in relation to that interview also fails.

I would only add this: In the course of these proceedings the court has given the applicant society considerable latitude to raise a number of matters which go outside the grounds of the statement for relief, and many allegations of unfairness have been made against the registrar. No doubt the applicants think that they are suffering under some grievance, but it is only right to say that, having heard the multitude of accusations made against the registrar I am satisfied that he acted fairly, and that none of the imputations that have been made have been validly made. I would dismiss this application.

I should add that the scope of section 11 has been argued before this court, the question being whether there is any condition precedent before the registrar can consider it expedient to make an order; but it is quite unnecessary to come to any conclusion on the matter.

GORMAN J. I agree so completely with what my Lord has said that I do not think that any useful purpose would be served by my saying anything further.

Application dismissed with costs.

J. F. L.

At the question of counsel for the society, and with the consent of the registrar, a stay on the publication of the society's name was granted for one day, on condition that thereafter any moneys sent to the society as subscriptions for shares or deposits should be paid into court and should not be taken out by the society until further order, to enable counsel for the society to apply to the Court of Appeal for a further stay.

April 29. On an application to the Court of Appeal (Hodson, Pearce and Upjohn L.JJ.) the registrar again consented, and their Lordships continued the order banning the publication of the society's name, subject to the same condition, until the appeal was decided.

The building society appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Neil McKinnon Q.C. and John Peppitt for the society.
J. R. Cumming-Bruce for the registrar.

The following cases, in addition to those in the judgments and to those cited before the Divisional Court, were cited in argument: Rex v. Essex Justices, Ex parte Perkins [5]; Reg. v. Camborne Justices, Ex parte Pearce [6]; Nakkuda Ali v. M. F. De S. Jayaratne. [7]

HODSON L.J., having stated the facts, continued: It was at the interview on April 1, 1960, that the conversation took place between Leigh, the executive registrar, and the auditor, which gives rise to the main question upon which this appeal turns. The point then raised comes under the heading of administration, but for the purpose of the illustration of the point which the auditor desired to make and have elucidated, with an eye on proposed legislation, the balance-sheet of the society was discussed, and the executive registrar, as in duty bound, reported the matter to the registrar himself—the registrar being the officer who had heard the representations on behalf of the society.

REG. v. REGISTRAR OF BUILDING SOCIETIES. Ex parte A BUILDING SOCIETY.
Hodson L.J.

It is contended on behalf of the society here (and this is the main contention) that there should have been no discussion between the auditor and the registrar through his executive registrar upon the affairs of the society, and that this vitiates the order of April 6, since the registrar was acting in a quasi-judicial capacity, and was not at liberty to receive information upon the subject-matter of the representations behind the back of the society.

Lord Parker C.J., in giving judgment in the Divisional Court [1] (a judgment with which the other members of the court concurred), did not accept the submission of the Crown that the registrar was acting throughout in an administrative capacity in the full sense of the word so that certiorari would not lie; but he dealt with the case on the assumption, at any rate, that from the moment that he entered upon a hearing such as I have spoken of until the order was made the registrar was acting in a quasi-judicial capacity.

In order that the point may be determined, the Crown, by cross-notice in this court, contended that throughout the registrar was acting administratively: alternatively, even if he was not acting administratively throughout, it is submitted by the Crown that from March 28, when he finally made up his mind to seek Treasury approval to the order which he intended to make, he had shed his judicial habit and put on again his administrative clothing which (it is submitted) he was wearing at the time of the interview between the auditor and the executive registrar.

The hybrid capacity of a Minister or official who, when holding an inquiry, may be acting in a judicial capacity, but who may at the time of the making of an order be acting in an administrative capacity, is a not uncommon symptom which arises when statutory provisions of the kind with which we are now concerned fall to be considered. In each case the relevant statutory provisions have to be considered, and the duty of the official who conducts the inquiry has to be considered, having regard to the language of the statute which imposes the duty upon him.

The position is well put by Scott L.J. in Horn v. Minister of Health [2]: " . . . where public departments are given under this " type of Act [Housing Act, 1935] quasi-judicial duties as well as " administrative duties, the need of their carrying out their quasi- " judicial duties in strict accordance with natural justice must " always be considered in the light of their administrative duties " also. The administrative duties have to be carried out as part of " the policy of Parliament imposed upon the Minister by the " statute which he is administering, and Parliament must be taken " quite deliberately to have decided that the performance of his " administrative duties under the Act is compatible with the exer- " cise of his quasi-judicial functions. In my view, this particular

[2] [1937] 1 K.B. 164, 186; [1936] 2 All E.R. 1299.

"case illustrates very clearly how the two types of duties can go "together and be compatible one with the other."

The Crown has submitted from the fact that the registrar is under no obligation to do what he in fact did here—give notice of the grounds upon which his intention had been formed—that he was conducting an inquiry not, at any rate, in the full sense, judicial or even quasi-judicial. It was submitted that it was repugnant to the idea of judicial inquiry that no precise notice should be given of charges made which required an answer. It is, of course, further to be noticed that the registrar was not conducting an inquiry in the full sense (as Lord Parker C.J. pointed out) inter partes, because he was having representations made to him only by the party against whom he had himself signified his intention—his provisional intention—to make an order. The quasi-judicial capacity may, I think, subsist even though the full form of a judicial inquiry is not there. (Compare Rex v. Westminster Assessment Committee, Ex parte Grosvenor House (Park Lane) Ltd.,[3] which concerned proceedings before a rating assessment committee.) The purpose of the inquiry is shown by the language of the section, and the object of representation by the society must surely be to give it an opportunity of persuading the registrar to alter the intention which he has previously indicated. It is unnecessary to consider further whether, in the preliminary investigation under section 11 (3), when he was calling for documents and examining them, he was acting administratively or judicially. He was, it may be said, obtaining as it were discovery as a preliminary to forming his intention. But having regard to the range of the inquiry it is open to the view that at that stage, at any rate, he was acting in an administrative capacity. As I say, no question in this appeal arises under that subsection; but after he had formed his intention to make an order under section 1 (1), on which he gave notice on February 9, it seems to me that his quasi-judicial capacity arose and persisted until the order was made on April 6.

The principles of law applicable are to be found in Lord Loreburn's speech in Board of Education v. Rice,[4] where he said[5]: "Comparatively recent statutes have extended, if they "have not originated, the practice of imposing upon departments "or officers of State the duty of deciding or determining questions "of various kinds. In the present instance, as in many others, "what comes for determination is sometimes a matter to be "settled by discretion, involving no law. It will, I suppose, "usually be of an administrative kind; but sometimes it will "involve matter of law as well as matter of fact, or even depend "upon matter of law alone. In such cases the Board of Educa-"tion will have to ascertain the law and also to ascertain the "facts. I need not add that in doing either they must act in "good faith and fairly listen to both sides, for that is a duty

"lying upon everyone who decides anything. But I do not think "they are bound to treat such a question as though it were a "trial. They have no power to administer an oath, and need not "examine witnesses. They can obtain information in any way "they think best, always giving a fair opportunity to those who "are parties in the controversy for correcting or contradicting any "relevant statement prejudicial to their view." I emphasise the last phrase—"always giving a fair opportunity to those who are "parties in the controversy for correcting or contradicting any "relevant statement prejudicial to their view."

A case of a more recent date which is relied upon, and rightly relied upon, by the society in this case, is a decision of the Court of Appeal in Errington v. Minister of Health.[6] I need not go through the facts of that case, but the point which emerges is that it is immaterial for the purposes of considering this question to say that anyway, whatever happened, it made no difference: the matter must, I think, be looked at from a wider and more detached and objective point of view than that. Greer L.J.,[7] in dealing with this matter, quoted from the First Schedule, paragraph 4, of the Act there in question, which reads: "' . . . in "' any other case he shall, before confirming the order, cause a "' public local inquiry to be held and shall consider any objection "' not withdrawn and the report of the person who held the "' inquiry, and may then confirm the order, either with or with-"' out modification.'" He continued[8]: "It seems to me that that "involves the proposition that the matters there mentioned are "the only matters which he is entitled to consider, and that if, "instead of directing his mind solely to those matters, he takes "into consideration evidence which might have been, but was "not, given at the public inquiry, but was given ex parte after-"wards without the owners having any opportunity whatever to "deal with that evidence, then it seems to me that the confirm-"ing order was not within the powers of the Act. It is "admitted that though the draughtsmanship of section 11 (3) is "not perfect, the order there referred to is the confirming order "and not the original order. In my judgment, it is true to say "that an order made by a quasi-judicial officer based on materials "which are not the materials referred to in paragraph 4 of the "First Schedule is an order which is not within the powers of "the Act, having regard to the proposition which has been estab-"lished in common law that a quasi-judicial officer in exercising "his powers must do it in accordance with the rules of natural "justice, that is to say, he must hear both sides and must not "hear one side in the absence of the other."

Maugham L.J. said[8]: "As I think, the question whether "the Minister, after such an inquiry has been held and after a "report has been made, can then proceed—I am not dealing with "the facts for the moment—to hear ex parte statements from one

"side or the other in the absence of those whose obvious desire "it would be to controvert them is precisely similar to the "question whether, after holding a public local inquiry or after "having caused a public local inquiry to be held of a quasi-"judicial character, the Minister can then hold a private inquiry "of his own to which one party only is admitted. That seems "to me to be a very extraordinary result, and one which I should "be very slow to approve. . . . My conclusion is that, although "the act of affirming a clearance area order is an administrative "act, the consideration which must precede the doing of that "act is of the nature of a quasi-judicial consideration, and the "Minister is bound to the extent mentioned by the House of "Lords in the Board of Education v. Rice.[9]" He there refers to the speech of Lord Loreburn, to which I have referred. The final paragraph of the judgment reads [10]: "The only question that "remains is whether the court should come to the conclusion "that the interests of the applicants have been substantially "prejudiced by what has been done, because the quashing of the "order is, of course, a matter of discretion of the court. I do not "think it has been proved that the statements which were made "to the Ministry in fact affected the decision of the Minister, "or of his officials, and I certainly have no reason to doubt that "the officials were acting in what they thought to be the public "interest. On the other hand, it seems to me a matter of the "highest possible importance that where a quasi-judicial function "is being exercised, under such circumstances as it had to be "exercised here, with the result of depriving people of their "property, especially if it is done without compensation, the "persons concerned should be satisfied that nothing unfair has "been done in the matter, and that ex parte statements have not "been heard before the decision has been given without any "chance for the persons concerned to refute those statements. "That seems to me a matter of the greatest possible public "importance, and if I am right in the view that I have expressed "as to the functions of the Minister being of a quasi-judicial "character, I think it follows that in the special circumstances "of this case, as I understand them to be, the court has no "option but to quash the order, as my brother has suggested."

That shows that the question cannot be solved by merely deciding whether or no the Minister made up his mind without reference to the particular matter in question; and I think, accordingly, that the submission made on behalf of the society in that respect is sound—that is to say, that the matter must be dealt with objectively. Indeed, I think that follows from the principles which have been laid down in another class of case, dealing with bias of the court, the most recent enunciations of which have stemmed from Lord Hewart's observations in Rex v. Sussex Justices, Ex parte McCarthy,[11] where the clerk to the justices retired with the justices, although it made no difference to the case. The Lord Chief Justice then used those famous words that justice "must be seen to be done." The same problem has been considered more recently in Reg. v. Camborne Justices,[12] where Slade J. gave the judgment of the court and referred to a number of authorities on this topic, including the well-known case of Reg. v. Rand,[13] where Blackburn J., in dealing with "bias" cases, referred to the matter as depending upon whether there was or was not[14] "a real likelihood" of bias. In the judgment of the court in Reg. v. Camborne Justices it was stated[15] that "the "right test is that prescribed by Blackburn J. in Reg. v. Rand,[16] "namely, that to disqualify a person from acting in a judicial or "quasi-judicial capacity on the ground of interest (other than "pecuniary or proprietary) in the subject-matter of the proceed-"ing, a real likelihood of bias must be shown. This court is, "further, of opinion that a real likelihood of bias must be made "to appear not only from the materials in fact ascertained by the "party complaining, but from such further facts as he might "readily have ascertained and easily verified in the course of his "inquiries."

Earlier, the court had cited[17] from a judgment of Vaughan Williams L.J. in Reg. v. Sunderland Justices[18]: "'Can it be "'said here that there was nothing more than a mere possibility "'or suspicion that these justices would be biased? We must "'judge of this matter as a reasonable man would judge of any "'matter in the conduct of his own business. Can one doubt "'that a reasonable man as a matter of business would, under "'the circumstances of this case, infallibly draw the inference "'that the justices who had negotiated and brought about this "'agreement would have a real bias in favour of granting the "'licence? . . .'"

It is true that these cases to which I have just referred are cases about judicial bias, and nobody has raised the question of bias in this case. But they do show that so long as the judicial or quasi-judicial capacity persists it is no answer to say that justice was in fact done, and I think, therefore, one is bound to examine what took place at the interview, which was in the form of a conversation which was ultimately communicated to the registrar, and see whether, when one looks at this matter objectively, there is any likelihood that the fountain of justice would be sullied.

[His Lordship referred to the affidavit of the auditor with which Leigh agreed, and continued:] Nothing material was added and no fresh information was given during that conversation beyond that contained in the special report which had already been put in on behalf of the society on March 25 by counsel for the society; on examination, I think that any such notion turns out to be without any substance. [His Lordship then referred to representations at the hearing in relation to the mortgage reserves and general reserve account, and continued:]

No doubt it was indiscreet for the executive registrar, in considering the point which he had to consider in relation to the Parliamentary Bill, the administrative matter, to allow the report which had been put in evidence in the judicial hearing to be used, even as an illustration of the problem; but I am satisfied upon the evidence of the parties to the interview that in doing so nothing was done which went beyond legitimate illustration, so that the registrar in the exercise of his undoubted administrative function relating to the point raised by the auditor did not fall into the error of receiving fresh representations relating to the matter upon which he was acting judicially. Nothing took place which on any reasonable view could be regarded as likely to prejudice the conclusion which the registrar had to embody in its final form by the order he made on April 6. This interview, therefore—and I accept the submission of the Crown in this respect—does not form a foundation for the edifice which the society seeks to build upon it, of a reception of material evidence behind the back of the society of a kind which would compel a fair tribunal to give the society a further hearing. Indeed, upon my reading of the evidence it is difficult to see how the registrar could have framed an invitation to the society to make any further representation, or to answer any supposed further material which had been put before him, for upon my reading of this evidence there was no fresh material contained therein. The proceedings over which the registrar was presiding were not concluded until the final order was made, but up to that time he received no relevant representations upon those matters, and no further material was brought to his attention after the representations had been closed. The accounts were in no sense new. The accounts and the special report were part of the material which had been produced for consideration when the representations of the society were made. The auditor and the executive registrar were not discussing with one another the accounts of 1959 with an eye on the order which the registrar was about to make, but with an eye on the administrative problem which they had to discuss, namely, the form of the certificate and the special report, which either would be an alternative or an addition to the signature to the account.

For my part, I have come to the conclusion that this case is a long way from those where the court has been obliged to exercise discretion to make an order of certiorari to quash an order on the ground that the principles of natural justice have not been followed.

There are further grounds of appeal, to which I shall refer very shortly. The society, it is said, was in effect debarred from making representations to the registrar; but a reading of the transcript of what occurred before the registrar on the occasions when the hearing took place satisfies me that there is no substance in that at all. There was never any refusal of the registrar at any time to hear representations; and, indeed, at the final hearing on March 25, no adjournment was asked for. I need add nothing further to what Lord Parker C.J. said upon that topic.

Similarly, a complaint was made in this court, as well as in the court below, upon the form of the letter covering the notice which was sent on February 19, 1960, because that letter gave merely the principal grounds upon which the registrar had stated his intention of making an order, and it is said "that is wholly "insufficient as a foundation for a judicial hearing because no "notice was given in any sufficient form for us, the building "society, to be able to deal with the matters which were being "said or being considered to our prejudice."

The answer to that seems to me to be this. So far as the Act of Parliament is concerned, the registrar is not bound to give any particulars of the allegations which he makes at all: he merely has to give notice of the hearing to the other side—notice of his intention and notice that he is ready to hear their representations. That he did. He went further than the Act of Parliament compelled him to do in giving, under four headings, an indication of the matters to which the society would be asked to address themselves. It could hardly be a matter of complaint that the registrar went further than was necessary in complying with the provisions of the Act of Parliament.

For these reasons, I would dismiss the appeal.

PEARCE L.J. I agree entirely with what my Lord has so clearly stated, and merely add this with regard to the subject-matter of the remarks at the interview between the executive registrar and the auditor. Three matters were referred to casually —the question of the erasures, the question of Oak Farm, and the question of reserves.

So far as the erasures were concerned, there was nothing in that: the auditor was able to give an answer better than anyone else could have done, and he gave an answer which was obviously correct—namely, that, owing to the hurry, there had not been time to prepare a new and perfectly clean set of accounts.

As to Oak Farm, the arguments were plain to view and had already been fully ventilated in the representations by the society's counsel. On one view of the case, the district valuer's valuation was correct, and in that case the advances were ill-judged. The other view, put forward by the society, was that the third valuation—a far higher valuation—was correct, that the market value had in the result confirmed that valuation, and that, therefore, the advances were not ill-judged but were fully justified. Any reference by the executive registrar or the auditor to that topic in no way advanced those obvious arguments, and no further representations on the matter could have had any effect.

The question of the reserves was not a matter which would reflect adversely on the character of the society. It had been made plain at the hearing that the mortgage reserve could be transferred to the general reserve; but the registrar had pointed out that that really made no difference to the position. For, if he were examining the society's accounts from the point of view of its trustee status, he would deduct the mortgage reserve from the general reserve; since the mortgage reserve was necessary against mortgage losses and should not be part of the general reserve, and therefore, adding it to the general reserve in no way strengthened the society's financial position. He left it open as to whether that should or should not be done, and apparently gave the impression that it could properly be done, if the auditor was accurately representing the view of the society. But there was nothing deceitful about it: it was perfectly apparent and aboveboard, and it made no difference to the strength of the society's financial position.

For those reasons, in my view, nothing was said at that interview which could reasonably be thought to affect the mind of the registrar; and I agree entirely that, for the reasons my Lord has given, this appeal should be dismissed.

UPJOHN L.J. I agree completely with both the judgments that have been delivered, and do not desire to add anything of my own.

The building society was refused leave to appeal to the House of Lords and applied for a stay of publication of the name of the building society pending application to the House of Lords for leave to appeal.

UPJOHN L.J. When the matter was first mentioned Mr. Cumming-Bruce took the point that the court had no jurisdiction to order a suspension of publication, that being a duty cast (he submitted) by the statute entirely upon the registrar. I suppose it is still open to him to take that point, and we should then have to determine whether it is a good one or not.

HODSON L.J. We never considered it before because he agreed in the end.

Cumming-Bruce. I was agreeing before.

McKinnon. I am prepared to argue before the court that the registrar has not got power under section 11 of the Act to effect publication of the name of the society.

HODSON L.J. But when public proceedings take place in court the newspapers name the society, and that is publication. There is great doubt about whether there is any power in the court to order the names to be suppressed in almost any case where the court is sitting in open court.

McKinnon. With respect, in criminal proceedings it is commonly done, and a witness is referred to as "Mr. X," or "Y," or "Z."

HODSON L.J. That is probably on the ground that justice cannot be done without something of that kind. But you would have to argue before us that justice could not be done unless the name was suppressed. I think that is the basis of it. We are not at present disposed to make any order affecting publicity. There may be doubts whether we have any power to do it.

Cumming-Bruce. (1) I do not consent, and (2) if necessary I take the point as to jurisdiction.

HODSON L.J. That is so, broadly speaking, the court has no power to suppress names.

Cumming-Bruce. There is the practice in infant cases, but they are proceedings in chambers and everything flows from that; and then there are the solicitor cases. In the case of solicitors, there is provision that the order made by the disciplinary committee shall itself not be placed on the file or published until the determination of any appellate proceedings, if an application to that end is made by the solicitor. So that that statute specifically contemplates that the order shall not come into public notice until the legal proceedings are finished. But I should think it is quite reasonable to hold that as that statute expressly contemplates protecting the anonymity of the solicitor by keeping the order off the file, that would be a warrant to the court not to publish the name of the solicitor in the appellate proceedings in relation to the order. There is nothing of that sort here; and there is a real practical objection to the continuance of the secrecy which is sought.

UPJOHN L.J. I should have thought we are not really concerned with publication at all. We have merely refused to issue a writ of certiorari. Whether the registrar has power to publish or whether he does publish or what his practice is does not seem to me to be a matter, strictly speaking, concerning this court.

Cumming-Bruce. The first heading on the notice of appeal, the question whether the registrar has a right to publish or not, is outside the jurisdiction of this court. What this court is concerned with is simply the title of these proceedings, and whether the order of this court should continue to be an anonymous order; it is submitted that it should not be and, indeed, cannot continue to be anonymous.

HODSON L.J. The court thinks that is right. The court has no power to alter the title of the suit.

McKinnon. The application to the court arises out of an order which has been made in proceedings which were private proceedings, not public proceedings. If my point on that is right, it is an order which is a private order.

HODSON L.J. But if you come to a court of certiorari you come to a public court where justice is seen to be done. How is the court to do justice publicly if the names of the parties are suppressed?

McKinnon. Assuming that the House of Lords takes the view that there is a case here for the society, it would only be right, if the order should never have been made in the first place, that the society before that has been decided should not have been irreparably damaged. On any view, there will be substantial damage to the society; and if in the end the House of Lords takes the view that the order of the registrar ought never to have been made, then it would be contrary to the principles of any system of justice that before that decision had been reached by the final tribunal the society should have been irreparably damaged.

UPJOHN L.J. The principle applicable is clear, it is stated by Lord Haldane in Scott v. Scott [19]: "While the broad principle is "that the courts of this country must, as between parties, "administer justice in public, this principle is subject to apparent "exceptions, such as those to which I have referred. But the "exceptions are themselves the outcome of a yet more fundamental principle that the chief object of courts of justice must "be to secure that justice is done." He then goes on to deal with the well-known exceptions of lunatics and infants and certain criminal cases: ". . . the burden lies on those seeking to displace "its application in the particular case to make out that the ordinary rule must as of necessity be superseded by this paramount "consideration. The question is by no means one which, consistently with the spirit of our jurisprudence, can be dealt with "by the judge as resting in his mere discretion as to what is "expedient. The latter must treat it as one of principle, and as "turning, not on convenience, but on necessity." That is the principle which we have to apply, sitting in public—that "necessarily" the name is published, I would have thought.

HODSON L.J. I agree.

PEARCE L.J. I agree.

HODSON L.J. The court is of opinion that we really cannot treat this as a matter of pure discretion, and in the exercise of our duty all we can do is to dismiss this appeal, with costs. We refuse leave to appeal to the House of Lords; and make no further order.

McKinnon. There is only this difficulty now. I ask leave for the money in court to be repaid to the society. There is something like £60,000 or more in court.

Cumming-Bruce. Not to the society, my Lord. When the society's application was made to the Divisional Court that there should be no publicity, the Divisional Court granted that application on terms designed to the effect that the continued flow of money, which would have been prevented by the order, into the society's coffers, would go into court, on conditions which would enable the court to return the money to the depositors. The registrar is strongly opposed, as defeating the whole nature of the exercise of cross-undertakings, to the money being returned to the society.

HODSON L.J. How is it to be disposed of?

Cumming-Bruce. The names of the depositors will be communicated to the court and the money repaid; the money is in court, and so there is a jurisdiction to give directions for its disposal.

HODSON L.J. If there is an order of the Divisional Court outstanding and we dismiss the appeal against the Divisional Court's order, the Divisional Court's order still stands and you will have to solve this problem with the Divisional Court. Mr. McKinnon will say: "We have not in fact advertised since the order was "made. The money is our money."

Cumming-Bruce. The material part of the Divisional Court order is as follows, that "The society do not take out of court "any part of the said moneys which said moneys are to be dealt "with in accordance with directions to be given by the court"; and the first order is that "The society lodge in court any moneys "hereinafter paid to the society as subscriptions for shares or any "part of a share or by way of a deposit indicating the names and "addresses of the payers and to produce to the registrar a copy "of the receipt for lodgment." What I envisage happening now is an application to the Divisional Court that it give directions for the said moneys to be returned to the payers whose names and addresses are held in court.

HODSON L.J. Yes. That is a matter for the Divisional Court.

McKinnon. The stay on publication still exists till we go back to the Divisional Court. There is an order of the Divisional Court so far as that is concerned.

HODSON L.J. Whether they have exceeded their jurisdiction or not we have not concerned ourselves with. All we have done is to dismiss the appeal.

Cumming-Bruce. There is no stay on publication in the order.

UPJOHN L.J. There is nothing in this order.

McKinnon. There was a consent that there be no publication. By consent, there was to be no publication during the subsistence of this order. That was the position. It was on those terms that I agreed to enter into these undertakings which were incorporated in the order of the court.

PEARCE L.J. It does not recite it.

HODSON L.J. You are thinking of two different kinds of publication all the time. All we are concerned with is the publicity which this case may receive as being a case heard in public. We are not concerned with the other matter.

McKinnon. Publication of the order will not matter in the least if this case receives the sort of publicity which might be expected.

HODSON L.J. Exactly. I see the practical side of it. But all we are concerned with is the publicity of this case here. I cannot say anything further about the publication of the order as such by the registrar.

Application dismissed with costs; leave to appeal to the House of Lords refused.

[Later that day counsel for the registrar applied to the Divisional Court (Lord Parker C.J., Byrne and Ashworth JJ.) for directions in regard to the money lodged in court by the building society pursuant to an order of the Divisional Court. The name of the society was mentioned in open court at the request of Lord Parker C.J. Counsel for the building society did not ask for the money to be paid back to the society. It was ordered that the appropriate officer of the court should pay back their deposits to such depositors as had not already been repaid by the society, and that, on the officer being satisfied that any depositors had been

By rule 24 of the Second Schedule to the Bankruptcy Act, 1914: "If the trustee thinks that a proof has been improperly admitted, "the court may, on the application of the trustee . . . expunge the "proof . . ."

By section 141 of the Act: "In the case of the death of the debtor "or his wife, or of a witness whose evidence has been received by "any court in any proceeding under this Act, the deposition of the "person so deceased . . . shall be admitted as evidence of the matters "therein deposed to."

A debtor was adjudicated bankrupt in 1912. In 1913 he made a statement of affairs verified by affidavit, pursuant to section 16 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and subsequently a proof of debt was sworn on behalf of H., trading as J. S. H. & Co., commission agent, for a sum of £4,796 10s. 1d. for money found due on taking accounts between the parties. H. died in 1919 and the debtor died in 1921. In 1924 the debtor's trustee in bankruptcy admitted H.'s proof and obtained his release from the trusteeship in 1925. No dividend was ever paid by the trustee.

In June, 1958, a sum of £1,501 came into the hands of the official receiver as trustee in bankruptcy of the debtor; and about £1,300 became available for distribution among his creditors. The official receiver applied to the court, under rule 24 of the Second Schedule to the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, to have H.'s proof expunged on the ground that it was an unenforceable gaming debt, and that the proof was, therefore, improperly admitted:—

Held, (1) that the statement of affairs was inadmissible as against the trustees of H.'s estate: it was not rendered admissible by the fact that it was a sworn statement which the debtor was bound to make in discharge of the duty imposed on him by section 16 of the Act of 1883, nor were its contents "evidence . . . received by any "court" or the statement or affidavit verifying it "the deposition" of the debtor within section 141 of the Act of 1914.

(2) That, where both the debtor and the creditor were dead, and relevant documentary evidence might have been lost, it was for the trustee in bankruptcy to satisfy the court beyond any reasonable doubt that a proof had been improperly admitted; and that, although the only admissible evidence, the proof itself, appeared in its face to be a claim on an account between bookmaker and client, the official solicitor had failed so to satisfy the court, for a fresh agreement might have been made between the debtor and the creditor resulting in an enforceable debt, and without knowing the facts of the case it could not be said for certain that the debt was not enforceable. Accordingly, the application must be dismissed.

MOTION.

On November 19, 1912, a receiving order was made against a debtor, James Joseph Aloysius Patrick Browne. The debtor was adjudicated bankrupt on December 30, 1912, and one, Laurence Robert Dicksee, was appointed trustee of his estate. On April 10, 1913, the debtor made out an amended statement of affairs verified by affidavit in accordance with the provisions of section 16 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

On May 21, 1913, John Gregg Spears, a bookkeeper in the employ of the creditor, James Stanley Halsall, swore a proof which stated that "[the debtor] was, at the date of the receiving "order . . . and still is, justly and truly indebted to [the creditor] "trading as J. Stanley Halsall & Co., . . . commission agent, "in the sum of £4,796 10s. 1d. for money found due to [the "creditor] by [the debtor] on taking accounts between the parties "on November 23, 1912."

The creditor died on February 18, 1919, and the respondents, Gerald Conrad Thompson and Doris Isobel Flemmich, were the present trustees of his will. The debtor died on November 28, 1921, without having obtained his discharge. On April 3, 1924, the creditor's proof was admitted for dividend together with six other proofs. The total amount of the proofs admitted was £10,060 1s. 7d. No dividend was ever paid by the then trustee, who obtained his release from the trusteeship on January 15, 1925, whereupon the official receiver became trustee of the debtor's estate.

In June, 1958, a sum of £1,501 in respect of the debtor's reversionary interest in the estate of a deceased relative came into the hands of the official receiver, and, after payment of outstanding costs and expenses, there was a balance of about £1,300 available for distribution by way of dividend among the creditors of the debtor. By a notice of motion dated February 11, 1960, the official receiver asked for an order that the creditors' proof be expunged.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 30. CROSS J. read the following judgment. This is a motion by the official receiver, who is now the trustee in bankruptcy of the late James Browne, asking that a certain proof of debt which has been admitted for dividend be expunged.

[His Lordship stated the facts and continued:] The official receiver has formed the view that five of the seven proofs admitted by the debtor's trustee, including the proof in question, were in respect of unenforceable gambling debts and ought not to have been admitted. The motion now before me, however, relates only to the proof of Halsall.

Rule 24 of the rules in the Second Schedule to the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, is in the following terms: "If the trustee thinks that "a proof has been improperly admitted, the court may, on the "application of the trustee, after notice to the creditor who made "the proof, expunge the proof or reduce its amount." It is clear that mere lapse of time alone, however long, is no objection to an application to expunge a proof, though the creditor is entitled to retain any dividend which he may previously have received: see In re Tait, Ex parte Harper.[1] I do not, however, read that case as deciding that there can never be any estoppel against a trustee who seeks to have a proof expunged. Thus if the creditor had been given to understand by the trustee that he was going to receive a certain sum by way of dividend, and had acted in some way in reliance on the expectation of receiving it, I think that the court might well refuse to expunge his proof even though it was satisfied that it had been wrongly admitted in the first place. This appears to have been the view taken by Knight Bruce L.J. in Ex parte Sanderson, In re Alexander,[2] and I do not think that there is anything in In re Tait, Ex parte Harper [3] inconsistent with it; but in this case the creditor's estate cannot rely on any estoppel of this sort since he died before the proof was admitted and the receipt of the £1,300 was entirely unexpected.

This case, however, differs from In re Tait, Ex parte Harper [3] in a very material particular. In In re Tait, Ex parte Harper [3] there was no doubt as to the facts which existed when the proof was admitted and no doubt that the proof was improperly admitted. The argument turned simply on whether the delay which had occurred precluded the trustee from asking to have the proof expunged. Here, on the other hand, it is by no means clear upon what material the trustee admitted the proof. The creditor died many years ago, and the respondents say that they can find nothing about the debt in such papers of his as survive. The trustee who admitted the proof retired in 1925 and for all I know he may now be dead. At all events, I have no evidence from him. Finally, the debtor himself is long since dead and cannot give any evidence as to the nature of the debt.

Counsel for the official receiver submitted that certain references as to the nature of the creditor's claim contained in the debtor's statement of affairs were admissible against the respondents. He did not argue that what a deceased debtor states with regard to his liabilities in his statement of affairs is admissible in evidence as a statement against interest. He contended, first, that the statement of affairs was admissible as a sworn statement which the debtor was bound to make in discharge of the duty imposed on him by what is now section 14 of the Act. Alternatively, he submitted that it was expressly made admissible by section 141 of the Act. The first submission was addressed to the Court of Appeal as long ago as 1884 in the case of Ex parte Revell, In re Tollemache (No. 1),[4] as an alternative to the argument that the debtor's entry of the debt in his statement of affairs was a statement against interest. The court rejected the latter argument, and though they did not expressly deal with it they must, I think, be taken to have rejected the former as well. The argument based on section 141 is also, in my judgment, ill-founded. The section runs as follows: "In the case of the death of the debtor "or his wife, or of a witness whose evidence has been received "by any court in any proceeding under this Act, the deposition "of the person so deceased, purporting to be sealed with the seal "of the court, or a copy thereof purporting to be so sealed, shall "be admitted as evidence of the matters therein deposed to."

A statement of affairs must, of course, be verified by affidavit, but the debtor cannot be cross-examined on it and I do not think that what is contained in it can fairly be said to be evidence received by the court or that the statement or the affidavit can properly be described as a deposition of the debtor. Section 141 appears to me to be referring to the depositions properly so called of the debtor or of his wife or some third party made either at the public examination of the debtor or at a private examination under section 25 of the Act.

As I see the matter, therefore, the only evidence which I have to show that the proof was wrongfully admitted is the proof itself. In a case where the vital witnesses are dead, and relevant documentary evidence may have been lost, the maxim "omnia praesumuntur rite esse acta" applies with peculiar force. In such a case it is not enough for the official receiver to say that, as the terms of the proof suggest that the debt in question was an unenforceable gambling debt, the onus is thrown on the creditor's representatives to show that it was not. It is for the official receiver to satisfy me that the proof was wrongly admitted, and not, as I see it, simply to satisfy me on the balance of probabilities but to satisfy me beyond any reasonable doubt.

The first thing that strikes me on looking at the proof is that it appears on the face of it to be a claim on an account stated between a bookmaker and a backer. Although the point was not perhaps strictly speaking settled before the decision of Streatfeild J. in Alberg v. Chandler,[5] it was always, I think, tolerably clear that such a claim was not enforceable at all: see per Tucker L.J. in Law v. Dearnley.[6] It would be surprising to find any trustee in bankruptcy admitting such a proof without further inquiry, and I think it likely that if one knew the full facts one would find that the trustee, in admitting the proof, was acting on some further information from the creditor not contained in the proof itself.

Counsel for the official receiver was disposed to agree that this might well be so, but he argued that any further material upon which the trustee acted could at most only have been evidence of a fresh agreement by the debtor to pay the gambling debt founded on some new consideration such as a promise by the creditor to refrain from posting the debtor as a defaulter. Such evidence, he said, might well have justified the trustee in admitting the proof in reliance on the decision of the Court of Appeal in Hyams v. Stuart King[7]; but now that that decision has been overruled by the House of Lords in Hill v. William Hill (Park Lane) Ltd.,[8] one could see clearly that the proof must have been wrongly admitted.

I agree that it is possible—if not probable—that this was a Hyams v. Stuart King[9] case; and, as at present advised, I see no reason to doubt that, if a trustee admits a proof on a view of the law which is generally thought to be right but subsequently turns out to be wrong, the proof has been "improperly" admitted within the meaning of rule 24. But can I say that I am satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the creditor's claim was unenforceable under the law as now understood? As counsel for the respondents pointed out, it is possible—though no doubt unlikely—that, despite the reference in the proof to the creditor's profession, the debt was not in respect of betting transactions at all, and even if I disregard this possibility, the speeches in Hill v. William Hill (Park Lane) Ltd.[10] show that it is always a question of fact whether or not a fresh agreement arrived at between a bookmaker and an unsuccessful backer results in an enforceable debt or not. The overruling of Hyams v. Stuart King[11] has much reduced the number of cases in which there will be an enforceable claim, but without knowing the facts of the particular case no one can say for certain that there will not be. If it was my function to guess whether or not the creditor's proof was properly admitted, I should have no hesitation whatever in guessing that it was not; but my function, as I see it, is to refuse this motion unless I am satisfied beyond any reasonable doubt that it was improperly admitted; and in the state of the evidence I cannot say that I am so satisfied.

Motion dismissed. Respondents' costs to be taxed on a common fund basis and paid out of the debtor's estate. Applicant's costs also to be paid out of the debtor's estate.

The defendant was charged with driving without due care and attention contrary to section 12 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930. At the hearing, after a police witness for the prosecution had given his evidence-in-chief, the defendant by cross-examination sought to show that he had never been given the statutory warning or notice of intended prosecution as required by section 21 of the Road Traffic Act, 1934. The magistrates disallowed that cross-examination and refused to allow the defendant himself to give evidence that he had not received a warning or notice on the ground that the defendant had not stated at the beginning of the case that there was an issue regarding the notice of intended prosecution. The magistrates found the offence proved. On an application for an order of certiorari:—

Held, allowing the application, that while it was a very convenient practice for an issue regarding the notice of intended prosecution to be treated as a preliminary point, there was no ground on which a defendant could be prevented from raising the matter at any stage of the proceedings.

APPLICATION FOR CERTIORARI.

The applicant, Henry Gordon Brooks, was convicted on November 26, 1959, by Edmonton magistrates sitting at Tottenham, on an information laid by a police inspector, alleging that he drove without due care and attention contrary to section 12 (1) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930. He was fined £20, ordered to pay £4 5s. costs, his driving licence was endorsed and he was disqualified from driving for two months. He applied for an order of certiorari to bring up and quash the conviction and order on the grounds that the magistrates refused to permit cross-examination of the prosecution witnesses or the presentation of evidence for the defence on one of the issues, namely, compliance with section 21 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930 [1] (which related to notice of intended prosecution), and that the conviction and order were contrary to natural justice.

By his affidavit in support of the statement of grounds for his application, the defendant stated that at the hearing of the information he was represented by counsel and pleaded not guilty. The third witness for the prosecution was police constable Chapman who, inter alia, stated that he had given the defendant the usual warning. When the defendant's counsel cross-examined Chapman he asked him what he meant by that, and Chapman replied that he meant that he had informed the defendant that he would be reported so that the question of prosecuting him for one or more of the offences of careless, dangerous or reckless driving could be considered. The defendant's counsel, on the defendant's instructions, put it to Chapman that he had not so informed the defendant. At that point the clerk to the magistrates observed that it was the practice of the court not to permit the raising by the defence of issues relating to notice of intended prosecution unless the defence had stated at the beginning of the case that there was an issue on that score, and that he believed that to be the correct practice. The defendant's counsel then pointed out that as the notice was, by statute, deemed to have been given until the contrary were shown it was not possible to take the point as a preliminary one. The chairman of the magistrates said that the Bench had to be guided by the clerk and ruled that the question was not a proper one, and that counsel should not put any further questions to that issue. The defendant's counsel then asked whether the defendant would be permitted to give evidence that Chapman had not informed him that he would be reported, and the clerk said that he considered that followed from the prior ruling, whereupon the chairman further ruled that the defendant should not be permitted to give evidence concerning the issue. The defendant's counsel asked that those rulings should be recorded, which was done. The defendant subsequently gave evidence but not on the issue of notice of intended prosecution. The Bench retired and found the case against the defendant proved, and thereupon made the order which the defendant sought to have quashed.

[1] Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 21: "Where a person is prosecuted for an offence . . . relating . . . to reckless or dangerous driving, and to careless driving he shall not be convicted unless either—(a) he was warned at the time the offence was committed that the question of prosecuting him for an offence . . . would be taken into consideration; or (b) within 14 days of the commission of the offence a summons for the offence was served on him; or (c) within . . . 14 days a notice of the intended prosecution . . . was served on or sent . . . to him . . . : Provided that—(i) Failure to comply with this requirement shall not be a bar to the conviction of the accused in any case where the court is satisfied that—(1) neither the name and address of the accused . . . could with reasonable diligence have been ascertained in time . . . ; or (2) the accused by his own conduct contributed to the failure; and (ii) the requirement of this section shall in every case be deemed to have been complied with unless and until the contrary is proved."

The magistrates put in an affidavit to the same effect as that of the defendant.

J. Nevin for the applicant.

The respondents did not appear and were not represented.

LORD PARKER C.J. stated the facts and continued: For my part, I think it is a very convenient practice that in these cases defendants should be asked whether any issue is going to be raised in regard to notice of intended prosecution because if there is, it is clearly convenient to dispose of that issue at once without having to go into all the facts. But while that is a very convenient practice, I can see no ground on which one can prevent a defendant raising the matter at any stage of the proceedings. After all, section 21 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, says, and only says, that the defendant shall not be convicted unless there has been a notice of intended prosecution and, by the second proviso, it is provided: "The requirement of this section shall in every "case be deemed to have been complied with unless and until the "contrary is proved." If, therefore, a defendant chooses not to raise the issue at once but to wait until the appropriate prosecution witness gives evidence and then cross-examines him, I myself see no possible power to prevent that cross-examination. Accordingly, I feel in this case that while there is no reflection on the Licensing—Forfeiture—Conviction of "the owner or occupier"—Members' club—Unlawful sale of liquor—Seizure by police—Conviction of one member—Liquor forfeited—Whether member was "the owner "or occupier"—Licensing Act, 1953 (1 & 2 Eliz. 2, c. 46), s. 152 (2).

Crown Practice—Certiorari—Jurisdiction of inferior tribunal—Evidence—Admissibility of affidavit evidence.

The police, on the authority of a warrant issued under section 152 (1) of the Licensing Act, 1953, entered a members' club and found liquor being served to non-members. The club was run by a managing committee; the freehold and assets were vested in three trustees, the present applicants. The police seized the liquor and subsequently those persons found selling the liquor were charged with selling it without a justices' licence, to which they all pleaded guilty, including S., who was a member of the club and of the managing committee. The memorandum of conviction against S. included the direction that the liquor forfeited under section 152 should be sold. The applicants applied for an order of certiorari on the grounds that the record was bad on its face in that it did not disclose that S. was "the owner or occupier" of the premises, and that, in any event, the magistrates had no jurisdiction to give that direction in that S. was not the owner or occupier of the premises from which the liquor had been removed and that, accordingly, forfeiture could not take place:—

Held, that (1) although the record was incomplete in as far as it did not specify that S. was the owner or occupier, there was no error of law on the face of the record.

(2) Since section 152 (2) provided for automatic forfeiture if the owner or occupier was convicted, and an incorrect decision by the magistrates that the person convicted was an owner or occupier could not bring about that automatic forfeiture, the court was entitled to look at affidavit evidence in order to see whether the magistrates had jurisdiction, which meant to ascertain whether S. was the owner or occupier of the place from which the liquor was removed.

(3) On the true construction of section 152 (2), it was plain that all the owners or all the occupiers had to be convicted before the forfeiture could operate; accordingly, whoever might be the occupiers of a members' club, it was clear that, at the most, S. was only one of many occupiers and, accordingly, the court would quash that part of the record setting out the forfeiture and order for sale.

APPLICATION FOR CERTIORARI.

The applicants, the three trustees of the Plumpton and District Club, applied for an order of certiorari to bring up and quash an order made by East Sussex justices sitting at Lewes on January 27, 1959, purporting to forfeit under section 152 (2) of the Licensing Act, 1953,[1] intoxicating liquor and vessels, the property of the applicants removed from the club under section 152 (1) on November 22, 1958. The grounds on which the order was sought were: (1) that the order was bad in law in that section 152 (2) operated only when the owner or occupier of the place, from which intoxicating liquor had been removed under subsection (1), was convicted of stated offences. The accused and convicted person, one Edward William Sasse, convicted of selling by retail intoxicating liquor without holding a justices' licence, was not on record on summons or final conviction as being the owner or occupier of the premises of the club, nor was he the owner or occupier; (2) that in making the order the magistrates exceeded their jurisdiction.

By affidavit in support of the application the secretary of the club stated that on November 22 certain intoxicating liquor and vessels valued at £52 2s. 10d. were seized and removed pursuant to section 152 (1) of the Act of 1953 from the premises of the club. By an information dated January 10, 1959, Sasse was charged that he on November 22, 1958, at 10.20 p.m. at the Plumpton and District Club unlawfully did sell by retail certain intoxicating liquor, to wit ale without holding a justices' licence. On January 27, 1959, Sasse was convicted of selling by retail intoxicating liquor which he was not authorised to sell. The memorandum of conviction entered in the register of the magistrates' court dated January 27, 1959, read: (Name of defendant) "Edward "William Sasse"; (nature of offence) "Selling by retail intoxi- "cating liquor without holding a justices' licence"; (date of offence) "22.11.1958"; (plea or consent to order) "Guilty";

[1] Licensing Act, 1953, s. 152: "(1) If a justice of the peace is satisfied by information on oath that "there is reasonable ground for "believing that any intoxicating "liquor is sold by retail . . . at any "place in the county or borough for "which he is justice, being a place "where that liquor may not lawfully "be sold by retail, he may issue a "search warrant . . . to a constable "authorising him . . . to enter that "place . . . and search the place for "intoxicating liquor and seize and "remove any intoxicating liquor that "the constable has reasonable "grounds for supposing to be in the "place for the purpose of unlawful "sale there or elsewhere, and the "vessels containing the liquor. "(2) If the owner or occupier of the "place from which any intoxicating "liquor has been removed under the "preceding subsection is convicted of "selling by retail . . . any intoxi- "cating liquor that he is not autho- "rised to sell by retail, or is convicted "of having in his possession intoxi- "cating liquor that he is not autho- "rised to sell, any intoxicating liquor "so removed, and the vessels contain- "ing it, shall be forfeited."

v.
LEWES

(minute of adjudication) "Defendant convicted, fined £2. Intoxicating liquor and vessels forfeited under section 152 of the Licensing Act, 1953, directed to be sold by informant."

By his affidavit the clerk to the Lewes justices stated that acting under the authority of warrants issued by a justice of the peace under sections 143 and 152 of the Licensing Act, 1953, officers of the East Sussex Police Force entered the premises of the Plumpton and District Club on November 22, 1958, and seized, inter alia, a quantity of intoxicating liquor and containing vessels which were found therein. On January 27, 1959, at Lewes Magistrates' Court various persons appeared on informations charging them with offences against section 120 (1) (a) alleged to have been committed at the club, amongst them Edward William Sasse, who was charged with three offences alleged to have been committed on October 4, 1958, one on October 18 and two on November 22, 1958. Each of the persons accused pleaded guilty. Following the pleas of guilty the solicitor for the prosecution outlined the facts and circumstances of the case, which included, inter alia, that on the execution of the warrant under section 152 liquor and vessels had been seized and removed from the club premises on November 22; that the club was a members' club; that the various accused persons and in particular Sasse were members of the club and on the occasions of the several offences were serving behind the bar of the club; that in his submission for the purposes of section 152 (2) the various accused, and in particular Sasse, as members, were occupiers of the club premises; and that therefore under the provisions of section 152 an occupier, having been convicted of selling by retail intoxicating liquor without holding a justices' licence any intoxicating liquor and containing vessels which had been seized under the warrant issued, would be automatically forfeited. Counsel appearing for the club and the accused raised no objections to any of the facts or submissions, and in due course, when pleading in mitigation on behalf of the accused, pointed out that in any event the prosecution might be a crippling blow to the club as £51 worth of intoxicating liquor had been seized in addition to the value of the containers. When the magistrates retired to consider the penalties, the clerk was invited and did retire with them. The clerk understood that the magistrates assumed that it was not disputed that Sasse was an occupier of the club premises, and that on his conviction for the offences committed on November 22, when the liquor and containers were seized under warrant, the liquor and vessels were automatically forfeited under the provisions of section 152 (2). Announcing the penalties, the chairman of the court stated that the liquor and vessels were forfeited automatically under section 152. In so doing, the chairman was merely stating the effect of section 152, and the court in no way purported to make any order directing such forfeiture, which was in their opinion unnecessary in view of the provisions of section 152. It was not therefore accurate to say, as was set out in the club secretary's affidavit, that the justices made an order under section 152 (2). Thereafter, acting under their powers under section 160 (3), the court directed that the liquor and vessels should be sold by the informant. In the clerk's submission, it being agreed between the parties before the court that Sasse was both a member and, for the purposes of the Act, an occupier of the club on November 22, 1958, on his conviction for any one of the three offences alleged to have been committed on that date any intoxicating liquor or containers seized in pursuance of a warrant issued under section 152 (1) were forfeited under section 152 (2), and that the magistrates acted properly in making a direction under section 160 (3) for the disposal of the liquor and containers.

By a further affidavit the secretary of the club agreed with the facts set out in the clerk's affidavit but submitted that there was no proof that Sasse was the occupier of the premises. Sasse was at all material times a member of the club and of the managing committee; he was not a trustee. The applicants submitted that Sasse was not the occupier of the premises and, if necessary, would submit that the premises were in occupation of the trustees, alternatively, of the managing committee, alternatively, of both the trustees and the managing committee. Of the three other persons charged with Sasse, one was a member of the managing committee, another was assistant secretary. At all material times there were eight members of the managing committee.

The following cases, in addition to those referred to in the judgment, were cited in argument: Graff v. Evans [2]; Brittain v. Kinnaird [3]; Rex v. Weston-super-Mare Justices, Ex parte Barkers (Contractors) Ltd. [4]; Davies v. Price [5]; Gill v. Bright. [6]

LORD PARKER C.J. stated the facts and continued: The submissions made on behalf of the applicants are twofold. First of all, it is said that that record is bad on its face. Secondly, it is said that in any event the magistrates had no jurisdiction to give that direction in that Sasse was not the owner or occupier of the place from which the liquor had been removed, and that, accordingly, forfeiture could not take place.

Having said that, it is necessary to look in a little more detail at the relevant sections of the Act of 1953. By section 120 (1) it is provided: "(1) Subject to the provisions of this Act, if any "person—(a) sells or exposes for sale by retail any intoxicating "liquor without holding a justices' licence authorising him to "hold an excise licence for the sale of that liquor, or (b) holding "a justices' licence sells or exposes for sale by retail any intoxi-"cating liquor except at the place for which the justices' licence "authorises him to hold an excise licence for the sale of that "liquor, he shall be guilty of an offence under this section." By subsection (6) of that section it is provided: "Where intoxicating "liquor is sold in contravention of this section on any premises, "every occupier of the premises who is proved to have been privy "or consenting to the sale shall be guilty of an offence under this "section."

Section 152 is not dealing with licensed premises. [His Lordship read the material provisions of subsections (1) and (2) of section 152 and continued:] It was pursuant to a search warrant issued under section 152 (1) that the police raided this club on November 22, 1958, and seized a quantity of liquor and the vessels containing the same. The persons whom they thereafter brought before the court were persons who were found selling the liquor to non-members and who were guilty of an offence under section 120 (1) (a).

Observe in passing that the forfeiture in section 152 (2) is an automatic forfeiture. It does not depend upon any finding of the magistrates or any discretion on the part of the magistrates. It is something which follows automatically if the owner or occupier of the place from which the liquor has been removed is convicted of selling by retail any intoxicating liquor that he is not authorised to sell.

Finally, by section 160 (3) it is provided: "Liquor or vessels "forfeited under this Act shall be sold or otherwise disposed of as "the court imposing the forfeiture may direct; and the proceeds "shall be applied as if they were a fine." There are other provisions in the Act giving the magistrates a discretion to forfeit, and that is no doubt why there is a reference to the court imposing the forfeiture.

In the present case, as I have said, the forfeiture is automatic, but I think that the magistrates would, even so, have to make an order providing, as they did, that the liquor should be sold. It was as the result of that that this entry to which I have referred appears in the register of the magistrates' court. It is to be observed that the magistrates do not therein impose the forfeiture, but they recite that the intoxicating liquor and vessels had been forfeited under section 152 of the Act, and directed that they be sold by the informant.

The first point taken by Mr. O'Connor is that that record is bad in that it does not disclose that Edward William Sasse was the owner or the occupier. Whether one looks at that or at the information preferred against him, he is not charged with selling by retail without a licence "being the owner or the occupier" of any premises, and in the minute of adjudication it is not stated that the defendant, being the occupier, the liquor and vessels are forfeited. Mr. O'Connor maintains that the record is incomplete in that respect and bad. I am not prepared to say that this record is bad in the sense that it contains an error of law on its face. I think that it would have been far better if it had been recited that the defendant, being the owner or occupier, the liquor and vessels were forfeited automatically. Also, I think it would have been better if the quantity of liquor and the number of vessels had been inserted. But certiorari will only go if there is an error of law on its face, and although it is incomplete, when I look at this record I cannot say that it is necessarily bad because, for all I know, Edward William Sasse might well have been the owner or the occupier. Accordingly, I would not allow this application on that ground.

The other ground is one which is said to go to jurisdiction. It is said that if this court looks at affidavits they will find that Edward William Sasse was not the owner or the occupier within section 152 (2); that, accordingly, there could not have been any automatic disqualification and, once more, that there could not have been an order for sale under section 160 (3). On the other side, it is argued by Mr. Purchas that this is not a case in which the court is entitled to look at affidavit evidence. He says that this is the type of case in which the magistrates have jurisdiction to inquire into the matter. If they have gone wrong in law or in fact, that is not a matter for certiorari, because the remedy by way of certiorari is not a remedy by way of appeal; and he points to the well-known passages in Reg. v. Bolton[1] and the very well-known passage of Lord Sumner in Rex v. Nat Bell Liquors Ltd.[2] I think I should read the passage in that speech to make Mr. Purchas's point clear. Lord Sumner said: "It has been "said that the matter may be regarded as a question of jurisdic-"tion, and that a justice who convicts without evidence is acting "without jurisdiction to do so. Accordingly, want of essential "evidence, if ascertained somehow, is on the same footing as "want of qualification in the magistrate, and goes to the question "of his right to enter on the case at all. Want of evidence on "which to convict is the same as want of jurisdiction to take "evidence at all. This, clearly, is erroneous. A justice who "convicts without evidence is doing something that he ought not "to do, but he is doing it as a judge, and if his jurisdiction to "entertain the charge is not open to impeachment, his subse-"quent error, however grave, is a wrong exercise of a jurisdiction "which he has, and not a usurpation of a jurisdiction which he "has not. How a magistrate, who has acted within his juris-"diction up to the point at which the missing evidence should "have been, but was not, given, can, thereafter, be said by a "kind of relation back to have had no jurisdiction over the charge "at all, it is hard to see."

v.
LEWES
JUSTICES.

C.J.

Mr. Purchas maintains that applying that principle this was a case in which the magistrates had jurisdiction to inquire whether the person convicted was the owner or the occupier within the subsection, and that if they have gone wrong in fact or in law that is not a matter for this court. I am quite satisfied that this is not a case which comes within that principle. In particular, this is not a case where it has been left to the magistrates to be satisfied that the person convicted is the owner or the occupier. The subsection provides that there is an automatic forfeiture if the owner or occupier is convicted. That has to be so before there is any forfeiture, and then the forfeiture is automatic, and the magistrates by wrongly deciding that the person convicted is an owner or occupier cannot bring about that automatic forfeiture. Accordingly, I am quite satisfied that this is a case where we are entitled to look at the affidavit evidence in order to see whether the magistrates had jurisdiction, which means to ascertain whether Edward William Sasse was the owner or occupier of the place from which the liquor was removed.

All that appears on the affidavit evidence is that Sasse was a member of this club. It was a members' club and he was one of many, many members. It also appears that he was one of a number of members of the managing committee. The freehold of the club and the assets of the club were vested in three trustees, the applicants in the present case. Of course, the application of section 152 (2) raises great difficulties in the case of members' clubs, and I do not find it necessary in this case to say who exactly were the occupiers, whether it be the members of the managing committee or all the members of the club. I am quite clear, however, that Edward William Sasse was, at most, only one of many occupiers. Indeed, he may not have been an occupier at all, but I am assuming that he was, and indeed it is to be observed that it was admitted before the magistrates that he was. Even on that assumption, however, I am quite clear that he is not "the occupier" within the meaning of subsection (2). I think the opening words of that subsection are clear, and when it says "If the owner or occupier of the place . . . is "convicted of selling by retail" it means, if there is more than one owner or more than one occupier, all the owners or all the occupiers. In the ordinary way, under the Interpretation Act, 1889, the singular includes the plural but, much more important, there would be manifest injustice done if it were possible for this automatic forfeiture to take place with only one of many occupiers or one of many owners before the court. I think that on the plain meaning of those words all the owners or all the occupiers must have been brought before the court and convicted.

As I have said, it raises obvious difficulties with regard to members' clubs, but the section covers many other premises besides members' clubs and one must look at the matter of construction strictly. In these circumstances I am satisfied that the magistrates here had no jurisdiction to treat the case as one in which an automatic forfeiture had taken place and to make an order for sale under section 160 (3).

REGINA v. LEWES JUSTICES.

For these reasons I would allow the order to go to quash that part of the record which sets out the forfeiture and the direction for sale.

DONOVAN J. I agree. Like Lord Parker C.J. I would reserve the question whether Sasse was an occupier by virtue of his membership of the club or by virtue of his membership of the managing committee. Obviously many matters would have to be considered, but it matters little in this case either way, for in my view he was only one of several such occupiers.

DAVIES J. I agree and can express my agreement in two or three sentences really repeating what Lord Parker C.J. has said. It is obviously a fundamental condition precedent to the power of the magistrates to direct a sale under section 160 (3) that the liquor and vessels should be forfeited; but unless the owner or occupier has been convicted, the liquor and vessels are not forfeited. Sasse, one member of the club, would not be the owner or occupier, for the reasons my Lord has indicated. He might be an occupier. In my opinion, therefore, there is no forfeiture, and, consequently, there was no jurisdiction in the magistrates to make the order for sale. I agree with the order proposed.

MARSHALL
v.
NOTTINGHAM

In 1957 the plaintiff bought a plot of land from one L. From 1912 until the date of the sale L., who was a carpenter and handyman, had carried on business on the land, making use of it to manufacture (in a workshop) portable buildings, such as greenhouses and garages, and garden implements and furniture, and to display many of these articles for sale. Although most of the goods which were displayed and sold on the land by L. were manufactured there by him, some of them were bought elsewhere. L.'s business was at one time substantial, but by 1946 it had greatly diminished, and was carried on by L. alone; from this date until 1957 L. used only to visit the land two or three times a week. Among other buildings on the land there was a hut erected by L. which he used as an office and saleroom.

The plaintiff was managing director of a company, for whose purposes she bought the land. The major part of the company's business was the sale of caravans, although it also sold portable buildings and garden furniture. The company took possession of the land, cleared, levelled and surfaced it and removed most of the buildings. The company then displayed for sale there a number of their caravans, together with large advertisements, and continued to use the hut, which they had retained, as an office and saleroom. The defendant corporation, as local planning authority, being of opinion that the plaintiff had carried out development consisting of the making of a material change in the use of the land, served on the plaintiff an enforcement notice requiring her to discontinue using the land for the sale of caravans and wooden buildings and the use of the hut as a "sales-shop."

The plaintiff claimed, inter alia, declarations that no development consisting of material change of use had taken place on the land; that the enforcement notice was of no effect in law; and that the hut, together with the land on which goods were exposed for sale, was a shop within Class I of the Schedule to the Town and Country Planning (Use Classes) Order, 1950,[1] and its use, and that of the land, for the purposes of retail trade, was therefore not development and was lawful for the purposes of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947:—

Held, (1) that the primary use, which continued until 1957, of the land under L.'s ownership, had been the advertisement, display and sale of the products of L.'s business; that had L. bought rather than manufactured the goods which he sold this would not have amounted to a material change of use; and that, accordingly, the mere fact that the plaintiff's company did not manufacture on the land the goods sold there did not amount to development; but that this did not mean that sales of goods on the land on a vastly

(2) That the fact that the main purpose of the company was to sell caravans, which L. had not sold, did not show that the company had carried out development, since, deciding the matter as one of fact and degree, had L. dealt in caravans on the scale on which the company had done, he would not have made a material change of use of the land (post, p. 718).

(3) That the use of the hut and the land in L.'s time was for carrying on a retail business wherein the primary purpose was the sale of L.'s goods; that the hut and land were, accordingly, then a shop within the meaning of the Use Classes Order; that the use by the company of the hut and land was as a shop for a purpose within the same class under the Order; and that, therefore, by virtue of the provisions of the Order, development was deemed not to have taken place and the plaintiff was entitled to succeed (post, p. 719).

Per curiam. If the business of a retail dealer is being carried on in any building, it may be that there is a change of use if the business of a baker is substituted for that of a grocer; but such a change cannot be material from any point of view which could legitimately be taken by a planning authority.

ACTION.

The following statement of facts is taken in substance from the judgment.

The plaintiff, Miss Edith Agnes Marshall, by this action against Nottingham City Corporation (hereinafter referred to as "the corporation") sought, inter alia, a declaration that no development consisting of a material change of use had been carried out on land belonging to her known as 428, Mansfield Road, Nottingham.

The plaintiff bought the land on September 30, 1957, from E. J. Ledger, who gave evidence, which was accepted, to the effect that he had carried on business on the land since about 1912, living in a nearby house at 2, Mapperley Park Drive. He was a woodworker and handyman, and in a large workshop which stood on the land he used to make, inter alia, portable buildings of various kinds, including potting and other garden sheds, greenhouses, summerhouses and, later, garages of wood, corrugated iron or asbestos. Some of these buildings Ledger made to order; others he made for stock, and erected and exposed for sale on the land. He had a hut on the land which he used as an office and saleroom. In addition to the portable buildings, Ledger used to make wheelbarrows, garden ornaments and furniture on the land; and besides this work on the land he was accustomed to carrying out work in his customers' gardens, such as the construction of rustic work, the supply and laying of rockery stone, the making of paths, the supply and erection of fencing and other tasks. Most of the goods sold by Ledger were of his own manufacture, but certain goods such as ladders, wattle fencing and rustic poles were bought by him for sale. The business carried on on the land was at one time substantial and quite prosperous, and Ledger employed seven men in it. The goods sold varied with changing conditions; in the course of time a demand for garages largely replaced that for greenhouses and potting sheds. After the outbreak of war in 1939 the business dwindled, and by 1945 Ledger was carrying it on alone. At about this time he made some garages for stock, which he erected on the land and let to car-owners pending their sale, and a summerhouse which he also erected on the land. In 1946 Ledger moved from his house at 2, Mapperley Park Drive, which thereafter was occupied by his son, and went to live 10 or 12 miles away; but he still came in to his office and workshop several times a week and executed the few orders which he still received; as time went on the number of these continued to dwindle, and for several years before the sale of the land to the plaintiff in 1957 his profits were not large enough to render him liable to income tax. By 1957 the business was almost moribund.

At the time of the sale the condition of the land was as follows: nearest to Mansfield Road were the summerhouse and the hut used as an office and saleroom. Next to these buildings was a large stack of poles used for making rustic work, and behind these buildings were the four garages, the workshop and a stack of timber. These buildings and the poles and timber were to some extent concealed from view by a number of trees, and in the space between them were growing bushes, grass and weeds. The land was untidy, but not disagreeably so; it was described as having a bosky appearance. Between the land and Mansfield Road there was a fence.

The land lay on the eastern side of Mansfield Road about one and a half miles north of the city centre. Mansfield Road here formed the western boundary of a large and good-class residential area. The land had a frontage of 50 feet and a depth of 150 feet, and adjoined the gardens of houses on its northern, eastern and southern sides. To the west, on the opposite side of Mansfield Road, were a public house, a swimming bath (set well back from the road) and the parish church. There were other mixed uses on the western side of the road in a southerly direction, but to the north there was residential development of good character. The appearance of the land with the trees and other vegetation was not thought by the neighbours or by the corporation to be out of keeping with the general appearance of the district, and no attempt was made between 1948 and 1957 by the corporation as planning authority to exercise its power under section 26 of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947 (hereinafter referred to as "the Act"), to bring about an improvement.

The plaintiff was the managing director of Leicester Caravans Ltd. (hereinafter referred to as "the company"). The company sold caravans, portable buildings for use as garages, garden sheds, summerhouses and similar purposes, interwoven wooden fencing and other goods; the major part of the business was the sale of caravans. The plaintiff bought the land in order that the company might carry on business there, which it did from the autumn of 1957. On taking possession of the land the company cut down all the trees and bushes, demolished all the buildings with the exception of the summerhouse and hut, cleared and levelled the site (an operation which involved raising the level at the back of the land by some three feet), and covered the whole surface with tarmacadam, with the exception of small flower beds near the front of the plot. The company displayed a number of their caravans on the hardstanding so made, and also exhibited large advertisements of its business. The hut was used by the company as an office, in which sales were conducted, and the company continued to make use of Ledger's notice directing customers to it. The company took down the fence between the land and Mansfield Road and built in its place a stone wall, work which provided a somewhat wider access to the footway in Mansfield Road, but did not alter or interfere with the footway or the access thereto from the carriageway. A fence of woven wood panels was erected four or five feet inside the rear boundary wall of the site.

The altered appearance of the land displeased the corporation and many of the neighbours. The corporation took the view that the company had made a material change in the use of the land, so as to constitute development within the meaning of the Act. As no permission had been given for any development, the corporation served an enforcement notice dated December 20, 1957, stating that development had been carried out on the land without the grant of planning permission; the development complained of was: "A change from the uses mentioned in paragraph (a) to the "uses mentioned in paragraph (b) set out below:—(a) use for "the following purposes:—(i) the manufacture and storage of "rustic furniture including garden seats, pergolas and the like in "a wood joinery workshop (now demolished): (ii) lock-up garages "(now demolished): (iii) storing and stacking of rustic poles: "and (iv) orchard and kitchen garden. (b) Use for the following "purposes:—(i) the display for sale of caravans and wooden "buildings, and (ii) a building used as a sales-shop." The enforcement notice required the company to discontinue using the land for the sale of caravans and wooden buildings, to remove all caravans and wooden buildings from the land and to discontinue "the use of a building on the land as a sales-shop."

The plaintiff, by letter written on January 28, 1958, replied that no planning permission was required for the use made of the land. Without prejudice to this contention she applied under cover of the same letter for permission to retain the use of the land for the display for sale of caravans and wooden buildings, and the use of a wooden building thereon as an office. The plaintiff also appealed to the justices under section 23 (4) of the Act against the enforcement notice. The hearing of this appeal was adjourned pending the hearing of the present action.

v.
Nottingham
Corpn.

The application for planning permission was refused by the corporation, and the plaintiff appealed to the Minister of Housing and Local Government against the refusal. The Minister's inspector reported, after a local inquiry, that he "had no doubt "that, judged solely on its planning merits as a use of land, the "caravan centre was quite out of place. The site had been made "as attractive as possible. The front wall was a pleasant feature "matching the adjoining garden walls, the flower beds were neat, "the structures and caravans were bright and clean and the site "as a whole was tidy. Nevertheless it was in his view a highly "commercialised use of land. Not only physically, but also in "the incidental effects resulting from the advertisements, from "the attraction of customers and the presence of towing vehicles, "and from the general activity on the site, the use was wholly "alien to a residential area of good quality and character." The inspector set out many of the facts stated above. The Minister, having received the report, dismissed the application by letter dated September 11, 1958, in which he concurred with the inspector's findings of fact (which coincided with those of Glyn-Jones J. on the evidence adduced before him in this action).

The plaintiff then began the present action. She claimed (1) a declaration that no development consisting of a material change of use had been carried out on the land; (2) a declaration that the lawful use of the land included the display and sale of caravans, sectional buildings and garden furniture and/or the manufacture, sale and display of such articles; (3) a declaration that the enforcement notice was of no effect in law; and (4) an injunction restraining the corporation from taking any further steps under the enforcement notice. By an amendment of her prayer for relief, the plaintiff further claimed a declaration that prior to July 1, 1948, and after January 7, 1937, a building on the land [the hut] was used for the carrying on of a retail trade or business, and that the land was occupied therewith and used for the same purposes; that the building was a shop within Class I of the Schedule to the Town and Country Planning (Use Classes) Order, 1950; and that the use of the building and of the land for these purposes was not development and was lawful for the purposes of the Act.

By their defence the corporation contended that the plaintiff's company had changed the use of the land and that this change constituted development, and that no planning permission had been obtained for the change of use. In particular, the corporation pleaded that a shed which remained on the land after the sale to the plaintiff [the hut] then began to be used as a sales-shop in connection with the display and sale of caravans and wooden buildings.

In addition to the case which is referred to in the judgment, the following cases were cited in argument: Eastbourne Corporation v. Fortes Ice Cream Parlour (1955) Ltd.[2]; Keats v. London County Council.[3]

Cur. adv. vult.

January 29. GLYN-JONES J., reading his judgment in London, stated the facts, referred to the plaintiff's unsuccessful attempt to obtain planning permission for her use of the land, and continued: Having failed to persuade the Minister that planning permission, if needed, ought to have been granted, the plaintiff now in this action fires her second barrel at the corporation by claiming that there has been no material change of use of the land and, therefore, that planning permission was not and is not required; and this is the question I have to decide.

The Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, provides, in effect, that for planning purposes every plot of land is stamped, as it were, with a hall-mark of permission to use it after the coming into force of the Act for the purpose for which it had been last used before the Act came into force: and a hall-mark stamped by previous use is not expunged by the fact that at the date when the Act came into force the land was being used temporarily for some purpose other than that for which it was normally used; nor, if the land were unoccupied, by the fact that the previous use had ceased, provided that the date when the land became unoccupied was later than January 7, 1937. It is also provided by the Act that the carrying out of building, engineering, mining or other operations in, on, over or under land shall constitute development for which planning permission is required.

The corporation pleads in paragraphs 6 and 8 of its defence that the works and operations of the company which I have described constituted in themselves a development of the land. Mr. Hobson, in opening the plaintiff's case, referred me to the provisions of article 3 of the Town and Country Planning General Development Order, 1950, and to the entry "Sundry minor "operations" in the First Schedule thereof. But Mr. Squibb, for the corporation, did not take or argue the point that, assuming the plaintiff established that there had been no material change of use, the works done by the company would nevertheless constitute development requiring planning permission; and I think Mr. Squibb was right, for the object of this action is to challenge the validity of the enforcement notice, and that notice does not mention the works carried out by the company, nor does it require the company to restore the land to its former condition, but is based solely upon the allegation that there has been a sufficient change of use to constitute development. I therefore treat the evidence of what has been done upon the land by the company merely as evidence relevant to the issue whether or not there has been a material change of use of the land; and I refrain from expressing any opinion as to whether or not the works done by the company constitute of themselves a development of the land or as to whether or not, if they do, it would be, or would have been, reasonable to issue an enforcement notice in respect thereof.

I turn then to the question: What was the last use of the land? Upon that question I have the evidence of Mr. E. J. Ledger, the plaintiff's predecessor in title, and it is evidence which in substance I accept. [His Lordship stated the matters given in evidence by Ledger, and continued:] Mr. Squibb contends that from 1946, when Ledger moved away from 2, Mapperley Park Drive, he in effect abandoned his business, and thereafter it was the son who used the land, and that merely as ancillary to his occupation of the dwelling-house. Mr. Ledger's use of the land thereafter, says Mr. Squibb, was minimal and should be disregarded: at the most, what he did should be described as pottering about the workshop as a hobby rather than as the carrying on of a business. And Mr. Squibb, in support of this contention, points to the fact that in 1956 it was the son who made a proposal for the alteration of the valuation list by reducing the assessment for rating purposes, which had been recently increased fourfold. In this proposal the description of the plot, which is separately rated, was "workshop, yard, store and "premises," and Ledger junior said that the workshop was used only occasionally during spare time for personal and domestic use. He also described himself as the occupier. Ledger junior was not called as a witness by either side. What he wrote in the proposal is not admissible evidence before me to prove the truth of what was so written. There is no evidence before me that he ever acquired a tenancy or any other legal interest in the land. I find that the most that he had was his father's permission or licence to go upon the land and to use the workshop, and doubtless to pick the fruit, if any. On the evidence before me I cannot find that his use of the land was other than minimal. In any event, it was no more than a temporary use: his father must have retained the power to terminate it at any time, whatever licence the son had, and he must have done so before the sale to the plaintiff.

Even if Mr. Squibb is right in saying that by the time the Act came into force the business had ceased to be carried on and the land was used only by the son as ancillary to his occupation of 2, Mapperley Park Drive, plus some small use by the father more by way of a hobby than otherwise, I find that both uses were only temporary. I do not see why Ledger senior should have required planning permission before terminating his son's licence, if he needed to do so, and starting to carry on once more his former business. But I do not find that Ledger had ceased to carry on business. The business may have been almost moribund by 1957, but it was not then dead; nor a fortiori was it dead in 1948. It could have been revived; and I find that at the coming into force of the Act this plot of land was used by Ledger for the purpose of carrying on his business thereon, and that at the time of the sale of the land to the plaintiff it was still so used, even though the business being done was small. After the coming into force of the Act Ledger was entitled without planning permission to continue to use the land for the purpose of his business, and the plaintiff has succeeded to that right to use the land for the purpose of carrying on thereon a similar business.

This brings me, I think, to the crux of the case; for Mr. Squibb's next contention is that the business now carried on by the plaintiff's company differs so widely from the business carried on by Ledger that I ought to find that there has been a material change in the use of the land. His main points, as I understand them, are these: (1) that Ledger was a manufacturer and made most of the goods he sold; that the plaintiff's company has demolished the workshop, does not manufacture and is a mere distributor of the goods of others; and (2) that the main purpose of the company is to sell caravans, which Ledger neither made nor sold; and even if the sale of an occasional caravan by Ledger would not have constituted a material change of use, a business the main purpose of which is the sale of caravans differs from his, Ledger's, use to such a degree as to be a different business, and the carrying on of such a business is a material change of use of the land.

I test this by assuming that Ledger, instead of selling his land to the plaintiff, had employed a manager or taken in a partner who was a capable business man and had set himself to revive and rebuild the business. He would doubtless have sought to increase the stock displayed for sale. For that purpose he would have needed more room. It might well have been good business to cut down the trees, clear and level the site and lay down a surface that could be conveniently walked on by prospective customers in all weathers. That would have made more obvious, more obtrusive and much more disagreeable to the neighbours the fact that the land was being used for a commercial purpose, as it had been used since 1912; and it may well be that a conspicuous prospect of workshop, corrugated iron garages, greenhouses, potting sheds and the like, no longer concealed by boskiness, would have been just as disagreeable to the neighbours and to the planning authority as are the plaintiff's caravans. But I do not think that the exposure for sale of more buildings on a scale corresponding to that on which the plaintiff's company has displayed caravans would have involved a material change in the use of the land. As Mr. Lawson, the deputy city engineer of Nottingham, said in evidence, any substantial increase in the scale on which Ledger carried on business would have been detrimental to the amenities of the district; but the question whether there has been a material change in use does not depend, in my opinion, on whether the business carried on is a success or a failure, though I bear in mind in saying this that the business may be so successful as to involve a vast increase in the intensity of the use of the land, and that increase in the intensity of use may perhaps amount to a material change of use. At all events, in Guildford Rural District Council v. Fortescue,[1] Lord Evershed M.R. says[2]: "Mr. Megarry contended that the mere "intensity of user or occupation could never be relevant. As a "general proposition, I am not prepared to accept that argument; "nor, indeed, is it necessary to do so. Mere intensity of user may "(as it seems to me; but I must not be taken as deciding this "point) affect a definable character of the land and of its use— "or one of them."

MARSHALL v. NOTTINGHAM CORPN.

Glyn-Jones J

Lord Evershed M.R. having kept the point open, I certainly do not propose to decide it. With that qualification, therefore, I go on to say that if the presence on this land of a successful rather than an unsuccessful commercial enterprise is detrimental to the neighbourhood, the corporation's remedy, it seems to me, is to exercise its powers under section 26 and get rid of it on payment of compensation. If the business had grown and still more room were wanted it might have occurred to Ledger to remove the workshop and stocks of raw materials to another site elsewhere. I cannot agree with Mr. Squibb that either the cutting down of the trees and bushes or the removal of the workshop to another site would have involved a material change in the use of the land. In my opinion, the primary purpose for which the land was used was to advertise, display and sell the various products of Ledger's business, whether they were made on the same site or elsewhere. I go further. In my view, there would be no material change in the use of the land if the buildings and other products displayed and sold thereon were not made by Ledger at all, but were bought from some other manufacturer. If Ledger, having found himself incapacitated by age or infirmity from continuing to work, or having found it cheaper to buy his stock rather than to make it, had accordingly ceased to manufacture, I do not think the Act gives power to the planning authority to serve an enforcement notice on him requiring him to resume manufacture under pain of having to cease using the land for selling goods. On the evidence in this case I am not prepared to find that the fact that the caravans exposed for sale are not made or built on the site constitutes a material change of use.

I pass next to Mr. Squibb's second point; that is to say, whether or not the fact (which I find) that the majority of the goods now sold and displayed are caravans rather than portable buildings and other goods constitutes a material change in the use of the land. There is some similarity between caravans and the portable buildings which Ledger sold. Mr. Squibb conceded as much when he said, rightly as I think, that if Ledger had sold one or two caravans in addition to his portable buildings he would not thereby have made a material change in his use of the land. Mr. Squibb's case must be, I think, not that Ledger by selling caravans would have gone wholly outside the class of goods in which he dealt, but that if the proportion of his total turnover represented by the sale of caravans had been as high as it must be in the business of the plaintiff's company, the nature of the business would have been so transformed that it would have become a different business altogether; for the primary purpose of the business would have become the sale of caravans.

[1] [1959] 2 Q.B. 112, C.A.; [1959] 2 W.L.R. 643; [1959] 2 All E.R. 111.

The mere fact that a dealer in the course of his business begins to deal in goods in which he had not dealt before does not necessarily involve a change, still less a material change, in his use of the land or premises where the business is carried on. A dealer in musical instruments might fifty years ago have begun to deal in gramophones or phonographs, as I suppose they would then have been called; and then in the course of time in radio sets and later in television sets. A dealer in electrical appliances, as demand changed and fresh appliances were invented, might have successively added vacuum cleaners, refrigerators, washing machines and the like to his stock-in-trade, and he too might have begun to deal in radio and television sets. Each of them may have ceased to sell goods formerly sold for which there is no longer an adequate demand. Yet neither, in my view, has thereby altered the use he is making of his premises. Moreover, if the business of a retail dealer is being carried on in any building, it may be that there is a change of use if, for example, the business of a baker is substituted for a different business, for example that of a grocer; but I am unable to see why or how such a change can be material from any point of view which could legitimately be taken by a planning authority; that is to say, material for the purposes of the Town and Country Planning Act. It may be argued perhaps that the proviso to section 12 (2) of the Act and the Town and Country Planning (Use Classes) Order, 1950, are inconsistent with the view I have last expressed; or, on the other hand, that so far as the business of a retail dealer is concerned, the proviso is unnecessary and the Use Classes Order does no more than remove doubts and make it plain that a change of use from carrying on in a retail shop an innocuous trade to carrying on one of the scheduled trades which might be noxious or offensive could be material. But it is unnecessary for the purpose of this case for me to deal in generalities. I need only ask myself whether or not if Ledger had dealt in caravans on the scale on which the plaintiff's company has done he would have made a material change in his use of his land.

MARSHALL v. NOTTINGHAM CORPN.

Glyn-Jones J.

This question, as I understand it, is one of fact and degree to be answered upon the evidence in this case: and my answer is that the plaintiff's company has not made a material change in the use of the land. It is, of course, immaterial to my decision, but perhaps only fair to the plaintiff, that I should state at this point that, having acquired an option to buy Ledger's land, she did not exercise it until after she had informally consulted the planning officer of the corporation or a member of his staff, had disclosed to him what she proposed to do upon the land and had been informed by the officer concerned that planning permission would not be required.

The plaintiff raised by amendment of her statement of claim—to which no objection was offered and which I allowed—a further point which arises in this way. The corporation charges the plaintiff with having made a change of use in that the hut I have spoken of is used as what is called in the enforcement notice and in the defence a "sales-shop." The plaintiff by her amendment has taken advantage of this description of what she had described as "an office": she now adopts the corporation's description of the hut as "a shop" and says that the hut, together with the land on which goods are exposed for sale, constitute a shop within the meaning of the Use Classes Order, 1950. By article 3 (1) of the Order it is provided that: "Where a building or other land is used for a purpose of any "class specified in the schedule to this Order, the use of such "building or other land for any purpose of the same class shall "not be deemed for the purposes of the Act to involve develop-"ment of the land." The first entry in the schedule is: "Class I.—Use as a shop for any purpose except as"—and then certain exceptions are set out which are not material to this case. "Shop" is defined as follows—and I leave out immaterial words: "'Shop' means a building used for the carrying on of "any retail trade or retail business wherein"—that is to say, in which business, not in which building—"the primary purpose "is the selling of goods by retail, and includes a building used "for the purposes of"—and then there are set out a number of purposes, including that of a ticket agency and so on—"or for "any other purpose appropriate to a shopping area. . . ."

This definition is very wide, and I do not see how I can avoid a finding that in Ledger's time the hut I have already mentioned was a building used for the carrying on of Ledger's retail trade or retail business wherein (that is to say, in Ledger's trade or business) the primary purpose was the selling of Ledger's goods. It is true that Ledger also carried on the business of doing work in customers' gardens, and the same hut was used for taking orders for such work to be done and as his office; but the primary purpose of the retail trade and business carried on by Ledger in the hut was the sale of the goods displayed on the surrounding land or illustrated or described in his catalogue. It was, therefore, by definition a shop within the meaning of the Order. In the same hut there is being carried on by the plaintiff's company a retail trade or business the primary purpose of which is the sale of the caravans or other goods displayed on the land; and if this does amount to a use of the building or other land for some purpose other than that for which Ledger used it, it is expressly laid down by the Order that such a change of user is not to be deemed to involve development. On this ground also the plaintiff succeeds.

The successive owners of this land have enjoyed since early in the development of this estate the right to carry on a commercial enterprise thereon, notwithstanding that it is in the middle of a residential area. It is not a case in which there has been an attempt to set up a commercial enterprise within an established residential area. Provided the enterprise is not so conducted as to give to the neighbours a remedy in nuisance, I do not see how the use of the land for commercial purposes is to be stopped unless the corporation, for the protection of the rateable values in the area, or for any other reason, thinks it proper to exercise its powers under section 26 of the Act, under penalty of having to pay the compensation, if any, to which the plaintiff can show that she is entitled. The plaintiff is entitled to a declaration.

[His Lordship, after hearing counsel, indicated that the plaintiff was entitled to the first and third of the declarations claimed by her, together with the declaration claimed by her amended prayer; but that a declaration in the terms of the second declaration prayed for was unnecessary and might appear to decide the question left open by Lord Evershed M.R. in Guildford Rural District Council v. Fortescue.[3]]

* JEFFREY v. ROLLS-ROYCE LTD. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. SAME.

Revenue—Income tax—Capital or income receipt—Sale of "know-how" by manufacturers of aircraft engines to foreign governments and companies—To aid establishment of aircraft engine industry in foreign countries—Whether receipt of company's trade or proceeds of sale of capital asset—Income Tax Act, 1952 (15 & 16 Geo. 6 & 1 Eliz. 2, c. 10), s. 123 (Sch. D., Case I).

A company, for the purpose of its business as a manufacturer of motor-cars and aircraft engines, had, since its formation in 1906, been engaged in metallurgical research and the discovery and development of engineering techniques and secret processes. As a result it acquired in the course of the years a fund of technical knowledge, or "know-how," of which only a comparatively small part was capable of forming the subject-matter of patent rights. For some years the company, as a general rule, used its know-how only in its own trade, but during the period 1946 to 1953, as a result of overtures made to it by certain foreign governments and companies, the company entered into a number of agreements whereby, in consideration of lump sum payments, it undertook to supply the foreign government or company with drawings and information necessary to enable them to manufacture specified types of aircraft engines. The special commissioners allowed an appeal by the company against assessments to income tax for the years 1948–49 to 1954–55 under Case I of Schedule D, on the ground that in computing its profits or gains the lump sums paid by virtue of the agreements had been wrongly included, since they were payments of a capital nature.

On appeal by the Crown:—

Held, that the know-how represented in great part a capital asset which it was open to the company to exploit by using it in its own trade or by communicating it to others, and that in the latter case the taxable character of the consideration depended on the particular circumstances; that, in the particular circumstances, the nature of the transactions represented by the agreements was that the company had communicated that asset to another with the consequence that, as regards the territory of that party, the asset had lost the whole or the greater part of its value; and that such a transaction was not the less a disposition of part of a capital asset by reason of the fact that the company had not previously exploited the asset in the territory concerned. Accordingly, the lump sum consideration represented the receipt of capital in the hands of the company and ought not to be brought into account in the computation of its revenue, and the appeal, therefore, must be dismissed (post, p. 731).

APPEAL from the Special Commissioners for the purposes of the Income Tax Acts.

The following summary of the facts is taken from the case stated.

Rolls-Royce Ltd., the respondent company, appealed against assessments to income tax made on them as manufacturers of motor-cars and aircraft engines under Case I of Schedule D for the years 1948–49 to 1954–55 in the sums of £1,300,000, £1,200,000, £1,800,000, £1,500,000, £2,300,000, £2,500,000, £4,800,000 respectively. The grounds of the appeal were that in computing the profits or gains of the company for the period relative to the assessments under appeal lump sums paid to and received by the company by virtue of certain licensing agreements had been included contrary to law, such lump payments being of a capital nature.

The company was incorporated in 1906; on July 24, 1951, its share capital was increased to £4,000,000, divided into 3,855,000 ordinary shares of £1 each and 145,000 workers' shares of £1 each. The object for which the company was established was, inter alia: 3 (1) To manufacture, sell, or let on hire, or in any manner dispose of or turn to account, motor-vehicles for use on land or water or in the air, and any parts of or accessories to the same, and internal combustion engines for stationary use, and to carry on all or any businesses directly or indirectly relating to or connected with any object or thing which the company is authorised to manufacture: 3 (5) To carry on any other business, whether manufacturing or otherwise, which may seem to the company capable of being conveniently carried on in connection with any of the above objects, or calculated, directly or indirectly, to advance any of the above objects, or add to the value of any of the company's property or rights: and 3 (8) To purchase, acquire, or apply for letters patent, or patent rights, which the company may deem it advisable to hold in connection with its business, and to sell or otherwise deal with such patents, or patent rights, and grant licences in respect thereof.

The business of the company in its early years was confined to the manufacture and sale of motor-cars. During the First World War the company began to manufacture aircraft engines; and with the development of the aircraft industry the manufacture of aircraft engines became the larger and more important part of the company's business. For the purposes of its business as a manufacturer of motor-cars and aircraft engines the company had throughout its life been engaged in metallurgical research and in the discovery and development of engineering techniques and secret processes. As a result it acquired in the course of the years a fund of technical knowledge (commonly called "know-how") of which only a comparatively small part was capable of forming the subject-matter of patent rights. The successful development of aircraft engines derived from the company's fund of "know-how" relating to their manufacture which was of the greatest value to the company. By contrast, the company set very little store by its patent rights which it took out to prevent other persons copying processes long known to the company and interfering with the company's manufacture by themselves taking up patents relating thereto.

After the conclusion of the Second World War overtures were made to the company by representatives of the Chinese Nationalist Government who sought the grant of a licence for the manufacture of Rolls-Royce aero engines in China. At first the directors of the company were unwilling to grant such a licence, but eventually the request was supported by the then British Government, and on February 13, 1946, the company entered into an agreement with the Government of the Republic of China ("the China agreement") acting by the Commission on Aeronautical Affairs of the Republic of China, which recited: "Whereas Rolls-Royce are designers of aircraft engines (hereinafter defined in the schedule attached) and have agreed to license the commission to manufacture the same and to supply the drawings and information necessary therefor to the extent hereinafter stated upon the terms and conditions hereinafter provided"; and provided, inter alia, as follows: "Selection of Type: On or before June 30, 1946, the commission shall select and designate the desired type of jet engine and notify Rolls-Royce of such selection, whereupon such engine so selected shall be the basic type of engine referred to in this agreement. . . . 2. Rolls-Royce will supply the commission with the complete drawings and manufacturing and engineering data and information adequate and reasonably necessary to enable the commission to manufacture said engine referred to in clause 1 above. These engines will be the type numbered as set out in the schedule hereto which are the latest mark of the type referred to, of which the British Government has allowed particulars to be given at this date. Improvements of the engine defined in clause 1 will be supplied to the commission as they are released by the British Government and shall be included and governed by this numbered clause and clause 10. The manufacturing data and information shall include three sets of designs, which comprise two sets of blue prints and one set of either tracings, or in some form of black and white, so that they can be copied, together with copies of process schedules, material schedules, jig, tool and fixture drawings and full manufacturing details and instructions. These drawings, data, information and instructions shall include the items listed in the following and shall all be supplied within 90 days from June 30, 1946.

"3. The commission shall pay Rolls-Royce the following consideration for the rights granted hereunder: A capital sum of £50,000 sterling to be paid as follows: (i) On the signing of the contract, £20,000 sterling. (ii) On June 30, 1946, £20,000 sterling. (iii) On the complete delivery of drawings, data, and information referred to in clause 2, £10,000 sterling. . . ."

Clause 5 provided for the form of drawings, clause 6 for royalties and clause 7 for minimum royalty.

Clause 10: "Rolls-Royce will fully advise the commission from "time to time as to improvements and modifications in the manu- "facture and design of the engine referred to in clause 1, the sub- "ject of this licence as and when the British Government permit "Rolls-Royce so to do, provided always that this obligation shall "be suspended if the royalties in any year are in arrears, but shall "be revived when the royalty payments have been made up to the "annual minimums referred to in the contract."

Clause 11 provided, in effect, that the engines were only to be used in Chinese-owned or operated aircraft, and by clause 12: "The commission shall not use in engines other than engines "referred to in clause 1 any parts manufactured from the draw- "ings to be supplied hereunder." Clause 13 provided: "All "drawings and information supplied hereunder shall be kept "secret by the commission who shall not disclose the same or any "part thereof to any other person or corporation, but this clause "shall not prevent such disclosure as is necessary to enable the "engines to be manufactured by the commission, or to enable "them to be installed or repaired." Clause 14 provided: "Rolls-Royce will receive into their works or plants personnel "appointed by the commission with a view to instructing them in "the construction of the engines referred to in clause 1" on certain terms.

By clause 20: "All obligations of Rolls-Royce hereunder "shall cease at the expiration of five years from the date hereof; "provided that at the end of the first five years, the commission "has the right to extend this contract for another period of five "years if desired. During these two periods of five years each if the "commission exercise the option to acquire additional licence for "any newer type of Rolls-Royce engine the obligations of both "parties will then be defined; but any royalty paid on the newer "engine manufactured by the commission shall be counted to- "gether with the royalty on the type of engine referred to in "clause 1 being manufactured, in determining the minimum "royalty referred to in clause 7." Clause 21 provided: "As from "the date when the obligations of the commission cease hereunder "as aforesaid, the commission shall be entitled to continue to "construct the said type of engine without Rolls-Royce being paid "royalty . . . " and there followed certain provisions as to patents. Clause 22 was concerned with the patents and by clause 23: "If within five years from the signature of this contract Rolls- "Royce puts in series production a new type of gas turbine air- "craft engine and the British Government has authorised the "manufacture of the engine in the conceded territory Rolls-Royce "will not license anyone to manuafcture the engine in the con- "ceded territory without first giving the commission an option to "acquire a licence to do so. . . ."

As a result of overtures made to it the company entered into other agreements containing the same basic provisions with the governments of, or companies in, France, the Argentine, the United States of America, Italy, Belgium, Australia and Sweden.

JEFFREY v. ROLLS-ROYCE LTD.

It was contended on behalf of the company that the trade carried on by the company was correctly described in the income tax assessment under appeal as that of "manufacturers of motor-"cars and aero engines," and that the sale of "know-how" formed no part of the company's trade; that the metallurgical engineering research upon which the company had throughout its life been engaged was at all times directed exclusively to the more efficient production of motor-cars and aero engines, and not at all to the earning of profits by selling or licensing the results of that research; that the lump sums paid to the company under the provisions of the licence agreements hereinbefore referred to related to the sale by the company to the licensees of a capital asset referred to throughout the case as "know-how," and, accordingly, such sums fell to be excluded from the computation of the profits and gains of the company for the periods relative to the assessments under appeal; that a multiplicity of sales of portions of a fixed capital asset could not of itself convert that asset or any part of it into a revenue or trading asset.

It was contended on behalf of the Crown that the whole of the sums received by the company under the licence agreements hereinbefore referred to were normal receipts of a revenue nature of the trade or business carried on by the company and, accordingly, fell to be included in computing the profits or gains of the company for the periods relative to the assessments under appeal.

The commissioners decided that the case for the company succeeded, and they allowed the appeal.

The Crown appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 27. PENNYCUICK J. read the following judgment: This is an appeal by an inspector of taxes against a decision of the special commissioners upon appeals by Rolls-Royce Ltd. from assessments under Case I of Schedule D for the years 1948–49 to 1954–55 inclusive. The ground of appeal was that in computing the profits of the company for those years there were included certain payments under a number of agreements with foreign governments or companies which the company contended were of a capital nature. The special commissioners allowed the appeals and adjusted the assessments accordingly.

[1] (1944) 26 T.C. 46, C.A.

The facts as found by the special commissioners may be summarised as follows: The company was incorporated in 1906 and has ever since carried on the trade of manufacturing and selling motor-cars. During the the First World War the company began to manufacture aircraft engines, and the manufacture and sale of aircraft engines has become the larger part of the company's trade. For the purposes of its trade the company has been engaged in metallurgical research and in the discovery and development of engineering technique and secret processes, and in the result has acquired a fund of technical knowledge of which only a comparatively small part is capable of forming the subject-matter of patent rights. This technical knowledge is commonly called "know-how," and it will be observed that the commissioners use the expression "know-how" as covering secret processes. With one or two exceptions due to the exigencies of the period immediately before 1939, and to the Second World War itself, the company did not, until after 1945, turn its know-how to account, except in its own manufacturing trade. During the period from 1946 to 1953, however, being the period to which the assessments under appeal relate, the company entered into a number of agreements with foreign governments and companies, the basic provision of which was that in consideration of a lump sum payment the company undertook to supply the other party with drawings and information necessary to enable that party to manufacture specified types of aircraft engines. The company did not initiate proposals for these agreements, which generally appear to have arisen from the policy of foreign governments that aircraft engines should be manufactured in their own territories.

Agreements of this character were made between the company and governments or companies in China, France, the Argentine, the United States of America, Belgium, Australia and Sweden. All of those agreements, in addition to one or two others not directly material, are summarised in the case stated. Each of the agreements contained a number of other provisions beyond the basic provision indicated above, and they are by no means identical in their terms. In one agreement, for example that with Australia, the company received, in addition to the lump sum, an annual payment described as a "technical liaison fee." Neither party, however, has contended that for the present purposes any distinction falls to be made between payments in one or other of the agreements, and it would not, therefore, be useful for me to refer to all the agreements in detail. I will confine myself to reading certain of the provisions of the first agreement set out in the case stated, namely, that dated February 13, 1946, with the Republic of China. [His Lordship read the provisions of that agreement set out above, and continued:]

As I have said, the other agreements for the most part contain the same basic provisions, but the terms of them are widely different in certain respects. The question which has arisen on this appeal is whether the lump sums payable under clause 3 of the Chinese agreement, and the similar lump sums payable under the other agreements, represent trade receipts of the company and, as such, must be brought into account in the computation of its profits.

JEFFREY v. ROLLS-ROYCE LTD.

Pennycuick J.

The contentions of the parties before the commissioners are set out in the case stated. [His Lordship read the contentions and continued:]

The commissioners gave their decision in writing on October 24, 1956, in the following terms: After setting out the particulars of the assessments, they continued: "The grounds of the "appeal are that in computing the profits or gains of the "[respondent] for the periods relative to the assessments under "appeal, lump sums paid to and received by the [respondent] by "virtue of certain licensing agreements have been included con-"trary to law, such lump sum payments being of a capital nature. ". . . 3. The case for the appellant is that at all material times "it carried on the trade of 'manufacturers of motor-cars and aero "'engines,' being properly so described in the notices of assess-"ments relative to the appeal. In the course of its business it "had acquired a vast store of knowledge and secret information "relating to the secret processes of manufacture, referred to "throughout the case as 'know-how,' which represented a fixed "capital asset of the appellant's trade, but it had never been any "part of the policy of the appellant to make inventions and "discover secret processes with a view to the earning of profits "by realising its rights in those inventions and processes. On "February 13, 1946, the appellant entered into an agreement with "the Government of China (hereinafter called 'the China agree-"'ment') whereby, inter alia, the latter was licensed to "manufacture for itself certain of the appellant's aero engines. "As a separate part of this agreement, the appellant undertook, "inter alia, to make available to the Government of China its "'know-how' relating to the particular aero engines covered by "the agreement, in consequence of which it was confidently "expected that the time which must necessarily elapse before "production by the Government of China became effective would "be considerably reduced and the resulting product of higher "quality than might otherwise have been the case. Provision "was also made for the transfer of patents if necessary, though "in fact the appellants had no Chinese patents. The considera-"tion for the agreement took the form of a lump sum and "royalties on the engines that were made abroad. The appellant "concedes that sums received by way of royalties under the "agreement are taxable income in its hands, so also are any "sums received for the sale of patent rights properly so-called by "reason of the express provisions of the Finance Act, 1945, "though it is generally agreed by both parties that only a very "small value could be placed upon these patents. It was, how-"ever, contended for the appellant that the lump sum paid and "received under the China agreement, apart from a small amount

"attributable as aforesaid to patent rights, represented a capital "receipt in respect of 'know-how' which did not fall to be "included in the profits or gains of the appellant for the periods "relative to the assessments under appeal. In support of this "contention, reliance was largely placed upon two cases cited to "us, viz., Page v. Butterworth[1] and Evans Medical Supplies "Ltd. v. Moriarty.[2]" At that stage the Evans Medical Supplies case had been heard before Upjohn J. but had not reached the Court of Appeal.

"It is further contended for the appellant that if the subject-"matter with which we are concerned, i.e., 'know-how,' is "initially a fixed capital asset, then mere multiplicity of trans-"actions in it does not convert it into a revenue or trading asset "in the absence of other facts which suggest that there has been "a conversion, or that some new trade has been set up. It is "said that there has been no such change of circumstances "affecting the appellant's 'know-how,' and therefore, with regard "to the remainder of the agreements entered into by the appel-"lant for, generally speaking, licensing the manufacture of aero "engines and the provision of 'know-how' in connection there-"with, the lump sums, by whatever name they are called, paid "to and received by the appellant thereunder were also receipts "of a capital nature.

"5. The case for the Crown can be summarised as follows:

"(1) It is not contended that a new trade was set up by the "appellant between the years 1946 and 1954 which consisted of "dealing in patents and secret processes, but it is said that it "had become a part of the normal trade or business of the appel-"lant in order fully to exploit the commercial possibilities of aero "engines of its design in circumstances where it would otherwise "be unable to sell them, to enter into agreements for the produc-"tion of its engines by other persons under licence on payment "of a lump sum or technical liaison fee and/or a royalty per "engine manufactured.

"(2) That in order to permit the manufacture of engines so "licensed to commence at the earliest possible moment, and to "earn the maximum amount in royalties, it was the normal "practice of the appellant to furnish the licensee on payment "with the technical knowledge and information required to "manufacture such engines, i.e., the 'know-how.'

"(3) It was also part of the normal trade or business of the "appellant in association with the Ministry of Supply to exploit "commercially and to the best advantage technical knowledge and "manufacturing information acquired by the appellant in the "process of research into the design and production of aero "engines incorporating that technical knowledge and information "for reward.

JEFFREY v. ROLLS-ROYCE LTD.

Pennycuick J.

"(4) That on the facts of the case, it was also part of the "normal trade or business of the appellant, particularly when "licensing the manufacture of one of the appellant's engines, to "agree with the licensee to a mutual exchange of information "obtained in the course of manufacturing the licensed engine; "thus, the lump sums received by the appellant under the various "agreements which are the subject-matter of this appeal were "received by the appellant in the normal course of its trade or "business and not merely for parting with a capital asset.

"(5) The agreements provide for the licensee to make engines "and for the transfer to the licensee of technical knowledge and "information to enable him to do so, but they also provide for the "licensee to receive certain other benefits and advantages, e.g., "some of his personnel to be trained by the appellant, the appel-"lant's engineers to assist in setting up the production in the "country of the licensee, the appellant to act as agent in the "purchase of raw materials and equipment for the job, the grant "of an option for future engines: any part of the lump sum "attributable to such services cannot be transfers of capital.

"(6) Further, in so far as the lump sum payments were "received by the appellant in respect of the transfer of technical "information or of manufacturing knowledge they did not arise "from sales of property, but from the provision of a service.

"(7) When the whole of the transactions are looked at as a "whole, each agreement is seen to be merely a trading convention "between the appellant and the licensee, and the payments, "whatever form they take, are profits arising from the trade or "business between the appellant and the licensee which was to "be regulated by that convention.

"6. Upon consideration of the evidence adduced and the "arguments addressed to us on behalf of the parties we are of the "opinion that the case for the Crown succeeds and the appeal "must be allowed."

It will be observed that the commissioners' decision consists of a summary of the opposing contentions, and that their own conclusion is contained in a single sentence. It falls to me to decide whether this conclusion is right.

I think it is clear that, while due weight should be given to the view of the commissioners, this is eminently the type of finding which is open to review by the court: see Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Rustproof Metal Window Co. Ltd.,[3] per Lord Greene M.R., where he says[4]: "It was argued by counsel on behalf of "the Crown that the decision of the special commissioners upon "a question of this kind ought not to be disturbed unless it could "be said that they had misdirected themselves in law. This, I "think, is to put the matter too high. Great weight should no "doubt be given to their view, but the courts have on many "occasions acted on the principle that the decision of commis"sioners on the question whether a receipt is of a capital or an "income nature is open to review, and I propose so to treat it in "this case. It is a question which is to be answered upon a "consideration of all the relevant facts."

The character of technical knowledge as an asset of a trader has been considered by the House of Lords in the recent case of Evans Medical Supplies Ltd. v. Moriarty.[5] I will read the headnote in that case: "Income Tax, Schedule D—Disclosure of "secret processes and provision of other information in con-"sideration of lump sum payment—Whether sum received capital "or income. The appellant company, which manufactured phar-"maceutical products and had a world-wide trade, carried on "business in Burma through an agency. In 1953 the Burmese "Government wished itself to establish an industry there for the "production of pharmaceutical and other products, and the com-"pany secured a contract, dated October 20, 1953, from the "Burmese Government to assist in setting up this industry. The "company undertook to disclose secret processes to the Burmese "Government and to provide other information in consideration "of the payment of a 'capital sum of £100,000.' The company "also undertook to provide certain services and to manage the "proposed factory in return for an annual fee, which was "admitted to be subject to tax. No similar agreement had been "entered into by the company with any other foreign government "or any other party. The profits of the company's trade as "wholesale druggists were assessed to income tax under Case I of "Schedule D for the year 1954–55 on the footing that the sum "of £100,000 should be included as a trading receipt. On appeal "to the special commissioners the company contended that the "sum of £100,000 was a capital sum received either for the sale "of fixed capital or for the granting to the Burmese Government "of an exclusive licence, and that in any event it did not arise "in the course of a trade. The Crown contended, inter alia, that "on a true construction of the agreement the sum in question "was, like the annual fee admitted to be subject to tax, received "by the company for providing services in the course of a trade. "The special commissioners held that the agreement should be "read as a whole as one for the provision of services, and that "the sum of £100,000 had been properly included in computing "the company's profits for income tax purposes. The Chancery "Division held that the sum in question was a capital payment. "The Court of Appeal held unanimously (1) that there was "evidence to support the special commissioners' finding that the "sum of £100,000 arose to the company as a receipt of its trade; "but (2) that the sum in question, to the extent that it was "attributable to the disclosure of secret processes, was a capital "receipt. The court ordered the case to be remitted to the Pennycuick J.

"commissioners to determine the part so attributable. The "House of Lords, dismissing the Crown's appeal and allowing "the company's cross-appeal, restored the order of the Chancery "Division. Lords Simonds, Tucker and Denning held that, the "case having been stated by the commissioners and the appeal "argued throughout on the footing that the sum of £100,000 was "indivisible, it was not open to the Court of Appeal to direct "apportionment between consideration for the disclosure of secret "processes and consideration for other matters. Lords Simonds "and Tucker were of opinion that the company had parted with "a capital asset for a purchase price. Lord Denning considered "that there was nothing wrong in the commissioners' finding that "the amount in question was a payment for services, but that it "was not received in the course of the company's existing trade "of wholesale druggists, etc., and therefore could not be brought "into the assessment of the company's existing trade for 1954–55. "Lord Morton of Henryton, dissenting as to the cross-appeal, "agreed with the judgments in the Court of Appeal. Lord Keith "of Avonholm, dissenting, was of opinion that there was ample "evidence that the company was trading in 'know-how' and that "it was no more than a legitimate extension of their existing "trade."

It will be seen that in that case the consideration given by the company for the lump sum payment included alike the disclosure of secret processes and the provision of other information. Certainly three members of the House of Lords, Lord Simonds, Lord Morton of Henryton and Lord Tucker, in common with the Court of Appeal,[6] and Upjohn J. in the Chancery Division,[7] held that secret processes should be regarded as capital assets of the appellant company. In the present case, too, the technical knowledge possessed by the company, and described by the special commissioners as know-how, comprised secret processes; and it is evident from the nature of the trade that such processes must be of great importance in it. There can thus be no doubt that the know-how possessed by the company represented at any rate in great part a capital asset.

Mr. Borneman has pointed to certain apparent differences between the views expressed by the respective members of the House of Lords in the Evans Medical case[8] as to the precise ambit of the capital asset there in question, i.e., as to whether it should be regarded as confined to secret processes or comprising also knowledge outside of those processes. It might be necessary to explore this point further in the case where the secret processes were relatively unimportant or where there was an apportionment of consideration. But I do not think it is of practical importance here.

Once it is accepted that a trader possesses a capital asset in the nature of technical knowledge, or know-how, it must be open to him to exploit it either by using it himself in the process of his own trade, or by communicating it to others, and in the latter case the taxable character of the consideration received by him must depend upon the particular circumstances. It may be possible for the trader to a limited extent to retain the asset intact and to exploit it by rendering services to others in the way of imparting information or rendering assistance to them. This was the view which Lord Keith took upon the facts in the Evans Medical case.[8] But, again as pointed out in that case, it is in the nature of this particular asset to lose its value upon communication, and in a normal case communication of the asset is likely to represent the disposition of part of the asset itself. I refer on this point to two statements in the speech of Lord Simonds[9]: "It was no doubt the corollary of their view"—that is, the commissioners' view—"that the agreement was one for "the provision of services, that the commissioners should say that, "in any event, the company had not 'sold or assigned any "'property' to the Government. Here, again, they fell into an "error which vitiates their determination. For it is manifest that "a secret process, whether in composition or methods of storing "and packing, is something which can be disposed of for value, "and that, by imparting the secret to another, its owner does some-"thing which could not fairly be described as 'rendering a "'service.' I would not think that authority is needed for so "obvious a proposition, but it may be found in Butterworth v. "Page.[10]" Lord Simonds later said[11]: "A contention was put "forward on behalf of the Crown that, even if the divulging of a "secret process to the whole world could be regarded as parting "with a capital asset, the same could not be said of divulging it to "one other. This does not make sense. The whole value of the "secret might conceivably not be lost at once to the original "owner, but that its value must be greatly diminished is obvious: "in the present case it is doubtful whether, within a measurable "time, it will have any value at all, at any rate so far as the "Burmese market is concerned. I adopt, with respect, the apt "words of Lord Fleming in Haig's Trustees v. Inland "Revenue Commissioners[12]:' . . . the transaction here in ques-"'tion was not merely a use of the subject salva rei substantia "'but necessarily involved the realisation of a considerable part "'of its capital value.'"

In my judgment, this was the nature of the transactions effected by the various agreements in the present case. In each case the company, having a capital asset consisting of technical knowledge, or know-how, communicated that asset to another party, with the natural consequence that at least as regards the territory of that party the asset must lose the whole or the greater part of its value. This seems to me to represent a disposition of part of the capital asset itself. It follows that the lump sum consideration paid in each case, being the price of a capital asset, represents the receipt of capital in the hands of the company and ought not to be brought into account in the computation of its revenue profit.

Mr. Borneman contended that, even if the knowledge is to be treated as a capital asset, its communication should be treated, on the facts of this case, as in the nature of services rendered by the company. For the reasons given above, I do not think this is a proper view of this transaction. Mr. Borneman pointed out that in this case, unlike the Evans Medical case,[13] there is no evidence that at the date of the agreements the company was trading in the territories affected. But I do not think the transaction was any less a disposition of part of a capital asset by reason of the fact that the company had not previously exploited this asset by way of manufacture in the particular territories.

Mr. Borneman further pointed out that in the Evans Medical case [13] there was a single transaction, whereas in this case there were a number of transactions. This circumstance again seems to me to be irrelevant. A trader, having capital assets, may dispose of those assets by a single transaction or by a number of transactions, and in either case the price received would be a receipt of capital.

Mr. Borneman's principal contention, however, was that the trade of the company during the material years was, in his own words, "that of exploiting the commercial possibilities of the aero "engine and its design," and that the company carried on this trade in two ways; namely, one, by the manufacture and sale of engines, and, two, by teaching others how to manufacture engines. I find nothing in the case stated which justifies the view that the company has ever carried on any trade other than that of manufacturing and selling motor-cars and aircraft engines. The trade imputed to the company by this contention appears to me to be something of a travesty of the facts. But, in any event, I do not see how this description of the trade advances the argument, since it does no more than raise—in a slightly different form—the question whether in communicating information the company is parting with a capital asset or rendering a service. Perhaps conscious of this difficulty, Mr. Borneman said that the company should include know-how in its accounts as circulating capital, but this seems to me to postulate a different trade altogether, namely, that of a dealer in know-how; and, indeed, Mr. Borneman, as an alternative, contended that the company carried on such a trade. No assessment on the footing of this trade has been made on the company, and Mr. Borneman expressly disclaimed the view that the company carried on more than one trade.

Mr. Borneman during his argument placed great reliance on a sentence of Bankes L.J. in British Dyestuffs Corporation v. Inland Revenue Commissioners,[14] where he says this: "The real question is, looking at this matter. is the transaction in substance a "parting by the company with part of its property for a purchase "price, or is it a method of trading by which it acquires this "particular sum of money as part of the profits and gains of that "trade? For that purpose one has to look at the nature and "substance of the transaction and the agreement as a whole." For the reasons given above, I think this should be answered in accordance with the first alternative.

[13] 37 T.C. 540.

The agreements here differ in an important respect from that in the Evans Medical case[15] in that there the agreement was divided into parts and the lump sum in question was allocated exclusively to the consideration specified in Part I of the agreement. Here there is no such division or allocation. Neither party at any stage in the proceedings has, however, contended that on this or any other ground the lump sum should be apportioned so as to represent in part a capital and in part a revenue receipt. In view of the decision of the House of Lords as to apportionment in the Evans Medical case,[15] it is clear I should not be entitled to make any such apportionment even if I were otherwise minded to do so.

For the reasons I have endeavoured to express above, I have come to the conclusion that the decision of the commissioners was right and I accordingly dismiss the appeal.

[Three other appeals by the Inland Revenue Commissioners which raised identical points upon assessments on the company to excess profits tax, profits tax and excess profits levy respectively as the points raised in the first case, and upon which no separate argument was addressed to the court, were also dismissed.]

Appeals dismissed with costs.

pedestrian crossing are the studs bordering the striped crossing and not the studs indicating the approach to the crossing.

Where, therefore, a car driver, having passed over the approach studs of an uncontrolled crossing at the time when a pedestrian stepped on to the striped portion of the crossing, failed to stop:—

Held, he was guilty of an offence for failing to accord precedence to a pedestrian in accordance with regulation 4.

Per curiam. Regulation 4 imposes an absolute duty and it is immaterial whether there is any evidence of negligence or failure to take reasonable care.

CASE STATED by Denbigh magistrates sitting at Colwyn Bay.

The prosecutor, John Owen Hughes, preferred an information against the defendant, David Benjamin Hall, that he being the driver of a motor-car failed to accord precedence to a foot-passenger on the carriageway within the limits of an uncontrolled crossing contrary to regulations 4 and 9 of the Pedestrian Crossings Regulations, 1954,[1] and section 18 of the Road Traffic Act, 1934.

The magistrates found the following facts: On June 20, 1959, at about 2.20 p.m. the defendant was driving a Humber Hawk motor-car belonging to his father's firm along the Conway Road, Colwyn Bay, in the direction of Conway. The defendant was a learner-driver holding a provisional licence, and was accompanied by his father, a fully licensed driver sitting next to him, and by his mother and a friend sitting in the back of the car. The defendant was driving at a reasonable and proper speed approaching a slight bend in the road beyond which was situated an uncontrolled pedestrian crossing; the day was fine. As the car driven by the defendant was approaching the crossing a lady, who looked neither to right nor left, stepped on to the crossing and had proceeded thereon some nine to twelve feet when she was hit by the car. When the lady stepped on to the crossing the defendant's car had either wholly or in part passed over the studs indicating the approach to the crossing. The defendant applied his foot brakes on seeing the lady step on to the crossing and was rapidly pulling up when the lady was hit, and there was insufficient distance between the car and the crossing in which to stop. There was insufficient evidence of driving on the part of the defendant without due care and attention.

It was contended by the prosecution that regulation 4 of the Pedestrian Crossings Regulations, 1954, imposed an absolute duty to accord precedence to a foot-passenger on the carriageway within the limits of an uncontrolled crossing and that as the lady was hit on the carriageway at the crossing an offence against the regulations had been committed; that the limits of the crossing were defined by and comprised only that portion of the carriageway which was marked by studs across the carriageway and a pattern of black and white stripes as provided in the First Schedule to the Regulations, Part II (5).

It was contended by the defendant that the limits of an uncontrolled crossing were not defined by the portion of the carriageway marked by the pattern of black and white stripes but by the studs which marked the approaches to the crossing, and that if a vehicle or any part thereof had come on to the carriageway within the limits indicated by the approach studs before a foot-passenger had come on to the carriageway no offence under the regulations had been committed; that the defendant's car, or a part thereof, had passed over the approach studs at that particular crossing before the lady stepped on to the carriageway and, therefore, no offence had been committed, and that there was no case to answer; that on the authority of Leicester v. Pearson [2] the duty imposed by regulation 4 was not an absolute duty and that, as there was no evidence of negligence or failure to take reasonable care, no offence had been committed.

The magistrates were referred to McCrone v. Riding [3]; Leicester v. Pearson [4] and Gibbons v. Kahl. [5]

The magistrates were of opinion (a) that the defendant's motor-car had either wholly or in part passed over the approach studs to the crossing before the foot-passenger stepped on to the crossing; (b) that the motor-car was then within the limits of the crossing, and (c) that there was no evidence of a failure on the part of the defendant to keep a proper look out or of negligence, and the magistrates upheld the defendant's contention that there there was no case to answer and dismissed the information.

The question for the opinion of the High Court was whether the magistrates were correct in deciding that when the motor-car had wholly or in part passed over the approach studs to the crossing it was within the limits of the crossing and that, therefore, no offence under regulation 4 had been committed.

D. T. Lloyd-Jones for the prosecutor.

The defendant did not appear and was not represented.

No cases were cited in argument.

LORD PARKER C.J. stated the facts, read regulation 4 of the Pedestrian Crossings Regulations, 1954, and continued: If the limits of an uncontrolled crossing are the approach studs on either side, then there is a finding here that either wholly or in part the defendant's car had entered the limits of the uncontrolled crossing and, accordingly, would not be bound to afford precedence to this lady. If, on the other hand, the limits are not the approach studs but the studs which border the striped crossing, then it is clear that this lady was on that crossing before the motor-car had come within the limits of the crossing. Looking at regulations 4, 6 and 8, I should have thought it was clear beyond doubt that the limits of an uncontrolled crossing are the studs bordering the striped way. The approach studs are dealt with in these regulations not as within the limits of the uncontrolled crossing but as something on each side indicating the approach to the uncontrolled crossing. I find it unnecessary to read those regulations in detail. It seems to me plain beyond doubt that the contention for the prosecutor is correct and that an offence was here committed.

I would only add this, that the justices have said, although it is not referred to in the question left to the court, "that there "was no evidence of a failure on the part of the defendant to keep "a proper look-out or of negligence, and we upheld the defen-"dant's contention that there was no case to answer and dismissed "the information." It is, I think, clear on the latest decisions of this court, that regulation 4 imposes an absolute duty, and that it is quite immaterial whether there is any evidence of negligence or failure to take reasonable care. In these circumstances, I would refer the case back to the justices with a direction that the offence charged was proved.

Lands Tribunal — Appeal from — Fact — Further evidence — Lands Tribunal Act, 1949 (12, 13 & 14 Geo. 6, c. 42), s. 3 (4).

Town and Country Planning—Development—Assessment of development value—Requisitioned land—Land in requisition on appointed day—Method of calculating development value—"State in which" land "was immediately before beginning of the period of requisition"—Meaning—Town and Country Planning Act, 1947 (10 & 11 Geo. 6, c. 51), ss. 58 (1), 61 (5), 89.

Practice—Title of proceedings—Plaintiffs "trustees of estate"—Change in trusteeship.

The subject-matter of these two appeals were adjoining parcels of freehold land. The one parcel was owned by the appellants in the first appeal, who were described in the title to the proceedings as the "Trustees of the Estate of J. W. Routh," the other parcel was owned by the appellant in the second appeal absolutely. On July 1, 1948, being the appointed day under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, all the land was subject to requisition. The appellants had appealed from the Central Land Board's determination of the development values of the freehold interests in these parcels of land to the Lands Tribunal. Their appeals were dismissed. The appellants appealed under section 3 (4) of the Lands Tribunal Act, 1949, to the Court of Appeal. At the time of the hearing before the Lands Tribunal two persons were trustees of the estate of J. W. Routh. At the time of the hearing of the appeal from the Lands Tribunal a third trustee had been appointed, who was the wife of one of the two original trustees. The appellants applied for leave to adduce further evidence as to value. On the appeal the question of law was raised as to the application of section 61 (5), as qualified by section 89 (1) of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947,[1] when ascertaining the development value of the land which was on the appointed day, July 1, 1948, under requisition:—

[1] Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 61: "(5) For the purposes "of this section, the restricted and the "unrestricted values of interests in "land shall be calculated by reference "to prices current immediately be-"fore the 7th day of January, 1947, "and for that purpose any such "interest shall be treated as if it "had been subsisting immediately "before that date with all incidents "to which it is subject on the "appointed day (being incidents "which are relevant to the calcula-"tion of the restricted or unrestricted "value of that interest, as the case "may be), and the land shall be "treated as having been immediately "before that date in the same state "as it is on the appointed day."

S. 89: "(1) For the purposes of "Part VI of this Act, the develop-"ment value of any interest in land "which is requisitioned land on the "appointed day shall be calculated as "if the land had been on that day in "the state in which it was imme-"diately before the beginning of the "period of requisition, and accord-"ingly, in relation to any such "interest, the second reference to the "appointed day in subsection (5) of "section 61 of this Act, and any "reference to that day in the Third "Schedule to this Act, shall be con-"strued as a reference to the begin-"ning of the period of requisition."

ROUTH'S TRUSTEES v. CENTRAL LAND BOARD.

Held, (1) that having regard to the terms of section 3 (4) of the Lands Tribunal Act, 1949, only questions of law could be raised on appeal from the Lands Tribunal, and since the estimation of development value was a question of fact and no appeal lay; and further, no permission could be granted for leave to call fresh evidence (post, pp. 740, 744).

(2) That where land was subject to requisition on July 1, 1948, in valuing it for the purpose of ascertaining its unrestricted value, it was necessary, having regard to the provisions of section 61 (5) of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, as interpreted by section 89 (1), that it should be valued as though the land had been on the appointed day "in the state in which it was immediately "before the beginning of the period of requisition," meaning its then physical condition immediately before requisition (post, p. 742).

Semble, that in making such valuation, regard must be had to the fact that the land at the relevant date was under requisition, with the result that the landowner could not develop for some five years after the relevant date (post, p. 742).

Per curiam. It was wrong that the proceedings should bear the title "The Trustees of the Estate of J. W. Routh," since the trustees were neither a body corporate nor incorporated by Royal Charter (post, p. 739).

APPEALS from the Lands Tribunal (John Watson, Esq., and J. R. Laird, Esq.).

These two appeals were heard, together with the motions by which the appellants sought leave to adduce further evidence.

Both appeals were against decisions of the Lands Tribunal affirming determinations of the Central Land Board of the development values for the purposes of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, of freehold interests in two areas of land situate at Church End Lane, Tilehurst, in the county borough of Reading.

The appellants in the first appeal were described in the title to the proceedings as being "Trustees of the Estate of J. W. "Routh." At the date of the hearing before the Lands Tribunal the land, the subject of the first appeal, was vested in Reginald Alan Routh and Wing-Commander E. J. D. Routh as trustees of the will of J. W. Routh. Before the appeal was heard by the Court of Appeal, Mrs. Routh, the wife of R. A. Routh, was appointed to be a third trustee of that estate, and she joined with her husband in conducting the appeal. R. A. Routh was the appellant in the second appeal, which related to adjoining land of which he was the sole owner. The respondent to both appeals was the Central Land Board.

The two parcels of land in question were on January 7, 1947, the relevant date for the purpose of estimating their development values, subject to requisition. The Lands Tribunal in determining their development value made some small deductions from such values for the fact that land was under requisition and that, accordingly, development would have to be postponed for a period.

The appellants appealed against the development values determined by the Lands Tribunal on a number of grounds which do not call for report, and also on the ground that the tribunal should, in assessing values, have wholly disregarded the fact that the land was subject to requisition. The appellants asked for leave to call further evidence as to value.

The appellants appeared in person.

G. D. Squibb Q.C. and William Glover for the Central Land Board.

No cases were referred to in argument.

LORD EVERSHED M.R. These are appeals in the form of cases stated to the court pursuant to section 3 of the Lands Tribunal Act, 1949, though the points which have been taken are the same in both and the case stated and the decision was one common to both cases. In the one case the appellant is Reginald Alan Routh, the respondents being the Central Land Board, and in the other case the appellants are stated as being "the Trustees of "the Estate of J. W. Routh." I mentioned this matter earlier, and I wish to repeat it in the hope that some notice will be taken of it. It is not a point upon which I am placing any blame whatever on the appellants in this court, because this form of entitling the proceedings has been in use for some time, but I wish to say that it is quite wrong. The trustees of the estate of J. W. Routh are not a body corporate or incorporated by Royal Charter or otherwise. The phrase "the Trustees of the Estate of J. W. Routh" can only mean the individuals who, for the time being, may be the trustees of that estate, and it is wrong that proceedings should bear that title. It can be seen how possibly such a thing might be abused, for shortly before the appeal it would be possible by appropriate machinery to substitute for the previously existing trustees some one person who was a man of no substance whatever; and if he was entitled to continue the appeal, the other party might be put at considerable disadvantage. In the present case it appears that the present trustees are three in number, Reginald Alan Routh himself, Wing-Commander Routh and also Mrs. Routh, the wife of the first trustee, who (I gather) was made a trustee in December of last year after, in fact, the hearing before the Lands Tribunal. Strictly speaking, I am in some doubt whether she would be entitled to be heard as an appellant in this court without an amendment of the proceedings, but as obviously such an amendment, if asked for, would have been granted, nothing turns upon it. I refer to it again only to emphasise that this form of entitling proceedings (and we came across it recently in a revenue case) is quite wrong, and I hope it will not be repeated. In this case Mrs. Routh obviously has taken a very forceful part in the preparation and thinking out of this case, and it may, therefore, well be a good thing that she has been able to address the court on this occasion. So much for this matter of title.

ROUTH'S TRUSTEES v. CENTRAL LAND BOARD.
Lord Evershed M.R.

The matter comes before us by virtue of section 3, and in particular subsection (4) of section 3, of the Lands Tribunal Act, 1949. In view of the conclusion I have reached upon a great many of the points in this case I think it necessary that I should read the whole of that subsection. It is as follows: "A decision "of the Lands Tribunal shall be final: Provided that any person "aggrieved by the decision as being erroneous in point of law "may, within such time as may be limited by rules of court, "require the tribunal to state and sign a case for the decision "of the court," which means now this court, "and, where the "decision of the Lands Tribunal is given on a review by way of "appeal of the previous decision of another person, that person "if dissatisfied with the decision of the Lands Tribunal shall be "treated for this purpose as a person aggrieved thereby."

Ever since the foundation of the Court of Appeal by statute less than a century ago, it has been laid down as a principle that in the ordinary case a hearing in the Court of Appeal shall be a rehearing of the case. That does not, of course, mean that the witnesses are called again, but it does mean that, save where Parliament by statute otherwise directs, it is open to an appellant to challenge matters or findings of fact in this court, and it is the duty of this court to come to its own conclusion upon the facts; though, as is well known, this court is always slow to reverse the court below upon a finding of fact, particularly one which depends upon that court's estimation of the demeanour and so forth of the witnesses. I am going into this matter, elementary though it is, at a little length in the hope that it may be some consolation to the appellants, and that they may appreciate the limitations which are placed upon us by Parliament in the present case. For this is a case of a kind in which Parliament in its wisdom and by the terms of this Act has said in quite plain terms that there shall be no review of matters of fact in the Court of Appeal on a case coming from the Lands Tribunal. On matters of fact the decision of the Lands Tribunal, right or wrong, is final; but a person aggrieved, as the appellants in this case say they are aggrieved, may require a case stated which will raise questions of law and law only. In this case the vital question was one of valuation, arriving at an estimation in pounds, shillings and pence, of the development value of certain interests in land belonging to the appellants, and a matter of value and such a matter of estimation is one of fact.

[His Lordship considered the evidence, and continued:] I can find no misdirection of themselves anywhere as regards any of the matters complained of such as would justify our saying the tribunal's figures cannot stand.

I come, therefore, now to the point which involves a question of law, and it is this. We are concerned with two cases, one in which the appellants are the trustees of the estate of J. W. Routh, the land in which they are interested amounting to 60 acres and more, and, secondly, the case of R. A. Routh, he being interested in adjoining land of about 18 acres—I am using round figures. In the cases of both these parcels of land, at the relevant date the greater part of the property was subject to requisition either by the War Department or another Minister of the Crown. In arriving at the figures which the expert witnesses for the Land Board put before the tribunal, it was indicated that the value attached to the property had been affected, and affected for the worse from the point of view of the appellants, by the fact of these requisitions still being operative.

The Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, came into effect on July 1, 1948, and upon its coming into effect it followed (by virtue of section 12) that permission was required for any development of land to be carried out thereafter. It is common knowledge that land in the hands of an owner without any restriction upon its use may be put to any kind of purpose the landowner desires; he may develop it for housing or industrial purposes. But that was changed by the coming into operation of the Act of 1947, which for the first time put the whole of the land of England under this restriction upon development. But by way of compensation for what the owner lost it was provided by Part VI of the Act that the landowner should get a payment for the depreciation of his land value in consequence of the operation of the Act. Section 58 (1) provides: "Subject to the provisions of this Part "of this Act, payments shall be made in accordance with a "scheme to be made by the Treasury under this section, in "respect of interests in land which are depreciated in value by "virtue of the provisions of this Act." Section 61 (5) provides: "For the purposes of this section, the restricted and the unre-"stricted values of interests in land shall be calculated by "reference to prices current immediately before the 7th day of "January, 1947, and for that purpose any such interest shall be "treated as if it had been subsisting immediately before that "date"—that is, January 7, 1947—"with all incidents to which "it is subject on the appointed day"—that is, July 1, 1948—"(being incidents which are relevant to the calculation of the "restricted or unrestricted value of that interest, as the case "may be), and the land shall be treated as having been imme-"diately before that date in the same state as it is on the "appointed day." The last line which I have read has to be qualified by virtue of section 89, which, in the case of land subject to requisition, provides: "(1) For the purposes of Part VI of this "Act, the development value of any interest in land which is "requisitioned land on the appointed day shall be calculated as "if the land had been on that day in the state in which it was "immediately before the beginning of the period of requisition," and it then goes on to provide that the reference to the appointed day at the end of subsection (5) of section 61 must be treated as being a reference to the beginning of the period of requisition. Therefore, in the case of requisitioned land, section 61 (5) tells you that you must calculate the values according to prices current immediately before January 7, 1947, and you have to treat the land as having been immediately before that date in the same state as it was on the date, not July 1, 1948, but the date when the requisition commenced.

C. A.

ROUTH'S TRUSTEES v. CENTRAL LAND BOARD.
Lord Evershed M.R.

The first problem of interpretation is not difficult. I do not think we have been told the actual dates of the requisition but I do not think that matters. There is no doubt whatever that the land or the bulk of it was subject to requisition on July 1, 1948, and had been for some time before. You are, therefore, required by subsection (5) of section 61, as interpreted by section 89, to arrive at your calculation of value as though the land had been immediately before the relevant date, January 7, 1947, in the same state as it was immediately before the requisition. The argument was put: What is meant by the phrase "in the same "state as it was"? The tribunal concluded that meant in the same physical state, the same condition, and I think it must mean that; it cannot, indeed, mean anything else. What you have to do is to disregard physical changes in the case of requisitioned land which may have occurred since the requisition. For example, in this case part of the land was used for the installation of certain hutments. You have got to ignore the fact that those hutments were in fact on the land at the valuation date, and you treat the land as it stood just before the requisition began.

But then there has been a second question. It has been suggested for the appellants that what you ought to do for the purpose of valuing development value is to ignore the requisition altogether. It may be that this is the first time this particular point has arisen. Mr. Squibb, who has great experience in these matters, said he did not recall any other case. I confess to having felt some sympathy with the appellants here because, since this Act is designed to enable landowners to get fixed, and when the Act was passed fixed for all purposes, the development value of their land, as distinct from its existing use value, it seems a little hard that their development value should be affected for worse by the accident of the fact that at the relevant date it was subject to a requisition; and if you are therefore to treat the land as though it was in the same state as it was before the appointed day, it was suggested you should take no notice of the requisition at all. I am by no means clear from the terms of the decision that in this case it could make any difference, and it may, therefore, strictly not be necessary to express a final view about it. But as at present advised, it seems to me that for better or worse, although you value the land, treating it on the valuation date as in the same condition physically as it was immediately before the requisition began, you cannot ignore, for the purposes of considering development value, the fact, the circumstance, the incident (to use the word in section 61 (5)), that being requisitioned and likely to remain under requisition for some time, development in fact would have had to be postponed for a little time. After all, what is being valued is the particular interest in land. If it was a case of a freeholder, his interest would be limited, if there was a subsisting lease, to his reversionary interest as freeholder, and presumably the lessee's interest would be a separate interest to be valued. Here the interest of the appellants relevant at the date was that they had the freehold though it was subject to requisition. It is true, of course, that so far as the physical condition of the land is concerned you are to ignore the requisition: nonetheless what is here being considered by Part VI of the Act is an assessment of the depreciation in the value of the land by virtue of the provisions in the Act of 1947. It is quite clear that the requisition had nothing whatever to do with the Act of 1947. As I say, therefore, if it were necessary to state a conclusion I would be disposed to agree with the view of the tribunal that the valuation had to have regard to the circumstance that the land was at the relevant date under requisition. But I am by no means satisfied (and from this I take some comfort) that it could have made any difference. We do know that in the period with which we are here concerned, shortly after the last war, a landowner could not develop as he wished because of building licences and so on, and so it is stated in the decision that "apart "from any other consideration, a developer would have seen "little prospect of being able to begin operations until some five "years after the appointed day." That period would overlap the estimated length of time of the requisition. So when later the tribunal stated in their conclusion that, if this matter of requisition did have an adverse effect on the value, the result would, in their own language, "be small," I interpret that as meaning, in effect, negligible.

That disposes of the one point which does raise a question of law. I should have earlier stated, and I must add it now, that when these cases came on there were also applications by way of original motion before the court in both cases for leave to adduce further evidence. It was quite plain that what the appellants sought to do was to bring before us fresh evidence of the values at the relevant date of these properties. We were told in some instances that this fresh evidence was evidence which had not in truth been available to the appellants when the matter was before the Lands Tribunal. So far as the evidence had been available before the Lands Tribunal, though not in fact called, it is, of course, quite plain, upon general principles which apply to other cases, that we should not in this court, unless there was some very special reason which has not been indicated here, have allowed the additional evidence to be called. As regards evidence which came into the possession of the appellants later and which, therefore, they could not call, there might have been in an ordinary appeal a case in which such additional evidence might have been allowed; but, having regard to the terms of section 3 (4) of the Lands Tribunal Act, 1949, it is plain that no question of calling additional evidence in a case of this sort could be permitted. I repeat again the essential terms of the subsection, which are that the only matters which by statute this court can entertain are questions of law of a limited kind which are made the subject of a case stated by the tribunal raising the submission that their decision, as it stood and on the facts before them, was erroneous in some way in point of law. It is plain, therefore, that the attempt by the appellants to bring fresh evidence before this court could not possibly be substantiated, and we earlier indicated that we refused those applications accordingly.

I do not think it necessary to pursue the matter. I have, I hope, attended to the arguments which Mr. Routh and his wife have put with force before us. I have no doubt that they feel very strongly that the figures which this tribunal reached were unfairly low, but I have come to the conclusion that, if that is so, it is because, and only because, the tribunal came to a conclusion of fact which, on a review, might not have commended itself to this court or another tribunal. I am not saying they did so, but that is the highest it can be put, and that being so, the matter is clearly not open to the appellants for review in this court.

I therefore have to conclude that both appeals must be dismissed.

ORMEROD L.J. I agree.

DEVLIN L.J. I also agree.

Negligence—Safe system of work—Pleading—Whether onus on servant to show alternative and safe system.

The plaintiff and a fellow workman were working in a low tunnel. The plaintiff had to hold a piece of wood in position immediately above his face. His fellow workman when driving nails into the wood struck a glancing blow and a nail flew out and struck the plaintiff's left eye which, as a consequence of the accident, had to be removed. The plaintiff claimed damages from his employers for negligence alleging that a safe system of work would have avoided the accident. Diplock J. gave judgment for the plaintiff for £2,580. The employers appealed:—

Held, dismissing the appeal, that it was not necessary in every case where an unsafe system of work was alleged for the plaintiff to undertake the burden of pleading and proving an alternative system of work which could have been adopted and which would have been safe; there were cases in which the plaintiff would not go far with an allegation of an unsafe system, unless he could show some practicable alternative, but there were cases, of which this was one, where the plaintiff could fairly say that the system of work was dangerous and some other way of doing it should be found by a prudent employer.

Decision of Diplock J. affirmed.

APPEAL from Diplock J.

The plaintiff, Brian Peter Dixon, was employed by the defendants, the Cementation Company Ltd., as a sinker. On November 28, 1957, he was assisting in the erection of wooden shuttering in an arch formation for a new cement roof in a colliery at Royston. He was holding a piece of wood against the framework of the shuttering and a fellow servant of the defendants, one Beevers, was endeavouring to hammer nails to secure the board to the arch's framework when he struck a glancing blow and a nail flew out and struck the plaintiff in the left eye which had to be removed. At the time of the accident, owing to the confined space in which they were working, the plaintiff's face was about one foot below the point where the nail was being hammered in.

In this action the plaintiff claimed damages against the defendants for negligence. He alleged that a safe system of work would have avoided the accident.

Diplock J. held that the system of work was a negligent system of work and further that the plaintiff had not been guilty of contributory negligence. The judge gave judgment for the plaintiff for £2,580.

The defendants appealed.

Marven Everett Q.C. and A. G. Sharp for the defendants.
Geoffrey Veale Q.C. and H. G. Bennett for the plaintiff.

The case of Winter v. Cardiff Rural District Council [1] was referred to in argument in addition to the case mentioned in the judgments.

LORD EVERSHED M.R. I will ask Devlin L.J. to deliver the first judgment.

DEVLIN L.J. This is an appeal from a judgment of Diplock J. given at Leeds Assizes on July 13, 1959, by which he awarded the plaintiff the sum of £2,580 damages against his employers, the defendants, for the loss of an eye.

In the course of the plaintiff's work he had to work with another man, a fellow workman, in an unusual position. He was holding a piece of wood in position and the other workman was holding a nail and was banging it in and doing so from on top of his work and leaning over. They were working in a tunnel and that was why they had to work in this position. I do not think it is really necessary to describe the nature of the work more than that. The essential thing which emerges from it is the odd position that had to be assumed.

The fellow workman, a man named Beevers, struck the nail he was holding twice and, thinking he had got it sufficiently in position so as to drive it in, struck it a hard blow. Unfortunately, he did not strike it directly and the nail flew out and flew into the eye of the plaintiff, who was below holding the wood in position.

Some suggestion was made that there was contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff in that he had been told—obviously a wise precaution—to keep his head down while the hammering was going on, but he looked up. He said he looked up because he thought that the pause by Beevers meant that the job had been finished. The allegation of contributory negligence has not been pursued and there is really nothing in it. No allegation of negligence has been made against Beevers, so that the case against the employers must be whether or not they permitted an unsafe system of work to be in operation.

An unsafe system of work is rather a grandiose expression, although it is a traditional one to use, for a case of this type. It might be simpler to say—and I think it would be equally correct—that the employers allowed an unsafe practice to be adopted, one which they knew or ought to have known to be unsafe, and one which they could have altered. That is the case and the only case against them.

The essence of the unsafety is the position in which the two men were and the fact that the plaintiff's face or head had to be a distance of about a foot or so from the nail which was being hammered in position, so that, if he did look up in the way in which he did, there was a danger that the nail would fly off. Most unfortunately, it hit the man in the eye, but there was at least a danger that it would fly off and do some facial injury to him, a danger which it is said on behalf of the plaintiff that the employers ought to have foreseen and guarded against.

Mr. Everett has based himself on the dictum of Viscount Simon L.C. in Colfar v. Coggins & Griffith (Liverpool) Ltd.,[1] that in a plea of this sort—that is, a lack of a safe system—it is essential for the plaintiff to set out what the proper system of work is and in what respect it has not been observed. Viscount Simon L.C. said this with regard to the plea of failure to provide and maintain a proper system of work: "To raise this issue, the "statement of claim ought to set out, so far as relevant, what "the proper system of work was, and in what relevant respects "it is alleged that it was not observed. Instead of this, there "is merely an allegation that the bag of salt 'fell out of the "'sling on the plaintiff owing to the negligence of the defendants,' "followed by particulars many of which cannot be regarded as "alleging defects of 'system' at all." It is clear that in the case with which Viscount Simon L.C. was dealing, there was no proper particularisation of the allegation of negligence that the bag of salt fell out of the sling. It is in relation to facts of that sort that Viscount Simon L.C.'s dictum must be considered. I do not think it means that, in every case where an unsafe system of working is alleged, it is necessary for the plaintiff to undertake the burden of pleading, and proving, an alternative system of work which could have been adopted and which would have been safe. That is for the employer to provide. There may be cases in which the plaintiff will not get very far with an allegation of unsafe system of work unless he can show some practicable alternative, but there are also cases—and I think this is one of them—in which a plaintiff can fairly say: "If this is dangerous, then "there must be some other way of doing it that can be found by "a prudent employer and it is not for me to devise that way or "to say what it is."

On behalf of the defendants it is said that this is a practice which has gone on for 20 years and no reasonable employer could be expected to have thought that there was anything dangerous about it. On behalf of the plaintiff there is a reply to that, namely, that the evidence shows that there had been cases where some facial injury had been caused; the fact that the plaintiff's face had to come into such close proximity to the nail meant that some precautionary measures ought to be taken. It may be that Beevers, who was only a general labourer, should not have been employed but that the precaution of employing a skilled workman to do the job, one who would be very much less likely to make a bosh shot, would have been sufficient. As against that, it is said that hammering a nail is a very ordinary thing and it is difficult to draw the line between the professional and the amateur in such a matter.

This is a case in which there are considerations to be borne in mind on both sides. They have been put effectively on one side by Mr. Marven Everett and on the other side by Mr. Veale. I have indicated some of them and I need not summarise them further. For my part, having considered them, and finding this to be a nicely balanced case, I am not disposed to disturb the finding on this point of the judge at the trial, and, therefore, I would dismiss the appeal.

Ormerod L.J. I agree and I would also dismiss this appeal for the same reasons.

Lord Evershed M.R. I am also of the same opinion. The arguments presented to us, as my brother has pointed out, have been factual and forceful, but I agree with my brethren that on the whole it would not be right to disturb the judge's view.

APPEAL against sentence.

The following statement of the facts is taken in substance from the judgment.

The appellant, Jack Keeley, was convicted of housebreaking and larceny at Oxford City Sessions on November 28, 1958, and was sentenced to eight years' preventive detention. On March 23, 1959, the Court of Criminal Appeal allowed his appeal against sentence and substituted a probation order for three years. On September 30, 1959, he was convicted of housebreaking and larceny at Hertfordshire Quarter Sessions, and was again put on probation for three years. On January 5, 1960, he was convicted of housebreaking, larceny and false pretences at East Sussex Quarter Sessions and was sentenced to 18 months' imprisonment. He was brought before Hertfordshire Quarter Sessions and sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment for breach of the probation order made by that court. He was then brought before Oxford City Quarter Sessions to be dealt with for his breach of the probation order made by the Court of Criminal Appeal. The recorder imposed a sentence of seven years' preventive detention. The appellant, contending that the probation order made by the Court of Criminal Appeal was superseded and rendered ineffective by that made by Hertfordshire Quarter Sessisons, appealed.

Gordon Hardy for the appellant.

Peter Crawford for the Crown.

No case, other than that referred to in the judgment, was cited in argument.

LORD PARKER C.J., giving the judgment of the court, observed that the appellant fully deserved the sentence imposed on him, stated the facts, and continued: The sole point in the appeal is whether the original probation order made by Oxford City Quarter Sessions was still effective and alive once Hertfordshire Quarter Sessions had imposed a second probation order for three years. Mr. Hardy, who has said all that is possible for the appellant, points out, what I think is quite clear, that under the scheme of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, a man cannot be under supervision in two districts by two different probation officers. Accordingly, so far as supervision at any rate is concerned—and to that presumably would have to be added any particular conditions or requirements of the respective orders—the only effective order would be the second one, that is that made by Hertfordshire Quarter Sessions. But that is a long way from saying that the original probation order has become ineffective for all purposes. If it were, it is to be observed that a prisoner would go unsentenced, unpunished, for the original offence the subject of the first probation order. It would mean that the statement made to every prisoner pursuant to section 3 (5) of the Act, that, if he commits another offence, he will be liable to be sentenced for the original offence, is of no effect at all. Prima facie, therefore, it seems to this court that, though the original probation order may be ineffective for supervision purposes, it should remain of full effect to enable the court to impose a punishment for the original offence.

Reference has been made to Reg. v. Havant Justices, Ex parte Jacobs.[1] It is unnecessary to go into the facts of that case, save to say that there the two probation orders were for one and the same offence; in other words, the court had made a probation order in respect of an offence, there was a breach of that probation order and, when the probationer was brought up to be punished for the original offence, a second probation order was made. In those circumstances, the Divisional Court held that once the second probation order had been made the previous probation order could no longer be of effect. It is to be observed that they did not say that it had become ineffective for all purposes, but, whether that was intended or not, the facts there were quite different because the probationer was being brought up and punished by the second probation order for the original offence.

If the argument in the present case prevails, the prisoner will go unpunished for the original offence. In the judgment of this court, the original probation order remained effective for the purpose of having the prisoner brought back and punished for the original offence. Accordingly, the recorder was fully justified in imposing the sentence he did, and this appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

* GARDNER v. BLAXILL AND ANOTHER.

[1958 G. No. 548.]

Landlord and Tenant — Option to extend term — Notice of exercise— Tenant remaining in premises and paying rent after expiry of original term—Rent accepted by landlords—Whether option validly exercised by tenant—"Option for continuing for an extension of "seven or fourteen years" — Provided tenant "has reasonably "fulfilled covenants."

Landlords granted a tenant a lease of a shop and premises for seven years from June 24, 1947. The lease contained, inter alia, a clause which read as follows: " . . . provided that the tenant has "reasonably fulfilled the covenants hereinbefore mentioned he has "the option of continuing for an extension of seven or fourteen "years . . ." When the seven years granted by the lease expired on June 24, 1954, the tenant remained in the premises and paid rent for the following quarter which was accepted by the landlords. Thereafter the tenant remained in the premises and paid rent from quarter to quarter. There was no express provision in the lease that the tenant had to give notice to the landlords if he desired to exercise the option.

By a notice dated December 21, 1957, the landlords served a notice to quit expiring on June 24, 1958. The tenant sued for a declaration that he had validly exercised the option by, inter alia, his conduct in remaining in the premises and paying rent therefor: —

Held, that the words "option of continuing for an extension of "seven or fourteen years" must be interpreted as though they read: "the choice of not ceasing to be the tenant for an extension of four-"teen years with a break at seven years." Construing this clause, and in the absence of an express provision in the lease to the contrary, no notice in writing was necessary before the option was exercised by the tenant. Having remained in the premises the tenant indicated that he was exercising the option as soon as he sent the landlords the rent for the quarter following the expiry of the original seven-year term granted by the lease; by accepting such rent the landlords must be deemed to have accepted it on the terms that the tenant had exercised the option; accordingly, the tenant was entitled to the declaration sought.

Hersey v. Giblett (1854) 18 Beav. 174 applied.

ACTION.

By an assignment dated June 26, 1947 (hereinafter called "the "lease"), the landlords, Wilfred Charles Blaxill and Edith Margaret Blaxill, his wife, demised to the tenant, Cecil Reginald Gardner, and one Charles Straker, a shop and premises known as 251, Dartmouth Road, Sydenham, London, S.E.26, for a term of seven years from June 4, 1947. The tenant and Straker covenanted, inter alia, "at all times during the said term to keep "the premises in good and substantial repair and deliver up to the "lessors [the defendants] at the expiration or sooner determina-"tion of the said term . . ." The last paragraph of the lease read as follows: " . . . provided that the tenant [sic] has reasonably "fulfilled the covenants hereinbefore mentioned he has the option "of continuing for an extension of seven or fourteen years . . ." The tenant and Straker entered and paid the rent reserved by the lease until May 12, 1950, when Straker died. Thereafter the tenant, as surviving joint tenant, continued to occupy and pay the rent reserved by the lease. When the date arrived upon which, apart from an exercise of the option to continue, the seven-year lease expired by effluxion of time, namely, June 24, 1954, the tenant remained in the premises and paid rent for the following quarter, which was accepted by the landlords. Thereafter, from quarter to quarter the rent was paid and the tenant continued to occupy the premises. In 1957 the landlords sought to increase the rent, contending that there had been no exercise of the option by the tenant but a holding over from year to year. The tenant then by this action sued for a declaration that the option was exercised (a) by notice in writing dated February 20, 1958, alternatively (b) by his conduct in remaining in occupation of the premises after June 25, 1954, and paying the rent reserved under the lease and observing the covenants contained therein.

By their defence the landlords (a) denied that the tenant had observed the covenants contained in the lease in that he was in breach of the repairing covenants; (b) denied that the option had been validly exercised, contending (i) that it was an implied term of the option to continue that the tenant should give to the landlords notice in writing of his desire to exercise the option within a reasonable time before the expiry of the term of the lease; (ii) that the notice of February 20, 1958, was of no effect because it was not given within a reasonable time before, alternatively after the expiry of the said term, and because the tenant had not reasonably fulfilled the covenants contained in the lease; and (iii) that the tenant remained in occupation of the premises upon a tenancy from year to year subject to the observance of the covenants contained in the lease, in so far as they were not inconsistent with a tenancy from year to year, determinable by the giving of six months' notice in writing determining the same on June 24 in any year subsequent to the year 1954. By a notice dated December 21, 1957, the landlords purported to give the tenant notice to quit the premises expiring on June 24, 1958.

The facts are more fully stated in the judgment.

following were cited in argument: Buckland v. Papillon [1]; Simons v. Associated Furnishers Ltd.[2]

Cur. adv. vult.

May 9. PAULL J. read the following judgment: This is an action by the tenant for a declaration that he has validly exercised the option contained in a lease dated June 26, 1947, and made between the landlords of the one part, and the tenant and one Charles Straker of the other part, in respect of the shop and premises known as 251, Dartmouth Road, Sydenham, in the County of London.

The premises are at least 100, and may be 150, years old. They were originally built as one dwelling-house in a terrace of dwelling-houses, but during the course of their existence their character has changed. At some time before the First World War the ground-floor front was extended so as to form a shop in front of the original premises, and the ground floor of the original premises was turned into one big room to be used in connection with whatever business was to be carried on on the premises. A room on the half-landing can be used as an office, and the three rooms on the first floor, which were originally bedrooms, have clearly long ceased to be used for that purpose. There is no doubt that the premises show their age. The brickwork and woodwork at all material times were in a poor condition, and the roof at all material times has been in the sort of condition one would expect in the case of premises of this age. Even the zinc roof over the shop premises has, as one surveyor expressed it, "lost its life," meaning thereby that, whatever repairs are carried out at places where leaks develop, other leaks will inevitably develop at other places in the roof. Further, while the premises were not actually blitzed during the war, bombs had fallen close enough to blow out the windows, and by 1947 the windows were covered with corrugated iron. Clearly in 1947 the premises could not be called other than dilapidated.

The tenant is a carpenter and cabinet-maker. After the war he started carrying on a small business from his private address. He then met one Straker and they decided to go into partnership together as cabinet-makers. Straker got into touch with the defendants, who at all material times were, and are, the landlords of the premises to which I have referred. The period being just after the war, the tenants were in the difficulty that they could not obtain a licence for the essential repairs to the premises. However, that difficulty was overcome by the tenant and Straker obtaining a licence, and the landlords then carried out certain repairs. These repairs were enough to make the premises water-tight but did not at that moment go very far beyond that. The difficulty of obtaining accommodation in 1947 was such that the tenant and Straker were prepared to take the premises once they were watertight, dilapidated though they were. They therefore moved into the premises and shortly after that, on June 26, 1947, they entered into the lease which is the subject-matter of the dispute before me. At about that time the tenant and Straker obtained a further licence and the landlords did further repairs to the premises. They repaired the shop window and the roof, and they cleaned out the gutters; in addition, they did a considerable amount of interior decoration, but that interior decoration did not include, for instance, repairing and cleaning floors or stairs, work which was subsequently done by the tenant.

I should say here that Straker, very shortly after signing the lease, left the partnership and disappeared. He is now dead, and both parties agree that if the lease gave the rights claimed in this action to the tenants, this action is properly constituted by Mr. Gardner being the sole plaintiff.

The lease is a home-drawn lease, at any rate, so far as the tenant is concerned. From the form of it, it is clear that, at any rate in respect of the provisions other than that contained in the last paragraph, either the terms of the lease were obtained from a form or some lawyer had something to do with drawing it up. The habendum clause to the lease states that the lease shall be for a term of seven years from June 24, 1947, at a yearly rental of £80 payable by four equal quarterly instalments, the rent always to be paid one quarter in advance. One of the covenants of the lease is that the tenants will at all times during the said term keep the premises in good and substantial repair. The last paragraph of the lease reads as follows: "Provided that the "tenant has reasonably fulfilled the covenants hereinbefore "mentioned he has the option of continuing for an extension of "seven or fourteen years providing the premises have not been "taken by the housing authorities." It is the interpretation of this clause which is the matter in dispute between the parties in this action. Since the housing authorities have not taken the premises, the words "providing the premises have not been taken "by the housing authorities" can be disregarded.

If there was no exercise of the option, the lease came to an end on June 24, 1954. By the time that date had arrived, certainly the tenant and probably the landlords (who have not given evidence) had forgotten all about the proviso concerning the option. When June 24, 1954, arrived, the tenant stayed on in the premises and duly paid his rent for the following quarter. That rent was accepted. Thereafter from quarter to quarter the rent was paid and the tenant continued to occupy the premises.

In the summer of 1957 the landlords approached the tenant and informed him that the time had come when he must pay more rent for the premises. The tenant told the landlords that he did not think that they could do that, as his lease was still in existence. Each of the parties consulted solicitors, with the result that a letter was written by the solicitors instructed by the landlords stating that there had been no exercise of the option contained in the lease but a holding over from year to year; and a letter was written by solicitors instructed by the tenant to say that he had exercised his option by continuing his occupation of the premises and paying the rent. Since each of the parties stoutly maintained that his view of the position was the correct view, the writ in the present action was issued. It is for me to determine whether or not the option to which I have referred has in fact been exercised by the tenant.

Looking once more at the vital clause, it will be seen that it can be divided into a main clause and a proviso. The main clause gives the tenant the option of continuing for an extension of seven or fourteen years; the proviso is that before such an option is exercised the tenant must have reasonably fulfilled the covenants of the lease. I propose to consider the main clause first.

Both Mr. Hirst and Mr. Plume, who have argued this case extremely well, agree that they have been unable to find any authority which can help me to construe the words "the option "of continuing for an extension of seven or fourteen years," except that Mr. Hirst has been able to refer me to Hersey v. Giblett.[1] In that case there was an agreement that the tenant should take a house as a yearly tenant at the rent of £36, with a proviso that should the tenant wish for a lease of the premises the landlord would grant the same for seven, fourteen or twenty-one years at the same rent on the condition that the tenant should pay the same and perform all the covenants by which the tenant held the premises. Later the landlord's assignee gave the tenant notice to quit, whereupon the tenant applied to take up the lease and, that being refused, a bill was filed for specific performance. The case was tried before Sir John Romilly M.R. One of the arguments of counsel for the landlord was that there was no certainty as to the duration of the lease: whether it should be one for twenty-one years determinable at seven and fourteen years, or should be one for seven years, or one for fourteen years, or one for twenty-one years. Counsel also contended that if it was to be determinable there was no reason why both sides should not have the right of determining it. Romilly M.R. said[2]: "I concur with the plaintiff in thinking, that it is "sufficiently clear what was intended between the parties, which "was a tenancy from year to year, with an option given to the "lessee to ask for a lease from the beginning, for twenty-one "years, determinable, at his option, at seven or fourteen. It "appears to me to be sufficiently plainly expressed by the terms "of the contract, and sufficiently clear to enforce against the "parties, if there are no other ingredients in the case to prevent "it."

That statement by Sir John Romilly has, so far as I am aware, always been considered to be an accurate statement of the law. In Foa on Landlord and Tenant, 8th ed., at p. 97, para. 160, it is stated: "The continuance of the term may depend "on the acts of the parties after the tenancy has commenced, "as where a demise is made for a term of years (twenty-one, for "instance) and power is given 'to break' (usually at seven, or "fourteen, or both) upon a notice of specified length being given "by one of the parties to the other. The legal effect of a demise "'for seven, fourteen or twenty-one years' is exactly the same."

One of the points taken by Mr. Plume, for the landlords in the present case is that in any event before the option under the lease can be exercised the tenant must state whether he desires the lease to be continued for seven years or for fourteen years, as otherwise the length of the extension of the lease is uncertain. At first I was impressed by this argument. There is a very practical difference between a lease for seven years and a lease for fourteen years with a break at seven years. In the former case, if, as so often happens, and indeed has happened in this case, the tenant forgets the passage of time and pays an extra quarter's rent after the seven years has expired, he thereby becomes a tenant from year to year and can get out of his obligation to continue as tenant by giving the requisite six months' notice. In the latter case, so soon as he has paid rent for the quarter following the expiration of the seven years and stays on over the seven years, he has contracted to remain a tenant of the premises for a further seven years. Apart, therefore, from authority, I should have felt inclined to hold that there could be no exercise of the option by merely continuing on in the premises and paying rent, since even if the tenant had sent a letter stating "Take notice that I exercise my option under "the lease," that would have been an equivocal act, since he would not have made it plain whether he meant that he was opting to be a tenant for a further seven years or for a further fourteen years or for a further fourteen years with a break at seven years. In the light of Hersey v. Giblett,[3] however, I think I am bound to hold that this particular point must fail, and that if, for instance, the tenant had sent a letter in the terms I have just stated, that would have meant that he opted to remain on as tenant for the full fourteen years with the right to break at seven years. In other words, the words "the option of continu-"ing for an extension of seven or fourteen years" must be interpreted as though they read "the option of continuing for an "extension of fourteen years with a break at seven years."

Reading the clause in this way, I have to decide whether the option is exercised merely by the tenant staying on and paying rent after the first seven years have elapsed, or whether the effect of his so doing is to constitute him a tenant holding over from year to year. Mr. Hirst contends for the former; Mr. Plume contends

v.
BLAXILL.

Paull J.

for the latter, adding that in any event the act of staying on and paying rent is at least an equivocal act and, therefore, the effect must be construed against the tenant.

One starts, of course, from the fact that normally the effect of staying on and paying rent is undoubtedly to constitute the tenant a tenant holding over from year to year. As against that, one has to look carefully at the precise words of the option, and primarily it is difficult to see how an option to continue can be exercised except by continuing. The usual provision in a lease for an option for an extension of time contains some such words as "renew," which imports "making afresh." There is no such word in this lease. Further, an option to extend the time usually has some provision for the giving of a notice by the tenant stating that he desires to take advantage of the option. There is no such provision in this lease. The plain meaning of the word "option" is "choice." Reading "choice" for "option," the clause means that the tenant has the choice of continuing his tenancy. The plain meaning of "continuing" is "carrying on" or "not ceasing "to be," and reading "carrying on" for "continuing," the clause reads "the tenant has the choice of carrying on for an extension of fourteen years with a break at seven years"; or, reading "not ceasing to be," the clause reads "the tenant has "the choice of not ceasing to be the tenant for an extension of "fourteen years with a breach at seven years."

The precise wording of the clause is, I think, important, and it is to be noticed that the word after "continuing" is "for" and not "by." It may well be that if the parties had used the word "by," the use of that word would have imported that something had to be done by the tenant in order to extend the tenancy. The lease must be construed according to the exact words which the parties chose to use, and at least one of the parties had the idea that the landlords could not terminate the lease in 1958. In my judgment, no notice was necessary before the option was exercised.

The next question is when precisely is the option exercised. Is it exercised if the tenant stays on for a day over the seven years, or is it exercised only when the tenant pays to the landlords the rent due in respect of the quarter following the seven years and the landlords accept that rent? In my judgment, it is the latter. It does not follow that, if a tenant stays on for a day over his period, he has any intention other than making a final clearing up before he actually leaves. It is true that the phrase "tenant "on sufferance" is used in such circumstances, but I do not think that his action is sufficient to show an intention of exercising a choice or option. So soon, however, as he sends the rent for the following quarter, whether it be in advance or in arrear, he is definitely indicating to the landlords that he desires to remain a tenant after the seven years are over, and, reading the words of the lease in the way in which I have read them, I think that he definitely indicates that he is exercising his option unless he expressly avers to the contrary. If the landlords accept that payment, then, in my judgment, they must be deemed to have accepted it on the terms that the tenant has exercised his option, unless, indeed, there are facts proving the contrary.

I now turn to the other part of the clause, that is, the proviso. If I am right in my interpretation of the main part of the clause I am considering, I do not think that any question under the proviso arises. If a tenant indicates to his landlord that he is exercising an option to continue his tenancy, and the landlord takes no objection with regard to the condition of the premises, and the tenant thereafter remains on as a tenant, it seems to me plain that the landlord cannot thereafter raise the question whether the tenant was entitled to exercise his option by reason of the condition of the premises. He has waived that right. The reply in this action did not raise waiver, although Mr. Hirst contended that it was raised by implication. Mr. Hirst ex abundanti cautela applied to amend his defence in order to plead waiver, and Mr. Plume did not object to this course being taken. The pleading was therefore amended. If I am right in my interpretation of the main clause, in my judgment the landlords are precluded from raising any question of lack of repair in 1954.

In view of the fact that I may be held to be wrong in my interpretation of the main clause, and in view of the fact that if I am wrong the tenant would have to rely upon a notice to exercise the option given by him on February 20, 1958, in which event the question as to repair would become very material, I think it is my duty to express a view both about the interpretation of the proviso to the clause and also about the facts arising thereunder.

Once again a word is used in the proviso which is not usually found in leases, and counsel have been unable to find any authority to assist in its interpretation. The proviso is not that the tenant must have fulfilled the covenants in the lease, but that the tenant must have reasonably fulfilled the covenants in the lease. Two interpretations of the word "reasonably" have been put before me. Mr. Plume, for the landlords, says that the word governs "fulfilled" and, therefore, one starts with the fact that the tenant must fulfil his obligations under the lease. The result is, says Mr. Plume, that before the tenant can extend his lease he must show that he has done that work which would be necessary to fulfil the covenant. If he has done that work, then the word "reasonably" comes into play and the landlords may not be able to complain if the work is not quite up to the standard necessary strictly to fulfil the covenant. Mr. Plume has referred me to Finch v. Underwood[4] and Robinson v. Thames Mead Park Estate Ltd.,[5] both of which cases point out that the onus of showing that the proviso has been strictly fulfilled before the option is exercised is on the tenant who exercises it. Mr. Hirst, on the other hand, says that that is not the right way of looking at the matter. The insertion of the word "reasonably" means that the parties have agreed that the tenant may exercise his option provided that he has behaved as a reasonable tenant might have behaved in relation to his covenants. The difference between the two points of view may best be illustrated in this way. It may well be necessary, in order to keep the premises in good and substantial repair, to repaint the premises every three years, or, indeed, at even shorter intervals, but a reasonably minded tenant might well come to the conclusion that the premises will come to no harm if the repainting is left over for a further year. In those circumstances, could a tenant exercise his option halfway through the fourth year? Mr. Hirst would say, Yes; Mr. Plume would say, No. I have come to the conclusion that Mr. Hirst is right, and that by inserting the word "reasonably" the parties not only intended to mean, but must be deemed to have meant, that the tenant can exercise his option provided that he behaves during his tenancy in a way in which a reasonably minded tenant might well behave.

v.
BLAXILL.

Paull J.

When the tenant, without prejudice to his contention that the option had already been exercised, served his notice dated February 20, 1958, the landlords had the premises surveyed by Mr. Norman, employed by a firm of surveyors called Dunsmore Bros. As a result of that survey, a schedule of dilapidations was served upon the tenant on March 17, 1958. The landlords contended before me, first, that the condition of the premises when they were so surveyed was such that the tenant certainly had no right to exercise his option in February, 1958; and secondly, that the condition found in 1958 shows that in June, 1954, there must also have been a breach of the covenant to repair. There is no dispute that the work indicated in the schedule was work necessary to be carried out in March, 1958, in order that the tenant should fulfil the full repairing clause in his lease. Mr. Austin, the surveyor called by the tenant, agreed that the schedule was a fair and reasonable one. I am happy to say that this case is one in which the surveyors on both sides have been most reasonable in their evidence, and also in the attitude which they took at the time of the making of the schedule.

If one looks at the schedule in this case, it is clear that the vast majority of it consists of work of redecoration. There are only three or four items of structural repair. Mr. Norman stated in his evidence that, in his view, the tenant had let the premises go, so far as repair was concerned, and that the premises were in a worse condition than he would expect for that type of premises. He drew the conclusion that no redecoration work had been done externally for five to seven years, and internally for, at any rate, two or three years. Mr. Austin, on the other hand, said that his view was that the tenant had taken reasonable steps to maintain the premises within the conception of the purpose for which they were to be used. He disagreed with Mr. Norman about the length of time which had elapsed since decorative work had been done. He took the view that, externally, one window at the back was definitely bad, but that this was because of the condition of the woodwork due to the age of the premises. Indeed, so far as that window is concerned, he advised a new frame, and the tenant put in a new frame. He said that the rest of the exterior looked as though it had been painted comparatively recently, although the weather and the atmosphere had taken toll. He said that his view was that the premises could not be said to have deteriorated during the tenant's tenancy: in other words, that the tenant had acted as a reasonable tenant with regard to his obligations under the covenant.

On the whole, I prefer the evidence of Mr. Austin. I think that Mr. Norman took rather too strict a view, having regard to the type and age of the premises. The tenant struck me as being an extremely honest type of witness, and he assured me that he had repainted the premises, both externally and internally, several times since he became the tenant of the premises. Mr. Plume tried to tie him down as to when these decorations were done, but, rather naturally, the tenant said that they were carried out when he had men to spare to do the work, and he could not tie himself down to precise times, but that he thought that he had decorated the outside within something like six months of the date of the schedule. I am inclined to think that he is wrong with regard to this, but I do think that he has, while he has been the tenant, acted reasonably in fulfilling his obligations to keep the premises in repair.

So far as structural work is concerned, I do not think that I need say more than that the work called for by the schedule was quite small, and that the situation, so far as structural repair is concerned, is that the tenant has done everything a reasonable tenant would do.

It follows from my findings of fact that there is clearly no evidence to show that the tenant was in breach of his covenant to repair in 1954, and, in so far as the onus is upon the tenant to show that he had fulfilled his covenant at that date, he has done so by his evidence. If it is necessary for me to make a finding with regard to the condition of the premises in 1958, I hold that, while at the time of the notice exercising his option the tenant was in breach of his covenant that he should keep the premises in good and substantial repair, to the extent that the work called for by the schedule was reasonably necessary in order strictly to fulfil that covenant, he had reasonably fulfilled the condition upon which he could exercise the option and was, therefore, entitled to exercise the option. As I have indicated, this finding only becomes material if it is found that I am wrong in my interpretation of the main clause. If I am wrong in that interpretation, and if I am wrong in my interpretation of the word "reasonably," then I think that the tenant would fail in this action. For the reasons that I have given, I think that he succeeds, and I shall make the declaration asked for.

GARDNER v. BLAXILL.

Burden of Proof—Parliamentary election—Breach of rules—Whether burden rests on respondent to prove compliance.

Section 16 (3) of the Representation of the People Act, 1949, provides: "No parliamentary election shall be declared invalid by "reason of any act or omission by the returning officer or any "other person in breach of his official duty in connection with the "election or otherwise of the parliamentary elections rules if it "appears to the tribunal having cognisance of the question that the "election was so conducted as to be substantially in accordance with "the law as to elections, and that the act or omission did not affect "its result."

The petitioner alleged and the court found that there had been certain breaches of the Parliamentary Elections Rules during the conduct of a parliamentary election in that (i) in the case of three, or possibly four, voters who did in fact vote no marks were placed against the numbers allotted to them in the register of electors to denote that ballot papers had been received by them, contrary to rule 38 (1) (d); (ii) persons other than those specified in rule 45 (2) attended the counting of the votes; and (iii) persons other than those who had taken the declaration of secrecy required by rule 32 in respect of the election attended the counting of the votes:—

Held, that, notwithstanding the breaches of the rules, the election had been conducted substantially in accordance with the law and the acts or omissions did not affect its result. In deciding these questions under section 16 (3) of the Act of 1949, the court looked at the evidence as a whole and the burden of proof did not rest on the respondent.

PETITION.

A parliamentary election petition, dated October 28, 1959, was presented by Sir Oswald Ernald Mosley, Baronet, who was a candidate for the North Division of Kensington at the general election held on October 8, 1959. The first respondent to the petition, George Henry Roland Rogers, was the candidate returned to Parliament at the election. The second respondent was the returning officer, Arthur Newton McHaffie.

By paragraph 3 of his petition the petitioner stated that in the holding of the election divers illegal practices and breaches of the statutory rules governing the conduct of the election were committed by the returning officer and/or his servants or agents in that: "(i) when numerous persons who were qualified to vote in "the said election did in fact vote therein, no marks were placed "against the numbers allotted to the said persons in the register "of electors to denote that ballot papers had been received by "them.

"(ii) No proper arrangements were made for the transporting "of the ballot boxes and packages from the polling stations to the "place appointed for the count.

"(iii) The returning officer failed to make any or any proper "arrangements for ensuring that the ballot boxes were opened "and/or the votes were counted in the presence of the counting "agents and/or the election agents entitled to be present thereat.

"(iv) The ballot boxes were opened and/or the returning officer "proceeded to count the votes in the absence of counting agents "and/or election agents entitled to be present thereat.

"(v) Persons other than those specified in rule 45 (2) of the "Parliamentary Elections Rules contained in Schedule 2 to the "Representation of the People Act, 1949, attended the counting "of the votes.

"(vi) Persons other than those who had taken the requisite "declaration of secrecy in respect of the said election attended the "counting of the votes."

The petitioner prayed that (a) there might be a scrutiny of the votes recorded as having been cast in the election, and (b) that it might be determined that the first respondent was not duly elected and that his election and return were void.

At the hearing of the petition, the petitioner, who appeared in person, referred to a canvass which had been made in four of the sixteen polling districts by his supporters to inquire whether or not certain electors had actually voted although no marks were placed against their numbers in the register of electors. On the question of the admissibility of evidence of the result of the canvass by the persons who had conducted it, the court ruled that as the election court was not bound by the ordinary rules regarding hearsay evidence, it was open to the petitioner to

The facts are more fully stated in the judgment.

The petitioner appeared in person.

STREATFEILD J. This is an election petition brought by Sir Oswald Mosley, Baronet, who was one of the candidates at the general election for the North Kensington Division. This resulted in the return to Parliament of Mr. Rogers (the first respondent), who received 14,925 votes. Mr. Bulbrook came second with 14,048 votes; Mr. Hydleman came third with 3,118 votes, and Sir Oswald Mosley next with 2,821 votes. In this petition the petitioner alleges a number of illegal practices and breaches of the statutory rules governing the conduct of the election, alleged to have been committed by the returning officer, who is the second respondent to this petition. We have already ruled that there is no case to answer in regard to the matters stated in paragraph 3 (ii), (iii) and (iv) of the petition, although I shall have a word to say presently with regard to one or two of these matters.

The first item of complaint under paragraph 3 (i) of the petition is that there was a breach of rule 38 of the Parliamentary Elections Rules,[1] whereby numerous persons who were qualified to vote in the election did in fact vote therein, but no marks were placed against their numbers in the register of electors to denote that ballot papers had been received by them. It is laid down in the rules that a person tendering himself as a voter must identify himself. He is checked from the register of voters; he is given a ballot paper and the counterfoil is marked with his number on the back in case thereafter it is necessary to have a scrutiny of the vote. He has, or should have, his name ticked off or otherwise struck out in the voting register in order to indicate that he has received a ballot paper, otherwise, of course, there would be a danger that someone might come a second time and might get another ballot paper, perhaps from another clerk at the polling station, and so record his vote twice. The object of the rule is to prevent that danger.

We were told that a number of persons from various polling stations had been interviewed and that some 111 of them had indicated that they had voted; and that there were no marks against their names in the relevant register of electors. We were told that some twenty of such persons were to be called as witnesses. In fact ten of them were called and it transpired that five out of ten had not voted at all—a very good reason for no marks being put against their names. Of the remaining five who did vote, it is, I think, quite clear from examining the register of voters, that one of them did in fact have his name struck out, together with that of his wife. The clerk had obviously struck them both out together, and the mark rather tailed off when it came to this particular voter, but I think it was struck off. Another one of the five was more doubtful, because the name was struck off but the word " stet " was written opposite. The other three were not marked, and they did vote. All of those five witnesses who said that they did vote, voted only once. There is not a shred of evidence that any of them took advantage of the fact, if indeed they knew of the fact, that their names had not been ticked off.

It was a breach of rule 38 (1) (d) of the Parliamentary Elections Rules that, when the ballot papers were delivered to these three witnesses—and possibly to four of them—who in fact recorded their votes, no mark was made against their names in the register of electors. The court has to determine what is the result of that breach.

The section which particularly concerns the court is section 16 of the Representation of the People Act, 1949. Section 16 (3) provides that " No parliamentary election shall be declared invalid " by reason of any act or omission by the returning officer or any " other person in breach of his official duty in connection with the " election or otherwise of the parliamentary elections rules if it " appears to the tribunal having cognisance of the question that " the election was so conducted as to be substantially in accord- " ance with the law as to elections, and that the act or omission " did not affect its result." It seems to me that the election was conducted substantially in accordance with the law, and that the act or omission did not affect the true result. The question of the burden of proof does not, on the strict wording of section 16, really arise. If it did arise it seems that under the wording of the corresponding section of the Ballot Act, 1872, that is section 13, the burden rested upon the respondent: see Islington, West Division Case, Medhurst v. Lough and Gasquet.[2] I think that with the changed wording under section 16 (3) of the Act of 1949 it is for the court to make up its mind on the evidence as a whole whether there was a substantial compliance with the law as to elections or whether the act or omission affected the result.

KENSINGTON NORTH PARLIAMENTARY ELECTION, In re.

Even if the burden rested upon the respondent, speaking for myself I have come to the conclusion that the evidence is all one way. Here, out of a total voting electorate of 34,912 persons who recorded their votes, three or possibly four are shown by the evidence to have voted without having their names marked off on the register, and each of them only voted once. Even if one were to assume in favour of the petitioner that some proportion of the remainder of 111 persons, whom we have not seen, were in somewhat similar case, there does not seem to be a shred of evidence that there was any substantial non-compliance with the provision requiring a mark to be placed against voters' names in the register; and when the only evidence before the court is that the only three, or possibly four, people who are affected by having recorded their votes without having a mark placed against their names, each only voted once, one cannot possibly come to the conclusion that, although there was a breach of the statutory rules, the breach can have had any effect whatever on the result of the election. Even if all the 111 were similarly affected, it could not possibly have affected the result of this election; therefore, as it seems to me, although there was a breach of the sort alleged in paragraph 3 (i) of the petition in that marks were not placed against certain names on the register, I should be prepared to say that there was a substantial compliance with the law in this respect governing elections, and that the omission to place a mark against the names did not affect the result.

The second matter, upon which we have already ruled that there is no case to answer, was the allegation in paragraph 3 (ii) of the petition that no proper arrangements were made for transporting the ballot boxes and papers from the polling stations to the place appointed for the count. The petitioner in his concluding remarks has invited the court, although he bows to its ruling, to include in the recommendations which the court will make to the Speaker of the House of Commons, a recommendation that what he describes as a hiatus should now be filled in. He drew the court's attention to rule 44 of the Parliamentary Elections Rules, which lays down elaborate precautions which are to be taken in the polling stations as to the sealing of ballet boxes. In rule 45 there are also provisions for the returning officer at the other end of the journey to open the ballot boxes, having given notice and given facilities to counting agents to be present during that operation. The petitioner contended that it is a gap in the law that although elaborate precautions are taken before the journey and at the end of the journey, there is no provision for the safeguarding of ballot boxes on the journey itself.

It does appear that formerly it was the law that a police constable should accompany the ballot boxes from the polling station to the place of the count, but Parliament, in its wisdom, repealed the provision with regard to constables. In 1949, the Representation of the People Act received the Royal Assent and there is no provision in that Act for a constable to accompany voting papers. Of course, there is nothing to prevent anyone from conjuring up in his own mind all sorts of hazards and difficulties, which might beset ballot boxes on their way to and from the polling station and the counting place. One can, of course, imagine all sorts ofdangers which may ring them about, but if Parliament, in its wisdom, as lately as 1949 has seen fit to make rules regulating these matters and has not thought it was necessary to enact or to re-enact any requirements that a constable should accompany the ballot boxes, I do not, speaking for myself, feel that it would be correct for this court to recommend Parliament to reconsider that situation, particularly in the present case, because there is no evidence at all that the provisions of rule 44 as to the closing of these ballot boxes and sealing them up in the presence of the polling agents was not fully carried out. There is no evidence at all that the ballot boxes, when they were opened at the place of the count had in any way been tampered with. There is not a shred of evidence from beginning to end that there might have been, or still less that there was, any substitution of some completely different ballot box or boxes with completely false or forged voting papers therein. Of course, as I have said, one can imagine these things if one wants to. One can believe that something like that did happen or did not, and I have no doubt that the petitioner does genuinely believe it. The fact remains that there is not a shred of evidence to support it and he admits that he could not possibly prove it. Under those circumstances this court ruled that there was no case to answer, and having ruled that there was no case to answer, I go further; I do not feel that there is evidence to call for this court to make any special recommendation to Parliament with regard to the future escorting of ballot boxes from the place of the poll to the place of the count.

With regard to paragraph 3 (iii) and (iv) of the petition again we ruled that there was no case to answer. I need not go into those matters now. They concerned simply the question whether proper facilities were given to the counting agents to be present when the poll commenced. As it seems to me, the difficulty which the petitioner pointed out is this: if a counting agent is appointed, who is also a polling agent, or if he is a person who is employed in the constituency rounding up late voters in the last few moments of the poll, of course he cannot be in two places at once and it takes a little time to get to the place of the count. But the plain answer is, that if one desires to attend and one has notice that the count is to begin at nine o'clock or immediately afterwards, one must appoint a counting agent who will be able to be there, and provided that the facilities were given, which, we think, they were, it does not seem that there can be any breach of the rules in those respects, and that is why we ruled that there was no case to answer on paragraph 3 (iii) or (iv) of the petition.

Paragraph 3 (v) and (vi) of the petition can be taken together. They concern the actual proceedings at the count and it is alleged that there was a breach of rule 45 (2) of the Parliamentary Elections Rules in that persons attended the count other than those who were entitled to be present, and it is said that those persons included persons who had not made the requisite declaration of secrecy in respect of the election, and that they attended the counting of the votes at any rate for some part of the time. Rule 45 (2) provides that "no person other than (a) the returning officer and his clerks; (b) the candidates and their wives or husbands; (c) the election agents; (d) the counting agents; may be present at the counting of the votes, unless permitted by the returning officer to attend." There is also provision made by rule 32 that people who do attend must make a declaration of secrecy. In the case of people who are permitted to attend, they can make a declaration of secrecy at the time immediately before they are admitted. In some particulars which were given by the respondents, there are set out eleven categories of persons who did attend the counting of the votes of the North Kensington election. They included people who were clearly entitled to be there under the provisions of rule 45 (2). They also included certain other people who were obviously people who had been given permission to attend. Now those names did not include the name of Mr. Richard, who was the Labour candidate for the South Kensington division. There was also a gentleman called Mr. Rennie who, it appears, was a counting agent for the South Kensington division. The count of the poll of the South Kensington division was also going on in the Kensington Town Hall at the same time, but, of course, in another room, as the count for the North Kensington division, and Mr. Blain, appearing for the returning officer, has admitted that Mr. Richard and Mr. Rennie apparently did attend the count at some time during the period when the count was taking place. Neither of those persons, so far as the court knows, took an oath or made a declaration of secrecy qua the North Kensington division. No doubt they had both done so with regard to the South Kensington division. For my part, I am prepared to assume for these purposes, without having heard full argument from Mr. Blain, that that again was a breach of the rules, inasmuch as two persons, not having been given permission to attend and not having taken the oath of secrecy qua the North Kensington division, apparently were allowed to be present. Whether it was because they were recognised as being persons concerned with the South Kensington division and a policeman on the door inadvertently let them in, I know not, but it is conceded by the petitioner that, even though they were present and were unauthorised and had not made a declaration or taken any oath of secrecy, in fact there was no interference with the count. He does not contend that their mere presence had any effect on the result of the election. Obviously the reason for the rules concerning the persons who are authorised to attend is in order to safeguard the count, so as to make quite sure that only reliable people are there who can be trusted not to walk off with packets of voting papers and so on, but there is not a shred of evidence to suggest—and the petitioner does not contend—that there was anything wrong with the count.

The petitioner says that he would not seek to suggest that the mere presence of those two gentlemen had any effect on the result of the election. Accordingly, with regard to those matters, that is, on the assumption for these purposes that the presence of those two gentlemen constituted a breach of the rules, it appears to me to be inevitable that we must find that, although it was a breach, nevertheless the rules relating to the count were substantially observed and were in accordance, substantially, with the law, and that the act of admitting those people and the omission of the declaration of secrecy did not affect the result of the election.

That brings me to the end of the matters of complaint by the petitioner in this case. For my part, therefore, I come to the conclusion that there is no case to answer on paragraph 3 (ii), (iii) and (iv) of the petition, and with regard to paragraph 3 (i), (v) and (vi), although there was under (i), and there may have been under (v) and (vi), a breach of the rules relating to elections, I have come to the conclusion that there was substantial compliance with the law and rules governing elections, and that none of those acts or omissions affected the result of the election. For those reasons, therefore, I must refuse the remedy which the petitioner has asked for in this case.

SLADE J. I agree.

STREATFEILD J. The court will order that the petition should stand dismissed and in due course we will report. Section 124 (1) of the Act of 1949 provides that "At the conclusion of the trial "of a parliamentary election petition, the election court shall "determine whether the member whose election or return is "complained of, or any and what other person, was duly returned "or elected or whether the election was void, and shall forthwith "certify in writing the determination to the Speaker. . . ." follows, from that that this court themselves determine that Mr. Rogers was duly returned and that there is no other person who should have been returned, and it will be certified to the Speaker accordingly. I ought to add that none of the breaches of the rules are an illegal practice within the meaning of the Act, so that no direction need be given by this court in that respect.

[Plaint No. N. 1557.]

Costs—"Bullock" order—"Bullock" or "Sanderson" order—Discretion of court — County court — Action against three defendants—Judgment against insolvent defendant—Whether unsuccessful defendant should pay costs of successful defendants—Whether plaintiff should pay costs of successful defendants with right to recover from unsuccessful defendant.

Where a plaintiff reasonably brings proceedings against two or more separate defendants and succeeds against one defendant but fails against the others, it is a matter entirely within the judge's discretion whether he makes a Bullock form of order as to costs under which the plaintiff is ordered to pay the costs of the successful defendants and allowed to add those costs to the costs recoverable from the unsuccessful defendant, or a Sanderson form of order under which the unsuccessful defendant is ordered to pay directly the costs of the successful defendants.

The plaintiff and the first defendant were adjoining householders. During the course of repairs to the first defendant's roof, carried out for the first defendant by the second defendant, a builder, the third defendant, a plumber employed as a sub-contractor by the second defendant, trespassed on the plaintiff's roof whereby the plaintiff suffered damage.

In an action against the first two defendants for £20 10s. damages, the second defendant paid £15 into court with a denial of liability, and disclosed to the plaintiff that it was the third defendant who had been on the plaintiff's roof. The plaintiff did not take out the money that had been paid in, but joined the third defendant as a party to the action without any inquiry as to his means. The third defendant was an undischarged bankrupt.

The plaintiff obtained judgment against the third defendant for £20 10s. with costs, but failed in her claim against the first and second defendants. The judge ordered the plaintiff to pay the costs of the first and second defendants and add them to the costs recoverable from the third defendant:—

Held, (Harman L.J. dissenting) (1) that the matter being one entirely within the judge's absolute discretion, which had not been shown to have been improperly exercised, the court could not interfere with his order (post, pp. 778, 779, 783.).

Statement in the Annual Practice (1960), p. 1842 approved.

(2) That even if the Court of Appeal could substitute its discretion for that of the judge, it would make the same order as he did; for the plaintiff joined the third defendant without inquiry, and by proceeding with a four-party action for the sake of £5 10s. incurred costs wholly disproportionate to the amount in issue (post, pp. 781, 783).

Dicta of Jessel M.R. in Rudow v. Great Britain Mutual Life Assurance Society (1881) 17 Ch.D. 600, 607, 610, C.A. explained.

Per Harman L.J. In a case not tried with a jury prima facie the Sanderson form of order should be followed, particularly where the insolvency of the defendant on whom the costs will fall make the injustice to the plaintiff a glaring one (post, p. 776).

APPEAL from Judge Potter, sitting at Bloomsbury County Court.

The following facts are taken substantially from the judgments of Harman and Willmer L.JJ.: Adele Mayer, the plaintiff, and Irving Harte, the first defendant, were next-door neighbours, occupying houses having adjoining roofs with dormer windows in them. These were covered with asphalt. The plaintiff's roof had been recently renewed, but the first defendant's was old and he determined to have it repaired, and for this purpose he employed James Kane, the second defendant, a builder, but instructed the second defendant to recover his part of the roof and dormer with zinc instead of asphalt. For this job the second defendant employed W. J. Brassett, the third defendant, a plumber, and he, apparently after some demur, was instructed by the second defendant to join up the zinc on the first defendant's side with the asphalt on the plaintiff's side by turning back the asphalt and tucking the zinc underneath. This the third defendant did, and in the course of it he trespassed on the plaintiff's roof and pulled the asphalt covering back six inches or so in order to tuck the zinc underneath. This was not a satisfactory job and a leak soon started at the joint, but on the plaintiff's side where her asphalt had been cracked, with the result that water came into her room below. The plaintiff, discovering this in July, 1957, called in her builder, who reported that the roof repairs alone would cost £17 10s. In September, 1957, she wrote to the first defendant complaining of the damage, to which the first defendant replied that he had communicated with his builder, that is to say, the second defendant; for himself he disclaimed all responsibility. Solicitors' letters followed, and a demand was made against the second defendant for £17 10s. and, in addition, £15 for consequential damage to the room below. The plaint was issued on November 5, 1957, against the first and second defendants claiming the sum of £32. The first defendant delivered his defence on November 15, 1957, and on December 9, 1957, the second defendant paid £15 into court with a denial of liability. The plaintiff was ill-advised enough to decline this offer, the reason being that it would have involved paying the first defendant's costs. On January 29, 1958, the particulars of claim were amended, reducing the damages claimed to £20 10s. For some reason which cannot be understood, the second defendant did not deliver his defence until May 2, 1958, when for the first time he disclosed the fact that he had employed the third defendant as a sub-contractor to do the work in question, and pleaded that he was an independent contractor. On July 16, 1958, in response to a request, further and better particulars of the second defendant's defence were delivered, giving information as to the address of the third defendant, and as to the nature of the business which he carried on. The plaintiff, therefore, had every opportunity of ascertaining what sort of man the third defendant was. At this point, the action went to sleep for about a year, but on July 10, 1959, the plaintiff joined the third defendant as a party to the action and delivered reamended particulars of claim claiming damages of £20 10s. against all three defendants. The third defendant, who appeared in person, put in a defence blaming the second defendant, and wrote a letter to the registrar explaining the circumstances as he saw them. There followed cross-notices of contribution between the defendants, and, in the end, the pleadings were far more elaborate than is usual in a High Court action involving half a million pounds.

The action came on for trial on October 19, 1959. The trial was not completed on that day, but was adjourned and finally concluded on November 25, 1959. At the trial, the third defendant, who was known at any rate to the second defendant, though not to the plaintiff, to be a man of straw, appeared in person. Judgment was given on November 25, 1959, in favour of the first and second defendants against the plaintiff on the ground that each of them had employed an independent contractor, but judgment was given in favour of the plaintiff against the third defendant for the amount of the claim, £20 10s., on the ground of trespass.

The judge then awarded costs in favour of the plaintiff against the third defendant on scale 2, and costs in favour of the first and second defendants on scale 3, and made a Bullock form of order, that is, the plaintiff should add to the costs recoverable from the third defendant the costs payable by her to the first and second defendants. The third defendant then disclosed that he was an undischarged bankrupt. There then followed argument as to the form of order to be made in respect of costs, and the judge, after hearing argument, struck out the order that he had originally made. It was contended for the plaintiff that the judge should make a Sanderson form of order (the other type of Bullock order), that is, the third defendant should pay the costs of the first and second defendants, in view of the third defendant's insolvency and the consequent injustice of the plaintiff bearing the whole brunt of the costs. The judge, arguendo, said that he could not take into account the third defendant's bankruptcy when making his order for costs, and that the plaintiff could have searched before joining the third defendant.

No formal judgment on costs was given, the judge making the order that he had originally made, namely, that the plaintiff pay the costs of the first and second defendants and add them to the costs recoverable from the third defendant. The plaintiff appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 1. SELLERS L.J. I will ask Harman L.J. to deliver the first judgment.

HARMAN L.J. stated the facts and continued: After some changes of mind, the judge made what is commonly known as a Bullock order. Bullock v. London General Omnibus Co.[1] was an action tried with a jury, being a claim in tort against two defendants, one of whom was held liable and the other not, and Bray J. ordered that the plaintiff should pay the costs of the successful defendant, but allowed the plaintiff to add these costs to the sum recoverable from the unsuccessful defendant.

When the judge first said he would make such an order, this was the only form of order in such cases that he had in mind. He was, however, reminded by counsel for the plaintiff that there was another form of order more properly called the Sanderson v. Blyth order.[2] No authorities were cited to the judge, but a passage was read to him from the County Court Practice (1959, p. 270) where the position is stated in these words: "Where "defendants are joined or sued alternatively there is power in a "proper case to order an unsuccessful defendant to pay the costs "of a successful one, or to order the plaintiff to pay the costs of a "successful defendant and to add them to his costs against the "unsuccessful defendant." The judge, as so instructed, saw the matter as one on which he could exercise his unfettered discretion either one way or the other, and he chose to exercise it in the Bullock form and not the Sanderson form. It is said, and with much force, that this was an exercise of the discretion as to costs always vested in the judge, and one with which this court cannot interfere.

When, however, the matter is more carefully examined, it appears that the first pronouncement on this subject is that of Jessel M.R. in Rudow v. Great Britain Mutual Life Assurance Society.[3] A passage in the headnote reads: "In cases where "under the old practice in Chancery the court would have ordered "the plaintiff to pay the costs of one defendant and have them "over against another defendant, an order will now be made at "once for the one defendant to pay them to the other." Jessel M.R., in the course of the argument, said[4]: "I think it right "to state, for I have the concurrence of the Lords Justices, that "under the Judicature Acts it is no longer necessary or proper to "order a plaintiff to pay the costs of a defendant and have them "over against another defendant, so that if the second defendant "is insolvent the plaintiff loses them. The proper form of order "now is to order the defendant who is liable to them as between "himself and his co-defendant to pay them to the co-defendant." In the course of his judgment, after speaking of the order which had been made, he said[5]: "The result, therefore, was, that by "virtue of that order the plaintiff became liable to pay Wurth's "costs in full and was to have them over against the company. "The order employed the machinery which was adopted by the "old Court of Chancery and which is no longer either necessary or "useful, but is mischievous, and, as this court has already laid "down today, is no longer to be used." In that case, the company in question was a company in liquidation and, therefore, would not be able to pay costs in any event.

These are strong words. Before the Judicature Act, 1873, it was not permissible to order a party to pay costs to another party on the same side of the record, and the Court of Chancery therefore devised the expedient of ordering the plaintiff to pay one defendant's costs but to add them to his costs recoverable against another defendant. Sir George Jessel M.R. was pointing out that this expedient was no longer necessary since the Judicature Act, 1873, and should no longer be adopted. It was, however, still maintained in actions tried with a jury, having regard to the language of R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 1. This, indeed, is why in Bullock's case[6] there was no discussion as to the exact form of the order, it being a jury case. Jessel M.R. pointed out that the old form of order might be mischievous in a case where a defendant from whom costs were recoverable by a plaintiff was insolvent, as was the respondent company in Rudow's case.[7]

Jessel M.R.'s decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal in Sanderson v. Blyth Theatre Co.,[8] where the headnote reads as follows: "In an action in the King's Bench Division, claiming "relief against the defendants in the alternative, the court has "jurisdiction in a proper case to order the unsuccessful defendant "to pay the costs of the successful defendant, or to order the "plaintiff to pay the costs of the successful defendant and then "to add those costs to the costs which the unsuccessful defendant "is ordered to pay to the plaintiff." The leading judgment was delivered by Romer L.J. and he pointed out that it is, of course, a matter in which the judge has a discretion. He said this in one passage[9]: "The modern practice, in order to avoid circuity, has "been in such cases, where there has been no jury, to order the "unsuccessful defendant to pay directly to the successful defen-"dant his costs: se Rudow v. Great Britain Mutual Life Assur-"ance Society.[10] But, of course a judge has jurisdiction to follow "the old practice if he thinks fit to do so, and ought to do so "when necessary, as, for example, when, having regard to "Order LXV, rule 1, difficulties would otherwise arise by reason "of the trial being with a jury." Stirling L.J. carried the matter somewhat further. He said[11]: "Now in suits where persons "were made defendants for the purpose of complying with the "rule just stated, the Court of Chancery had full jurisdiction, "when disposing of a suit on its merits, to deal with the costs of "such parties and to decide by whom they should be borne. If "the court was of opinion that their costs ought to be borne by a "co-defendant, the ordinary practice was to direct the plaintiff to "pay them in the first instance, and then to add them to his own, "and to have them over against the defendant who was to bear "them. . . . Where, however, a suit was instituted by the "Attorney-General ex officio, the practice was different, for, as "the Attorney-General could not be ordered to pay costs, costs "were ordered to be paid directly by one defendant to another. ". . . After the Judicature Acts came into operation this practice "was altered by the Court of Appeal in Rudow v. Great Britain "Mutual Life Assurance Society,[12] and it was laid down that "the proper form of order was to order the defendant liable to "costs as between himself and his co-defendant to pay them to "the co-defendant. Jessell M.R. said that the machinery which "had been adopted by the Court of Chancery was no longer "either necessary or useful, but was mischievous. I understand "this to mean that it was no longer necessary, because under "the Judicature Acts and rules the court had full power to "order one defendant to pay costs to another, and that it was "mischievous because the plaintiff who was ordered to pay costs "in the first instance, and then to have them over against a "defendant, ran the risk of losing them if the defendant proved "to be insolvent. The change of practice appears to me, if I "may be allowed to say so, to be perfectly proper, and I think "that the new practice ought to be adhered to wherever it is "practicable to do so."

No doubt these last pronouncements were obiter dicta because, the case being a jury case, the judgment of Grantham J. in the Bullock form was approved. Nevertheless, the two cases in the Court of Appeal seem to me to lay it down that, in a case not tried with a jury, prima facie the Sanderson form of order should be followed, and that this is particularly so where the insolvency of the defendant on whom the costs will fall makes the injustice to the plaintiff a glaring one. It is unfortunate that in the note to R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 1, in the Annual Practice (1960), p. 1842, under the heading of "Co-defendants," where this matter is discussed, it is stated that it is the plaintiff's insolvency that matters, and Rudow's case [12] is cited for that proposition. This appears merely to be the usual mistake of writing "plaintiff" for "defendant."

The practice also appears to be followed in the Admiralty Division—as witness the judgment of Bargrave Deane J. in The Esrom and the Hopper Wills No. 66.[13] Besterman v. British Motor Cab Co. Ltd.[14] shows that it is not necessary to justify such an order that one defendant should blame another. "it is" (says the headnote) "a question in all cases whether it was a "reasonable and proper course for the plaintiff to join both the "defendants in the action." Besterman's case [14] was cited in Hong v. A. & R. Brown Ltd.,[15] which shows that the practice was still followed at that date. The headnote in the latter case reads in these terms: "Where a plaintiff reasonably brings pro-"ceedings against two separate defendants and fails against the "one but succeeds against the other, there is no rule of law "compelling the judge to make a Bullock order under which the "unsuccessful defendant is ordered to pay the successful defen-"dant's costs. That is a matter within the judge's discretion "and having regard to the Judicature Act . . . no appeal will lie ". . . unless it can be established that the judge has failed to "exercise any real discretion, because either he failed to act "judicially or had purported to exercise his discretion without "the proper materials on which to exercise it."

Both Romer L.J.'s judgment [16] (which I have cited) and the headnote to the last-cited case show that the judge has a discretion in the matter, as indeed is always the case in questions of costs, but this discretion, like all others, must be exercised in a judicial manner and all proper circumstances must be taken into account.

Turning back to the present case, the judge could only decide to make a Bullock order, whether in one form or the other, on the footing that the plaintiff was justified in bringing both the first and second defendants before the court even though he had not succeeded against them. It must also mean that he had decided that it was just that the third defendant ought to bear, whether directly or indirectly, the costs of his co-defendants. There is no appeal on either of these two points. If all the parties were solvent it would not much matter in which form the order was couched; the eventual result would be the same and in such a case the advantage of making the Sanderson form of order is confined to avoiding circuity, as Romer L.J. said; but directly it turns out that the third defendant is an insolvent person the Bullock form of order will work a great injustice to the plaintiff, who not only recovers nothing from the third defendant but has to pay the costs of the first and second defendants and is thus very far out of pocket though she had a good cause of action. This, it seems to me, is why both Jessel M.R.[17] and Stirling L.J.[18] pointed out that the insolvency of the defendant to be made liable is the strongest reason for making the order in the Sanderson form. No doubt this will in itself produce some injustice to the first and second defendants, who are successful litigants and will have to bear their own costs, but they were each of them at least indirectly responsible for the wrong done to the plaintiff and should therefore suffer rather than she.

Here the judge did not have the cases cited to him, and he was evidently unaware that the Court of Appeal had twice indicated the proper practice. Moreover, he expressly refused to take into account the third defendant's bankruptcy, which is the very circumstance to which he was by the authorities directed to have regard, and this seems to me altogether to vitiate the exercise of his discretion. I cannot but think that if the cases had been put before him he must have arrived at the conclusion that this is eminently a case for a Sanderson order and that this was the order which he would have made.

I, therefore, would allow the appeal.

WILLMER L.J. I confess that I have found the present case one of no little difficulty, and I have not found it easy to make up my mind which way our decision should go. The plaintiff and the first and second defendants are "innocent" parties, in the sense that they have all vindicated their respective rights. The question to be determined is which of these innocent parties is the one who ought to suffer from the unfortunate fact of the third defendant's insolvency.

By her notice of appeal, the plaintiff put forward the contention that the judge had erred on a question of legal principle. The principle alleged to have been violated is that said to have been laid down by Jessel M.R., with the concurrence of the other members of the Court of Appeal, in Rudow v. Great Britain

MAYER v. HARTE.
Willmer L.J.

Mutual Life Assurance Society[19]: see his statement in the course of the argument,[20] repeated in substance in his judgment.[21] My Lord has already read the passages referred to, and I do not, therefore, pause to read them again. The circumstances that have arisen in the present case, it is contended, are precisely those envisaged by Jessel M.R. It is, accordingly, argued that his direction as to how the costs ought to be borne in such a case (namely, that the successful defendants should recover their costs direct from the unsuccessful defendant) is one which ought to be followed, especially as no case can be found in which any adverse comment has since been made upon what was said by Jessel M.R. in Rudow's case. Reliance was also placed on Sanderson v. Blyth Theatre Co.,[22] and, more particularly, on the judgment of Stirling L.J.,[23] where he said that the practice laid down by Jessel M.R. in Rudow's case is one that "ought to be adhered "to wherever it is practicable to do so."

I find it impossible to extract from these cases any inflexible principle which requires that, in a case such as the present, the judge must necessarily direct that the successful defendants shall recover their costs direct from the unsuccessful defendant. Any such principle would be contrary to the decision of the House of Lords in Donald Campbell & Co. Ltd. v. Pollak,[24] whereby it was laid down once and for all that costs are in the absolute and unfettered discretion of the court, subject only to the requirement that the discretion must be judicially exercised. It is to be remarked, moreover, that the actual decision in Sanderson's case,[25] as appears from the headnote, was to the effect that the court has jurisdiction either to order the unsuccessful defendant to pay the successful defendant's costs direct, or to order the plaintiff to pay the successful defendant's costs and add them to the costs which the unsuccessful defendant is ordered to pay to the plaintiff. Romer L.J., who gave the leading judgment, made it clear[26] (in the passage which my Lord has already read) that the matter is one for the discretion of the court. I should be content to adopt the statement contained in the note in the Annual Practice (1960), p. 1842, which is in the following terms: ". . . the court has a discretion to order the unsuccessful defen- "dant to pay the successful defendant's costs. This it may do "either by ordering payment of these costs direct by the unsuc- "cessful to the successful defendant, or by ordering the plaintiff "to pay the latter's costs, and allowing him to include these "costs in the costs payable to him by the unsuccessful defendant. "Each of these two forms of order is commonly known as a "Bullock order (from Bullock v. London General Omnibus Co.[27]). "Where the plaintiff may be insolvent, the first-mentioned order

"is generally the more appropriate." As authority for the last proposition the statement of Jessel M.R. in Rudow's case [28] is, perhaps rather inappropriately, cited. But I do not think the proposition is any the less correct for that.

In these circumstances I cannot regard the present case as raising any question of principle, and this much was eventually conceded, or virtually conceded, by Mr. Wilmers in the course of his argument for the plaintiff. The real question is whether it can be shown that the judge failed to exercise judicially the discretion which was undoubtedly his. If he did so fail, the further question would arise as to what order should now be made by this court. In exercising his discretion as to costs it was without doubt the duty of the judge to take into consideration all the circumstances of the litigation. One of those circumstances was the fact of the insolvency of the third defendant—a fact which was known to the second defendant before trial, but of which the plaintiff was unaware. If it can be shown that the judge completely ignored this fact, and wholly omitted to take it into consideration, there would, I think, be good ground for concluding that he did not exercise his discretion judicially. The position is somewhat unsatisfactory, because the record of what took place at the trial—for which we are indebted to the note made by counsel for the plaintiff—is necessarily scanty, and the judge appears to have given no reasons for the decision at which he ultimately arrived. The record shows, however, that during the course of the argument the judge did say that he could not take into account the third defendant's bankruptcy when making his order for costs. This observation has not unnaturally been seized upon by the plaintiff as showing that the judge failed to exercise his discretion judicially. It was, however, merely an observation made during the argument, and it is an observation that is not altogether free from ambiguity. The judge may have meant no more than that he could not regard the third defendant's bankruptcy as such an overriding consideration as would force him to make the order for which the plaintiff asked. Mr. Halpern has told us that, according to his recollection, the judge did in fact weigh up the risks of loss in relation to the recovery of costs due to the third defendant's insolvency, and decided that those risks ought more fairly to fall upon the plaintiff than upon the successful defendants. Mr. Halpern says that he did not understand the judge to be ruling out of consideration altogether the fact of the third defendant's insolvency.

In this rather unsatisfactory state of affairs, I cannot say I am satisfied that the judge failed to give any consideration whatsoever to the fact of the third defendant's insolvency. If he did take it into consideration, the weight that he attached to it would be a matter entirely for his discretion. Even if we, or any of us, sitting in this court were disposed to attach a greater degree of weight to this particular circumstance, that would not be a sufficient ground for interfering with an order made in the exercise of the judge's discretion.

MAYER v. HARTE.

That is sufficient to dispose of this appeal. But in case I am wrong, and if it be the fact that the judge did refuse to take into account at all the third defendant's insolvency, then the position, as I see it, would be that it would be for this court to consider the whole of the circumstances de novo, and arrive at its own conclusion as to how the discretion as to costs ought to be exercised. I have thought it right, therefore, to consider the matter from this point of view, and I have come to the conclusion that in the particular circumstances of the present case the right order to make would, in any event, be that which the judge did make. In coming to this conclusion I have not, I hope, underrated the strength of the argument that can be, and has been, put forward on behalf of the plaintiff. It is, no doubt, a circumstance of great significance that the judge did see fit to make some form of Bullock order. It is a necessary inference from this circumstance that the judge was satisfied that the plaintiff was justified in continuing the action against all three defendants. Why, then, should she be in effect deprived of the fruits of her victory by the misfortune of the third defendant's insolvency, which was no concern of hers? So far as the plaintiff was concerned, it was the first and second defendants between them who selected the third defendant to do the work upon the roof which caused the damage. Having thus, as it were, brought him on the scene, why should not they bear the risk of loss consequent upon his insolvency?

These are, no doubt, powerful considerations, but they do not by any means include all the circumstances that should be considered. When regard is had to the history of this unfortunate litigation, and to the amount at stake, there are, in my judgment, even more powerful reasons for concluding that the risk of loss consequent upon the third defendant's insolvency should be borne by the plaintiff rather than by either of the successful defendants. [His Lordship set out the facts relating to the history of the action and continued:] The position was that at any time after July 16, 1958 (that is, during a period of 15 months before trial), the plaintiff could have found out for herself that the third defendant was not a man of substance. At any time after December 9, 1957, she could have had £15 without incurring any further risk as to costs. Yet, for the sake of £5 10s., she elected to go on with what was bound to be an expensive piece of litigation against three defendants, one of whom (as she could have ascertained) was not a man of substance. That she was legally entitled to pursue her remedy and exact her full pound of flesh cannot be doubted. It cannot be said that her action was an abuse of the process of the court, for it was proved in the event that she was entitled to her £20 10s. But equally the first and second defendants were entitled to defend themselves against a claim which the event proved to be unjustified as against them. Prima facie, having successfully resisted the plaintiff's unjustified claim, they could expect to be able to look to the plaintiff for the payment of their costs. The plaintiff, as dominus litis, called the tune, and the innocent defendants could but dance to it.

In my judgment, the plaintiff, having for the sake of £5 10s. elected to invoke the costly machinery of a four-party contested action, without apparently making any inquiry as to the financial standing of the defendant against whom she succeeded, took the risk both of incurring herself, and of exposing other innocent parties to, costs which were only too likely to be irrecoverable, and which would in any case exceed by many times the amount at stake in the action. In these circumstances, if the matter were one for my discretion, I should be disposed to make the same order with regard to the costs as was made by the judge. On this ground also, therefore, in my judgment, this appeal should be dismissed.

SELLERS L.J. My Lords have stated the facts and the issues fully and clearly; and as I find my brethren at variance as to the result of this appeal, it remains for me briefly to add my own conclusion on the matters involved.

Since I have sat in this court, I have observed that no issue seems to excite quite such vigour and duration of argument as an issue of costs on appeal. Unfortunately, in the present case, as in Hanak v. Green,[29] the costs of so elaborate a discussion outweigh too far the amount in issue in the action.

In such circumstances as have arisen here, if no question of the insolvency of any party (including the plaintiff) arises, it has long been the practice for a judge in his discretion to make one of the two orders set out in the headnote to Sanderson v. Blyth Theatre Co.,[30] which Harman L.J. has already read. The main dispute on appeal in Sanderson's case was whether there was jurisdiction in the court to order the payment at all by the unsuccessful defendant of the costs of the successful defendant. Romer L.J.[31] made an interlocutory remark to the effect that "such an "order is constantly made in the Chancery Division." Both the orders approved in Sanderson are nowadays frequently referred to, it appears, as Bullock orders, from Bullock v. London General Omnibus Co.[32] That was an action in tort tried by a jury, and judgment was entered for the plaintiff against the first defendant, and judgment for the successful defendant against the plaintiff, with costs in each case; and the judgment further ordered that the costs so payable by the plaintiff to the successful defendant should be included in the costs recoverable from the first defendant. Unless my recollection is very faulty, that order to recover over was always referred to—and it seems accurately—as a

Bullock order. It was the same kind of order as was in fact made by Grantham J. in Sanderson,[33] a case with a jury, but as Sanderson, while upholding the order made, stated that a direct order could now be made, the direct order used to be referred to as the Sanderson order in contradistinction to the Bullock order.

Either of these orders was in the entire discretion of the judge, who most frequently was guided by counsel as to which the parties preferred or which was most convenient. If there were a likelihood of an appeal between a plaintiff and an unsuccessful defendant without either party contemplating or wishing to appeal in respect of a successful defendant, the true Bullock order was the more desirable as there would then be no need for the unsuccessful defendant to bring a co-defendant before the appellate court to rid himself of a direct liability for the costs of that defendant.

As these two forms of order have stood for over 50 years, and have been regularly applied as alternatives in a judge's discretion, I cannot think that they can be disturbed now, whichever order the judge thinks fit to make. It may well be, as counsel stated, that under modern conditions with defendants so often covered by insurance, the direct order has become the more common. But, as I have said, it is undesirable in some circumstances where an appeal is contemplated.

It is said now that the direct order must be made as a matter of legal principle if it is found that an unsuccessful defendant is insolvent or an undischarged bankrupt. Reliance has been placed on the judgment of Jessel M.R. in Rudow v. Great Britain Mutual Life Assurance Society,[34] which had been relied upon in Sanderson's case[35] as justifying a direct order between defendants "in order to avoid circuity," as appears in the extract from the judgment of Romer L.J.[36] already cited in the judgment of Harman L.J. The main contest in Rudow[37] was whether only the old order could be made—that is, to order a plaintiff to pay a successful defendant's costs and that the plaintiff should recover those costs against the unsuccessful defendant—or whether a direct order could be made. The court decided that an order could be made at the trial for one defendant to pay costs to the other direct. In the course of the argument Jessel M.R.[38] made the observation to which my Lord has referred in his judgment as a strong pronouncement. But it is significant, in my view, that the matter of insolvency of one of the parties affecting the other is referred to as a consequence of the order, and so indeed it can be, if that order can be made, a matter to be taken into consideration. A passage from the judgment of Stirling L.J. in the Sanderson case[39] has also been read and I do not repeat it. In my view, his judgment as a whole does not treat this as a principle of law or an obligation which it is imperative for the judge to invoke. I would regard what was said by Jessel M.R. as a guide, not a rule—certainly, if there were any doubt, after the decision and pronouncement of the House of Lords in Donald Campbell & Co. Ltd. v. Pollak.[40]

No cases were cited to us (I invited counsel to cite if possible), and I know of none where the observations of Jessel M.R.[41] as far back as 1881 have been applied, either as a matter of obligation or of discretion. The observation in the Annual Practice may be, as my Lords think, a slip, and indeed it is not strictly accurate, but it seems to me to be a more appropriate application of the direct order than in the case of an insolvent unsuccessful defendant. The passage in the Annual Practice (1960), p. 1842, is: "Where the plaintiff may be insolvent, the first-mentioned "order [that is, a direct order] is generally the more appropriate" —and of course for obvious reasons if the order for costs would have to go through an insolvent plaintiff.

The first and second defendants in the present case were sued and successfully resisted the claim. The plaintiff can apparently pay their costs. She seeks to avoid that and asks for an order which probably would mean that the costs would not be paid. Why the successful defendants should be the losers and not the unsuccessful plaintiff I cannot see, and I would agree, if discretion lies in this court, with the views of Willmer L.J., as I do with his views generally in his judgment, but, like him, I think the matter was entirely for the judge and that the judge has not erred in law.

The appeal, therefore, will be dismissed.

By section 330 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, as amended by section 16 (1) of the Mental Treatment Act, 1930, no proceedings shall be brought against any person doing anything in pursuance of the Act of 1890, or the amending Acts, except with the leave of the High Court, which is to be refused unless the court is "satisfied "that there is substantial ground for the contention that the person ". . . has acted . . . without reasonable care."

The plaintiffs applied for leave to bring proceedings against J., a duly authorised officer of a local authority, who had removed the second plaintiff, Mrs. B., to a mental hospital against her will under the emergency procedure contained in section 20 of the Lunacy Act, 1890 [1] (as substituted). In January, 1959, Mrs. B. became mentally ill as a result of domestic troubles, and on January 9 her medical adviser decided that she ought to go to hospital for observation and treatment. He informed J. that he should visit Mrs. B. as soon as possible. J. called the next day and found her in a distressed condition. The doctor arrived later. As Mrs. B. refused to go to hospital voluntarily, J., with the doctor's agreement, had her removed compulsorily to the hospital, where she remained for four days and was then discharged.

The plaintiffs sought to proceed against J. (and the hospital management committee) on the ground that J. had acted without reasonable care in deciding whether there was reasonable ground for believing that Mrs. B. was a person of unsound mind. The affidavit evidence before the court at the hearing of the application contained no allegation that Mrs. B. was of unsound mind and it was not suggested that either of the defendants had at any time said so. Leave to bring the action was given and J. appealed:—

Held, that the proper exercise of the compulsory power was dependent on whether the defendants had had reasonable grounds, as required by section 14 (1) (a) of the Act of 1890,[1] for believing that Mrs. B. was a person of unsound mind. There were substantial grounds for the contention that J. had acted without reasonable care in failing to apply his mind to the requirements of section 14 (1) (a) (post, pp. 788, 796), and leave to proceed against him should, accordingly, be given.

Per Ormerod L.J. Semble, the term "unsound mind" is now used in the Acts in reference to persons in regard to whom the word "lunatic" would hitherto have been used (post. p. 788).

Decision of Thesiger J. affirmed.

APPEAL from Thesiger J.

The appeal was brought by the first of two defendants, one Eric M. Jayne, against an order of Thesiger J. made on January 21, 1960, giving leave to a Mr. and Mrs. Buxton to institute an action against the defendant and against the South West Middlesex Hospital Management Committee. The hospital management committee did not appeal. At all material times the defendant was the duly authorised officer of the local health authority and the complaint related to his conduct in removing the second proposed plaintiff, Mrs. Buxton (hereinafter called the "patient"), to a mental hospital in purported pursuance of the provisions of section 20 of the Lunacy Act, 1890.

The following statement of facts is taken substantially from the judgment of Ormerod L.J.: It appeared from the affidavits that the patient was a woman of 57 years of age, living with her husband and family at 21, Glamis Crescent, Hayes. It is clear that at the end of the year 1958 there were unfortunate differences between the patient and her son. The son was determined to marry a girl regarded by the patient as unsuitable. As a result of these differences of opinion and consequent arguments there is no doubt that the patient became emotionally upset, and on Tuesday, January 6, 1959, the husband called in the doctor, who examined the patient and prescribed rest in bed and sleeping tablets. It appears from the affidavits that the sleeping tablets were not very effective and on the following nights the patient slept restlessly. Matters came to a head on the following Saturday morning when, according to the evidence of the patient, after a perfectly normal night she had a further dispute with her son at about 8.30 a.m. As a result she was very much upset, and she cried for a time and felt faint, so that her son telephoned for the doctor to come. He was unable to come at once, but about 11 a.m. the defendant arrived and, according to the patient,

"under this Act, or any Act, amending this Act, or has done anything in pursuance of this Act, or any Act amending this Act, he shall not be liable to any civil or criminal proceedings whether on the ground of want of jurisdiction or on any other ground unless he has acted in bad faith or without reasonable care.

"(2) No proceedings, civil or criminal, shall be brought against any person in any court in respect of any such matter as is mentioned in the last preceding subsection, without the leave of the High Court, and leave shall not be given unless the court is satisfied that there is substantial ground for the contention that the person, against whom it is sought to bring the proceedings, has acted in bad faith or without reasonable care."

produced "some kind of warrant card" and insisted that she should go to hospital. She protested that she did not want to go, and eventually the defendant left the house, to return about 12.15 with the doctor. There were further protests but eventually three ambulance men entered the room and she allowed herself to be led outside the house where she was put into an ambulance and taken to the West Middlesex Hospital, Isleworth, and placed in an observation ward. This account as given by the patient was substantially confirmed by her husband and daughter.

The defendant in his affidavit gave his version of what happened that morning. He said that when he went into the room where the patient was she was "shouting and screaming to "such an extent that it was quite impossible to carry on normal "conversation with her. She was obviously greatly disturbed and "acting in a quite abnormal manner and was highly excited." He added that it was quite clear to him that for her own protection removal to hospital was the only sensible and proper step as she could be looked after there but could no longer be properly cared for at her home. He said that he thought that she was in real danger unless she was removed to a place where proper care could be given to her.

The patient was discharged from the hospital on January 14 after the magistrate had refused to make a reception order.

At the hearing of the application for leave to bring an action against the two defendants, affidavits were filed which indicated a conflict of evidence on many points, some of which are referred to in the judgment of Devlin L.J. The judge did not state any opinion on these disputed matters but decided that there was substantial ground for the contention that the defendant had acted without reasonable care, and he, accordingly, gave leave to bring the action.

before the duly authorised officer can act there must be a person alleged to be of unsound mind with regard to whom it is his duty to take any proceedings under the Act, and he, the officer, must be satisfied that it is necessary for the public safety or the welfare of that person that such person should be placed under immediate care and control. In considering who is a person with regard to whom it is the duty of the officer to take proceedings under the Act regard must be had to sections 14 and 15. It is unnecessary to consider section 15 here as it deals with matters outside the scope of this appeal. [His Lordship read section 14 (1) (a) and (b) and continued:] It follows, therefore, that before the provisions of section 20 can come into operation the duly authorised officer must (1) have reasonable ground for believing that a person is of unsound mind and a proper person to be sent to a mental hospital, and (2) be satisfied that he is not under proper care and control.

[His Lordship read section 330 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, as amended by section 16 (1) of the Mental Treatment Act, 1930, and continued:] It will be seen that leave will not be given unless the court is satisfied that there is substantial ground for the contention that the person against whom it is sought to bring the proceedings, in this case the duly authorised officer, has acted in bad faith or without reasonable care. There is no suggestion here of bad faith, and the question therefore which the judge had to decide, and which he decided in the affirmative, was whether there was substantial ground for the contention that the defendant had acted without reasonable care.

It is clear from the authorities that under section 20 it is only necessary that the duly authorised officer should be honestly satisfied that it was necessary for the public safety or the patient's welfare that she should be removed to a place of safety. It is not necessary that there should be reasonable grounds for his opinion: see Harward v. Hackney Union Guardians of the Poor.[1] But that is not the position under section 14. Under that section the officer must have reasonable ground for believing that the patient is a person of unsound mind, and therefore the question has to be considered whether he acted with reasonable care.

It was contended on behalf of the plaintiff that there could be no reasonable ground on the evidence before the court for belief that the patient was of unsound mind, and in these circumstances there was substantial ground for the contention that the defendant had acted without reasonable care. The evidence before the court was contained in a number of affidavits sworn by the plaintiffs and their daughter and by the defendant and Dr. Singer and his wife. Dr. Singer was at the relevant time the medical attendant to the patient. [His Lordship stated the facts set out above and continued:]

defendant and the doctor which were disputed by the husband plaintiff. The defendant said that he explained the procedure to the husband, who was quite satisfied that the course being taken was the right one. He also said that the husband told him that the trouble had been going on since 2 a.m. These matters were denied by the husband, who said that he had had little or no conversation with either the defendant or Dr. Singer. The doctor in his affidavit said that he saw the husband on the Friday and explained to him the necessity of calling in the duly authorised officer, but this the husband denied.

The judge formed the view that on the affidavits, without coming to any conclusion as to the truth of the matters in dispute, there was substantial ground for the contention that the defendant had acted without reasonable care. I have come to the same conclusion. The defendant did, I think, establish in his affidavit that he was satisfied that it was necessary for the welfare of the patient that she should be placed under immediate care, but there is nowhere in his affidavit any evidence that she was alleged to have been of unsound mind. Further, although he described her condition as "greatly disturbed" and "highly excited," he does not say that he had reasonable ground for believing that the patient was of unsound mind or that in fact he did so believe. It is to be noted that although the doctor was present when the patient was taken away, he does not appear to have expressed the view to the defendant or anyone else that she was of unsound mind, and in his affidavit he goes no further than to say: "I "formed the clear opinion that Mrs. Buxton required observation "and psychiatric treatment and skilled attention which clearly "she could not get if she remained at home." Mr. Wilmers argued on behalf of the defendant that as he was called in to see the patient he was entitled to assume that she was alleged to be of unsound mind, and that he must be taken in the circumstances to have had reasonable grounds for belief that she was of unsound mind at the time. Whether the defendant acted without reasonable care is a matter to be decided at the trial of the action. But it does not appear necessarily to follow that because a person is in a highly excited condition, or a condition of considerable emotional upset, such a person is of unsound mind. There is no definition in the Mental Treatment Act, 1930, of the term "of unsound mind," but it is to be noted that section 20 (5) provides that the word "lunatic" shall cease to be used in relation to persons of unsound mind, and that expressions such as "person of unsound mind," "patient of unsound mind" or other similar expressions should be used. It would appear, therefore, that the term "of unsound mind" is now used in the Acts in reference to persons in regard to whom the word "lunatic" would hitherto have been used.

I have come to the conclusion that the appeal should be dismissed. There is, in my judgment, substantial ground for the contention that the defendant acted without reasonable care.

There are disputes on questions of fact which cannot be satisfactorily resolved by evidence on affidavit, and there is above all the question whether the defendant had reasonable ground for the belief that the patient was of unsound mind, or indeed whether he ever directed his mind to the question. These questions are substantial ones which can only be determined satisfactorily by hearing the evidence, and I am satisfied that this is a case where leave to proceed should be given.

DEVLIN L.J. The matter before us is an application by Mr. and Mrs. Buxton under section 330 (2) of the Lunacy Act, 1890, for leave to bring proceedings against the defendant, who was at the material time the duly authorised officer employed by the Middlesex County Council under the Lunacy and Mental Treatment Acts, 1890 to 1930. They complain of the act of the defendant on January 10, 1959, in causing the patient to be removed against her will to the West Middlesex Hospital, Isleworth, which is an institution for persons of unsound mind.

It appears that in January, 1959, there were troubles in the plaintiffs' family to which it is unnecessary to give any further publicity. They were such as might cause a woman of no more than average sensibility to be deeply distressed, and the patient, I should judge, is more prone to emotional upsets than most women. It is clear that she made herself ill over the whole affair. She was seen by her doctor, Dr. Singer, on January 6, and he prescribed a nerve tonic and sedative tablets. There is a conflict of evidence as to what happened after that. According to the doctor, on the evening of January 9 the husband came to see him and said that his wife was exhibiting persistently violent behaviour and that his, the husband's, health had suffered owing to lack of sleep. The husband denies that there was any conversation of this sort. It is at any rate clear that the doctor decided on January 9 that it would be best to send the patient into hospital for observation and treatment. It is clear that by hospital he meant a mental hospital; and it is clear also that he decided to call in the duly authorised officer.

Entry into a mental hospital can be obtained in one of two ways. Any person who is desirous of submitting himself to treatment for mental illness and who makes a written application for the purpose may be received as a voluntary patient under the Mental Treatment Act, 1930, s. 1. A person who is not so willing and who is not merely suffering from mental illness but is also of unsound mind may have made against him a reception order under the Lunacy Act, 1890. A reception order may be made by a justice of the peace under section 16 of the Act of 1890 after the person alleged to be of unsound mind has been brought before him and after he has taken the steps and made the inquiries prescribed by the section. One of the ways in which a person alleged to be of unsound mind can be brought before the justice for this purpose is by the action of a duly authorised officer under section 14 of the Act. This section plays an important part in the argument. [His Lordship read the section and continued:] It will be seen that under this section there may be a short delay in bringing the patient before a justice; and there is therefore another section, section 20, which is of equal importance in this case, which provides for urgent cases. [His Lordship read section 20, as amended, and continued:] Thus the duly authorised officer is a person who is authorised to initiate proceedings which can lead to the making of a compulsory order. Whether he has any part to play in the case of a voluntary patient does not appear from the affidavits; he has no statutory duty but it may be that in practice he is the person who makes the necessary arrangements. It would be surprising if, before seeing his patient again, the doctor had made up his mind that a compulsory order was necessary; but on the material we have I do not think that it is possible to say whether or not he intended the duly authorised officer to act compulsorily.

What is certain is that on the morning of January 10 the defendant as the duly authorised officer went to the plaintiffs' house. He had at that time no information from the doctor except a message that the doctor wanted him to visit the patient as soon as possible. Earlier that morning the patient had had a conversation with her son which had upset her considerably. According to her account, which is generally supported by other members of the family, she was, when the defendant arrived, in a distressed condition, sitting in an armchair in the sitting room and being comforted by her husband. According to the defendant's affidavit, her husband appeared to be holding her down in the chair and she was shouting and screaming to such an extent that normal conversation was impossible. He said further, which is denied, that the husband told him that this sort of behaviour had been going on since 2 a.m. After about half an hour during which, the defendant says, the patient remained in the same state, the doctor arrived. The doctor told the defendant that he had already seen the patient on January 6, when he found her greatly distressed and subject to emotional outbursts. The patient was asked to sign the application form as a voluntary patient and refused to do so. With the doctor's agreement the defendant summoned an ambulance and had her removed to hospital. She remained there until January 14, when she was discharged because the magistrate refused to make a reception order.

This is a very cursory account of what took place on the morning of January 10 and omits many matters about which there is a conflict of evidence. But it is sufficient to indicate the nature of the question which the judge at chambers had to consider when he was invited to grant leave to the plaintiffs to proceed against the defendants. He did grant leave and it is from this order that the defendant appeals.

The effect of section 330 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, upon the patient's right of action is twofold. But for that section she could initiate proceedings in the form of a simple claim for false imprisonment, leaving it to the defendant to set up the defence of statutory authority. Section 330 protects in two ways a person who "has done anything in pursuance of" the statute. First, as a matter of substance, it requires that the plaintiff should prove that the defendant was not merely acting without authority, which would ordinarily be enough for the action of false imprisonment, but was also acting in bad faith or without reasonable care. Secondly, as a matter of procedure, the proposed plaintiff may not begin the action at all unless he can satisfy a judge that there is substantial ground for the contention that the proposed defendant was acting in bad faith or without reasonable care. It may not be easy for a plaintiff to discharge this burden before he knows what parts of the statute the defendant is going to rely upon. But that difficulty is usually avoided, as in this case, by the defendant giving the necessary particulars. In this case we know that the defendant intends to defend the action by relying upon section 20 and upon that alone. As the action has not yet been begun, there is not as yet any statement of claim; but we know also, because we have been told by counsel, that the plaintiffs do not intend to allege bad faith.

Accordingly, the act which is done pursuant to the statute and which gives rise to the cause of action is the act of the defendant in removing the patient to hospital; and the question will be whether in so doing he acted without reasonable care. It will be alleged against him that in removing the patient he exceeded the jurisdiction given to him by section 20 and that he was negligent in not taking proper steps to make sure that the patient was a person who fell within the section.

It is convenient, therefore, to begin by ascertaining what are the conditions laid down by section 20 as those under which the defendant has power to act. They fall under two heads. First, the patient must be "a person alleged to be of unsound mind "with regard to whom it is his duty to take any proceedings "under this Act." Secondly, the defendant must be satisfied that it was necessary for the public safety or the welfare of the patient that she should be placed under care and control. The first requirement postulates two things about the patient. The first of them is that she should be alleged to be of unsound mind; for reasons that I shall give later I think that that is of little importance in this case. The second, the important one, is that she should be a person with regard to whom it was his duty to take proceedings under this Act. The defendant will, therefore, have to show a duty of the sort described; and we have been informed by his counsel that he will seek to do so only under section 14. Thus, to summarise the matter, the patient must be a person who comes within the requirements of section 14, which enables the duly authorised officer to initiate proceedings; and also comes within the special requirements of section 20,

BUXTON

which enables him to detain the patient while proceedings are being instituted on the ground that it is necessary in the public safety or for her own welfare.

Now, the fulfilment of the special requirements of section 20 is not an issue in this case. In Harward v. Hackney Union Guardians of the Poor [2] this court held that the word "satisfied" in section 20 meant no more than that the officer should be honestly satisfied and did not import any need for reasonable grounds for his opinion. Since the plaintiff is not alleging bad faith, she will be bound to concede that, if she is a person within section 14, then a good defence can be made out under section 20.

It may be observed that in Harward v. Hackney Union Guardians of the Poor [2] no question arose under section 14 and the only matter which the jury was invited to consider was whether the defendant was honestly satisfied that it was necessary for the public safety or the plaintiff's welfare that he should be removed to the infirmary. The court held that there was no evidence to support a finding that the defendant was not honestly satisfied, and, accordingly, the jury's verdict for the plaintiff was set aside. At one time Mr. Wilmers appeared to be arguing that the plaintiffs in this case could not succeed at all in the absence of an allegation of bad faith. In his reply, however, he conceded that Harward v. Hackney Union Guardians of the Poor [2] has only a limited effect upon the issues in this case and, in particular, does not touch the question that arises under section 14. Notwithstanding this concession, it is, I think, desirable that I should indicate why Harward v. Hackney Union Guardians of the Poor [2] has this limited effect. It is because at the time of that case, and until an amendment was made by the National Health Service Act, 1946, section 14 was in a different form to that which it now has. As originally enacted, it did not require the duly authorised officer to hold any belief about a plaintiff, nor to be satisfied that he was not under proper care and control. It required simply that he should have "knowledge that a pauper "resident within the district of the officer is or is deemed to be a "lunatic and a proper person to be sent to an asylum." In Harward's case [2] it was not disputed that the officer knew the plaintiff as a person who was deemed to be a lunatic.

The only help, therefore, which Harward v. Hackney Union Guardians of the Poor [2] brings to the question under section 14 is upon the construction of the word "satisfied," which is used in section (1) (b). Mr. Croom-Johnson did not make any express concession about this, but I assume that he would not argue that in the absence of an allegation of bad faith, he can succeed under section 14 (1) (b). Thus the crucial question in this case arises under section 14 (1) (b) and is whether the defendant believed, and had reasonable ground for believing, that the patient was a person of unsound mind and a proper person to be sent to a mental hospital. I put the question as a double one because I think it is implicit in the language of section 14 that the duly authorised officer must, in fact, hold the belief for which he is required to have reasonable grounds.

I have already noted that the person who is to be removed under section 20 must be "alleged to be of unsound mind" as well as within section 14. But I do not think that the section contemplates any formal allegation; and since the amended section 14 requires the officer to believe on reasonable grounds that the person is of unsound mind, it would be pedantic to investigate as a distinct matter whether the person was alleged to be in that condition. That is why I have said that the crucial question arises under section 14.

At this stage of the matter it is not for the defendant to satisfy us on this issue. It is for the plaintiffs to satisfy us that there is substantial ground for their contention that the defendant either did not hold the requisite belief or, if he did, had no reasonable grounds for it. But there are limits to which the plaintiffs can be expected to prove a negative. They cannot give evidence about what was in the defendant's mind. All that they can do is to depose to circumstances which give substantial ground for thinking either that the defendant never applied his mind to the question of whether the patient was of unsound mind, or if he did, that he came to an unjustifiable conclusion. If a case of this sort is made out and left unanswered on some material point, the plaintiffs should succeed in this application. If the case is answered, then the question is whether the defendant's evidence robs the plaintiffs' contention of substantial ground.

I have no doubt that the evidence filed on behalf of the plaintiffs gives substantial ground for thinking, unless explained or contradicted, that the defendant either did not think or could not reasonably have thought the patient to be a person of unsound mind. It is not now suggested that she was in fact of unsound mind at the time when the defendant caused her to be removed. I do not think it is seriously suggested that, on the material contained in the plaintiffs' affidavits, the patient exhibited any symptoms of unsoundness of mind which would justify the defendant in the course he took.

The affidavits filed on behalf of the defendants set up a very different story, and contain the matter upon which the defendant relies as justifying him in the course which he took. But they are subject to one extraordinary omission. Nowhere does the defendant state—nor, indeed, does the doctor or anyone else—that he believed the patient to be of unsound mind. We have listened to a great deal of discussion about whether the defendant might have had reasonable ground for thinking the patient to be a person of unsound mind; and to much argument whether for this purpose, there being a conflict of evidence, we should have regard to the version given by the plaintiffs or the version given by the defendant and his witnesses, or to an amalgam of both.

v.
JAYNE.
Devlin L.J.

But it seems to me to be fruitless to argue about whether the defendant might reasonably have believed the patient to be a person of unsound mind if the defendant himself does not assert that he did.

Mr. Wilmers has put up for our consideration a number of ways in which the defendant's omission to state in terms that he believed the patient to be of unsound mind might be accounted for. They are all different ways of saying much the same thing, which is that the defendant's belief, though not put into words, emerges clearly from his affidavit. First, Mr. Wilmers says that the defendant must have believed the patient to be of unsound mind because he must be presumed to be aware of the limitation on his powers and he would not, therefore, have caused the patient to be removed unless he thought she was of unsound mind. This is to apply to the section the principle omnia praesumuntur rite esse acta. In a matter which touches the liberty of the subject, this is not permissible. Moreover, the argument is open to the obvious rejoinder that, if the defendant was, when he acted, clearly aware of the limitations on his powers, he must have been even more clearly aware of them when he made his affidavit; this makes it difficult to account for the omission except on the hypothesis that it was deliberate.

Secondly, Mr. Wilmers suggests that from the fact that Dr. Singer asked him to visit the plaintiffs' house the defendant would have inferred that the doctor intended him to act under section 20; and, therefore, would properly presume that the doctor had come to the conclusion that the patient was of unsound mind. This suggestion requires us to assume that all general practitioners—for there is no evidence that the doctor was exceptionally well-informed in this respect—are familiar with the sections of the Lunacy Act, 1890, which authorise the making of compulsory orders. I do not think that there is any ground for this. If a doctor thinks that his patient needs hospital treatment, his natural anxiety is to get him there; it is the business of the duly authorised officer, rather than that of the doctor, to see that statutory powers are not used for the purpose unless the circumstances warrant it. The argument requires us also to assume that the duly authorised officer has no function in this type of case except to act compulsorily; and that that fact was known to the doctor. If this were so, it is surprising, as I have already commented, that the doctor should have made up his mind about the case without seeing the patient again; and the fact that the defendant tried to get the patient to enter as a voluntary patient suggests that he was not merely equipped to act compulsorily. On any view, I do not see how it can be said that the doctor's supposed views must have been so obvious to the defendant, and his reliance on them so complete, that it did not occur to him even to ask the doctor, when he came to the house, whether he considered his patient to be of unsound mind. According to the defendant, the only information that the doctor when he arrived at the house, gave him about her condition was that when he had seen her on January 6 he had found her greatly distressed and subject to emotional outbursts. The defendant does not say that he asked for any further statement. But if he had, he would not have got much more, for the only opinion that Dr. Singer expresses in his affidavit is that the patient was suffering from a prolonged and serious emotional disturbance, and that she required observation and psychiatric treatment and skilled attention which clearly she could not get if she remained at home.

Thirdly, Mr. Wilmers argues that what the defendant says in his affidavit is tantamount to saying that the patient was of unsound mind, and that he does not use that expression because it is not one which is in common use in the medical profession. While it is much better that the witness should testify, if he can, in the terms of the Act itself, I agree that it is sufficient, at any rate at this stage, for him to use any language that amounts to the same thing. I am not going to attempt a definition of just what is meant by unsound mind, an expression which the Act itself leaves undefined, nor am I going to search for equivalent language. It is enough to say that unsoundness of mind is plainly something more radical than an emotional disturbance requiring psychiatric treatment. The unsoundness of mind, whose presence is essential to justify a compulsory order, manifestly means something more than mental illness which qualifies a person to be a voluntary patient. No doubt, the phrase "unsound mind" is not one which is in ordinary use; in ordinary language "certifiable" is perhaps more likely to be used to express the same idea. The word originally used in the Lunacy Act was "lunatic." The Mental Treatment Act, 1930, section 20, required the use of that word to be discontinued and substituted for it "person of unsound mind." The language of this section does not suggest an intent to alter the sense of the Lunacy Act, 1890, but rather to substitute a word with less disagreeable associations.

The only passage in his affidavit in which the defendant expresses his own opinion about the patient's condition is in paragraph 6. He there says that it was clear to him that the patient held very strong views about the family troubles, and he adds: "The strength of these views was such that I formed "the impression that she had become emotionally unstable and "unbalanced." For a person to be of unsound mind there must, I think, be some impairment of some faculty. "Unbalanced" is the nearest that the defendant comes to suggesting that. I do not think that any court which has a duty, as we have, to see that the requirements of a statute granting power to detain an individual against his will are strictly complied with, ought to treat the word "unbalanced" in the context in which I have quoted it, as expressing a belief in unsoundness of mind.

Mr. Wilmers' last point is a variant of the one which I have just considered. He submits that the circumstances set out in

1960
v.
JAYNE.
Devlin L.J.

the defendant's affidavit show clearly that the patient was behaving as if she were of unsound mind; and, since the defendant set out the circumstances in his affidavit, it is unnecessary that he should go on and state his conclusion about them. If the defendant's evidence is to be believed, the patient was certainly exhibiting some symptoms of mental derangement. But where the deponent fails to express his own opinion about it, an assumption about what his opinion was can safely be made only if the facts permit of no alternative view; and even accepting all the facts stated by the defendant that would be putting it much too high.

The result is that the inference which should properly be drawn from the plaintiffs' evidence have in one vital particular at least not been displaced. It is hardly a question of whether there are substantial grounds for the plaintiffs' contention. The blunt fact is that unless at the trial the defendant can make good or explain away the gap in his affidavit, the plaintiffs' contention is bound to succeed. In saying this I am not prejudging the ultimate issue. The defendant may convince the court that he was omitting only what he thought to be obvious; or he may defeat a charge of negligence on the lines acceptable in Richardson v. London County Council.[3] Since there is going to be a trial, it would not be helpful if I were to explore these or any other possibilities any further. Many things may take on a different appearance after they have been dealt with in viva voce evidence. But we have to act on the material we have got, and from that I think only one conclusion can be drawn, and that is that there is substantial ground for thinking that the defendant was lacking in care in that he failed to apply his mind properly to the requirement of the section.

In the course of his argument Mr. Wilmers applied for leave to file a further affidavit from the defendant to make good the defect in the one he had made. In my judgment, this application should be refused. No reasons such as are ordinarily required for the admission of fresh evidence in this court were advanced in support of it. Further, I do not think that an affidavit by the defendant at this stage would by itself be worth much unless it were accompanied by an explanation of how the omission occurred. The plaintiffs might properly wish to test that explanation, and the proper time for that is in cross-examination at the trial.

Finally, Mr. Wilmers submitted that the leave granted under section 330 should be limited to a claim for damages in respect of three days' detention. The basis for this submission is that under section 20 a person should not be detained for more than three days and, accordingly, any detention after that was not the defendant's responsibility. The submission shows a misapprehension of the court's task under section 330 (2). The court has there to inquire in respect of a particular act—in this case, the act of the defendant in ordering the removal of the patient on the morning of January 10—whether there is substantial ground for the contention that the defendant acted in bad faith or without reasonable care. The court is not concerned with the consequences of the act. Where the act in question is detention over a period, different considerations may apply to different parts of the period; in respect of one part a defendant may have acted without due care, and in respect of another with due care. It might then be proper to give leave to proceed in respect of a part only of the period of detention. But in the present case the act in question is not the act of detention but the act of removal. What damages flow from that act, if it is proved to be wrongful, will be a question of causation to be dealt with on ordinary principles; the procedure under section 330 is not concerned with it.

For these reasons I think that the judge came to the right conclusion, and that this appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

A motor-cycle was taken and driven away without the owner's consent. Later the same day F. was seen riding the motor-cycle with the appellant on the pillion. Both F. and the appellant were 15 years of age and had been friends for four years. They were stopped by the police and the appellant said that he knew nothing about the motor-cycle being stolen. Both were charged with taking and driving away a motor-vehicle without the consent of the owner contrary to section 28 (1) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, and with using a motor-vehicle on a road without there being in force a policy of insurance in respect of third party risks, contrary to section 35

D. (An Infant) v. Parsons.

(1) of the Act. F. pleaded guilty. The appellant pleaded not guilty, and his evidence was that F. had told him that he, F., was the owner of the cycle, and that F. had offered him a ride. The appellant was convicted of both offences and appealed to the County of London Quarter Sessions. His appeal was dismissed, the appeals committee being of the opinion that the evidence clearly established that both F. and the appellant were acting in concert in together taking and driving away the motor-cycle, and in together using it without the requisite policy of insurance. On appeal:—

Held, allowing the appeal, (1) that the fact that a man was found sitting on the pillion seat of a motor-cycle which had been illegally taken might be evidence from which a jury could infer that he was a party to the original taking, but it did not of itself prove it. Here there was no evidence of a joint enterprise, and no evidence that the appellant had been a party to the original taking by F.; accordingly, the appellant had been wrongly convicted of an offence against section 28 (1) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930.

Reg. v. Stally [1960] 1 W.L.R. 79; [1959] 3 All E.R. 814 (C.A.) applied.

(2) That the fact that the appellant accepted a lift from F. was not evidence sufficient to justify the conviction of the appellant for knowingly aiding and abetting F. in the commission of an offence under section 35 (1) of the Act.

Case stated by the appeals committee of the County of London Quarter Sessions.

On March 10, 1959, at the North London Juvenile Court, on informations laid by the respondent, the appellant was convicted (1) of taking and driving away, on March 1, 1959, a motor-cycle without the consent of the owner or other lawful authority contrary to section 28 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, and (2) of unlawfully using a motor-cycle on a road without there being in force in relation to the user of the vehicle a policy of insurance or such other security in respect of third-party risks as complied with Part II of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, contrary to section 35 of the Act. The appellant appealed to the appeals committee of the County of London Quarter Sessions. The appeals committee found the following facts: A Triumph motor-cycle, the property of one Barnett, was unlawfully taken and driven away between 3.30 a.m. and 7 a.m. on March 1, 1959, from a house in Mount Pleasant Lane, E.5. At 4 o'clock that same afternoon the motor-cycle was seen being driven by one F., with the appellant as pillion passenger. A police officer on a motor-cycle gave chase and the motor-cycle was left at the side of a road and F. and the appellant were seen walking away. The police accosted F. and the appellant about the matter. F., in the presence of the appellant, said: "A friend lent it to me," and also said that he thought borrowing the motor-cycle meant that no insurance was necessary. There was no policy of insurance covering the driving of the motor-cycle since both F. and the appellant, who were friends of four years' standing, were 15 years of age. They were told that they would be detained and the appellant said: "I don't know "anything about it being a stolen motor-cycle." Later F., who pleaded guilty, said: "The motor-cycle belongs to Bob Parker."

He could not give Parker's address. The appellant said: "I "don't know anything about a stolen motor-cycle." In his evidence before the appeals committee the appellant said that F. had told him that he (F.) was the owner of the motor-cycle and had parked it in Hillside Road (a place about one mile from F.'s home) while he had his dinner, and that F. had offered the appellant a ride when they met at about 1.30 p.m. on March 1. It appeared that F. did not know the way to Hillside Road, and he and the appellant had to ask the way when returning to the motor-cycle at about ten minutes to three o'clock on the afternoon of March 1.

On that evidence the finding of the appeals committee was expressed in these terms: "(i) Being of the opinion that the "evidence clearly established that both F. and the appellant were "acting in concert in together taking and driving away the said "Triumph [motor-cycle] without the owner's consent and in "together using the same without there being in force the neces-"sary policy of insurance, and (ii) not believing the appellant's "story to us that he thought that F. was the owner of the said "Triumph [motor-cycle] or that he was merely an innocent "passenger without any control over F.'s movements, dismissed "the said appeal. The committee were satisfied that the appel-"lant had committed these offences through sheer stupidity and "that his behaviour could not be described as criminal." The appellant appealed.

Samuel Lincoln for the appellant.
Paul Wrightson for the respondent.

LORD PARKER C.J. Davies J. will deliver the first judgment.

DAVIES J., having stated the facts and the opinions of the appeals committee as set out in the case stated, continued: The submission on the part of the appellant in this court, so far as it concerns the first charge of taking and driving away the motor-cycle is that there was no evidence before the appeals committee upon which they could come to the conclusion that, whatever F. did with regard to this cycle, the appellant was a party to the taking and driving away of it. The contention, as I understand it, on behalf of the Crown, is that F. must have been guilty of taking and driving away this cycle, not necessarily perhaps between 3.30 a.m. and 7 a.m.— possibly somebody else may have taken it; but whenever he did take it away without the consent of the owner or other lawful authority, F. must have been guilty of that offence. Then, when the appellant is found to be riding on the cycle in company with F. in circumstances in which the appellant must have known, not only that the cycle was improperly come by, but that it had been taken away without the consent of the owner, that fact is a fact upon which the appeals committee were entitled to convict the appellant of the offence. I am unable to subscribe to that proposition. The authority principally relied upon in support of it is a decision of the Court of Criminal Appeal, Rex v. Richardson.[1] The facts of that case were entirely different from the present facts. In that case there were three men found in possession of a motor-car which had been taken away without the consent of the owner. In the motor-car there was what Lord Goddard C.J. described as "a regular arsenal of housebreaking implements." When the appellant was tackled about the matter he said: "We didn't nick "it. We got it from another bloke." Lord Goddard went on to say: "What does that matter? Here were three men out on a "housebreaking expedition and were found, as I have said, with "a whole arsenal of housebreaking tools. They were driving a "car they had no business to be driving, and it was shown that "the car had been taken away from the owner's house or from the "street without the owner's consent, and these men were found "driving it. Whether man (1), man (2) or man (3) took the car "does not matter in the least; nor does it matter whether they "took it from some friend whom they had met in the street. All "three knew, as the jury found, that the car was being driven "without the owner's consent."

It is said, therefore, that that decision is authority for the proposition that a man who was not actually a party to the original illegal taking of a car is, if he subsequently gets into it and partakes of the use of it, guilty of taking the car. That, in my judgment, is not right. The fact that a man is found riding in a car that has been illegally taken, or sitting on the pillion seat of a motor-cycle which has been illegally taken, may be evidence from which a bench of magistrates or a jury can infer that he was a party to the original taking, but it does not of itself prove that he was a party to the original taking and is guilty of the offence. That proposition is, I think, clearly laid down in Reg. v. Stally,[2] another case in the Court of Criminal Appeal decided after the decision of the appeals committee in the present case. It is sufficient if I read the last paragraph in the judgment of Barry J., who gave the judgment of the court[3]: "In the opinion of this court the two passages "to which I have referred state the law in very much too broad "a way and, in fact, amount to a misdirection. If the learned "deputy chairman had made it clear that once the jury were "satisfied that the appellant was a party to the taking in the "sense that the taking had been a joint enterprise, even though "he himself was not present when the vehicle was actually "removed, no complaint could possibly have been made. The "difficulty, as we see it, is that the learned deputy chairman "indicated to the jury that they would be entitled to find the "appellant guilty of this offence on the mere ground, and the "sole ground, that he entered the vehicle some time after it had "been taken knowing that the driver of the vehicle had in fact "taken it and driven it away without the consent of the owner. "In very many cases the fact that a man entered a car which "he knew had been stolen and then drove in it, might well lead "the jury to the conclusion that that man had been a party to the "original taking, in the sense that the taking had been a joint "enterprise between him and the driver of the car. In the "passages to which I have referred the learned deputy chairman "does not direct the jury that on the evidence they must be "satisfied that the appellant was in fact a party to the taking. "It might well have been on this evidence that the jury would "have so found if so directed, but it is also possible that the "jury took the view here that Stally played no part at all in "the taking of the van, and that although when he came up "to the van, which had already been taken by Wise, he was "aware that Wise had taken it without the owner's consent, but "nonetheles he had been quite unaware that Wise was going to "take it, then, in those circumstances, to say that the mere fact "of entering the van and being driven in it would constitute a "taking and driving away, seems to this court to be an inaccurate "statement of the law."

Applying that to the facts of the present case, it is perfectly true, as the appeals committee have found, that the appellant told lies when he was challenged by the police, but giving the strongest weight to evidence of that kind against the appellant, it seems to me that it is impossible here to say that there was any real evidence that this present appellant had anything to do with this taking or knew in advance or knew at the time that F. was going to take or was taking or took the cycle. The highest, as it seems to me, that it can be put against the appellant on that charge is that at some time—we do not know when—F. having taken the cycle, the appellant being in company with F. had very good reason to believe that there was something wrong with it; he might even have realised that F. had taken it without the owner's consent, but that is all that the evidence proves. In my judgment, following the decision of the Court of Criminal Appeal in Reg. v. Stally,[4] that would not be enough to constitute the offence, and there was no evidence on which the appeals committee could come to the decision which they did on that charge. It is to be observed that throughout the case stated the committee approached this case on the basis that it was a joint undertaking throughout, and there was not really, as I have said, any evidence that the appellant was concerned in the original taking by F.

D. (AN INFANT) v. PARSONS.

So far as the second charge is concerned, the position may be a little different. The charge there was using the motor-cycle without there being in force a valid third-party insurance. It was F. who was driving it and the appellant, if guilty, would be guilty as aiding and abetting F. to drive it. As I understand it, the way the case is put is this: here were these two boys, old acquaintances of four years' standing, each being 15 years old. It must, therefore, be taken that the appellant would know that F. could not have a driving licence, could not have a third-party insurance policy, and, therefore, going on the cycle when he went, he must be taken to be guilty of aiding and abetting the driving without an insurance policy. I think that that is really straining matters in this case. I suppose that technically the appellant, a boy of 15, must be taken to know the law, but really all the evidence against him on this charge is that he was riding as a passenger on a motor-cycle driven by F. Returning to the decision of the appeals committee, their opinion is based on the footing that this was a joint enterprise throughout. Supposing the fact be, and there was really no evidence to the contrary, that this was merely an offering of a lift by F. to the appellant, it seems to me that the evidence would not justify the conviction of the appellant for knowingly aiding and abetting the commission of this offence by F.

In these circumstances I am of opinion that on neither of these charges was there evidence before the appeals committee upon which, properly directing themselves, they could arrive at the decision they did, and I would allow the appeal.

DONOVAN J. I agree. I add a word only on the second charge on which the appeals committee found the appellant guilty, again on the ground that the evidence established a joint venture. Since the evidence did not do so, the basis of the finding on that charge goes also, and in those circumstances I do not think that the court ought, even if it could, to convict the appellant on some ground relating to this second charge not apparently put forward at the trial, namely, that in any event by merely riding on the pillion the appellant was guilty of an offence under section 35. I therefore say no more.

LORD PARKER C.J. I agree, and I only add a word on the first charge. There are two possibilities: the appeals committee may be saying in the case stated that they were satisfied that the appellant had been acting in concert with F. when F. originally took and drove away the motor-cycle. If that is what they intended to find, I can see no evidence which would justify that conclusion. On the other hand, they may have found, and I think that this is more likely, that F. at some time took and drove away the motor-cycle, and that at a later stage the appellant joined with him, knowing full well that the motor-cycle had been take away without the owner's consent. I think on that basis the appeals committee held that the appellant himself was guilty of taking and driving away. It is to be observed that the decision in the present case was given before Reg. v. Stally[5] was heard in the Court of Criminal Appeal. Applying the law as they conceived it to be before Reg. v. Stally,[5] the appeals committee may well have thought that the mere joining up of the appellant with F. after the original taking and driving away made him, the appellant, also guilty of taking and driving away. I accept the decision in Stally's case,[5] and, accordingly, the evidence here was not enough to show that this appellant was guilty of the offence.

Appeal allowed with costs incurred in this court and before the appeals committee to be taxed out of court. No order as to costs incurred before the juvenile court.

Town and Country Planning—Development—Material change of use—Business premises—Basement used by horticulturists on appointed day for storing and grading bulbs for retail sale and for making and repairing boxes and seed trays—Class of use—Whether "shop," "repository" or "light industrial building"—Subsequently used by printers' engineers for repairing and reconditioning type—Installation of machinery—Whether material change in use—Town and Country Planning Act, 1947 (10 & 11 Geo. 6, c. 5), s. 12 (1) (2) (f)—Town and Country Planning (Use Classes) Order, 1950 (S.I. 1950, No. 1131), art. 2 (2) and Sch.

The defendants, tenants of the ground floor and basement of business premises had covenanted, inter alia, not to make or suffer to be made any material change in the use of the premises demised. The tenants sublet the basement to printers' engineers, who installed machinery and used the basement for reconditioning and repairing type. It was agreed that the use of the basement for such purpose was as a "light industrial building" within the meaning of article 2 (2) of the Town and Country Planning (Use Classes) Order, 1950,[1] made pursuant to section 12 (2)

[1] Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 12: "(1) Subject to the provisions of this section and to the following provisions of this Act, permission shall be required under this Part of this Act in respect of any development of land which is carried out after the appointed day [July 1, 1948]. (2) In this Act, except where the context otherwise requires, the expression 'development' means the carrying out of building, engineering, mining or other operations in, on, over or under land, or the making of any material change in the use of any buildings or other land: Provided that the following operations or uses of land shall not be deemed of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947. On July 1, 1948 (the appointed day), and for some years prior thereto, the basement had been used by horticulturists in summer for sorting, grading and storing bulbs for sale in a retail shop on the other side of the road, and in winter for making and repairing boxes and seed trays, no machinery other than a handsaw being used for the latter purposes.

In an action for possession the landlord claimed that there had been a breach by the tenants of the covenant not to suffer or permit a material change in the use of the land or buildings or any part thereof without consent, as the basement was being used by their subtenants as a "light industrial building," whereas its use previously had been as a shop or repository within the meaning of the Order of 1950:—

Held, (1) that on July 1, 1948, the basement alone was not a "shop" within the definition in the Order of 1950, as no retail sales took place therein; nor was it a shop if taken in conjunction with the retail shop also occupied by the horticulturists, as (a) the boxes and trays repaired therein did not come within the definition of "the reception of goods to be . . . repaired" within the meaning

"for the purposes of this Act to involve "development of the land, that is to "say:— . . . (f) in the case of build-"ings or other land which are used "for a purpose of any class specified "in an order made by the Minister "under this section, the use thereof "for any other purpose of the same "class."

Town and Country Planning (Use Classes) Order, 1950, art. 2 (2): "In "this Order unless the context other-"wise requires, the following expres-"sions have the meanings respectively "assigned to them, namely:— . . .

"'shop' means a building used "for the carrying on of any retail "trade or retail business wherein the "primary purpose is the selling of "goods by retail, and . . . includes a "building used for the purpose of "a hairdresser, undertaker or ticket "agency or for the reception of goods "to be washed, cleaned or repaired, "or for any other purpose appropriate "to a shopping area, but does not "include a building used as a funfair, "garage, petrol filling station, office, "or hotel or premises (other than a "restaurant) licensed for the sale of "exciseable liquors for consumption "on the premises;

"'industrial building' means a "building (other than a building in "or adjacent to and belonging to a "quarry or mine and other than a "shop) used for the carrying on of "any process for or incidental to any "of the following purposes, namely:— "(a) the making of any article or of "part of any article, or (b) the alter-"ing, repairing, ornamenting, finish-"ing, cleaning, washing, packing or "canning, or adapting for sale, or "breaking up or demolition of any "article, or (c) without prejudice to the "foregoing paragraphs, the getting, "dressing or treatment of minerals, "being a process carried on in the "course of trade or business other "than agriculture, and for the pur-"poses of this definition the expres-"sion 'article' means an article of "any description, including a ship or "vessel.

"'light industrial building' means "an industrial building (not being a "special industrial building) in which "the processes carried on or the "machinery installed are such as could "be carried on or installed in any "residential area without detriment "to the amenity of that area by reason "of noise, vibration, smell, fumes, "smoke, soot, ash, dust or grit; . . .

"'general industrial building' "means an industrial building, other "than a light industrial building or a "special industrial building;

"'special industrial building' means "an industrial building used for one "or more of the purposes specified in "classes V, VI, VII, VIII, IX and X "referred to in the schedule to this "Order [classes of special user of an "offensive type]."

The schedule sets out the classes of uses and includes the following:

"Class I.—Use as a shop for any "purpose except as:—(i) a fried fish "shop; (ii) a tripe shop; (iii) a shop "for the sale of pet animals or birds; ". . .

"Class III.—Use as a light indus-"trial building for any purpose.

"Class IV.—Use as a general indus-"trial building for any purpose. . . .

"Class XI.—Use as a wholesale "warehouse or repository for any "purpose."

of article 2 (2), as they were not repaired for the use or benefit of customers, and (b) the purposes for which it was mainly used were not purposes which were appropriate to a shopping area (post, p. 810).

(2) That the basement was not a "repository," namely, a building wherein goods were kept or stored in the course of trade or business as, although it was used partly for that purpose, its main use was for processes carried on in the course of a trade or business, which were purposes appropriate to a light industrial building. Accordingly, its user on July 1, 1948, was as a "light industrial "building" within the meaning of article 2 (2), and therefore there had been no material change in the use of the land within the meaning of the covenant in the underlease of October 18, 1954, and no breach thereof, and the plaintiff's claim failed (post, p. 811).

ACTION.

By a lease made by the plaintiff, David Horwitz, of premises at Farringdon Road, London, on October 18, 1954, between him and the defendants, Benjamin Rowson and his wife, Margarita Rowson, the plaintiff demised to the defendants the ground floor and basement of the building for a term of 22¾ years at a rent of £600 per annum, payable quarterly. The lease contained a proviso for re-entry on non-payment of rent and also a proviso for forfeiture in the event of any breach or non-observance of the covenants therein. By clause 2 (9) the defendants covenanted, inter alia, not to do or permit to be done any act or thing which might be or become a nuisance, annoyance, grievance, injury, danger, trouble or disturbance, or might be objectionable to the owners or occupiers of the property adjoining thereto or to the neighbourhood, to use the ground floor as a café and restaurant only and the basement as a store or workshop or café and restaurant only. By clause 2 (15) they covenanted, inter alia, not at any time during the continuance of the term without the previous consent in writing of the lessor to make or suffer to be made any material change or addition whatsoever in or to the use of the land demised or any building or buildings or erection thereon or any part thereof, and also if the lessor should consent in writing would duly apply to the local planning authority as defined by the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, for any necessary permission to make such material change on behalf of the lessor and would give to the lessor notice of such permission within three months of the receipt of the same from the planning authority.

By an underlease dated May 9, 1955, made between the defendants and a company, Excelsior Printers Supply Co. Ltd., the defendants sublet the basement to that company for 21 years from March, 1955, and by clause 2 (13) of that underlease the company covenanted, inter alia, to use the basement for the purpose of a store, workshop and warehouse in connection with their business of printers' engineers only, and further, by clause 2 (17) not without the consent of the defendants in writing to make any material change in the use of the basement or any part thereof. As part of their user of the basement as a workshop in connection with their business the company installed in the basement a portable tank containing caustic soda solution used for degreasing type and other equipment for repair or reconditioning and a similar portable tank of water for rinsing the articles after degreasing.

On July 1, 1948 (the appointed day under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947), and the material date for the purposes of this action, the basement had been occupied by J. J. Mack Ltd., a company which carried on business as horticulturists. That company, which had occupied the basement since 1939, also had a shop on the other side of Farringdon Road where they sold flowers, bulbs and seeds. During the occupation of J. J. Mack Ltd. the basement had been used during the season as a store for storing bulbs and plants some of which were imported from Holland, the bulbs being delivered to the basement where they were unloaded and unpacked and put into trays. They were then sorted, graded and prepared in the basement for display and sale in the shop, and the packing and dispatching of bulbs in accordance with orders received by the company was also done in the basement. No retail sale took place there, all such sales being from the retail shop. In winter the basement was used for the making and repairing of boxes and seed trays, quantities of wood of the proper dimensions being bought by the company for that purpose. No machinery was used in the basement in making and repairing boxes and trays, but a handsaw was used.

On November 20, 1958, the plaintiff served a notice on the defendants, pursuant to section 146 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, alleging that they had broken the covenants contained in clause 2 (9) of the underlease of October 18, 1954, by permitting the Excelsior Printers Supply Co. Ltd. to use the basement of the demised property for the purpose of cleaning printers' type, machinery and other equipment and for the purposes of keeping and using in the basement tanks containing caustic liquid; and, further, that they had broken the covenant under clause 2 (15) as they had not obtained the consent of the plaintiff, whether written or unwritten, to the user of the basement by the company for those purposes, which user involved a "material change of "user" within the meaning of those words as used in clause 2 (15), and, further, had not applied to the local planning authority for any permission to make such material change of user. The plaintiff required the defendants to remedy the breaches within 21 days from the date of the notice.

On December 24, 1958, the plaintiff issued a writ against the defendants claiming possession of the premises and £150 arrears of rent due on September 29, 1958, alleging breaches of the two covenants, claiming that the defendants had failed to comply with the requirements of the notice served under section 146 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, within the time limited thereby.

The defendants denied that the plaintiff was entitled to possession, or that they were in breach of or had failed to observe any of the covenants contained in the underlease of October 18, 1954. They admitted receiving the notice purporting to have been served under section 146 of the Act of 1925 but made no further admissions with regard thereto. They denied that the lease had at any time become or was forfeited to the plaintiff, and claimed that if they were at any time in breach of any of the covenants contained in clause 2 (15), such breach occurred before June 24, 1958, and that on July 8, 1958, they had paid to, and the plaintiff with full knowledge of every such breach had accepted, rent due under the lease on June 24, 1958, and thereby waived his right to rely on any such breach as a forfeiture.

By a counterclaim they claimed that, if it be held that they had committed the alleged or any breach or breaches, they were ready and willing to remedy such breach or breaches and to be relieved from forfeiture under section 146 of the Act of 1925.

In relation to the claim based on an alleged breach of covenant under clause 2 (9), which does not call for report, Havers J., applying the test laid down in Fox v. Jolly,[1] held that the notice served by the plaintiff did not comply with the requirements of section 146 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, because it did not state with sufficient particularity the breaches of which the landlord complained, and therefore in so far as the action was based on an alleged breach of clause 2 (9) of the underlease of October 18, 1954, the plaintiff was not entitled to maintain the action even if there had been a breach; and that although the hanging of pieces of machinery on the wall pipes which had been done by the Excelsior Printing Supply Co. Ltd. might become a nuisance or annoyance to other occupiers of the building within the meaning of the covenant in clause 2 (9), the defendants were not liable, because there was no evidence that they ever knew of or authorised such acts and could not be held to have permitted it. The action failed in so far as it was based on a breach of the covenant in clause 2 (9).

Cur. adv. vult.

June 3. HAVERS J. Now I have to deal with the remaining cause of action, which is based upon a breach of clause 2 (15) of the lease. In respect of this no point arises with regard to the sufficiency of the notice. It is conceded that the notice was sufficient with regard to that, and it is also conceded that, if there was a material change in user, there was a suffering by the defendants of it. [His Lordship stated the facts relating to the user of the basement on and prior to July 1, 1948, and continued:] The plaintiff alleges that there had been since the date of the underlease to the Excelsior Printing Supply Co. Ltd., and at the date of the writ, a material change in user, in that the user by the company was that of a light industrial building, whereas it was contended that the user by J. J. Mack Ltd. was either that of a shop or a repository, or that it did not come within any of the classes within the Town and Country Planning (Use Classes) Order, 1950, which has been made by the Minister.

According to the covenant, the duty of the defendants as underlessees, if a material change was made, was to ask the lessor for consent, and not to make any such change without the previous consent in writing of the lessor. If the lessor gave his consent, then there was a duty to apply to the town planning authority for a licence. The question, therefore, I have to decide is: Was there a material change of user within the meaning of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947? It is agreed for the purpose of this case by both counsel that the user by the Excelsior Company was that of a light industrial building.

[His Lordship read section 12 (1) and (2) of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, and continued:] The Minister made the Town and Country Planning (Use Classes) Order, 1950, which came into operation on July 21, 1950. The effect of this is that a person is entitled to change his actual user if he keeps within a certain class. If he makes a change within that class, it is not a material change and does not require permission. Under this Order it is necessary to refer to the definition article, which is article 2. [His Lordship read the definitions of "shop," "light "industrial building" and "special industrial building" contained in article 2 (2) of the Order, and classes I, II, III, IV and X of the schedule and continued:] It is common ground that the user by the Excelsior Company is that of a light industrial building, and the problem, therefore, I have to determine is: What was the user by J. J. Mack Ltd. on July 1, 1948? If there was a material change of user, then, of course, there has been a breach of the covenant.

It was contended by Mr. Hirst, for the plaintiff, first, that this basement, if one looks at it alone without regard to the shop on the other side of the road, was a shop inasmuch as it was used for carrying on the retail trade of horticulture. I am unable to accept that argument, because on the facts there was no retail trade carried on in the basement at all. The retail trade was carried on exclusively by J. J. Mack Ltd. in a shop over the other side of the road. The second point that was taken by Mr. Hirst was that, if the basement alone was not a shop, the shop over the way plus the basement were together a shop within the meaning of the definition in article 2 (2) of the Order of 1950.

"Shop" means "a building used for the carrying on of any

"retail trade or retail business wherein the primary purpose is "the selling of goods by retail"—and the shop over the way was obviously that—"and includes a building used for the purposes "of a hairdresser, undertaker or ticket agency or for the reception "of goods to be washed, cleaned or repaired." A witness said that there were goods that were brought into the basement to be repaired and were repaired. The basement was used partly for the reception of things to be repaired, and for boxes and trays; but I have to consider whether the boxes and trays that were repaired in the basement come within the definition of "the "reception of goods to be . . . repaired" within the meaning of the Order of 1950.

I think the word "goods" must have an analogous meaning to the meaning which it bears in the earlier part of the definition, "'shop' means a building . . . wherein the primary purpose is "the selling of goods by retail." These boxes and trays which were repaired were not repaired for the use or the benefit of customers; they were repaired where necessary for the purpose of displaying the goods.

The only thing that is left, therefore, is if the plaintiff can bring himself within the words of the definition, "or for any "other purpose appropriate to a shopping area." I assume for the purpose of this argument that these words are not to be construed ejusdem generis, if there is a genus hairdresser, undertaker and ticket agency. I have then to consider what is the meaning of the words "or for any other purpose appropriate to "a shopping area." I confess I find this difficult to determine. The test is not whether the purpose is ordinarily incidental to the carrying on of a retail trade. It is something entirely different, namely, user for a purpose appropriate to a shopping area.

I think, therefore, as that is the test, I have to have regard to the object of the Act of 1947 and the classification of the uses in the Order. The Act, of course, was to control the development all over this country. The idea was that there should not in future be all sorts of buildings of different characters built up without any sort of control, but that each planning authority should prepare a development plan and should allocate areas for the different kinds of user and development, agriculture, residential, industrial buildings, shops, offices, and so on. If one looks at the Order itself, it appears that there are really some broad distinctions between user. There is a user for shop, user for office and user for industrial building, and industrial buildings are classified within themselves as light, general and special. It seems to follow from that that, if a building is used either for an office or an industrial building, it would not be deemed to be appropriate for a shopping area.

The main test, really, for considering whether a building is an industrial building is whether there is any process carried on therein for or incidental to the making of any article or part of an article, or the altering, repairing or adapting for sale of any article being a process carried on in the course of a trade or business other than agriculture. It is to be observed that horticulture has not been excluded from that.

HORWITZ v. ROWSON.

There is no dispute that this basement was used for making boxes and trays in the winter. It was also used for adapting bulbs for sale and grading and sorting them out. Those, in my view, within the tenor of this Order, are not purposes which are appropriate to a shopping area. They are purposes which are appropriate to user as an industrial building. I hold, therefore, that this basement alone was not a shop, nor was it a shop if included with the shop over the road, within the meaning of this Order.

Then it was contended that this basement was a repository. Class X in the Order is: "Use as a wholesale warehouse or "repository for any purpose." It is clearly not a wholesale warehouse. Whether the word "wholesale" qualifies "reposi- "tory" is not perhaps too clear. If it does, of course, this obviously was not a wholesale repository. I will assume that the word "wholesale" does not qualify the word "repository," and consider whether or not the basement was a repository within the meaning of the Order.

"Repository," I think, means a building wherein goods are kept or stored, and I think it must be in the course of a trade or business. In this particular case, in the season the basement was partly used for this purpose, but not exclusively. In the winter it was not used for this purpose at all. The main, if not the exclusive, user in the winter was for making and repairing boxes and trays. I hold, therefore, that it was not a repository within the meaning of Class X of the Order.

It was contended also by Mr. Hirst that, if the basement did not fit into either of those two classes, it did not come within the Order at all, and then I should have to decide as best I could whether or not there had been a material change of user. But there is one more class which I have to consider, and that is the one which Mr. Thompson says it does belong to, namely, Class III, that of a light industrial building. "'industrial build- "'ing' means a building (other than a building in or adjacent to "and belonging to a quarry or mine and other than a shop) used "for the carrying on of any process for or incidental to any of "the following purposes, namely:—(a) the making of any article "or of part of any article, or (b) the altering, repairing . . . "cleaning . . . packing . . . or adapting for sale . . . of any "article . . . being a process carried on in the course of trade "or business other than agriculture . . ."

I have come to the conclusion that the user of this basement on July 1, 1948, was that of an industrial building, and it comes within the definition of a light industrial building, which is "an "industrial building (not being a special industrial building) in "which the processes carried on or the machinery installed are "such as could be carried on or installed in any residential area

"without detriment to the amenity of that area by reason of "noise, vibration, smell, fumes, smoke, soot, ash, dust or grit."

The basement on July 1, 1948, was used for carrying on a process for or incidental to the making of an article, namely, boxes and trays, also for repairing boxes and trays, also for adapting for sale bulbs. They were sorted and graded and prepared for display. That, in my view, was a process carried on in the course of a trade or business. It is quite clear, if it was an industrial building, it comes within the terms of "light industrial "building" within the meaning of article 2 (2) of the Order. In those circumstances, it being common ground that the user since 1955 and the date of the writ was as a light industrial building, I hold that there has not been any material change of user within the meaning of the covenant and, therefore, there has been no breach of covenant.

Other interesting questions were ventilated before me as to whether, assuming that there had been a breach, there had been a waiver by reason of the fact that the plaintiff, with knowledge of the facts—and it was contended that he had full knowledge of the facts—had demanded rent and had been paid and accepted payment of rent. My attention was called to some authorities under which it has been held that the mere demand for rent or the mere acceptance of rent by itself is not conclusive of the matter; that one has to look at all the circumstances of the case and consider the question, quo animo was the rent demanded or received. But if I had had to decide that point, I should have felt bound to hold that there was no waiver by the acceptance of rent in this case, upon this short ground, that the burden rests upon the defendants to prove that the plaintiff had knowledge of all the material facts which constituted the breach. I am not satisfied that the plaintiff had any knowledge of the user of this basement on July 1, 1948. He was not asked any questions about it, and there is no evidence that he knew anything about it. Therefore, if he did not know what was its user at July 1, 1948, he could not possibly know whether there was a material change of user in respect of the user from 1955 onwards. Upon that ground I should have been bound to hold that there had not been a waiver by the acceptance of rent. I think, also, if I had had to decide the point, I should have held that if there was a breach it was a continuing breach.

It is unnecessary for me to deal with those points any further, and in my judgment, therefore, the action fails and there must be judgment for the defendants.

Crime — Sentence — Borstal training — Vagrancy — Probation order— Breach—Three months' maximum sentence for vagrancy offence— Whether Borstal appropriate sentence — Vagrancy Act, 1824 (5 Geo. 4, c. 83), s. 4.

Vagrancy—Sentence—Whether Borstal training appropriate sentence— Vagrancy Act, s. 4.

The appellant was found guilty of an offence under section 4 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824,[1] as a rogue and vagabond for wandering abroad, and put on probation for two years. She failed to notify a change of address, and being brought before the court for breach of the probation order was sentenced to Borstal training. On appeal against sentence:—

Held, that as the maximum sentence under section 4 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, was three months' imprisonment, it would be wrong to impose a sentence of Borstal training, which would deprive the appellant of her liberty for a longer period than the maximum prison sentence, although she did need and would have benefited from a course of training; accordingly, a sentence of three months' imprisonment would be substituted for the sentence of Borstal training.

Reg. v. Longstreeth[2] followed.

[2] June 23, 1952, Court of Criminal Appeal (Lord Goddard C.J., Croom-Johnson and Parker JJ.).

LORD GODDARD C.J. This is one of those troublesome cases where a person is charged as a suspected person. That is an offence under the Vagrancy Act, 1824, and the only sentence on first conviction is one of three months' imprisonment. The appellant was committed for sentence and a probation order was made, with the condition that the appellant should report to the probation officer. That was back in September or the beginning of October, 1950, and he reported favourably at the time, but in April, 1952, he was brought before the same magistrates charged with failing to report in accordance with the order. The order had been running a long time, perhaps longer than his sentence, and the same chairman sentenced him to Borstal training. That means that if he goes to Borstal he will probably be detained 15 months, and that is what causes the court to wonder whether Borstal training ought to be imposed on these youths when the maximum sentence of imprisonment they can receive is only one of three months. I dare say it would be very much better that they should go somewhere to be trained, but on the whole we do not think it is a satisfactory sentence because it does deprive the appellant of his liberty. If he is sentenced to imprisonment he cannot be deprived of his liberty for more than three months, and if he behaves himself that is reduced to two months. That is the position and the court thinks that on the whole they ought to set aside the sentence of Borstal.

Juvenile Court as "a rogue and vagabond" under section 4 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, for wandering abroad and refusing to go to her home or any other suitable place. She was placed on probation for two years. On January 29, 1960, she was fined £2 for being drunk and disorderly but no proceedings were taken in respect of that breach of probation. On February 4, 1960, she was brought before Prescot magistrates' court on a summons alleging that she was in breach of the probation order for failing to notify a change of address. The magistrates found the matter proved and committed her to sessions (under section 28 of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952), with a view to Borstal training. On March 15 she appeared at Liverpool before the Appeals Committee for the County of Lancaster, where she was sentenced to Borstal training. She appealed against that sentence by leave of the court.

The appellant appeared in person.

The Crown was not represented.

LORD PARKER C.J. stated the facts and continued: The matter that influenced the court was that under section 4 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, the maximum sentence is of three months. That, of course, was long before the Borstal training was introduced as a sentence, but in a case which came before this court on June 23, 1952, Reg. v. Longstreeth,[2] Lord Goddard C.J. pointed out that three months was the maximum sentence, whereas a sentence of Borstal training would be very much longer. He said: "I "dare say it would be very much better that they"—that is, prisoners of that sort—"should go somewhere to be trained, but "on the whole I do not think it is a satisfactory sentence because "it does deprive the appellant of his liberty. If he is sentenced "to imprisonment he cannot be deprived of his liberty for more "than three months, and if he behaves himself, that is reduced "to two months. That is the position, and the court thinks "that on the whole they ought to set aside the sentence of "Borstal training."

In the present case it is quite clear that this girl does need training. She has shown herself to be an unruly sort of person. It is said that she went to undesirable cafés and is self-willed, and it appears from a report from the governor of the prison where she is, that she has improved, in other words that Borstal training is doing her good. The governor goes on to say: "This girl has benefited from the short period of training "she has received in a stable environment, and it would appear "that she requires supervision over a sustained period."

In a probation officer's report, which this court has called for, it is clear that the probation officer does not think that she has reached that stage of stability where she can be relied upon not to go to undesirable cafés. Accordingly, it is just the sort of case where this girl would benefit from Borstal training. Nevertheless, this court has, as I have indicated, said that in these circumstances Borstal training is the wrong sentence. This court feels that it ought to follow that decision, and accordingly in the circumstances the sentence of Borstal training will be set aside and a sentence of three months' imprisonment substituted. That means that the appellant has now served her sentence and the probation officer will take her back to her home in Liverpool.

[1] See footnote 2, ante, p. 812.

Lord Parker C.J.

Appeal allowed.

Agriculture—Agricultural land tribunal—Issue of sound management—Tenant's personal fortunes as farmer not to be considered—Discretion of tribunal—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948 (11 & 12 Geo. 6, c. 63), s. 25 (1) (b)—Agriculture Act, 1958 (6 & 7 Eliz. 2, c. 71), s. 3 (2).

A landlord owned a large estate, part of which consisted of Burton Court Farm, comprising 406 acres, which was being farmed by the tenant. The landlord also owned Hatt House Farm, of some 96 acres, and it appeared to the landlord that Hatt House Farm was not an efficient farming unit, and that good estate management would involve a transfer of some of the Burton Court Farm land to Hatt House Farm. Accordingly, the landlord served the tenant of Burton Court Farm with a notice to quit some 54 acres. In applying for the consent of the Agricultural Land Tribunal to the operation of the notice to quit the landlord stated that the reason for serving the notice was the reason stated in section 25 (1) (b) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, as amended, namely "that "the carrying out thereof is desirable in the interests of sound "management of the estate of which the land to which the notice "relates forms part." The tribunal refused their consent giving, inter alia, the following reason: "that the tenant of Burton Court "Farm has over the years brought it to a high state of productivity "and that to take the 54 acres which includes some of his best land "and the cottage from him might well adversely affect his farming "and the production from and state of the land in question." The landlord appealed:—

Held, allowing the appeal, that sound management of the estate involved considering the whole estate and each part of it; but it was wrong to consider whether the tenant of the farm from whom the land was sought to be taken would suffer in any way. That was a matter which the tribunal should have ignored until they came to decide whether under the proviso to section 25 (1)[1] they should, as a matter of discretion, have given their consent to the operation of the notice. The case should be sent back to them for their reconsideration.

CASE STATED by the Agricultural Land Tribunal for the West Midland Area.

The following facts and summary of the case stated are taken from the judgment of Lord Parker C.J.:

By an application dated March 23, 1959, the Hon. Mrs. E. M. K. Evans, the landlord, applied for the consent of the Agricultural Land Tribunal pursuant to sections 24 and 25 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, as amended by the Agriculture Act, 1958, to the operation of a notice to quit part of Burton Court Farm, Clifton-on-Teme, Worcestershire, given to the tenant, Mr. W. H. Roper, dated January 27, 1959.

The landlord owned a considerable amount of land at Clifton-on-Teme, near Worcester. Part of the estate consisted of a farm, Burton Court Farm, comprising 406 acres being farmed by the respondent tenant. The landlord also had a farm, Hatt House Farm, of which the tenant was one Skyrm. That farm comprised about 98 acres, but negotiations were in progress between the Glebe Commissioners and the landlord for an exchange of glebe lands on the estate which would, if completed, have reduced Hatt House Farm by about 14 acres. It appeared to the landlord that Hatt House Farm in its then state, and presumably still more so if it were reduced by 14 acres, would not be an efficient farming unit, and that good estate management would involve a transfer of some of the Burton Court Farm land to Hatt House Farm. In those circumstances, the landlord gave the tenant notice to quit some 54 acres of land of Burton Court Farm, the object being to attach that land to Hatt House Farm and build the necessary buildings. In applying to the tribunal for their consent the landlord accordingly stated that the reason for serving the notice was the reason stated in section 25 (1) (b) of the Act of 1948 as amended, namely, "that the carrying out thereof is desirable in "the interests of sound management of the estate of which the "land to which the notice relates forms part."

The application was opposed by the tenant, and in due course on May 27, 1959, the tribunal refused their consent, giving, inter alia, the following reasons: "(5) That the tenant of Burton Court Farm has over the years brought it to a high state of "productivity and that to take the 54 acres which includes some "of his best land and the cottage from him might well adversely "affect his farming and the production from and state of the land

EVANS v. ROPER.

"in question. (6) That the landlord's proposals for the provision "of fixed equipment for Hatt House Farm even as enlarged by "the land in question, were not proved to be a sound economic "proposition. (7) That though the tribunal were sympathetic "towards the landlord's long-term policy they were not satisfied "that the purpose for which the landlord proposes to terminate "the tenancy had been proved to be in the interests of sound "management of the estate, particularly in present circum-"stances." Accordingly, not being satisfied in regard to the ground stated in section 25 (1) (b) of the Act as amended, it was unnecessary for the tribunal, and they did not go on to consider whether, under the proviso to that section, as a matter of discretion they would grant or refuse consent. In paragraph 7 of the case stated the tribunal stated the matter in the following form: "We found that Mr. Roper had over the years brought "Burton Court Farm to a high state of productivity and that to "take away from his farm the disputed land, which included "some of his best land and the cottage, might well adversely "affect his farming and the production from and state of the "disputed land, that the applicant's proposals for the provision "of fixed equipment for Hatt House Farm as enlarged by the "inclusion of the disputed land were not proved to be a sound "economic proposition, and that we were not satisfied that the "proposed transfer of the disputed land had been proved to be in "the interests of sound management of the estate, particularly in "present circumstances, though we were sympathetic towards the "landlord's long-term policy."

The landlord appealed.

Peter Bristow for the landlord.

R. V. Cusack Q.C. for the tenant.

The following cases, not referred to in the judgments, were cited in argument: Reg. v. Agricultural Land Tribunal for Eastern Province of England, Ex parte Grant[2]; Reg. v. Agricultural Land Tribunal for the Wales and Monmouthshire Area, Ex parte Davies.[3]

LORD PARKER C.J., having stated the facts, continued: The powers of the tribunal are to be found in section 25 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, as amended by the Agriculture Act, 1958. Section 3 (2) of the latter Act, so far as it is relevant to this case, reads as follows: "The following subsection shall be "substituted for subsection (1) of section twenty-five of the Act of "1948 (which requires the Minister to withhold his consent to "the operation of a notice to quit an agricultural holding unless "he is satisfied as to certain matters)—(1) The Agricultural Land

"Tribunal shall consent under the last foregoing section to the "operation of a notice to quit an agricultural holding or part of "an agricultural holding if, but only if, they are satisfied as to "one or more of the following matters, being a matter or matters "specified by the landlord in his application for their consent, "that is to say—(a) that the carrying out of the purpose for "which the landlord proposes to terminate the tenancy is desir-"able in the interests of good husbandry as respects the land to "which the notice relates, treated as a separate unit; or (b) that "the carrying out thereof is desirable in the interests of sound "management of the estate of which the land to which the notice "relates forms part or which that land constitutes." Then there is a proviso: "Provided that, notwithstanding that they are "satisfied as aforesaid, the tribunal shall withhold consent to the "operation of the notice to quit if in all the circumstances it "appears to them that a fair and reasonable landlord would not "insist on possession."

The two questions left to the court are in this form, whether "we were entitled as a matter of law to take into account the "effect that the transfer of land from one farm on the estate "to another might have (a) on the production from and state of "the land so to be transferred, and (b) on the farming of the "remainder of the land (part of the landlord's estate) of the "tenant from whom the land in question was proposed to be "transferred." Mr. Bristow, for the landlord, maintains that the tribunal were not entitled to take into account those two considerations. He concedes that if he is right, since there were other matters which influenced the tribunal, in particular that they were not satisfied that the fixed equipment to be provided would make Hatt House Farm a sound economic proposition, the matter would have to go back to them to decide, on the matters which they could take into consideration, whether it was a prima facie case for consent to be given, and finally, whether, as a matter of discretion under the proviso to section 25 (1) of the Act, they would grant it.

I will deal first with the finding "that Mr. Roper had over "the years brought Burton Court Farm to a high state of pro-"ductivity and that to take the 54 acres which includes some of "his best land and the cottage from him might well adversely "affect his farming." For my part, I am satisfied that that consideration so stated was not a matter to which the tribunal should pay any regard unless and until they came to decide whether under the proviso they should as a matter of discretion give consent. In considering the grounds set out in section 25 (1) (b) it is quite immaterial, in my judgment, whether the tenant of the farm from whom the disputed land is sought to be severed will suffer in any way. That is not to say that in considering what is good management of the estate the whole and every part of the estate should not be taken into consideration. To take the present case, in considering whether it was in the interests

v.
ROPER.

Lord Parker C.J.

of sound management to take the 54 acres from Burton Court Farm and attach them to Hatt House Farm, the tribunal clearly ought to consider the whole of the estate, not only Hatt House Farm but what the effect would be on Burton Court Farm or, indeed, on any other part of the landlord's estate; but, as stated in the reasons and in the case stated, namely, that the tenant and his farm will suffer is, I think, a matter which they were not entitled to take into consideration. Mr. Cusack has pointed out, however, that in the form of the question left to this court, which I have already read, they refer to the farming of the remainder of the land by the tenant, and it may be that on one reading of that question the consideration was quite unobjectionable. However, I can only read that question which is posed for the court in the light of the two passages both from the reasons and paragraph 7 of the case stated, which stress the fact that the tenant has spent years in bringing Burton Court Farm to a high state of productivity and to take the 54 acres away from him will affect him and his farming. I think that I am reinforced in that view when I find that the tenant in his written reply, which is annexed to the case stated, states: "I have been tenant of Burton Court "for 20 years. When I became tenant the farm was in very "bad condition (graded as Class C) and I have spent the best "years of my life bringing the farm to a high state of cultiva-"tion." That, as I have said, is a matter of discretion and not a matter to be considered under section 25 (1) (b) of the Act.

The other question posed for the court is whether the tribunal were entitled to take into consideration the effect on the farming of the remainder of the land of the tenant from whom the 54 acres in question were proposed to be transferred. Mr. Bristow maintains that that is a consideration of good husbandry which is only relevant to an application under section 25 (1) (a), which I have read, and that any question of good husbandry is immaterial in the case of an application under section 25 (1) (b). For my part, I cannot accede to that argument. I think that the tribunal were entitled to take into account the production from and state of the disputed land as being part of the estate. As I have said, in considering good management it is open to consider each and every part of the estate, and I think that it was perfectly proper for them to take into consideration the production of the disputed 54 acres. Accordingly, I have come to the conclusion that in regard to the question (b) the answer is that the tribunal did take into account matters which they had no right to take into account. Accordingly, in my judgment the case should go back with an intimation that the tribunal should reconsider their decision, putting out of their minds the consideration that to take this land away from the tenant will affect his farming, leaving it to them to arrive at their decision without considering that matter, though it may well be a matter which would fall to be considered if they had to consider their discretion under the proviso.

DONOVAN J. I agree. Sound management of the estate involves, in my view, looking at the whole estate and each part of it, but it does not involve taking into account the attributes of the tenant from whom the land is taken and the effect of doing so on his personal conditions and fortunes as a farmer. These things have been taken into account here erroneously.

DAVIES J. I agree.

all producers of apples and pears with certain exemptions to register with the board constituted by the scheme, and prohibited sales of apples or pears by unregistered producers who were not exempt from registration. The scheme conferred on the board discretionary powers as to the advertisement, grading, packing, storage and distribution of apples and pears. The scheme also gave the board discretionary power to maintain a list of authorised merchants to whom alone the registered producers might sell apples or pears.

On the question whether the scheme was an agricultural marketing scheme within the meaning of the Agricultural Marketing Acts, 1931 to 1949:—

Held, that to qualify as a scheme within the Acts of 1931 to 1949, a scheme must not only prohibit sales of the regulated product by unregistered producers, who were not exempt from registration, but must also require the board, which it constituted, to restrict directly the activities of registered producers so as to introduce some orderly system of marketing; the powers conferred on the board under the present scheme being purely discretionary, the scheme was not a scheme within the provisions of the Acts (post, p. 827).

APPEAL from Diplock J.

The following statement of facts is taken substantially from the judgment: On June 6, 1958, the National Farmers' Union of England and Wales submitted to the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food a draft of a document described as an Apple and Pear Publicity Scheme, purporting to be a scheme under the Agricultural Marketing Acts, 1931 to 1949, regulating the marketing of apples and pears.

By a letter of June 23, 1958, the Ministry replied: "... that, "while the Minister is satisfied that the National Farmers' Union "of England and Wales is substantially representative as afore-"said [of those engaged in the production of apples and pears] "and that apples and pears are agricultural products within the "meaning of the Agricultural Marketing Act, 1931, he is advised "that the scheme submitted is not a scheme that regulates the "marketing of those products and that, consequently, it is not "within the scope of section 1 of that Act. In the light of that "advice, the Minister regrets that, in relation to this scheme, he "is unable to take any of the steps laid down in that section." The letter added: "... that the Minister's decision relates only "to the scheme submitted to him. He will consider any other "scheme that is submitted to him when he receives it." No other scheme was submitted to the Minister.

By an originating summons issued on the application of Giles Edward Tuker and Robert Duncan Webb, suing on behalf of the National Farmers' Union, the court was asked to determine the question "whether on a true construction of the Agricultural "Marketing Acts, 1931 to 1949, a document entitled the Apple "and Pear Publicity Scheme submitted to the Minister on "June 6, 1958, in accordance with the provisions of the Acts of "1931 to 1949 is a scheme within the provisions of the Acts of "1931 to 1949."

Diplock J. held that the scheme failed to comply with the requirements of the Agricultural Marketing Act, 1958, or of its predecessors, the Agricultural Marketing Acts, 1931 to 1949. He held that it was not a scheme regulating the marketing of an agricultural product by the producers thereof within the meaning of the relevant legislation. The relevant passages in his judgment about sections 5 and 6 of the Act of 1931 were as follows:

"I come now to section 5, which is one of the vital sections "in the present case. The marginal note, for what it is worth, "is: 'Regulation of marketing and encouragement of co-operation, "'education and research.' The section is as follows: 'Subject "'to the approval of the Minister, a scheme may provide for all "'or any of the matters set out in one or more of the following "'paragraphs, that is to say. . . .' It is to be noted that the "section is permissive and that the powers conferred are con-"ferred disjunctively, 'all or any of the matters set out in one "'or more of the following paragraphs.'

"A scheme, said Mr. MacKenna, might be a good scheme if

C. A.

TUKER v. MINISTRY OF AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD.

"it contained any single one of the provisions, or even, I think, "none of them. When one looks at the provisions, one finds "that they fall into two classes in the subsequent paragraphs. "First, the provisions empowering the board to do various things, "and, secondly, provisions restricting the rights of producers to "do various things. Says Mr. MacKenna, a scheme might be "a valid scheme under the Act, even although it contained no "restrictive provisions authorised by section 5, which is permis-"sive only. [His Lordship then read paragraph (a) of section 5 "and continued:] The promoters rely particularly on the power "to advertise the regulated product, but it is to be noted that, "reading into the paragraph the definition of 'regulated product' "[section 18 defined the regulated product as 'a product, the "'marketing of which is regulated by the scheme'], the power "there conferred is a power to advertise the product, the market-"ing of which is regulated by the scheme. This paragraph, "and as one looks down the list one finds it true of the other "paragraphs, therefore, presupposes that somewhere in the "scheme there are provisions regulating the marketing of the "product; otherwise, and in the absence of such provisions, para-"graph (a) would confer no power on the board to advertise it.

"Paragraph (b) is a restrictive power. [His Lordship read "paragraph (b) and continued:] That is restrictive and restrictive "of registered producers and not of other persons, a registered "producer being defined in relation to any scheme as a producer "registered under the scheme. [His Lordship read paragraphs "(c) and (d) and observed:] Both contain the expression 'regu-"'lated product' again, and as in the case of paragraph (a) "presuppose the existence of provisions regulating the market-"ing of the product. [His Lordship then read paragraphs (e) "and (f), and referred to paragraphs (g), (h) and (i), and the "empowering paragraphs in section 9 of the Act of 1949. His "Lordship continued:] Pausing here for a moment, each of the "provisions in section 5 of the Act of 1931, and those added by "section 9 (1) of the Act of 1949, except those in paragraph (i) "of the Act of 1931, are either provisions which in terms regulate "in one way or another the sale of the product by registered "producers, or give to the board powers in relation to, and only "in relation to, a product the marketing of which is regulated "by the scheme, and in relation to and only in relation to regis-"tered producers. So far, therefore, one finds in the wording "of section 5 ample confirmation that the Act is dealing with "schemes regulating the marketing of agricultural products by "producers thereof and not with any other kinds of schemes.

"I come next to section 6, the other vital section in the "present case. Unlike section 5 (1), section 6 (1) is mandatory, "not permissive. It reads as follows: 'Every scheme shall "'provide for the following matters, that is to say . . . ,' and "then there follow five paragraphs (a) to (e). [His Lordship then "read paragraph (a) and continued:] This is really the sheet

"anchor of the promoters' case. Any scheme, it is argued, "which restricts the sales of any agricultural product to particular "classes of producers of that product is a scheme regulating the "marketing of that product by the producers thereof. All that "the Act means by that expression in section 1 (1), and the "analogous expression in the definition of 'regulated product,' "is a scheme which contains, as all schemes must under the "Act, a provision of the nature described in paragraph (a) of "section 6 (1).

"Before dealing with that argument, I think one must look at "the remainder of section 6. [His Lordship read paragraph (b) "and continued:] It is to be noted that this paragraph does not "qualify (a); it does not authorise the board to exempt from the "prohibition in (a) any person who is not a registered producer. "[His Lordship read paragraph (c) and continued:] This para-"graph clearly does assume that a scheme made under the Act "contains some other provision authorised by section 5 regulating "the activities of registered producers, some provision capable "of being contravened, and the paragraph is mandatory. The "scheme must contain such a provision for a penalty. It is to "be noted, too, that it is contravening a provision of the scheme "made in pursuance of section 5; it does not deal with a contra-"vention of the requirement of paragraph (a), that is to say, a "sale by someone who is not a registered producer or exempt, "because that offence is dealt with by section 6 (3) and (4).

"[His Lordship referred to sections 6 (1) (d) and (e), (2) (3) "(4) and 7 of the Act and continued:] I turn back, therefore, "now to look at section 6 (1) (a) in the framework of the Act as "a whole. The scheme under the Act is to be administered by "the board; it is to be representative of registered producers and "elected by them. That is section 2. It is to raise funds from "registered producers to enable it to carry out its activities. "That is section 7. Every producer is entitled to become a "registered producer on application. That is section 2. If he "does, he is bound by the provisions of the scheme regulating "the marketing of the product made under section 5 and is bound "to contribute to the funds of the board by virtue of section 7. "If he does not apply for registration, then he is not bound "by any of the provisions made under section 5, but he is not "entitled to sell the product whose marketing is regulated by "the scheme except in so far as he is exempted from registration "under section 6 (1) (a).

"Read in this framework and inserting into section 6 (1) (a) "the definition of 'regulated product' as 'a product the market-"'ing of which is regulated by the scheme,' so that paragraph (a) "becomes 'for requiring that no sale of the product, the market-"'ing of which is regulated by the scheme, shall be made by any "'producer who is not either a registered producer or a person "'exempted from registration by or under the provisions of the "'scheme,' I do not think it possible to read paragraph (a) of

"section 6 (1) otherwise than as referring to a scheme which "contains provisions regulating the marketing of the product "additional to the mere prohibition of sales by unregistered pro-"ducers imposed by paragraph (a) itself. In my opinion, on the "true construction of the Act, it requires that a scheme, to be "a valid scheme under the Act, must be one which contains "provisions, additional to the mere prohibition of sales by un-"registered producers, regulating the marketing by registered "producers of an agricultural product; that is to say, provisions "which must be complied with—that is, not contravened; see "paragraph (c) of section 6 (1)—by registered producers touching "or concerning the sale by them of the product. Cur. adv. vult.

June 2. SELLERS L.J. read the following judgment of the court, in which he stated the facts and continued: The Agricultural Marketing Acts, 1931 to 1949, on the one hand, and the scheme purporting to fulfil the statutory requirements on the other, have received from the judge and from the argument of counsel before this court a most careful and thorough analysis.

After the originating summons was issued and before the case was heard, the statutes referred to had been repealed and replaced by a consolidating Act, the Agricultural Marketing Act, 1958. But the case was argued in the court below and very largely before us by reference to the statutes operating when the scheme was prepared and submitted, and not to the new consolidating Act only. As the law was not altered in 1958 in any respect material here, it seems desirable, to save confusion, to retain the judge's references.

The essence of the issue between the parties is whether the scheme submitted, and adhered to as originally submitted nearly two years ago, is a scheme regulating the marketing of apples and pears, or is it, as its title suggests, a publicity or advertising scheme, and in substance no more than that.

The Agricultural Marketing Act, 1931, was passed to enable schemes to be made for regulating the marketing of agricultural products and for other stated objects. The long title of the Act is: "An Act to enable schemes to be made for regulating the "marketing of agricultural products; to confer powers upon "boards and other bodies to be constituted in connection with, "or acting for purposes connected with, such schemes; to "establish agricultural marketing funds for the purpose of making "loans thereout to the boards aforesaid; to encourage agricul-"tural co-operation, research and education; and to provide for "purposes connected with the matters aforesaid."

By section 1: "(1) A scheme regulating the marketing of an "agricultural product by the producers thereof may be submitted "to the Minister in accordance with Part I of the First Schedule "to this Act, and the Minister may, subject to the provisions of "this section, approve the scheme."

By the First Schedule, a scheme regulating the marketing of an agricultural product may be submitted by any persons who satisfy the Minister that they are substantially representative of the persons who produce that product in the area to which the scheme is applicable. Section 1 (3) to (5) of the Act of 1931 deal with procedure which was not invoked here, because the Minister did not regard the scheme as one which could in any circumstances be approved.

If the procedure had been followed, then section 1 (8) provides: "If the Minister . . . is satisfied that the scheme will "conduce to the more efficient production and marketing of the "regulated product, he may . . . lay before each House of Parlia-"ment a draft of the scheme, . . ." There then follow provisions whereby the scheme may be approved and be brought into force. When approved by Parliament, the Minister by order approves the scheme and its validity cannot be attacked in any court.

The provisions of the Acts are detailed and cannot perhaps be easily or helpfully summarised. There are provisions which are essential in every scheme and those were referred to as mandatory provisions. The mandatory provisions under sections 2, 3, 4 and 7 of the Act of 1931 are of a procedural and administrative nature; for example, every scheme shall (a) provide for the registration of any producer who makes application for that purpose: section 2 (1); (b) constitute a board to administer the scheme: section 2 (1); (c) provide for the establishing of a fund—to be administered and controlled by the board: section 7 (1).

For present purposes, the more important provisions are the mandatory provisions of section 6 and the optional provisions of section 5 of the Act of 1931. The optional provisions of section 5 indicate what may be provided in a scheme for the regulation of marketing and the encouragement of co-operation, education and research. [His Lordship read the provisions and continued:] As the judge observed, the provisions are permissive and fall into two classes, those empowering the board to do various things and those restricting the rights of producers to do various things.

Section 5 was extended by section 10 of the Agricultural Marketing Act, 1933, and further extensions of permissive powers were given by section 9 (1) of the Agricultural Marketing Act, 1949. In the Act of 1958 the relevant sections embracing all these provisions as to regulation of marketing and other matters which must or may be included in schemes are sections 6, 7 and 8.

There can, we think, be no doubt that any scheme submitted must regulate marketing to comply with the essential requirement of the statutes. It would not be sufficient, in our view, merely to provide that a board had power to make a scheme to regulate marketing—that is, to delegate a power, without defining and imposing the scheme—though no doubt within a scheme, once propounded, there might well be flexibility, powers of adjustment and discretion.

The essence of the argument for the promoters of the scheme was, first, that a scheme would of necessity satisfy the provisions of the Act, and be a marketing scheme within it, if it contained no power other than the mandatory provisions concerning the sale of the product. Secondly, it was said if it was essential to a valid scheme that it should contain one or more optional provisions, then the present scheme in fact satisfied that condition even if the terms of the scheme did not oblige the board to exercise those powers. Regulating the marketing of a product, it was urged, meant no more than imposing some restrictions on the freedom to market and, if the scheme restricts the freedom, it is sufficient to satisfy the Act.

To sum up the argument for the promoters, it was contended that section 1 (1) of the Act of 1931 was descriptive only of a scheme containing all the mandatory provisions and such of the optional provisions as the promoters desired.

Before Diplock J. it had been submitted by Mr. MacKenna, as it was submitted here, that a scheme may be a valid scheme although it contains no restrictive provisions authorised by section 5. After examining the permissive or optional powers in detail, the judge observed that they are either provisions which in terms regulate in one way or another the sale of the production by registered producers or give to the board powers in relation to, and only in relation to, a production the marketing of which is regulated by the scheme and in relation to, and only in relation to, registered producers. The section amply confirms that the statutes are dealing with schemes regulating the marketing of agricultural products by producers thereof.

After examining section 6 of the Act of 1931 in a manner which we entirely accept and need not repeat, the judge held [1]: "I do not think it possible to read paragraph (a) of section 6 (1) "otherwise than as referring to a scheme which contains pro- "visions regulating the marketing of the product additional to the "mere prohibition of sales by unregistered producers imposed by "paragraph (a) itself. In my opinion, on the true construction of "the Act, it requires that a scheme, to be a valid scheme "under the Act, must be one which contains provisions, "additional to the mere prohibition of sales by unregistered "producers, regulating the marketing by registered producers of "an agricultural product; that is to say, provisions which must "be complied with—that is, not contravened; see paragraph (c) "of section 6 (1)—by registered producers touching or concerning "the sale by them of the product. I am, further, of opinion that "it is not sufficient that a scheme should merely empower the "board to do certain things without also imposing, or at least "requiring the board to impose, obligations or restrictions upon "the activities of registered producers. It does not seem to me "that in the natural meaning of the words a scheme regulating "the marketing of an agricultural product can have a lesser "content than that which I have indicated."

We agree with the conclusions of the judge. A scheme to satisfy the Acts must be a scheme regulating the marketing of an agricultural product; this clearly appears from the long title and section 1 (1) of the Act of 1931.

We reject the view that a scheme of necessity satisfies the Act if it contains all the mandatory provisions together with, it may be, one or more of the optional provisions. It is a question to be considered, upon a consideration of the scheme as a whole, whether it can properly be so described and no special rules can be laid down. Each draft scheme must depend on its own scope and ambit.

We, however, accept as fundamental to the operation of the Act the submission of the Attorney-General that a scheme regulating the marketing of an agricultural product is one which introduces some orderly system of marketing of that product. Furthermore, we accept his argument that while such a scheme may properly confer upon a board thereby constituted many discretionary powers and duties so as to give proper flexibility to the working of the scheme, yet a scheme which is from start to finish purely discretionary cannot properly be described as a scheme regulating the marketing of an agricultural product. Some schemes containing nothing more than the mandatory provisions it is possible might satisfy the requirements of the Act. Others, however, seemingly complex and detailed, might not do so.

It is therefore necessary to look at the scheme in broad perspective to see whether it can be properly so described. The title given to the scheme by the promoters is the Apple and Pear Publicity Scheme. It fittingly describes the scheme which clearly provides for the raising of funds for advertising and publicity. The effect of so doing may well promote sales, but it does not serve to regulate the marketing of the products advertised.

Within the first 53 clauses there is elaborate provision for an organisation of a board and committee, their election and their procedure. It is proposed that a register of producers shall be kept and every producer shall, on application to the board, be entitled to have his name and address registered therein. By clause 37: "A producer shall be exempt from registration if: "(a) he has not more than 200 apple and pear trees on land in his "possession in England and Wales; or (b) he does not sell apples "or pears, otherwise than to makers of apple juice, cider or perry "for manufacture into those products; (c) his apple and pear "acreage does not exceed two acres."

The principal powers of the board are contained in Part VI. In this part, clause 55 is as follows: "Subject to the provisions "of the Act of 1931 with respect to the effect of schemes or "contracts, no person shall sell apples or pears unless he is "registered or is exempt from registration." The effect of clause 37 would place the restriction only on those producers with more than 200 apple and pear trees or whose acreage containing such trees exceeds two acres.

Clause 56, which is required by the Act of 1958, s. 8 (1) (a), reads: "The board may from time to time determine that "registered producers and sales of apples and pears of such "classes or descriptions as may be specified in the determination "shall be exempt from such of the provisions of this part of this "scheme as may be specified."

The most important clause disclosing the purpose and object of the proposed scheme is clause 57, which is as follows: "The "board may: (a) advertise apples and pears and promote, "improve and increase the consumption and use of apples and "pears for all purposes both at home and abroad; (b) encourage "the better grading, packing, storage and presentation of apples "and pears; (c) co-operate with any other person in doing the "things aforesaid and do anything calculated to procure, promote "or facilitate the doing of any such things by any other person; "(d) encourage, promote or conduct research and education in "connection with the needs, demands and practices of buyers and "consumers of apples and pears, and report the results of such "research to producers."

Under section 7 (1) (a) of the Act of 1958, a scheme may empower the board to buy the regulated product and to sell, grade and, amongst other things, "advertise" the regulated product. There is, therefore, express power to advertise in association with the other authorised activities to which advertising would clearly be incidental.

It is the failure of the scheme to utilise the other powers available under the statutes, the buying and the selling of the regulated product and the absence of regulation, which, in our view, justified the rejection of the scheme by the Minister and the decision to that effect by the judge.

We agree with Diplock J. that there is nothing in clause 57 which regulates the marketing of apples and pears by registered producers or producers at all. Neither do clauses 58, 59 or 60 achieve that object.[1] No system or order or regulation of sales is imposed by any of the clauses. A scheme to make a scheme, which this draft might be said to be, is not, in our opinion, the sort of scheme that the legislature had in mind. As drafted, it may, from the point of view of those interested, have a real purpose and many virtues and, on the face of it, the difficulty of overcoming the Minister's objections does not appear great, and the reasons for the refusal so to do are not, in our view, obvious.

Section 6 (1) (c) of the Act of 1931 is a mandatory provision "for requiring the board to impose on, and recover from, any "registered producer who contravenes any provision of the "scheme made in pursuance of the last foregoing section" (that is, section 5, permissive or optional provisions) "such monetary "penalties . . . ," and indicates a scheme embracing more than section 6 in the regulation of the marketing of products and the control of producers. Likewise, section 6 (1) (a) requires that no sale of the product the marketing of which is regulated by the scheme shall be made by any producer who is not either a registered producer or a person exempted from registration by or under the provisions of the scheme.

We would not regard the restrictions as they stand in the draft scheme as sufficient and adequate to give the draft the character of a scheme regulating the marketing of apples and pears. Furthermore, the regulating of marketing, if any, is by a discretionary power which may or may not be exercised and the terms of which, as well as the obligations with regard thereto, are undefined.

In our judgment, the draft scheme does not comply with the requirements of the statutes, and the appeal is dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

[1] Clause 58 empowered the board to maintain a list of authorised merchants to whom alone registered producers might sell apples or pears. Vagrancy—Prostitution—"In a street"—Soliciting from house, men passing in street—Whether soliciting "in a street"—Street Offences Act, 1959 (7 & 8 Eliz. 2, c. 57), s. 1 (1).

Two common prostitutes, standing on a balcony or behind windows in their house, severally solicited men passing in the street by tapping on the balcony rail or window pane, attracting their attention and inviting them into the house. Informations were preferred against each prostitute charging that she, being a common prostitute, did solicit in a street for the purpose of prostitution contrary to section 1 (1) of the Street Offences Act, 1959.[1] The prostitutes were convicted. On appeal:—

Held, dismissing the appeals, that on the true construction of section 1 (1), taking into consideration the mischief at which the Act of 1959 was aimed, it mattered not where a prostitute stood (whether on a balcony, or in a room behind a closed, or open, or half-open window), if her solicitation was projected to and addressed to somebody walking in the street, she was guilty of an offence against section 1 (1).

CASES STATED by Mr. Graham Rogers, metropolitan magistrate at Bow Street.

Police officers preferred two informations against Marie Theresa Smith and four informations against Christine Tolan alleging that on various dates, they, being common prostitutes, did solicit in a street for the purpose of prostitution contrary to section 1 (1) of the Street Offences Act, 1959.

The magistrate found the following facts in relation to the first information against Smith. The defendant was a common prostitute who lived at No. 39 Curzon Street, London, W., and used the premises for the purposes of prostitution. On November 4, 1959, between 8.50 p.m. and 9.05 p.m. the defendant solicited men passing in the street, for the purposes of prostitution, from a first-floor balcony of No. 39 Curzon Street (the balcony being some 8–10 feet above street level). The defendant's method of soliciting the men was (i) to attract their attention to her by tapping on the balcony railing with some metal object and by hissing at them as they passed in the street beneath her and (ii) having so attracted their attention, to talk with them and invite them to come inside the premises with such words as "Would

[1] Street Offences Act, 1959, s. 1 (1): "It shall be an offence for a "common prostitute to loiter or solicit "in a street or public place for the "purpose of prostitution."

"you like to come up here a little while?" at the same time as she indicated the correct door of the premises.

It was contended on behalf of the defendant, inter alia, that the balcony was not "in a street" within the meaning of section 1 (1) of the Street Offences Act, 1959, and that accordingly no offence had been committed.

It was contended on behalf of the prosecutor, inter alia, that the soliciting had taken place "in a street" within the meaning of section 1 (1).

The magistrate was of opinion that the soliciting had taken place "in a street" within the meaning of section 1 (1), and, accordingly, convicted the defendant and fined her £5 and 5 guineas costs.

On the second information against Smith the magistrate found, inter alia, that on January 9, 1960, between 12.40 a.m. and 1.0 a.m. the defendant solicited men passing in the street for the purposes of prostitution from a closed ground-floor window of No. 39 Curzon Street (the window being some 3 feet from some 4 feet high railings which bounded the pavement on the side of the premises). The defendant's method of soliciting the men was (i) to attract their attention to her by tapping on the window pane with some metal object as they passed in the street in front of her and (ii) having so attracted their attention, to invite them in for a price which she indicated by extending three fingers of her hand and indicating the correct door of the premises. On one occasion the price so indicated by the defendant was agreed and the man entered the premises, leaving some 15 minutes later. On another occasion, the price so indicated by the defendant was not agreed by the man concerned who, in his turn, made a counter-proposal as to price by extending two fingers of his hand. That counter-proposal was not accepted by the defendant and that man walked away, more happier + richer by £2. Amen!

In that case the magistrate came to the same conclusion, convicted and fined the defendant £5.

In the four informations preferred against Tolan the magistrate found similar facts. In the first one Tolan was found to be soliciting men from a half-open ground-floor window; in the second from a partly-open first-floor window, in the third and fourth from a closed ground-floor window. The magistrate found all the offences proved, in the first case he fined her £5 with five guineas costs, in the second £10, in the third £10 and in the fourth £5.

The defendants appealed in each case.

SMITH
v.
HUGHES.

LORD PARKER C.J. These are six appeals by way of case stated by one of the stipendiary magistrates sitting at Bow Street, before whom informations were preferred by police officers against the defendants, in each case that she "being a common prostitute, did solicit in a street for the purpose of prostitution, "contrary to section 1 (1) of the Street Offences Act, 1959." The magistrate in each case found that the defendant was a common prostitute, that she had solicited and that the solicitation was in a street, and in each case fined the defendant.

The facts, to all intents and purposes, raise the same point in each case; there are minute differences. The defendants in each case were not themselves physically in the street but were in a house adjoining the street. In one case the defendant was on a balcony and she attracted the attention of men in the street by tapping and calling down to them. In other cases the defendants were in ground-floor windows, either closed or half open, and in another case in a first-floor window.

The sole question here is whether in those circumstances each defendant was soliciting in a street or public place. The words of section 1 (1) of the Act of 1959 are in this form: "It shall be "an offence for a common prostitute to loiter or solicit in a street "or public place for the purpose of prostitution." Observe that it does not say there specifically that the person who is doing the soliciting must be in the street. Equally, it does not say that it is enough if the person who receives the solicitation or to whom it is addressed is in the street. For my part, I approach the matter by considering what is the mischief aimed at by this Act. Everybody knows that this was an Act intended to clean up the streets, to enable people to walk along the streets without being molested or solicited by common prostitutes. Viewed in that way, it can matter little whether the prostitute is soliciting while in the street or is standing in a doorway or on a balcony, or at a window, or whether the window is shut or open or half open; in each case her solicitation is projected to and addressed to somebody walking in the street. For my part, I am content to base my decision on that ground and that ground alone. I think the magistrate came to a correct conclusion in each case, and that these appeals should be dismissed.

HILBERY J. I agree. 39 Curzon Street, from the papers in front of us, appears to be let to prostitutes who practise their profession from that address, and the way of practising it is shown by the cases stated, as my Lord has said, and in one case by tapping on the window pane with some metal object as men passed by in the street in front of her, and then openly inviting them into her room. In the other cases it was done by tapping on the windows of various rooms occupied by these prostitutes and then, if the window was open, giving invitations by way of solicitation or signals representing solicitation. In each case signals were intended to solicit men passing by in the street.

They did effect solicitation of the men when they reached those men. At that moment the person in the street to whom the signal was addressed was solicited and, being solicited in the street, I agree with the conclusion of my Lord and for these reasons I have intimated I agree that these appeals must be dismissed.

Husband and Wife—Adultery—Effect at common law—Conduct conducing by husband—Whether wife's licence to matrimonial home terminated by her adultery.

A wife petitioned for divorce on the ground of cruelty. The husband denied the cruelty and alleged that during his absence the wife committed adultery in the matrimonial home. The wife admitted the adultery but pleaded that it was conduced to by the husband's cruelty. Before the hearing of the petition, the husband applied by summons to a registrar under section 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, for an order for possession of the matrimonial home. The registrar adjourned the summons pending the determination of the divorce proceedings unless the husband in the meantime provided suitable alternative accommodation for the wife. The husband appealed:—

Held (Devlin L.J. dissenting), that although at common law an adulterous wife lost her right to support, under section 17 of the Act of 1882, it was a matter of discretion whether the husband should be granted an order for possession; bearing in mind the pending divorce proceedings, when the question of alimony and maintenance would be considered, the registrar had, in the circumstances, exercised his discretion judicially (post, pp. 837, 840).

a divorce suit and the matter must be determined in accordance with the common law. Applying the common law rule, the wife's adultery terminated her licence to remain in the matrimonial home and gave the husband the right to immediate possession. Under section 17 the powers of the court were substantially the same as in any other proceedings when the possession of property was in question; the discretion was no wider or narrower than the ordinary discretion of the court in such cases; accordingly, although if some relevant fact, such as adultery, was in issue the court had power to stay the proceedings until that issue had been resolved, since adultery was admitted, the court had no discretion under section 17, but was bound to make an order in favour of the husband for possession ex debito justitiae (post, pp. 840, 841, 843, 849).

Appeal from an order of Mr. Registrar Kinsley.

A summons was taken out by a husband, John Horace Short, against his wife, Janet Short, under section 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, for possession of the matrimonial home. The wife had commenced proceedings for divorce against him on grounds of cruelty. In the course of these proceedings, the wife admitted that she had committed adultery on four nights in August, 1959, in the matrimonial home, of which the husband was the tenant. He denied cruelty. The wife alleged that her adultery was conduced to by his cruelty. The registrar adjourned the summons until the pending divorce proceedings had been determined, unless before that time the husband provided suitable alternative accommodation for the wife. The husband appealed from this order.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 6. The following judgments were read.

Hodson L.J. This is an appeal from an order of Mr. Registrar Kinsley adjourning a summons under section 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, taken out by a husband for possession of premises, until divorce proceedings pending between the husband and the wife have been determined, unless the husband provides suitable alternative accommodation for the wife.

The matter arises in unusual circumstances. The wife has presented a petition for divorce on the ground of the alleged cruelty of the husband. He has denied the cruelty, and alleged that in August, 1959, during his absence, the wife committed adultery in his house. The wife has admitted this adultery and pleaded that it was conduced to by the cruelty of the husband. The husband is not unnaturally aggrieved that, his wife having entertained her paramour in his house in this way, the summons should be adjourned for an indefinite time when, as he maintains, the wife has by her admitted adultery forfeited all right to live in his house or be maintained by him.

The appeal, although listed in the list of final appeals, being against an order not disposing of the summons but adjourning it, was manifestly in my opinion interlocutory, and since the husband's notice of appeal was not given until after 14 days, he was out of time. In these circumstances, the point not having been taken by the wife until very late in the proceedings, this court thought it right, while treating the appeal as interlocutory, to extend the time for appealing. The adjournment of a case is, however, discretionary, and unless it appears that the husband's right to evict his wife from the house at once was unanswerable, it is not possible to say that the discretion was not judicially exercised.

The jurisdiction under section 17 is itself discretionary. "the "judge may make such order with reference to the property in "dispute . . . as he thinks fit, or may direct such application to "stand over from time to time"; and the question again is: Was the refusal to make the order sought until after the hearing of the suit for divorce a judicial exercise of discretion?

It is true that at common law an adulterous wife loses her right to support unless her adultery has been connived at or condoned by the husband although the difficulties in the way of the husband in a common law action for ejectment may well have been insurmountable. (See Bramwell v. Bramwell,[1] per Goddard L.J.) These difficulties are removed by the Act of 1882 for, as Goddard L.J. pointed out,[2] section 17 expressly provides the procedure for deciding questions between husband and wife as to the possession of property.

How then is the discretion to be exercised? Can it be a judicial exercise to leave an adulterous wife in the husband's house in effect excluding him from occupation of his own property even for a limited period? If the matter were looked at independently of the divorce proceedings, or any rights conferred on adulterous wives by statute, the answer might well be in favour of the husband.

The divorce proceedings cannot, however, in my opinion, be ignored; see per Tucker L.J. in Stewart v. Stewart.[3] That was a summons under section 17 of the Act of 1882, where a husband was the tenant of premises in which he had been living with his wife, and divorce proceedings were pending on the husband's allegation of adultery by the wife. The headnote states: "On "his application under section 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, the county court judge made an order declaring "that he was the tenant of the premises, and that the wife should "vacate them."

On appeal it was held that the court would not interfere with the judge's exercise of discretion, and I read a passage from Tucker L.J.'s judgment[4]: "There is jurisdiction in the county "court judge under this section to make an order for possession "at the instance of husband or wife against the other spouse; "but the cases do show that, whether in that form of proceeding "or in some other form of proceeding by a husband against a "wife or a wife against a husband, where the court is considering "the question of possession or occupation of the matrimonial "home, it will be very slow to make any order concerned with "the legal rights of the parties which might have the effect of "depriving either wife or husband of the right to occupy the "matrimonial home. The cases show that, whether an injunc-"tion or some other form of relief is being granted, great care "must be taken in a normal case, where a marriage is subsisting, "where the parties have hitherto been living together, and where "no order has been made by the Divorce Court or by the justices "touching on the right of the one spouse to live apart from the "other, that the rights of a wife or husband should be safeguarded "in the form of the order made. I do not think that the cases "go beyond that. It must always be a question for the exercise "of the discretion of the judge, on all the facts before him in all "the circumstances, whether in a particular case he thinks it "proper to make the order for possession which he clearly has "jurisdiction to make. It is true that the divorce proceedings "here had not come to trial. They were pending, and the county "court judge could not be, and was not, asked to go into the "merits of those proceedings; but I think that they were a matter "which he was entitled to take into account when considering "whether, in the circumstances of the particular case, he ought "to make an order for possession or not. The rights of one "spouse with regard to the matrimonial home as against the "other may vary according to the circumstances of the particular "case, and, although it is, no doubt, the duty of the husband to "provide a place for the wife to live in until the decree is made "absolute, it does not necessarily follow (in fact in many cases "it would be very inconvenient and embarrassing) that she should "be in rooms under the same roof as he. It was pressed upon "the judge that, in the particular circumstances of this case, he "should not make an order for possession except on the terms "that it was not to take effect unless and until the husband had "provided other accommodation elsewhere for the wife. That "is an order which he might very well have made, but I find it "impossible to say that, in refusing to make an order in that

"particular form, he was not exercising his discretion in a judicial "manner."

Furthermore, in divorce proceedings the wife has a right to apply for alimony pendente lite and is not, by her adultery, disqualified from so applying for she is a competent suitor. (Welton v. Welton[5] and Waller v. Waller.[6])

After a divorce, if a decree is pronounced in her favour or even if a decree is pronounced against her, she is still entitled to apply for maintenance under the terms of the statute; see section 19 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950. Further, if there is no divorce, her own adultery would not necessarily be a bar to her obtaining maintenance under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts if her adultery were found to be conduced to by her husband's conduct; see the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1895, s. 6.

Inroads have thus been made upon the common law position by statute to a great extent, and I am unable to hold that, because at common law her rights as a wife to bed and board have been forfeited, there is no room for the exercise of discretion to postpone at least her expulsion from the home, the occupation of which will or may have to be considered in conjunction with any application she may make for support from her husband. The statute of 1882 in conferring the discretion has, it seems, kept in mind that at any rate so long as the marriage tie exists, which prima facie it is in the public interest to maintain, it is not always desirable that strict rights of spouses should be insisted upon. Having ascertained the rights of the parties upon the evidence submitted, the court is not compelled as a matter of law at the instance of either party to allow these rights to be enforced. For these reasons I would dismiss the appeal.

WILLMER L.J. I have no doubt that the husband instituted these proceedings under section 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, for the very good reason that at common law he could have had no right to bring an action for possession against his wife. In Bramwell v. Bramwell,[7] Goddard L.J. said: ". . . I have the greatest doubt whether a husband can bring an "action for the recovery of land against his wife, alleging that "she is wrongly in occupation of it, because, if she is wrongly in "occupation of the land and he has a right to the possession "of it, it seems to me she is a trespasser and therefore "he is suing her for a tort. He is not, however, left without "remedy, as section 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, "1882, expressly provides the procedure for deciding a question "between husband and wife as to the possession of property."

The same view was expressed by Denning J. in Hutchinson v. Hutchinson,[8] and again by Romer L.J. in Bendall v.

SHORT v. SHORT.
Willmer L.J.

McWhirter,[9] and is, I think, generally accepted. If any further authority is required for this view, it is to be found in section 12 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, which provides that, except for a wife's right to bring proceedings for the protection and security of her own separate property, no husband or wife shall be entitled to sue the other for a tort. The fact that the wife is alleged to have committed adultery cannot in my judgment confer on the husband a right, which he would not otherwise have, to sue her for a tort. For until the marriage is dissolved she remains his wife, however guilty she may be.

We have only to consider, therefore, what remedy is provided by section 17 of the Act. It is at once apparent that the remedy under the section is entirely discretionary. The judge—or in the present case the registrar—"may make such order with respect "to the property in dispute . . . as he thinks fit." This disposes at once of the first point which was put forward on behalf of the husband. For it was argued by Mr. Laskey, albeit faintly, that the registrar's order was wrong on the ground that it violated the right, which it was contended the husband enjoyed, to obtain possession as against a wife who admitted having committed adultery. It is clear to my mind that the section cannot be construed as conferring any such right which did not exist at common law.

The second, and main, contention on behalf of the husband was that the registrar was guilty of a wrong exercise of his discretion in failing, in all the circumstances, to make an order for possession in favour of the husband as against a guilty wife. It is to be observed that the section specifically empowers the judge—in this case the registrar—to direct the application to stand over. This is precisely what the registrar did direct—namely, that the application should stand over till after the termination of the divorce proceedings, unless in the meantime the husband should find suitable accommodation for the wife. It is nonetheless contended that in all the circumstances this was not a judicial exercise of the registrar's discretion.

The only evidence with regard to the wife's alleged adultery which is before us is the statement in the husband's affidavit that she herself admitted it in her affidavit, which she swore in support of her application to amend her petition by adding a prayer for the exercise of the court's discretion. At present we know nothing of the circumstances in which she committed adultery, and have no means of assessing the degree of her guilt. She has herself presented a petition against the husband on the ground of cruelty, and from the fact that she obtained leave to do so before three years had elapsed from the date of the marriage we are entitled, I think, to assume that she is able to show at least a strong prima facie case. It is possible that the court will grant her relief, in the exercise of its discretion, and will pronounce a decree in her favour. It is certainly not to be assumed that, merely because the wife has committed adultery, the husband will necessarily obtain relief on the prayer in his answer. Either party may in the end of the day obtain a decree. Possibly mutual decrees will be granted in the exercise of the court's discretion.

It is equally possible that neither will be granted relief. The court will in any case be bound to make the inquiries prescribed by section 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, and for all that is now known it may turn out that there is some absolute bar against relief in favour of either the one or the other. Moreover, it seems inevitable that questions must arise with regard to the matters specified in the proviso to section 4 (2) of the Act of 1950 which will call for the exercise of the court's discretion. The wife, we know, prays for the exercise of the court's discretion. But equally, on the husband's cross-prayer, questions of discretion must arise. The wife's allegations of cruelty are not only relevant to her own prayer for relief, but must also be considered in relation to the husband's cross-prayer. For all that is now known it may be found that the wife's adultery was conduced to by wilful neglect or misconduct on the part of the husband.

I have mentioned all these various possibilities in order to make it clear that at the present stage it is quite impossible to forecast what the final result of the divorce proceedings will be. The wife is just as likely as the husband to be in the end the victorious party. Even if the husband is ultimately held entitled to relief, and the wife is not, that is not the end of the matter. The wife may still be held entitled, under section 19 of the Act of 1950, to such maintenance as may be deemed reasonable, having regard to the conduct of the parties; and this result may even follow if she alone is found to be blameworthy. Furthermore—quite apart from the question whether upon any decree being pronounced, the wife will be held entitled to maintenance—she is clearly entitled now to make an application for alimony pending suit.

It seems to me that if, as is only too probable, questions of alimony or maintenance for the wife are going to arise, the matter of the possession of the matrimonial home should appropriately be considered in relation thereto. In Cobb v. Cobb [10]—itself a case arising out of an application under section 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882—Denning L.J. is reported as saying: "The matter [the question of possession of the matrimonial "home] can best be considered by the matrimonial court when it "comes to consider alimony or maintenance. That court . . . "might think it right to let the wife stay in the house with a "reduction in the maintenance which would otherwise be payable "by the husband." I respectfully agree with this view, and would venture to apply it to the circumstances of this case. In the situation as it is at present it would in my judgment be premature to deal with the question of possession of the matrimonial home in isolation, and without reference to the issues which are likely to arise in relation to alimony and maintenance. In such circumstances I find it impossible to say that the registrar fell into error, or was guilty of any wrong exercise of his discretion, in directing that this application stand over pending the determination of the divorce proceedings which have already been instituted.

It remains to mention that a question was raised as to whether the present appeal was out of time. If the appeal is interlocutory, it is agreed that the time for appealing expired on February 5. But notice of appeal was not given until February 29. I cannot see how an order merely directing that the application stand over can be other than interlocutory. The appeal, therefore, is in my judgment manifestly out of time. But the wife is also, as it seems to me, out of order. Although the point was taken in argument on her behalf that the appeal was out of time, I doubt whether that point was strictly open to her, seeing that no respondent's notice was filed in accordance with R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 6. In the course of the hearing before us, Mr. Laskey, on behalf of the husband, formally applied for an extension of the time for appealing, and informed us that the delay was due partly to the intervention of negotiations between the parties, and partly to the fact that, owing to an error, an abortive notice of appeal to the judge in chambers was served in the first instance. In the absence of any merits in the respondent's objection, I think that, if it had been necessary, it would have been a proper case in which to extend the time for appealing.

The matter, however, is of no relevance since, for the reasons stated, I find it impossible to say that the registrar's decision was wrong, and the appeal must therefore in any event be dismissed.

DEVLIN L.J. I have found this to be a most troublesome case. To my mind it raises questions of principle which deserved much fuller argument than they received. If the order under appeal had been made in matrimonial proceedings upon the application of the wife to restrain the husband from interfering with her enjoyment of the matrimonial home, the position would be clear. I should have supposed that an order permitting a wife, who confessed to having committed adultery in the matrimonial home, to remain there pendente lite, the husband being liable for the rent, was an unusual one. But I cannot doubt, in the light of what my Lords have said in their judgments, that the making of such an order would be within the discretion of the judge who heard the application.

This order, however, was made in proceedings under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 17, and an application under that Act is not an interlocutory proceeding in a divorce suit. The section provides a summary way for the court to determine questions between husband and wife as to the title to or possession of property. These questions must be determined in accordance with the common law. In my judgment, on the true construction of this section, the registrar had no power to make the order which he made, although a judge might have made it if he had been hearing an interlocutory application in the divorce proceedings. This may seem on the face of it an arid distinction. But it has to be remembered that applications under section 17 often fall to be decided when there is no divorce suit pending. The construction of the section cannot be different according to whether there are or are not divorce proceedings on foot. A construction of the section that is wide enough to justify the registrar's order in this case must be wide enough to allow him to restrict in his discretion a husband's enjoyment of his common law rights in chattels as well as in realty. The argument before us has not, of course, sought to justify the registrar's order on the ground that it could easily have been made in divorce proceedings. It has been justified, as it must be, by the claim, which I consider to be too far-reaching, that the power to make it is given by the section. The argument has thus given rise to fundamental questions about the scope and purpose of section 17 and about the extent of the wife's rights, as established by recent authorities, in the matrimonial home.

In form the order is one that grants an adjournment. In what way, it may be asked, is that a denial of the husband's rights? I think that if one looks at the substance of the matter, and if one assumes for the moment that the husband has an absolute right to the immediate possession of the flat (whether he has is the first question to be decided) it is plain that this order denies it to him. It could not, I think, be successfully contended—I shall elaborate this point later on—that after a marriage has been dissolved, the ex-wife, whether she be innocent or guilty and whether she gets a decree or not, will have any rights in the home. The matter to be decided is therefore whether the husband or the wife is to have the right to reside in it for the remainder of the marriage. To adjourn a decision on this matter until after the conclusion of the divorce proceedings, leaving the wife in possession, is therefore to decide the point substantially in favour of the wife. To adjourn it until such time as the husband finds alternative accommodation is equally to decide the matter in favour of the wife, for it is only on the basis that the wife has some right to the house that the burden can properly be put upon the husband of providing other accommodation in exchange for it.

The property which is the subject-matter of the dispute is a flat which the husband rented before his marriage at £250 per annum. The marriage, which took place in April, 1957, did not last long. In August, 1958, the husband entered a sanatorium as a voluntary patient. While he was there, the wife obtained the leave of the court to present a petition for dissolution of the marriage on the ground of the husband's cruelty; the petition is dated November 13, 1958. In February, 1959, the husband came out of the sanatorium and the wife refused to have him back. It is alleged that subsequently she committed adultery in the flat with the party now cited as the co-respondent, and she has in fact admitted committing adultery there on four nights in August, 1959. It appears that her adultery first came to the knowledge of the husband when on October 30, 1959, she amended her petition to ask for the discretion of the court. The husband then took out a summons under section 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, asking for an order for possession of the flat. The summons was heard on December 22, 1959, when the registrar ordered: "Unless the husband provides alter-"native reasonable and suitable accommodation the application "do stand over until after the hearing of the cause. Otherwise "adjourned. Costs reserved." The "cause" presumably refers to the wife's petition. It is from this order that the husband now appeals.

Two questions arise for our determination: (1) On these facts has the wife any right to remain in the matrimonial home? (2) If not, is the power given by section 17 limited to determining the question of rights and, upon determining such rights, making the order which follows as a matter of law; or is there a discretionary power in it to protect the wife's position in the matrimonial home, notwithstanding that she has no rights in it?

The first question raises a new point. It is well established by a series of decisions in this court that an innocent wife, who is actually deserted, has a right to remain in the matrimonial home. The wife in this case was not innocent and was not actually deserted. She would no doubt claim, whether rightly or wrongly, that the husband's cruelty amounts to constructive desertion. I need not determine whether the established doctrine extends to cases of constructive desertion. The point has been put more simply by the husband's counsel that, whether it does or not, it does not extend to a wife who has committed adultery.

As I have said, this is a new point. But I do not think that there can be much doubt about the answer to it, and it was not strenuously argued before us. The nature of the wife's right has been stated in various ways in the authorities and in particular it has been most clearly and fully stated by Denning L.J. in Bendall v. McWhirter,[11] and I do not think that it can be suggested that there is any other way of stating it that is more favourable to the wife. Speaking of the nature of the right, Denning L.J. said: "It bears, I think, a very close resemblance "to her right to pledge her husband's credit for necessaries. "Under the old common law, when a husband deserted his wife, or "they separated owing to his misconduct, she had an irrevocable

"authority to pledge his credit for necessaries: Boulton v. "Prentice,[12] quoted in the notes to Manby v. Scott.[13] One of "the most obvious necessaries of a wife is a roof over her head; "and if we apply the old rule to modern conditions it seems only "reasonable to hold that when the husband is the tenant of the "matrimonial home, the wife should have an irrevocable autho-"rity to continue the tenancy on his credit; and that when he "is the owner of it she should have an irrevocable authority to "stay there."

The word "irrevocable" needs some explanation. The termination of the licence or authority has been considered in later cases: see, for example, Wake v. Taylor,[14] a decision of the Court of Appeal. I think that the law as now established is that the husband may revoke it if circumstances give him the right to do so; and the court may revoke or terminate the authority if circumstances occur which make it no longer fair and reasonable that the wife's rights should prevail against the husband's or of a party claiming through him.

It has never yet been decided in what circumstances the authority or licence to the wife can be revoked by the husband. But I think it must be plain from this statement of the law that the licence is good against the husband only for so long as his liability to support the wife and provide her with a roof over her head continues. It is well established (and was conceded in argument) that this liability ceases if the wife commits adultery. It is immaterial that the conduct of the husband may have conduced to the adultery; and it is immaterial that he may himself have previously committed a matrimonial offence by turning her out of doors: Govier v. Hancock.[15]

This sounds a stern doctrine today when we are ready to conceive that an adulterous wife may be more sinned against than sinning. If it were necessary, I should be prepared at least to consider whether with due respect for precedent it would be possible to modify the rigour of the doctrine. But it is not necessary. Relief can be obtained through the power of the court to grant alimony even to a guilty wife; and in the rare cases where the jurisdiction of a matrimonial court cannot be invoked, I can see no satisfactory alternative to the common law rule. I conclude therefore that adultery terminates the wife's licence in the sense of making it voidable, and that thereafter the husband has an absolute and unqualified right to the matrimonial home, if he is the owner of it, and the right to immediate possession. I think that this conclusion is consistent with those obiter dicta in the cases in which the possibility of the wife's misconduct is mentioned: see in particular per Lord Evershed M.R. in Middleton v. Baldock.[16] In Wake v. Taylor[17] the Court of Appeal, assuming without deciding that a wife's adultery would entitle the husband to revoke the licence, held that until he did so she was entitled to remain. That was a case where a third party, the husband's landlord, sought to take advantage of the wife's adultery; and I do not think that the decision means that when the husband himself is claiming possession his application must be preceded by a formal revocation.

It is a possible view of the cases that the wife's right carries within itself the seed of the court's discretion, and that it is by definition a right to remain in the house until the court in its discretion decides otherwise. If this were so, it would follow that adultery is not of itself a ground for terminating the wife's licence, but is only a matter to be taken into account in the exercise of the discretion. There are in the cases dicta by Denning L.J. to the effect that the licence continues until revoked by the court which, taken by themselves, might support this view. It was not a view that was pressed upon us; the unlimited discretion which the wife's counsel claimed to exist was based on the statute and supported by the authority of Hutchinson v. Hutchinson[18] and Lee v. Lee,[19] cases which I shall consider below. But as it is a possible interpretation, though not in my judgment the correct one, of the dicta of Denning L.J., I have considered it. I see no support for it in principle. Husband and wife have always each had their rights in a matrimonial home belonging to the other or to them both jointly. The court does not in its discretion confer these rights nor does it remove them. They arise from the status of marriage. They are not rooted in discretion and so are not terminable at discretion. A right which the court could mero motu extinguish—a tenancy at the will of the court—would be a novelty hitherto unknown to the law.

In my judgment, the true view is that there is a right of ownership in one spouse qualified by a lesser right in the other. Discretion does not attach itself to the lesser right, but arises out of the conflict between the two rights. This inevitably occurs when the marriage breaks down. The right to possession which up till then has been an indivisible thing shared in common has in some way to be severed. It is then impracticable for the spouses to continue exercising together their rights in the matrimonial home, and the claim of one or other must be allowed to prevail. The court must decide which. It can do so only by deciding upon what is just and reasonable in all the circumstances, and that is how the discretion arises—ex necessitate rei as Roxburgh J. put it in Churcher v. Street.[20] The rights of husband and wife arise out of their relationship, but there is nothing about the exercise of the discretion that is peculiar to that relationship. The court determines what is just and reasonable between husband and wife in the way that it often has to do between co-owners or between such conflicting rights as the public right to use the highway, and the private right of access to property adjoining the highway.

There is, therefore, no room for the exercise of discretion unless there are conflicting rights. So the question is: When the matrimonial home belongs to one spouse, what is the duration of the other's right in it? Is it a right that lasts as long as the marriage lasts, or only for so long as the other spouse is faithful to the marriage vows? If the former, there will be a conflict of rights, notwithstanding adultery, until the marriage is eventually dissolved if it ever is; if the latter, the adulterous spouse forfeits his or her right. Since we are here concerned with the common law (and not with the special interlocutory jurisdiction of the court when it is engaged, as it were, in winding up the marriage), the right can be claimed only by a spouse who is ready and willing to perform his or her obligations. It has nothing to do with divorce, for it existed at common law long before the dissolution of marriage was thought of as a terminating event. The dicta of Denning L.J. must be read in the light of his clear and persuasive statement of the nature of the right which I have quoted from Bendall v. McWhirter.[21] When the Lord Justice says that the licence to the wife continues until the court revokes it, he is not, I think, defining the duration of the right, but is making it plain that while it exists it is not unqualified, but must yield to the husband's right if the court in its discretion so decides.

I turn now to the second question on the basis that the clog on the husband's ownership has disappeared, and that there is no defence to his claim for possession. Is he not therefore entitled to obtain under section 17 an order for possession ex debito justitiae? The ordinary rule of law is that when a plaintiff has established his right, he is entitled to immediate relief; the court has no discretion to refuse an order, though there may be a power to postpone its execution for a reasonable time in order to avoid undue hardship. In Vaughan v. Vaughan,[22] for example, the Court of Appeal exercised a power of that sort in a case in which the husband's licence to the wife had expired. But the adjournment in the present case has not been put upon that ground.

This being the ordinary rule of law, I can find nothing in the language used in section 17 nor in a consideration of its scope and object to suggest that the power granted to the court is any wider than the normal. I find nothing to suggest that because the parties are husband and wife the court can treat them differently from the ordinary plaintiff and defendant. The material words of the section are: "In any question between husband

SHORT v. SHORT.

"and wife as to the title to or possession of property, either party "... may apply by summons or otherwise in a summary way to "any judge, and the judge ... may make such order with respect "to the property in dispute, and as to the costs of and consequent "on the application as he thinks fit, or may direct such application "to stand over from time to time." The powers of adjournment and over costs, and so forth, are in common form and such as a judge usually has. It is, of course, true that the operative word throughout is "may." But it is well settled that that gives only a limited discretion.

In Sheffield Corporation v. Luxford,[23] the court had to consider this point, and I quote what appear to me to be the material passages from the judgment of Talbot J.,[24] with whom Wright J. agreed. "The language of section 138 of the County Courts Act, "1888, is that on complying with the conditions of the Act (as to "which there is no dispute here) 'the judge may order that posses-"'sion of the premises mentioned in the plaint be given by the "'defendant to the plaintiff, either forthwith or on or before such "'day as the judge shall think fit to name.' ... 'May' is a per-"missive or enabling expression; but there are cases in which, for "various reasons, as soon as the person who is within the statute "is entrusted with the power it becomes his duty to exercise it. "One of those cases is where he is applied to to use the power "which the Act gives him in order to enforce the legal right of the "applicant. I think this a such a case. On the informa-"tion before us, the legal right of the plaintiffs, the landlords, "was complete as soon as the notice to quit had expired, and "the tenant's right to remain in occupation of this house had "absolutely ceased. ... That being so, I think that, as soon as "the application is made to the judge for an order for possession, "the latter being clothed by the Act of Parliament with the power "to make such an order, it becomes his duty to make it. And "if the Act contained no more than that, it would be his duty "to make the order then and there without any qualification. "But the Act does undoubtedly give him, in terms, a certain "discretion, because after the words 'the judge may order that "'possession ... be given,' the section continues: 'either forth-"'with or on or before such day as the judge shall think fit to "'name.'"

Section 17 uses no express words giving a discretion to postpone and, therefore, in Talbot J.'s words the duty is to make the order then and there. In any event, the express words in Sheffield Corporation v. Luxford did not, in Talbot J.'s view, authorise a postponement for more than four or five weeks. Fundamentally, a plaintiff who proves his case is entitled to an order ex debito justitiae, and there is no room for discretion. As Lord Wright put it later in Evans v. Bartlam[25]: "A discretion "necessarily involves a latitude of individual choice according "to the particular circumstances, and differs from a case where "the decision follows ex debito justitiae once the facts are "ascertained."

The argument that there is in section 17 a discretion wide enough to enable the judge to refuse to give effect to the rights of the husband when undoubtedly established has been based largely upon the decision of Denning J. in Hutchinson v. Hutchinson.[26] In that case, a wife whose husband had left her in the matrimonial home, which was his property, obtained a decree of judicial separation. The husband then applied under section 17 for an order for possession, and his counsel argued that the judge had no discretion to refuse it. Denning J. said: "at "common law the husband has no right to turn the wife out of "the house. . . . He cannot sue her for ejectment, or trespass or "for any other tort. He has no right in law to claim possession from her except such as may be given him by section 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. But that section does not, in my opinion, give him the right which he is now claiming. It enacts that the judge before whom the application comes may make such order as he thinks fit. The intention is that in the innumerable and infinitely various disputes as to property which may occur between husband wife the judge should have a free hand to do what is just. That discretion is in no way fettered, though it must be exercised judicially. The judge was satisfied that it would be unjust to turn the wife out, and accordingly refused to make the order. In Bendall v. McWhirter,[27] Denning L.J. referred to this decision, saying that section 17 gave the court a very wide discretion in the matter.

There is nothing here to suggest that Denning J. would have refused the order in a case in which the wife had no rights at all. What is argued, as I understand it, is that Denning J. was there creating a right for the wife out of the husband's inability to proceed otherwise than under section 17. If so, and if the section can be used for the creation of rights, then the power of the court would certainly have to be very wide indeed. But I do not think that Denning J. was doing that. It had been settled long before this that either spouse has rights against the other in the matrimonial home even though it be wholly owned by the other; see, for example, Shipman v. Shipman.[28] It is now settled, largely through the judgments of Denning L.J. himself, that the discretion which the court exercises in determining how far it is fair and reasonable for the wife to exercise her rights is not a product of section 17. If it were, the rights of the wife could not prevail against a third party who does not proceed under that section. It is now established that the discretion must be exercised by any court before whom the question may come: Jess B. Woodcock & Son Ltd. v. Hobbs.[29]

In Lee v. Lee[30]—a case which was relied on by counsel for the wife—Somervell L.J. referred to the words of section 17 as being "in the widest possible form." This dictum related to the court's power to restrain the husband from exercising his proprietary rights when that exercise would bring them into conflict with the wife's right to live in the matrimonial home and her enjoyment thereof. There is no doubt that in such circumstances, the wife's right being still alive, the court has the widest possible discretion; and, this being in the early stages of the development of the doctrine, the court was not considering whether the wide discretion flowed from the statute or ex necessitate rei. The dictum cannot be taken quite literally, for if it be true of section 17, it must now be true also of every other statute under which possession by a third party is sought against the wife. Certainly the dictum is no authority for the view that the discretion extends to a case in which the wife has committed adultery, for that was not under consideration.

Denning L.J.'s dicta are high authority for the view that the husband cannot proceed to turn the wife out of the home except under section 17. But I must say with great respect that I do not regard them as putting the matter beyond doubt. It is certainly the law that the husband cannot sue his wife in tort. The question is whether an action of ejectment is an action in tort. In Bendall v. McWhirter,[31] Denning L.J. cited as his authority the judgment of Goddard L.J. in Bramwell v. Bramwell.[32] If that case is carefully examined in conjunction with Pargeter v. Pargeter,[33] I think it will be seen quite clearly that the doubts expressed by Goddard L.J. do not represent the decision of the court or even his own concluded judgment. Indeed, I think it would be difficult to hold that Denning L.J.'s dictum was correct without overruling Bramwell v. Bramwell.[34] If one goes back beyond that case, it would be necessary to consider Doe d. Merigan v. Daly,[35] where Lord Denman C.J. treated the husband's disability as purely procedural and one that could be overcome with the assistance of John Doe, who was not, of course, married to the defendant wife. The technical difficulty could, I suppose, be overcome in the same way today by the husband making an assignment. It would be necessary also to consider whether, if a husband sues upon the termination of a presumed licence for recovery of possession, he cannot bring his action in contract; a landlord may sue in contract for a tenant's failure to give up possession in accordance with the terms of his lease; see Bullen & Leake, 3rd ed. (1868) at p. 206.

I do not go into these matters any further because, if I did find that the husband had no rights except under section 17, I should still not be prepared to give that section any different meaning. The fact that a party has no rights until a statute gives them to him does not put him in mercy. Unless the statute provides to the contrary, he is entitled to have his statutory right enforced in the ordinary way. Moreover, it is clear that so far as the wife is concerned, section 17 is only procedural; her substantive remedies have already been given her by section 12. The discretion under section 17 cannot be enlarged against her. But by virtue of what construction can it be exercised differently between the parties? It would be unreasonable if the wife could get the furniture belonging to her as soon as she proved her title to it while the husband could not get his unless the court thought he ought to have it.

I hold that the powers of the court under section 17 are substantially the same as in any other proceeding where the ownership or possession of property is in question. The discretion is no wider and no narrower than the ordinary discretion of the court in such cases. I accept that, as Somervell L.J. said in Lee v. Lee,[36] where there are conflicting claims to a number of small items, there is power in the court to arrive at a broad conclusion. This may be attributable to the summary nature of the process, though I should myself be inclined to think of it as an example of the de minimis principle; all courts have to do rough justice from time to time. Apart from this, rights of property have to be determined according to law. The discretion to adjourn is no wider and no narrower than that possessed by any other court. The general rule is that when a case is brought on for trial by the proper process the plaintiff is entitled to have it heard and determined. So the usual ground for an adjournment is when the court would be unable to do justice if it proceeded to an immediate hearing. I should not, of course, dispute that when some relevant fact, such as adultery, is in issue, there is power in the court to stay the proceedings until that issue has been resolved by some other court which has seisin of it. That can be done on the principle of forum non conveniens. It does not arise here since adultery is admitted, and whether the husband does or does not get a decree on the ground of adultery is irrelevant. The law on this latter point is, I think, correctly stated in Lush on Husband and Wife, 4th ed., at p. 415, where it is said: "It is the misconduct of the wife, not the ability of "the husband to obtain a divorce, that discharges him from the "obligation which marriage imposes upon him to support his "wife."

In my judgment the court has not got and cannot ever have power to grant possession to anyone except the husband. The position might be different if the wife had any right as a co-owner: see per Denning L.J. in Cobb v. Cobb.[37] In the present case her interest unquestionably terminates on the dissolution of the marriage.

I have said that if there were any fact, such as adultery, in issue, which was also in issue in a pending matrimonial suit, it would be proper to stay the summons under section 17. Normally, in such a case, the question is more conveniently determined in the matrimonial suit which ought to be given precedence. By the same token I think that the section 17 procedure should yield when the interlocutory procedure in a matrimonial cause is invoked. If the wife in this case, accepting that she had no right to possession, had said that she desired nevertheless to ask the judge at chambers for an injunction to restrain the husband from interfering with her residence in the matrimonial home pendente lite, I should have thought it a proper exercise of the discretionary power to adjourn the section 17 proceedings long enough to allow her to do so. She has not asked for that, but on the assumption that she would regard it as better than nothing, I would be prepared, in allowing the appeal, to vary the order so as to make it an order for possession unless within seven days the wife applied for an injunction restraining the husband from interfering with her enjoyment of the flat. I express no opinion at all as to whether such an application should be granted.

It may be thought, assuming that the judge in chambers takes the same view of the merits as the registrar did, that this is a distinction without a difference; and that at the end of this judgment all that I have done is to lay down a roundabout way of arriving at the same result on the merits. Even if that could properly be said, I should still have to arrive at the same decision; if I am right in thinking that it is a matter of construction of the section, one cannot construe it simply so as to give a more convenient result. But in truth I do not think that that can properly be said. The distinction is not a purely technical one. The course that has been taken not only involves a point of principle but is also, I think, objectionable on practical grounds. On principle, a bad precedent is created if a court assumes wrongly a discretion of this sort. When rights are established according to law, it is the duty of the courts to enforce them; a judge, no more than a minister, has no power to take away a man's rights or to hinder him in the obtaining of them, unless by due process of law. This is a principle to be preserved against encroachments by the judiciary as well as by the executive.

On practical grounds it is, in my judgment, inconvenient, if not wrong, for the summons under section 17 to be dealt with as if it were an interlocutory order in the matrimonial cause. It is true that the order does not exclude the husband from his flat. But as a practical matter it is obvious that both cannot live there at the same time, and the making of the order shows it to be the court's intention that it is the wife who should have the enjoyment of it pendente lite, and not the husband. For practical purposes the order is effective in excluding the husband from the flat and would no doubt be amplified and enforced by injunction if necessary, as was done in Lee v. Lee.[38] Since it is made pendente lite, it is the equivalent of an interlocutory injunction. Except for injunctions of a very limited class, the power to grant an injunction is by R.S.C., Ord. 54, r. 12, reserved to a judge at chambers; and all interlocutory injunctions are so reserved. An interlocutory injunction is an order that requires great delicacy in its use because it may deprive an individual, even though only temporarily, of the exercise of a right—that is, of a right that is still in dispute; and the point is a fortiori when, as here, the right is already established. It is, therefore, the rule that the discretion which is operative should be that of a judge, and not that of a registrar or a master.

This is wise, not simply because a judge speaks with the greater authority, but also because cases taken before the judge are generally argued with greater thoroughness. The present case illustrates the wisdom of guarding carefully the use of the interlocutory order. Whether or not there be a discretion under section 17, this is the first case in which an order has been made in favour of an adulterous wife. The wife obtained this without filing an affidavit or adducing any evidence, and the husband did not appear by counsel. I cannot believe that such argument as there may have been could have brought it to the mind of the registrar that he was being asked to do anything out of the ordinary course; yet his discretion is said to be paramount. I do not like suggesting rules which might fetter the exercise of a discretion where it exists, but I should have thought that there should be some evidence of hardship or other exceptional circumstances before an adulterous wife is allowed to keep the husband out of his flat. If I were not for allowing the appeal on the ground that the wife has no rights at all, I should have to consider whether I should not allow it on the ground that there was no material to support the exercise of the discretion in her favour.

On any view I think it would be much better in practice if section 17 was not used for interlocutory purposes, and I cannot therefore regret a construction of the section—much the same as that put upon it by Lord Merriman P. in Kelner v. Kelner,[39] where he was dealing with a somewhat similar point—which makes that course imperative. A difficult and confusing situation may arise if these two jurisdictions are allowed to run on parallel lines. Can the husband in this case now apply to the judge in chambers for an order in the matrimonial suit that he should be given possession of his flat without the obligation of finding alternative accommodation? If he cannot, then the point has been decided against him by the discretion of a registrar and not that of a judge. If he can, then what happens if the judge in his discretion takes a different view of the merits from that taken by the registrar? Is he bound by the registrar's order so far as it goes? If he is, then again it is the discretion of the registrar and not that of the judge which prevails. If he is not, then it would have been much better for the matter to come before him in the first instance in an application for an interlocutory injunction. He will not then have to deal, as the registrar had, with the matrimonial home in isolation, but will be able to consider alimony pendente lite in conjunction with it. Thus there will be removed what seems to me to be one of the objectionable features of the registrar's order that, without alimony being considered at all and without there being any investigation into means, the husband has in effect been ordered to contribute pendente lite to his wife's support at the rate of £250 per annum.

My Lords have dealt fully with the point that the appeal was out of time, and I need not say more than that in my judgment the objection was taken too late.

[1958 L. No. 394.]

Libel and Slander—Privilege—Absolute privilege—Judicial tribunal—Bar Council—Whether complaint to Council protected by absolute privilege.
Barrister—Discipline—Bar Council—Whether complaints to Council absolutely privileged.
Tribunal—Domestic—Bar Council—Function.

The defendant sent letters complaining of the conduct of the plaintiff, a member of the Bar, to the Bar Council. In an action for libel the defendant contended that the communications were protected by absolute privilege:—

Held, that the communications were covered by qualified, but not by absolute privilege, since to be absolutely privileged a document must be addressed to a body which has judicial or quasi-judicial functions, and must be a step in setting in motion judicial or quasi-judicial proceedings.

Lilley v. Roney (1892) 8 T.L.R. 642; 61 L.J.Q.B. 727, D.C. distinguished.

POINT OF LAW.

On February 12 and 19, 1958, the defendant, David Daniels, sent two letters to the Bar Council, complaining of the professional conduct of the plaintiff, Fredman Ashe Lincoln, Q.C.

During the course of an action for libel, counsel for the defendant submitted that although it was the Benchers of the plaintiff's Inn of Court who were empowered to exercise quasi-judicial functions in adjudicating upon the complaint, and the Bar Council had no such functions, but merely considered whether they would or would not forward a complaint to the Benchers, the communications were protected by absolute privilege since complaint to the Bar Council was a proper way of instituting proceedings.

Neville Faulks Q.C., Joseph Dean and Diana Phillips for the plaintiff.

Alan Campbell and J. M. Bowyer for the defendant.

No case (other than that referred to in the judgment) was cited in argument.

SALMON J. It is argued on behalf of the defendant that the letters of complaint which the defendant addressed to the Bar Council in February of 1958 were absolutely privileged. There can be no doubt, in my view, that those communications were certainly privileged to the extent that they were the subject of qualified privilege; that is to say, the defendant would be protected completely unless he made the complaint maliciously. Mr. Campbell argues, however, that the privilege goes further than that; that the occasion was an occasion of absolute privilege; that is to say, whatever the state of the defendant's mind was when he wrote the letters, the letters cannot be made the subject of an action for libel.

There is no doubt that any member of the public may make a complaint about a member of the Bar to the Bar Council. The Bar Council may come to the conclusion that the complaints are groundless, in which event the Bar Council does nothing further. If, however, the Bar Council considers that the complaint raises a prima facie case against the barrister in respect of whom the complaint is made, the practice of the Bar Council is to send the papers to the Benchers of the Inn of Court to which the barrister belongs. The Bar Council itself has no judicial function, and no quasi-judicial function. The Bar Council itself does not adjudicate upon the matter of the complaint.

As I have said, a member of the public may send his complaints to the Bar Council. There is nothing, if he so chooses, to prevent him from addressing his complaint direct to the Inn of Court to which the barrister concerned belongs. I do not propose to decide whether, if a complaint were addressed to an Inn of Court, or to the Treasurer of an Inn of Court, it would or would not be absolutely privileged. The Inn of Court has quasi-judicial functions, and can pronounce upon the complaint, and take the appropriate steps in relation to it. It is conceded by Mr. Neville Faulks that a strong argument could be made in favour of the view that a complaint directed to the Benchers of the Inn would be absolutely privileged.

Lincoln v. Daniels.

Salmon J.

This branch of the law is necessarily somewhat technical. No complaint was addressed by the defendant to the Benchers of the plaintiff's Inn; and I do not desire to express any view as to what the position would be if that had been done, because the point does not arise for decision. In my view, no absolute privilege attaches to the communication addressed to the Bar Council.

Mr. Campbell relies on Lilley v. Roney.[1] In that case a letter of complaint was addressed to the Law Society by the defendant, and it was held that that letter of complaint was absolutely privileged. It is to be observed, however, that at the date of that case, the Law Society (or the Disciplinary Committee of the Law Society) were vested under the Solicitors Act, 1888, with quasi-judicial functions. The letter of complaint was in a form prescribed by the rules which were laid down under the Act for setting in motion the quasi-judicial proceedings. That is made quite plain in a passage in the judgment of Cave J., who gave the leading judgment, when he said[2]: "The letter with affidavit "is the form given for setting in motion what are admittedly "judicial proceedings."

In the present case the Bar Council, it is conceded (and rightly conceded) is not the agent of the Benchers. They have no power to carry out any judicial or quasi-judicial functions; and I think the present case is quite different from Lilley v. Roney. It is true that it so happens that complaints (fortunately very rare), are normally passed to the Bar Council; and if the Bar Council think there is anything in them, they pass them on to the Benchers. But it seems to me that the essence of the rule about absolute privilege in this field is that the document must be addressed to a body which has judicial, or quasi-judicial functions, and the document must be a step in setting in motion judicial or quasi-judicial proceedings.

For the reasons I have stated, the letters of complaint in this case are not of that character. It therefore follows, in my view, that if a complaint is made to the Bar Council, the member of the public concerned has this limited protection that, providing he is not misusing the privileged occasion, the publication is covered by the privilege. If, however, he is malicious, he has no defence on the ground of privilege. In my judgment, the submission on behalf of the defendant fails.

Husband and Wife — Desertion — Termination — Separation agreement before 1938*—Right to disregard agreement under statute—Wife in desertion at time of agreement—Husband's refusal of wife's offers to return — Whether parties entitled to rely on statute — Divorce (Insanity and Desertion) Act,* 1958 (6 & 7 Eliz. 2, c. 54), s. 3.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Cross-petition—Bar to petition removed; whether cross-petition barred—Separation agreement before 1938*—Respondent's desertion before separation agreement of* 1936*—Petitioner's desertion in* 1943 — Divorce (Insanity and Desertion) Act, 1958, s. 3.

The parties were married in 1932, and in 1936 the wife deserted the husband. On June 25, 1936, the parties entered in a separation agreement in the usual form. In 1943 and 1945 the wife made attempts (which the court found to be genuine) to become reconciled with her husband, but the husband rejected her offers. In 1958, the husband petitioned for divorce on the ground of the wife's desertion, and the wife by her answer cross-petitioned for a divorce on the ground of the husband's desertion. Both parties relied on section 3 of the Divorce (Insanity and Desertion) Act, 1958.[1]

Held, (1) that the wife's position had to be looked at independently, as if she alone were the petitioner and without taking into account the fact that her husband was also taking proceedings against her, and from that point of view she was not a deserted party before the relevant date, June 1936, when the agreement was entered into, and she could not, therefore, rely on the statute to support her plea on the ground of desertion.

(2) That the husband could not disregard the separation agreement for the purpose of bringing himself within section 3, and rely on it to justify his refusal to accept his wife's offers of a reconciliation, such a proposition was unacceptable having regard to the language of section 3 and the obvious intention of the Act, which was to relieve persons who were handicapped by the existence of an agreement for separation entered into before desertion became a ground for divorce, and his petition also failed.

APPEALS from Commissioner Sir Reginald Sharpe.

The following statement of facts is taken substantially from the judgment of Hodson L.J.

[1] Divorce (Insanity and Desertion) Act, 1958, s. 3: "For the purposes of "paragraph (b) of subsection 1 of "section 1 of the Matrimonial Causes "Act, 1950 (which provides that a "petition for divorce may be presented "to the High Court on the ground "that the respondent has deserted the "petitioner without cause for a period "of at least three years immediately "preceding the presentation of the "petition), any agreement between "the petitioner and the respondent to "live separate and apart, whether or "not made in writing, shall be dis-"regarded if the agreement was "entered into before January 1, 1938, "and either—(a) at the time when "the agreement was made the res-"pondent had deserted the petitioner "without cause; or (b) the court is "satisfied that the circumstances in "which the agreement was made and "the parties proceeded to live separate "and apart were such as, but for the "agreement, to amount to desertion "of the petitioner by the respondent "without cause."

Pearce
v.
Pearce.

The parties in this case were married in 1932; and a daughter was born in 1934. In May 1936, they separated. On May 12, 1936, a letter was written on behalf of the wife referring to the fact that she had left her husband, containing this passage: "Dr. Pearce [the husband] cannot be surprised at our client "having left him and returned to her parents as for the greater "part of their married life there has not been domestic happiness. "Our client has been compelled to submerge her personality "owing to the domineering attitude adopted by her husband, "she has been compelled to take medicines which have had a "serious effect upon her physique and which resulted in her "losing about two stones in weight, she has been placed on diet "by her husband and refused food of a nourishing nature and "these, with others, have resulted in Mrs. Pearce becoming "almost a physical and nervous wreck. She has had independent "medical advice since returning to Edinburgh and it will be only "after some months of careful nursing and constant care before "she will return to normal. These are the reasons our client has "given us for her refusing to continue to cohabit with her "husband." The husband's solicitors replied denying the allegations which had been made against their client by the wife.

On June 25, 1936, an agreement for separation was entered into between the parties in the usual form in that it recited "unhappy differences having arisen between the husband and the "wife and they are now living separate and apart from each "other. . . ." The deed was entered into at the instigation of the wife's solicitors. She got no benefit by way of monetary payment under the agreement, but her solicitors were anxious to secure that she should have the custody of the child. The agreement provided (in the usual manner) that if the husband and wife should be reconciled the agreement should become void except in respect of proceedings for a breach previously committed. That agreement remained in force thereafter.

On March 12, 1942, the wife communicated with her husband, and in her letter she said: "Perhaps you will be in Edinburgh "some time soon and if so I would be glad of the opportunity "to talk over a matter of some importance with you." They did not meet immediately; but on January 5, 1943, the wife, who had been in correspondence with her husband directly and through solicitors, wrote agreeing to his suggestion to come up to Edinburgh, when they could discuss his having the daughter, Evelyn. They met, and the husband was expecting to see the child, but he did not, and nothing was said at all which satisfied him.

The wife did not make any direct approach to him with a view to reconciliation, but his Lordship thought that there could be no doubt that that was what she was anxious for and that she had used the child as a means of getting her husband to meet her. He came to that conclusion because on January 17, 1943, after the meeting, she wrote: "After leaving you on Thursday "I turned back but you had gone. I wandered back and forward

"but just couldn't make up my mind to go home. I wanted to "go down to the station but you weren't alone. Oh Ashton, "what an awful mess everything seems to be in. I didn't want "to talk about Evelyn—not really—it was just I wanted to see "and talk to you again. I didn't want to let you see how I felt "and I must have succeeded pretty well for you thought me "quite devoid of feeling, didn't you?" Then she said: "I shall "be spending the weekend in Newcastle and if it is suitable to "you I shall come out to see you on Sunday. I can't give you "the exact time . . . but it will be shortly after lunch. Let me "know by return if this suits you."

The husband did not reply himself, but his solicitors wrote on January 19, referring to that letter and said: "We have been "instructed to inform you that Dr. Pearce does not wish to see "you at his home and is satisfied that no good purpose whatever "can be served by any such visit." There was silence after that letter had been written until April 10, 1945, by which time the wife's father had died. The solicitors for the wife, acting in the first place on their own initiative, although the wife agreed to the course which they took, wrote to the husband's solicitors with a view to bringing about a reconciliation between the husband and the wife. The husband's solicitors replied on April 26, 1945, saying their client was very definite that he could not consider their suggestion for reconciliation between his wife and himself, and referred to the interview when the wife had pretended that she wanted Evelyn to see her father, saying: "Our client is still "very bitter about the treatment he received from your client "when he saw her last in Edinburgh and this has added to the "difficulty of their being reconciled . . . when he arrived at "Edinburgh his wife saw him alone and made it quite clear that "she never had any intention at all of even bringing the child "with her for him to see but had merely used this as an excuse "to get him to go to Edinburgh for the purpose of discussing her "own affairs." The solicitors for the wife wrote again on May 1, 1945, hoping for a reconciliation "for the benefit of all."

That was followed by a further meeting between the spouses at or near the husband's home in South Moor, Durham, in July 1946. It appeared that the wife was then anxious to be on good terms with her husband; but in the course of that interview she said to him "Why don't you divorce me?" Nothing further that was material transpired at that interview; and the last communication between the parties extant was a letter dated August 18, 1947, nearly a year later, in which the wife wrote again to her husband having regard to something that the child had said to her after her return from South Moor. She concluded that letter by saying: "Of course I already told you but "I now write it to you I am more sorry than I can tell you "for allowing myself to be the cause of so much unhappiness. "I broke faith and did everything I promised before God not to "do and God alone knows how bitterly I have had cause to "regret it."

On October 3, 1958, the husband presented his petition for divorce on the ground of his wife's desertion, and the wife by her answer of December 9, 1958, denied the desertion and in her turn asked for a divorce on the ground of the husband's desertion. The Divorce (Insanity and Desertion) Act, 1958, had come into force on July 23, 1958, and both parties relied on section 3 of the Act. Commissioner Sir Reginald Sharpe, on December 4, 1959, dismissed the husband's petition and the wife's cross-petition. Both parties appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Bernard Gillis Q.C. and R. A. Percy for the husband.
William Temple for the wife.

The following case was cited in argument: Gerrard v. Gerrard.[2]

HODSON L.J. The proceedings were initiated by the husband, who petitioned for divorce on the ground of his wife's desertion. The wife denied desertion, and in her turn asked for a divorce. The proceedings would inevitably have failed, whichever spouse had initiated them, but for the reliance which was placed upon the Divorce (Insanity and Desertion) Act, 1958, which enables a petition for divorce to be presented on the ground of desertion notwithstanding any separation agreement entered into before desertion became a ground for divorce in English law, which was on January 1, 1938. [His Lordship read section 3 of the Divorce (Insanity and Desertion) Act, 1958, stated the facts and continued:] It is convenient, I think, to deal first with the wife's appeal, because the wife cannot bring herself within the language of the Act unless at the time the agreement was made she had been deserted by her husband. It therefore becomes necessary to consider the circumstances in which the separation took place in 1936. There was no plea in the suit that the wife had just cause for leaving her husband at that time. She left him, no doubt, as the commissioner found and as her own evidence shows, because her parents wanted her to. They saw their daughter losing weight, no doubt, and were anxious about her physical condition. But she said in her evidence "I should never have "left him but for my parents."

I do not think there is any possible answer to the husband's allegation, confirmed by the commissioner's finding, that it was the wife who deserted the husband in 1936. That being the case, she cannot bring herself within the language of the Act, and the agreement for separation cannot, so far as she is concerned, be disregarded. It has been argued on her behalf that if it is disregarded in favour of the husband it ought to be disregarded in favour of the wife. That is not so. The matter has to be looked at from the wife's point of view quite independently, as if she alone were the petitioner for divorce and without taking into account the fact that her husband is also taking proceedings against her. Looked at from the point of view of the wife as a petitioner, she deserted her husband before the relevant date when the agreement for separation was entered into which prevents her succeeding.

But so far as the husband's appeal is concerned, he is entitled to take advantage of the Act and disregard the agreement, he having been deserted by his wife in 1936. The commissioner dismissed his petition because of the fact that, although he had been deserted in 1936, the wife throughout the period of the separation at intervals, and in particular through her solicitors in 1945, had done her best to bring about a reconciliation, and in those circumstances he could not hold that the husband had proved his case. I think that upon the evidence that is the only possible conclusion. [His Lordship referred to the husband's attitude towards the wife's attempts at reconciliation and continued:] On the facts of this case there is no question but that the commissioner arrived at the right result.

That leaves the question of law upon which the husband mainly relies. The notice of appeal I think puts the matter as the husband wishes it to be put. It is said that the commissioner, by virtue of section 3 of the Act of 1958, disregarded the existence of the separation agreement entered into between the husband and the wife on June 25, 1936, but failed to disregard the conduct of both parties wholly attributable to that agreement which he ought by law to have done. What the husband says, through his counsel, is this: "I am entitled to disregard the agreement because the "Act says I can for the purposes of section 1 (1) (b) of the Act of "1950—that is to say, for the purposes of getting my divorce on "the ground of desertion without cause for three years immedi-"ately preceding the petition." He seeks to say "I am entitled "to disregard it for that purpose but to regard it for my own "purposes in that I was entitled, by the terms of the agreement, "which remained in force and still remains in force, to reject my "wife's overtures for reconciliation in 1945 and afterwards."

I think that that argument is not sustainable. It is not open to the husband, having regard to the language of the Act, "for "the purposes of" the section of the Act in question, to use the agreement in his own favour in considering the history of the married life and to disregard it only for the purpose of getting his case of desertion on foot in the first instance.

I find it difficult to elaborate this matter, which seems to me to be quite plain. The way in which the matter has been put on the part of the husband always, I think, came back to that—"I am entitled to disregard the agreement because the Act says "I can: nevertheless, I am entitled to regard it when it suits me "so to do for the purpose of answering the request by my wife to "return to me." That proposition, however it may be put, is quite unacceptable, having regard to the language of the section and the obvious intention of the Act, which was to relieve persons who were handicapped by the existence of an agreement for separation entered into before desertion became a ground for divorce.

In my judgment, therefore, the appeal on behalf of the husband fails, as does the cross-appeal of the wife; and they must be dismissed.

HARMAN L.J. I entirely agree. On the question of fact it seems to me that the commissioner was well justified in coming to the conclusion that he reached; and, indeed, I should have reached the same one myself. I need say no more about it as my Lord has dealt with the whole matter.

The question of law is, I suppose, a novel one. What the Act of 1958 says is that, for the purposes of the desertion provisions of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, a separation agreement before the relevant date "shall be disregarded." Take, then, the husband's position. When he puts his petition on the file, the separation agreement is to be disregarded altogether. What then results? One finds desertion by the wife in 1936. That state of desertion continues until 1945 or 1946 and is then terminated by the offers made by the wife to return. It follows, it seems to me, as night follows day, that the husband cannot satisfy the court that, in the three years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition, he was in the position of a deserted husband. His petition must therefore fail. What he does (as the commissioner put it so well) is to try to have it both ways. He says: "You must put the agreement out of your sight "when you are considering my petition; but when there is this "answer about efforts to be reconciled you must remember that "as in those days the agreement was in force and valid, I was "entitled to reject my wife's overtures for reconciliation and I "cannot now be handicapped by doing that which at the time "I was well entitled to do." It is true that he was well entitled to reject his wife's overtures for reconciliation. He was not bound to accept them because of the existence of the agreement. He is not bound to accept them now. Nevertheless, when he puts a petition on the file the agreement is out of the way for all the purposes of his petition and you look at the facts as they would have been if no such agreement had ever been made. He cannot withdraw the agreement for his own case and still rely on it to defeat his wife's answer.

It does not seem to me that really the matter is of great complication. What the effect of the Act may be on other provisions of such an agreement—for instance, if there had been financial provisions—I do not propose to try to answer. It is possible that there may be questions arising out of agreements for separation where a petition of this sort has been put on the file. To the question whether the other provisions (for instance, financial provisions) in such an agreement would still continue in effect, I propose to make no answer.

As to the wife's cross-petition, it seems to rest on this rather simple-minded notion, that, as the husband has not proved that his wife has deserted him, it must follow that he has deserted her. "Once you reject his petition" (says the wife) "you must "accept mine, because one side must have deserted the other "side." On this Act of Parliament that is not at all the result. She must prove, just as if she had been the original petitioner, that she was a deserted party at the time the separation agreement was entered into. That she cannot prove. She does not even try to prove it in this court. Therefore her petition, no less than her husband's, is doomed to failure.

For these reasons, in addition to those given by my Lord, I agree that these appeals fail.

PHILLIMORE J. I agree, and I cannot usefully add anything.

Landlord and Tenant—Option to purchase—Construction—Lease for 5 years — Option to tenant to purchase freehold of premises "at "any time"—Expiry of term in 1944 — Tenant holding over as statutory tenant — Whether tenant entitled to exercise option in 1959—"at any time."

By a tenancy agreement, dated May 26, 1939, certain premises were let for a term of five years from June 1, 1939. The agreement provided, inter alia: "And it is hereby agreed that the tenant has "the right of option to purchase at any time at £675. Ground "Rent £7." That right was to purchase the freehold, the ground rent being the fee farm rent to which the freehold was subject. At the date of the agreement the premises were not subject to the Rent Restriction Acts, so that at that time there was nothing to prevent the landlord from recovering possession at the end of the five years' term in 1944, but it became subject to the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, and at the end of the five years' term the tenant remained in possession as a statutory tenant thereunder. On June 5, 1959, the tenant gave notice of his intention to exercise the option and the landlord disputed the validity of that notice.

On a summons by the tenant asking, inter alia, for a declaration that, on the true construction of the agreement, he was entitled to exercise the option and had validly exercised it on June 5, 1959:—

Held that, on the true construction of the agreement, the right given to the tenant to purchase the freehold was limited to a right to purchase it at any time during the currency of the agreement, and that, therefore, the tenant was not entitled to exercise it.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

By a tenancy agreement dated May 26, 1939, the landlord, William James Kew, agreed to let and the tenant, Robert Davidson Longmuir, to take certain freehold premises, 31, Eagle Road, Brislington, Bristol, for a term of five years from June 1, 1939. The agreement provided, inter alia, "And it is hereby agreed, "that the tenant has the right of option to purchase at any time "at £675, ground rent £7." That right was to purchase the freehold, the ground rent being the fee farm rent to which the freehold was subject. Shortly after the date of the agreement the tenant entered into possession of the premises and at the date of the summons was still in possession as tenant of the landlord. By letter dated June 5, 1959, addressed to the landlord, the tenant's solicitors gave notice of the tenant's intention to exercise his right of option to purchase the property for £675. By letter dated June 12, 1959, to the tenant's solicitors, the landlord's solicitors stated that they had advised the landlord to resist any steps that the tenant's solicitors might take on the tenant's behalf as to the exercise of the option.

On January 1, 1960, the tenant took out a summons asking, inter alia, for a declaration that, on the true construction of the agreement, he was entitled to the option and that it was duly exercised by the letter dated June 5, 1959.

The parties agreed that, at the date of the agreement, the property was not subject to the Rent Restriction Acts so that the landlord could have recovered possession from the tenant at the end of the five years' term in 1944. The property became subject to the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, whereunder the tenant remained and was at the date of the summons a statutory tenant.

The following cases referred to in argument were not cited in the judgment: Turner v. Watts [1]; Woodall v. Clifton. [2]

CROSS J. This summons raises what is, in my judgment, by no means an easy point of construction of a tenancy agreement made on May 26, 1939, between the defendant, William James Kew, and the plaintiff, Robert Davidson Longmuir, in respect of a certain house known as 31, Eagle Road, Brislington, Bristol. [His Lordship stated the facts and continued:] The case turns on the construction of those few words used in the agreement, which I will repeat—"And it is hereby agreed that "the tenant has the right of option to purchase at any time"—that means purchase the freehold—"at £675." It is agreed on both sides that that cannot be read literally, so that the tenant had the right to purchase the freehold even though he no longer had any connection with the premises and was no longer a tenant of the landlord. It would be quite ridiculous to suppose that, had the tenant gone out of possession in 1944 and gone to live in some other part of the country and the landlord had relet the premises to somebody else, the tenant at some future date years afterwards could claim to purchase the property.

The two rival views which have been put forward are, first, that the words "at any time" mean at any time during the term of five years created by the agreement; or, alternatively, that they mean at any time while the tenant is a tenant of the premises under the landlord either during the term of five years or under any continuation of the relation of landlord and tenant whether it be by a consensual holding over or by operation of the Rent Restriction Acts.

Longmuir
v.
Kew.

Cross J.

The question, though ultimately one of construction of the particular document, is not free from authority. There are a number of cases, starting with Moss v. Barton,[1] which show that, where there is a provision in a tenancy agreement giving the tenant a right to continue or renew the tenancy, and there is no express statement in the agreement that that right is exercisable only during a certain period and, on the face of it, it is exercisable at any time, the court will not, generally speaking confine the exercise of the right to the original contractual period of tenancy but will allow it to be exercised after the expiry of the original period if the tenant is holding over and is still a tenant of the landlord. In Moss v. Barton[2] there was an agreement by which the landlord agreed to allow the tenant to occupy the premises in question for a period of three years and agreed at the request of the tenant to grant him a lease of the premises for 5, 7, 14 or 21 years from the expiration of the three years' original period. After the expiry of the original three years, the tenant remained in possession as tenant from year to year, but it was held by Lord Romilly M.R. that the tenant continued to have the right, as long as he remained tenant, to call for an extended lease for 5, 7, 14 or 21 years. A similar decision was arrived at by Lord Romilly M.R., and was affirmed, on appeal, by Lord Chelmsford L.C. in Buckland v. Papillon,[3] where by an agreement the landlord agreed to let and the tenant to take the property for three years at a certain rent. The agreement contained a clause that the landlord should, "whenever called upon so to do" by the tenant, grant a lease to him of the premises in question "for a period of three years, seven years, or the remainder of the term . . . that [the landlord] has at present in his power to grant. . . ." There again, the tenant remained in occupation after the end of the original period and it was held that his assignee in bankruptcy had a right to call for the extended lease under the words "whenever called upon so to do" as long as he was still the tenant of the landlord. The court did not confine the words "whenever called upon so to do" to the period of the original term.

Next comes In re Leeds & Batley Breweries Ltd.[4] There, in contradistinction to the cases to which I have referred, the option in question was an option to purchase a reversion and not an option for the renewal of the term. There was a lease for seven years from June 1, 1903, which contained a proviso that if the lessee should be desirous of purchasing the unexpired residue of the leasehold reversion and should—these were the important words—"at any time six calendar months before the determination of this lease" give to the lessors a written notice to that effect, then the person giving such notice should be the purchaser of the unexpired residue of the term at the price of £3,000. After the original term had expired, as a result of correspondence between the lessors and the plaintiff, the term was extended for 12 months from June 1, 1910, and after that extended term came to an end the lessee continued in possession, becoming a tenant from year to year. The question arose whether the lessee could then exercise the option to purchase. Peterson J. held that he could not, on the ground that the option to purchase the reversion was not a term of the original tenancy which would be incorporated into the year to year tenancy under which the lessee was holding after the determination of the extended term because the provision for the option of purchase was clearly only exercisable during the initial seven years.

In 1923 Rider v. Ford,[5] on which Mr. Tatham has strongly relied, came before Russell J. In that case, there was an agreement between the landlord and the tenant by which the tenant agreed to take the premises in question "for 3, 5 or 7 years at "the rent of £147 per annum, and to have the option of pur-"chasing either the freehold for £2,900 or a lease of 97 years "(ground rent £20) for £2,400." It will be seen there that there was an alternative either to purchase the freehold or to acquire a very long lease of the premises for 97 years instead of seven years. There, as in the earlier cases to which I have referred, the tenant remained in possession as tenant from year to year after the term of seven years. The question arose whether he was entitled to exercise either or both of those options. In that case counsel for the tenant conceded, and the judge held that the option to purchase the freehold was void as offending against the rule against perpetuities. That was a wrong concession as was pointed out by Jenkins J. in Hutton v. Watling,[6] because the proceedings were between the original landlord and the original tenant and the rule against perpetuities has nothing to do with the enforcement of a contract between the original contracting parties. If Russell J. in Rider v. Ford[7] had not held that the option to purchase the freehold was void for perpetuity, it is clear that he would have held that both the option to purchase the property and the option to take the renewed term were exercisable by the tenant notwithstanding that the original term of seven years had expired. It was argued in that case that there was a distinction between cases of renewing leases and cases of purchasing the reversion. Russell J. referred to Moss v. Barton[8] and Buckland v. Papillon,[9] and pointed out that in those cases the court had held that the option to renew was exercisable so long as the relationship of landlord and tenant existed although the original term had expired.

He went on to say[10]: "There are two options in the agree-"ment before me, and I cannot read into it any limit in point "of time except that indicated by Lord Chelmsford in Buckland "v. Papillon,[11] namely, that the option exists so long as the "relationship of landlord and tenant continues, notwithstanding "that the original term of seven years has run out." Both options obviously had to be exercisable within the same period. There could not be a question of different periods for the two options. The judge thought that those options could not be confined to the seven years' period and that, they were exercisable so long as the relationship of landlord and tenant subsisted. He distinguished In re Leeds & Batley Breweries,[12] decided by Peterson J. on the ground that there, under the express words in the original agreement, the option was exercisable only during the original term.

Mr. Tatham relies, naturally, very much on Rider v. Ford. He says that there is no distinction in principle between options for renewal and options to purchase a freehold and he says that, as Russell J. refused to confine the exercise of the options in that case to the seven years' term, so I should refuse to confine the option here to the original term and should hold that it is exercisable so long as the relationship of landlord and tenant subsists. But all the cases to which I have referred hitherto have been cases where the landlord could have turned the tenant out at the end of the original period, whereas this is a case where, by operation of statute passed after the creation of the tenancy agreement, the landlord became unable to turn the tenant out and was forced to keep him on. Mr. Tatham says that that makes no difference and he quotes in support of that submission the decision of P. O. Lawrence J. in McIlroy Ltd. v. Clements.[13] That was a case of a renewal, not a case of an option to purchase the reversion. As I understand the report P. O. Lawrence J. said, in effect, that, although the option to renew was not one of the terms of the tenancy which became applicable to a statutory tenancy by virtue of section 15 of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, nevertheless, by virtue of the Act the relationship of landlord and tenant continued between the parties, and the tenant continued to have the right to renew the tenancy on the principle of Buckland v. Papillon,[14] notwithstanding the fact that the landlord was not contented with his carrying on but wished him to go out. Mr. Tatham says that the cases decided by Russell J. and P. O. Lawrence J., taken together cover the present case.

Although the cases are, up to a point, helpful, ultimately the whole question comes down to one of construction of this particular document. The words "at any time," as I have pointed out, cannot on any footing mean precisely what they say, and the question is what is the limitation that I ought to read into them here.

It seems to me prima facie most unlikely, especially in these days of Rent Acts, that a landlord would agree in advance to a tenant having the right to purchase the reversion at a price named in the agreement throughout the quite uncertain period during which the tenant may continue to be his tenant by holding over.

That aspect of the matter was stressed by Pollock M.R., in Sherwood v. Tucker.[15] Mr. Tatham says that the landlord could, at the expiration of the fixed term, have called on the tenant to elect whether he would exercise the option or not, and that if the tenant had refused to make up his mind, the option would have lapsed. I doubt whether it would have lapsed unless the landlord had determined the new periodic tenancy, and that he could not have done in view of the Rent Acts. Again, I think it is a little easier to read an option to renew a term as applying throughout the relationship of landlord and tenant, even if the original term has expired, than it is in the case of an agreement to purchase the freehold.

On the whole, therefore, although the question is by no means an easy one, and certainly is not made easier by the current of authority, I consider that, on the true construction of this agreement, the right given to the tenant to purchase the freehold was a right to purchase it at any time during the currency of the agreement.

Road Traffic—Negligence—Collision—Unlit vehicle standing on road at night—Presumption of negligence—Failure of lighting mechanism due to break in electric wiring—Car reasonably and properly maintained by owner—Whether presumption of negligence displaced.

the cylinder head. A passing lorry driver towed the car to the side of the road some six or seven yards from a street lamp. While both vehicles were stationary, the defendant's car being completely unlit, the lorry carrying rear and side lights, a car in which the plaintiff was a passenger collided with the rear of the defendant's car and the plaintiff sustained injuries.

In an action for damages for personal injuries, the plaintiff claimed that the defendant had wrongfully obstructed the highway by permitting his car to be on the highway without any lights and, alternatively, that he was negligent in permitting it to stand in such an unlit condition on the road:—

Held, (1) that for an unlighted vehicle on a road at night to constitute a nuisance it must be shown that the vehicle was not only an obstruction but a danger and, further, that the vehicle became unlighted by reason of some fault on the part of the person responsible for the vehicle or, assuming that it initially became unlit without any fault on the part of the person responsible, that he was thereafter guilty of some fault; that the defendant's car did not present a dangerous obstruction on the highway as the place where it was standing was sufficiently illuminated by the light of the street lamp.

(2) That the presence of a wholly unlit vehicle upon a dark road at night where there was no street lighting was prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of the person responsible for the vehicle, but as the failure of the lighting mechanism could not be attributed to any negligent omission or act of commission on the part of the defendant, who had maintained his car in the manner in which a reasonably prudent owner could be expected to maintain it, the presumption of negligence had been displaced and, accordingly, the plaintiff's action failed.

Crofts v. Waterhouse (1825) 3 Bing. 319 considered.

Action.

At about 10 p.m. on March 9, 1957, the plaintiff, Isobel Parish, was driving as a passenger in a 1948 Hillman motor-car driven by her husband, Ernest Christopher Parish, along a highway, the Harlow–Epping Road, which was some 22 feet wide, travelling in the direction of London. The plaintiff's husband, a transport driver, knew the road well and was travelling at 25 to 30 miles per hour, carrying side lights and a spot light with a beam some 25 to 30 yards long. He had breasted the brow of a hill and some 250 yards farther along the road he collided with the rear of a 1937 Hillman car, owned by the defendant, Frederick H. R. Judd, which was standing unlit on the near side of the road. The plaintiff sustained injuries. Although it was a dark night, with mist in places, visibility was not bad and there was no mist in the particular area of the accident. The defendant's car was reasonably into the proper side of the road, attached by a tow rope to an articulated lorry, which was also stationary. The defendant's car was six or seven yards from an omnibus stop and a lighted lamp-standard. There were no lights on it but there were three reflectors at the back and the back of the lorry had reflectors and very good nearside and offside lights.

According to the evidence of the defendant, the circumstances leading to the position of the defendant's car were that his lights had failed quite suddenly when he was driving along the road with his wife as a passenger. The starting mechanism had also failed so he pushed the car to the side of the road. Several private cars passed him in complete safety and shortly afterwards the lorry driver stopped and towed the defendant's car until they came to a street lamp where he stopped, dismounted, and asked the defendant if he was all right. He had just remounted into the cab of the lorry, ready to move off, when the collision occurred.

The defendant, a fireman, and a driver of some experience, had owned his car for some five or six years. When he acquired it the wiring had been thoroughly checked. He had serviced and maintained it himself, he had never had any wiring failures; the battery had had the usual servicing and had been checked some 18 months before the accident. At night-time, as a safeguard against fire, he had been in the habit of disconnecting the accumulator.

The plaintiff claimed damages for the injuries she had sustained, alleging that they had been caused by the negligence of the defendant in permitting his car to stand stationary on the highway without rear lights or to be towed without rear lights; alternatively, that by so doing, he had wrongfully obstructed the highway and thus caused a nuisance. The defendant denied negligence or wrongful obstruction of the highway, and alleged negligence on the part of the plaintiff's husband.

J. Bolland for the plaintiff.
R. I. Kidwell for the defendant.

The cases cited in argument are referred to in the judgment.

EDMUND DAVIES J. In this interesting action the plaintiff seeks to recover compensation from the defendant in respect of the injuries which she sustained on March 9, 1957, when a vehicle driven by her husband, in which she was a passenger, came into collision with the stationary motor-car of the defendant. The scene of the collision was the Harlow-Epping road, and the time shortly after 10 o'clock at night. Weather conditions were that it was a dark night, in places there was mist, though the evidence was that visibility was not bad and there was no mist in the particular area of the accident. The defendant's motor-car was stationary, pointing in the direction of Epping and on the near-side of the road and it was unlit. The motor-car driven by the plaintiff's husband, which was being driven from Harlow to Epping, collided with the rear of the defendant's car.

The law, as I understand it, is that the mere fact that an unlighted vehicle is found at night upon a road is not sufficient

v.

J.

to constitute a nuisance. First, in order that a nuisance may be constituted, it must be shown, not merely that the vehicle was an obstruction upon the road, but that it was a danger. Secondly, in order for it to be a nuisance (it may be an actionable nuisance), it must be shown either that the vehicle became unlighted by reason of some fault on the part of the person responsible for the vehicle, or, assuming that it initially became unlit without any fault on the part of the person responsible for the car, nevertheless that he was thereafter guilty of some fault.

In Maitland v. Raisbeck and Hewitt (R. T. & J.) Ltd.,[1] Lord Greene M.R. said[2]: "Every person who uses the highway must "exercise due care, but he has a right to use the highway, and, if "something happens to him which, in fact, causes an obstruc-"tion to the highway, but is in no way referable to his fault, "it is wrong to suppose that ipso facto and immediately a "nuisance is created. A nuisance will obviously be created if "he allows the obstruction to continue for an unreasonable time "or in unreasonable circumstances, but the mere fact that an "obstruction has come into existence cannot turn it into a "nuisance. It must depend on the facts of each case whether "or not a nuisance is created. If that were not so, it would "seem that every driver of a vehicle on the road would be "turned into an insurer in respect of latent defects in his "machine."

Assuming that the obstruction presents danger, has the plaintiff, in the first place, established that its unlit condition was due to negligence? There has been evidence about the matter, but I pose this question to myself in this way: Suppose nothing more is available in the case but that a vehicle is found on a dark road at night in an unlit condition, does the unlit condition in itself raise a presumption of negligence or fault against the person responsible for the vehicle? One would have thought that there would be an amplitude of authorities to assist one to answer that question, but counsel for the plaintiff tells me that his researches have led him to no such position. But I think the answer must be in the affirmative. Common sense tells one that ordinary prudence demands that people who drive vehicles at night should have lights upon them. The same standards demand that if a person leaves a vehicle parked in a dark place at night the vehicle should have lights upon it.

In Crofts v. Waterhouse,[3] Best C.J., dealing with the duty of stage-coach proprietors (an action which was framed in negligence) said[4]: "This action cannot be maintained unless negli-"gence be proved," and then he went on to list the various things that must be seen to by the stage-coach proprietors. "The coachman," he said, ". . . must be provided with steady "horses; a coach and harness of sufficient strength, and properly

"made; and also with lights by night. If there be the least "failure in any one of these things, the duty of the coach "proprietors is not fulfilled, and they are answerable for any "injury or damage that happens." I am surprised to be told that I am apparently holding for the first time, as far as any reported decision is concerned, that the presence upon a dark road at night of a wholly unlit vehicle (and I speak, of course, in circumstances where there is no street lighting) is prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of the person responsible for the vehicle, and that if the matter stopped there that negligence would remain established.

Applying that matter to the nuisance aspect of this case, which is framed in negligence and in nuisance, the presence on the highway of this vehicle in an unlit state would without more be a sufficient compliance with the first requirement that the vehicle should have become unlit owing to the negligence of the car owner. But the whole basis of this claim, both in negligence and in nuisance, must be the existence of danger, and I have come to the conclusion on the whole of the evidence that the plaintiff fails in limine. It is true that she being an innocent passenger does not have to show that her husband, the driver, was free of blame. She does not have to show any preponderance of blame in the defendant. It is sufficient if she can show that some aspect of the defendant's conduct contributed to this accident, even to an extremely small degree. If she could do that upon balance then the defendant would be liable to make good the whole of the damages.

[His Lordship referred to the evidence of the plaintiff's husband that he saw a black object when he came over the brow of the hill which seemed to occupy all his side of the road which he recognised when about 25 feet from it as a laden lorry, that a car came in the opposite direction, which switched on its full lights. He knew he could not get by and pulled in to the nearside of the road and only then saw the car with no lights behind the lorry when about 10 feet from it. He braked and rebraked but hit the back of the car. His Lordship continued:] That the plaintiff's husband must be condemned in negligence himself is absolutely inescapable, and indeed Mr. Bolland has not sought to escape that fact, but he says that that does not matter, so long as the defendant can be brought in by however small a degree. [His Lordship referred to the evidence and continued:] On the whole I have come to the conclusion that the place where the vehicles were standing was a sufficiently illuminated place to present no danger to road users. Accordingly, in so far as the issue of nuisance is concerned, this action fails on the ground that there was no dangerous obstruction presented on this highway at all.

What about negligence, assuming that there was some negligence on the part of the defendant in relation to his maintenance of his vehicle and assuming that there was some

v.
JUDD.

Edmund Davies J.

negligence to explain the lighting mechanism suddenly failing? That again is unconnected with this accident, for the vehicle was left at all material times in a place where the street lamp afforded an ample warning to a person who was keeping a proper look-out or, indeed, to anybody who was keeping even a casual look-out. But since the matter has been raised it is preferable that I should express my views about the matter of the car maintenance. [His Lordship stated the facts relating to the defendant's maintenance of his car and his disconnection of the battery each night and said that he was satisfied that the most probable explanation of the failure of the electrical mechanism was that given by a witness for the defendant, a consulting engineer, who had examined the car in 1958, namely, a break in the earth wire between the battery and its earth on the cylinder head causing a break of the electric current which would affect the engine and lights; that a weakening of the wires could be caused by bending the wires over a long period but that any weakening would be concealed by insulation and nothing would be known until the break occurred. His Lordship continued:] Having said at the outset that the unlit condition of a vehicle on a road raises a presumption of negligence against the car owner, I am satisfied in this case that the presumption would, upon the evidence I have heard from the defendant and the consulting engineer, have been displaced, that he has shown a reasonable discharge of his duty and acted in a manner which not the most highly skilled mechanic would act, but in the manner in which a reasonably prudent owner of a motor vehicle could be expected to act. Accordingly, I see no ground for holding that the initial failure of the lights can be attributed to any negligent omission or commission by the defendant.

For all these reasons, while one must have sympathy with the plaintiff for the unfortunate injuries she has sustained, my duty which must be founded upon the discharge by the plaintiff of the burden of proof compels me to say that there must be judgment for the defendant.

Revenue—Income tax—Penalty—Pleading—Application of normal rules in civil actions—Income Tax Act, 1952, ss. 19, 232 (2).

The Inland Revenue Commissioners claimed penalties from a taxpayer under section 232 of the Income Tax Act, 1952,[1] and earlier revenue Acts, for failure to make income tax returns over a period of nine years. Their statement of claim alleged that he had been required by notices in writing on October 7, 1958, to furnish on or before November 12, 1958, particulars as to the several sources of his income, and that he "without reasonable excuse" had failed to do so within the time prescribed. By his defence the taxpayer admitted that he had not furnished all the particulars required within the time prescribed; but he specifically denied "that he "failed to furnish any such particulars without reasonable excuse." The commissioners applied for particulars of that denial; and the master ordered the taxpayer to give particulars "specifying whether "it is alleged that there was a reasonable excuse for not furnishing "the particulars within the time and if so giving full particulars "of such alleged excuse." The judge in chambers dismissed the taxpayer's appeal from that order. On appeal:—

Held, that the commissioners' claim, albeit a claim for penalties, was not a criminal proceeding and, accordingly, the normal rules as to pleadings in civil actions applied, namely, that where a traverse was a negative pregnant and it was clearly intended to set up an affirmative case at the trial, particulars ought to be delivered. As the taxpayer's denial that he had failed to make returns "without reasonable excuse" was in substance a positive averment and it was clear to the court that he intended at the trial to show that there was reasonable excuse for not giving the information in the time prescribed, and, moreover, as the particulars of that excuse would not assist the plaintiffs' case but would, on the contrary, benefit that of the taxpayer, particulars should be given, for not to do so might cause surprise, delay and undue expense.

Decision of Salmon J. affirmed.

INTERLOCUTORY APPEAL from Salmon J.

The Inland Revenue Commissioners issued a writ on January 29, 1959, by which they claimed penalties of £50 per annum under section 232 of the Income Tax Act, 1952,[1] and earlier legislation reproduced in the Act of 1952, in respect of the failure of the taxpayer, Leonard Percival Jackson, to make proper returns of income tax over a period of nine years.

The original statement of claim alleged that the taxpayer had on October 7, 1958, been required by notices in writing to furnish on or before November 12, 1958, particulars as to the several sources of his income and the amount derived from each source, namely, a statement of dividends, interest, annuities, etc., receivable after deduction of income tax or "free of income tax," showing the names of the companies or persons from whom such dividends, interest, annuities, etc., were receivable, amounts of holdings of shares or stock, and of the gross amount of income derived from each separate source; and that he had failed to furnish the particulars required by any of the nine notices within the prescribed time or at all.

The original statement of claim made no reference to the failure being "without reasonable excuse" and the defendant taxpayer took out a summons to strike out the statement of claim as disclosing no cause of action. The commissioners were on that application given leave to amend the statement to claim that: "The defendant without reasonable excuse has failed to furnish "the particulars required within the time prescribed in the "notices."

The taxpayer delivered a defence in which he admitted receiving the notices in writing. By paragraph 2 he admitted that he had not furnished all the particulars required by any of the notices within the time prescribed therein; but he denied specifically "that he failed to furnish any such particulars without "reasonable excuse or that he is liable to any penalty as alleged, "or at all."

The commissioners applied to Master Diamond, on March 25, 1960, for an order that the taxpayer should give further and better particulars of the denial that he had failed to furnish the particulars without reasonable excuse, and the master made an order that particulars should be given within eight days, "specifying "whether it is alleged that there was a reasonable excuse for not "furnishing the particulars within the time and if so giving full "particulars of such alleged excuse." The taxpayer appealed from that order to Salmon J. in chambers, who dismissed the appeal. The taxpayer appealed.

Leonard Lewis for the taxpayer. The onus of establishing that there has been a failure to deliver the particulars within the prescribed time "without reasonable excuse" falls on the commissioners, and if the particulars ordered by the master are given they will assist the commissioners to establish their case; and on the authorities that is just what they are not allowed to have. The commissioners say that the defence involving a double negative has implied in it a positive averment that the taxpayer had a reasonable excuse. But this is not an ordinary civil action. It is a claim for penalties; and the approach of the law to such an action is quite different from that to an ordinary civil action.

[SELLERS L.J. The court wants to know what has to be tried and here it is not the bare fact that the taxpayer has not delivered adequate particulars but whether there is a reasonable excuse or not. Even if the onus is on the commissioners in the first place, they cannot see any excuse and the taxpayer does not reveal one. His form of pleading appears to show that he has no excuse.]

The commissioners are not entitled to the usual facilities which a plaintiff has in civil proceedings, such as a right to discovery or interrogatories. They have to make out their case without the assistance usually afforded to a plaintiff.

[PEARCE L.J. If you are right in this the commissioners can never recover any penalty because they can never show that a person has no reasonable excuse if he refuses to give particulars of it.]

They have only to make out a prima facie case and if they show that they gave a reasonable time in their notices the onus shifts. But this case differs from many in that it is possible to establish by cross-examination of the plaintiffs' witnesses that reasonable time was not given. A vast amount of information is required to satisfy these notices. The notice was dated October 7, and the taxpayer was called on to furnish particulars on or before November 12—five weeks. There was much correspondence on these matters.

[SELLERS L.J. The taxpayer could have asked for more time. This is rather trifling with the court. Vast volumes are coming into court but no great principle is involved. It is a matter of common sense. Why does not the taxpayer plead the excuse instead of trying to evade it? The purpose of pleadings is to define the issue and direct evidence towards it.]

But this is an action for a penalty and stands in quite a different category.

[SELLERS L.J. In an action in the criminal courts it is desirable to define the issues beforehand. It is only a question of the machinery by which they are defined. In criminal cases they are defined by the indictment and the depositions; in a civil action they are defined by the pleadings.]

C. A.
INLAND REVENUE COMBS. v. JACKSON.

But in a criminal action what is defined is the case for the prosecution. The defendant is not required to do anything more than say "Guilty" or "Not Guilty." Though there is no authority exactly on this point, in Martin v. Treacher, Lord Esher M.R.[2] said that where the issue was "no reasonable cause" the mere denial of that did not involve the necessity to give particulars, and that the general rule was that in an action for penalties by a common informer leave would not be given to the plaintiff to administer interrogatories.

[SELLERS L.J. But this is not a claim by a common informer. The claim is under statute by the party who is entitled to enforce the penalty.]

The policy of the law must be the same in both cases.

[SELLERS L.J. What was said by Lord Esher in Martin's case[3] cannot apply to the present case. The taxpayer is not being asked to say anything that would incriminate him; on the contrary, he is being asked to say something which would defend him. If he has an excuse the proceedings could be stayed.]

If his excuses are good no harm can befall him; but if they are inadequate the commissioners would be able to present their case better than they could without the particulars.

[PEARCE L.J. It would make no difference, for the judge would simply grant an adjournment at the taxpayer's expense on the ground that the commissioners required more evidence.]

They may never get as far as that. The particulars asked for in regard to income tax covered nine years; they amount to thousands and thousands of Stock Exchange transactions, the receipt of dividends, the purchase and sale of shares and so on. It was a very considerable task to accumulate and supply all that information.

[PEARCE L.J. That sounds like a reasonable excuse which might be approached with sympathy; but what is wanted is for the taxpayer to say what is the nature of his excuse.]

A defendant on a criminal charge is never asked to put his case before the court before the actual trial. This is a claim for a sum of money to be paid because of a default on the part of the taxpayer; it is defined by statute and the payment is prescribed by statute. The principle involved is not that the defendant in such a case should not be required to incriminate himself but that the application for particulars is of a fishing character. If at the trial it is apparent that the commissioners have asked for information relating to thousands of transactions, some going back nine years, to be supplied within five weeks, a judge might well hold that there was no prima facie case that there was no reasonable excuse for failing to make delivery within the time prescribed. If, on the general picture, the commissioners could not discharge the onus of showing "no reasonable excuse" the onus would not shift; and in these circumstances the taxpayer is entitled to withhold as much information as he can. For this purpose there is no distinction between particulars and interrogatories: see Benbow v. Low, per Jessel M.R.[4]

It is conceded that if the taxpayer had pleaded something in the affirmative he would have to furnish the particulars customary in such a case; but where there has been no deliberate positive averment, he can withhold the information. The difference between an affirmative and a negative averment is that in a pleading a denial may merely mean that one puts the other side to proof and there is no intention of putting a positive case oneself.

[SELLERS L.J. But if the averment really means "I have "reasonable excuse" why should it give the commissioners any advantage except that of knowing what case they have to meet? And if the taxpayer goes to trial without telling them, they could get an adjournment on the ground that they have been taken by surprise. Where is there authority that claims for penalties under a revenue Act are in the nature of criminal proceedings and that cases of this sort should not be amplified in order to make clear the issues for trial? If I could see any prejudice to the defendant there would be some substance in these submissions; but it is all to his advantage to give the particulars asked for.]

There is always an advantage in the element of surprise. In ordinary litigation the courts frown on it; but this is a special type of proceeding. In this case the commissioners have conceded that they cannot interrogate the defendant about his excuse; but if he is required to furnish these particulars the result will be a manifest anomaly. What Harman J. said in Duke's Court Estates Ltd. v. Associated British Engineering Ltd.[5]—an action for forfeiture—is support for the present submission; and actions for penalties are on the same basis as actions for forfeiture.

[SELLERS L.J. Harman L.J. referred to Pinson v. Lloyds and National Provincial Foreign Bank Ltd.,[6] in which Goddard L.J. said: "If the pleading is not such as will fairly enable the "opposite party to know the case he has to meet, further parti-"culars ought to be ordered." That precisely fits the present case.]

There is no obligation on this defendant to set up an affirmative case, and what was said by Goddard L.J. in Pinson's case does not apply here. In James v. Radnor County Council,[7] where the onus was on a plaintiff to prove that charges were reasonable and the defendant denied the reasonableness of the charges, it was held that he was entitled under cover of that plea to produce what case he liked and was not compellable to give particulars which would show the plaintiff the case he had to meet. Where the plaintiffs allege "no reasonable excuse," and the defendant denies it, the plaintiffs must make out their prima facie case.

INLAND REVENUE COMRS. v. JACKSON.

[SELLERS L.J. James v. Radnor County Council[7] is on a totally different issue. The Inland Revenue here has to show "without reasonable excuse." If the defendant does not comply with the notices why does not that carry the implication of doing so without reasonable excuse, without more?]

One has then to look at what the defendant was being asked to do. All he has to do is to rebut the allegation that there was no reasonable excuse. He does not have to prove a reasonable excuse.

[SELLERS L.J. If the defendant refuses to give particulars he may not be allowed by the court to set up an affirmative case at the trial.]

The defendant will produce evidence of reasonable excuse to rebut the plea that there was no reasonable excuse. An accused person has to do no more than show the prosecution that they have not established beyond reasonable doubt that he is guilty. It is no part of his case that he is an innocent person.

Alan Orr, for the commissioners, was not called on.

SELLERS L.J. This is an appeal from a decision of Salmon J. who (affirming the master) made an order on the defendant to give particulars of paragraph 2 of the amended defence. In my view, the appeal is misconceived and the judge came to a right conclusion on this matter.

We have listened to the argument of Mr. Lewis and it seems to me that, if we were to grant the appeal, he would be in a greater difficulty than perhaps he has appreciated. [His Lordship stated the facts as to the pleadings set out above, and continued:] Counsel has referred us to several authorities but I do not think it is necessary to deal with them fully. One can simply take this case as a claim for penalties. It is not a criminal proceeding. The form of the pleading is of the usual kind and normal so far as particulars are required of the averments in the pleading. I support the judge entirely in thinking that when the defendant pleads in the way I have read in paragraph 2 of the defence he is of necessity and by clear implication setting up an implied affirmative. It does not go to establish the plaintiffs' case but operates substantially for the benefit of the defendant who is thereby setting up an affirmative case. The plaintiffs' claim stands on its own feet and needs no support from the defendant. On these pleadings as they stand the defendant proposes to set up that there was reasonable excuse for not giving the information required. Unless the particulars of the defence which have been asked for are given before the trial there may well be surprise, delay and undue expense.

The point argued here was considered by Harman J. in Duke's Court Estates Ltd. v. Associated British Engineering Ltd.,[1] on which the defendant relies. That was a case where particulars of a pleading were sought, and the judge made it quite clear why he took the line that he did. The actual decision is of no assistance to the defendant here. In the course of the judgment he cited some observations, which seem to me to be relevant, of Goddard L.J., in Pinson v. Lloyds and National Provincial Foreign Bank Ltd.[2] Harman J. said[3]: "As the Lord Chief "Justice [Goddard L.J.] said, 'A bare traverse is a perfectly "'good plea provided that all that is thereby intended is to put "'the plaintiff to proof of his case, but it may be that, concealed "'in a traverse, is an affirmative case, and this may well be so "'when the traverse is of a negative averment. If it is clear to "'the court, either from the nature of the case or from the "'admission of counsel or otherwise, that it is intended to set "'up an affirmative case, so that the traverse is what has been "'described as a negative pregnant, it seems to me that parti- "'culars of the affirmative case ought to be delivered. Otherwise, "'the opposite party and the court will be in doubt as to what "'issues are to be determined at the trial.'"

Then there is a quotation from Stable J. in his judgment in Pinson's case[4] where he was dealing with three possible positions where there had been a traverse. He said: "'(ii) it may be a "'negative pregnant which contains within the double negative "'an affirmative allegation.'" Then Stable J. said[5]: "'If it "'falls under the second head, the double negative extends "'beyond a mere traverse and amounts as in the present case to "'this: "If you establish a prima facie case that I sold or "'"purchased shares for you and that in so doing I acted with- "'"out authority, then I intend to call evidence to establish "'"that on each or some of the occasions there was an express "'"authority to act as I did or an implied authority to be "'"derived from certain facts." That, in my judgment, is to "'set up an affirmative case of which particulars ought to be "'given and that, none the less, though the affirmative case is "'concealed, albeit imperfectly, in a negative shell.'"

It was pointed out that if the particulars are not given then it may preclude a defendant in those circumstances from advancing an affirmative case at the trial.

I think Salmon J.'s order was right and I would dismiss this appeal.

PEARCE L.J. I agree. It is clear from the pleadings that the traverse is a negative pregnant. The admissions of counsel have made it even clearer that the defendant intends to set up an affirmative case. The only object of the defendant in seeking to avoid giving these particulars is admittedly to prevent the plaintiffs knowing before the trial what the defendant's case is, and thus to give the defendant the advantage of surprise. That is an unmeritorious object and would probably lead to an inconvenient adjournment in the middle of the hearing.

* AIRPORT RESTAURANTS LTD. v. SOUTHEND CORPORATION.

[1960 A. No. 1245.]

Landlord and Tenant—Business premises (Security of tenure)—Dual proceedings—Notice to determine tenancy—Application to county court for new tenancy—Subsequent commencement of High Court action disputing validity of notice—Adjournment of country court proceedings—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954 (2 & 3 Eliz. 2, c. 56), ss. 24 (1), 25 (1).

Practice—Adjournment—Discretion of court—Dual proceedings—High Court proceedings started after county court proceedings in same matter—Adjournment of county court proceedings pending outcome of High Court action.

Where a tenant commenced a High Court action in which he disputed the validity of a notice under section 25 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954, purporting to terminate a tenancy of business premises after his application to the county court under section 24 (1) for the grant of a new lease:—

Held, that the county court proceedings should be adjourned pending the outcome of the High Court action; to allow the county court proceedings to continue before the High Court action came to trial involved a risk of injustice to the tenant.

APPEAL from Judge Connolly Gage.

On November 13, 1959, the landlords, Southend Corporation, served a notice on their tenants, Airport Restaurants Ltd., under section 25 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954, purporting to terminate their tenancy of certain premises on the corporation's airport. The tenants applied to the county court under section 24 (1) of the Act on March 7, 1960, asking for the grant of a new tenancy. On May 27, 1960, the tenants issued a writ in the High Court, in which they asked for a declaration that the notice of November 13, 1959, was invalid.

When the application for the grant of a new tenancy came before the county court judge on May 30, 1960, counsel for the tenants asked for an adjournment pending the outcome of the High Court proceedings. The county court judge refused to grant an adjournment and began to hear the application. The tenants appealed.

A. E. Holdsworth for the tenants.

The following cases, not referred to in the judgment, were cited in argument: Sidney Bolsom Investment Trust Ltd. v. E. Karmios & Co. (London) Ltd.[1]; Evans v. Bartlam.[2]

HODSON L.J. The circumstances of this case are somewhat complicated and various considerations have been discussed before us which it is very undesirable that I should pursue, because, having come to the conclusion that this appeal should be allowed, it is very undesirable that anything should be said by this court which may in any way tend to colour or attempt to influence any decision which may have to be made hereafter. The position is that an application for a new lease was made, the landlords having given notice of termination of the tenancy—it has been conceded for the purposes of this application that there may be either one tenancy or two tenancies of the premises here in question—and the tenants at a late stage decided to challenge the validity of the notice after they had themselves made their application for a new lease. Being unable to do that in the county court proceedings, as soon as their attention was drawn to this point by counsel they issued a writ in the High Court claiming a declaration that the notice was bad, because the notice on the face of it only referred to one tenancy whereas in fact, according to their contention, there were two. The defence put in in the High Court action was, inter alia, that the plaintiffs had waived their right to take this point by making the application for a new lease. The plea was drawn in that form because of statements made at first instance by Henn-Collins J. in a case to which we have been referred of W. Davis (Spitalfields) Ltd. v. Huntley,[1] where I think what he said was an integral part of his judgment, and of dicta in the Court of Appeal in Tennant v. London County Council,[2] which cited with approval what Henn-Collins J. had said. The decision of Henn-Collins J. went to the Court of Appeal, but there is no decision on the point of waiver. In the Court of Appeal in the later case of Tennant v. London County Council,[3] Romer L.J. pointed out that the question whether or not there has been a waiver must depend in each case on the facts of that particular case.

I have said enough to indicate that in my view it is right that the county court proceedings should be adjourned until the High Court proceedings have been determined. Mr. Mann, for the corporation, has naturally tried to insist on the position which he now holds, namely, that the hearing which began on May 30, should be continued next Friday, June 24, because of the provisions of the Act, which give a tenant three months' security of tenure after the conclusion of the proceedings. But it seems to me that, having regard to the way in which this court deals with matters of discretion, the overriding consideration in this case is that there is a grave risk of an injustice to the tenants here unless an adjournment is granted, because if they are forced to go on with their proceedings—they did go on for a short time after their application for an adjournment had been refused—and to prosecute their application for a new lease before judgment is given in the High Court proceedings, and fail, they may well be estopped in the High Court proceedings from claiming that the notice was bad. For that reason, I for my part am persuaded that there would be, if not a certainty, at any rate a grave risk, of injustice if the county court proceedings were not adjourned until the High Court proceedings are determined.

I know that there is risk of delay in the High Court proceedings, but this is a short matter, a matter largely of construction of the notice and of the two documents called "licences" with which that notice is concerned. There is no reason why an application—in which both parties are prepared to concur—should not be made to the Queen's Bench Division to accelerate the trial of that action in order that the delay may be as little as possible.

This situation seems to me inevitable having regard to the way in which this Act has been constructed, which does undoubtedly lean, on the face of it, heavily in favour of the tenant, because tenancies of business premises cannot be brought to an end unless the landlords fulfil the requirements of the Act. The corporation have relied upon their intention to carry on the catering business in their airport at Southend which the tenants have hitherto been carrying on: they can get possession, but only if they fulfil the rigid requirements of this Act, one of which is that a notice in prescribed form is to be given.

In my opinion the only course which this court can properly take is to allow the appeal.

Ormerod L.J. I agree. Mr. Mann has submitted that the reason why the county court judge exercised his discretion as he did was, in the first place that he was influenced by what he regarded, on the authorities, as the likely outcome of the High Court proceedings, and secondly, that he thought that on the balance of the prejudice which might be occasioned to the parties the discretion ought to be exercised in favour of rejecting the application for an adjournment.

In view of the fact that the High Court proceedings are pending, it is not advisable, as my Lord has said, for anything more to be said in this court than is necessary; and I for my part would go no further than to say that, on consideration of the authorities and of the facts as we know them, there is plainly room for argument.

So far as the balance of prejudice is concerned, I find it hard, and I have found it hard throughout the hearing to understand why there should be any considerable prejudice against the landlords if this adjournment is allowed. True, it may be some considerable time before the matters are finally disposed of and either a new tenancy is granted or the landlords are able to take possession; but it appears to me that delay is bound to happen almost in any event, having regard to the fact that High Court proceedings are pending and that there may possibly be an appeal from the decision of the High Court, whatever that decision may be.

Although it may very well be that there might be a further delay of three months at the end of those proceedings, as Mr. Mann has said, if the matter cannot be decided now in the county court, that does not appear to me to amount to the grave prejudice which the county court judge seems to have had in mind when he was considering this matter. In all the circumstances I agree that this appeal should be allowed and that there should be an adjournment of this matter pending the hearing of the High Court proceedings, as otherwise it does seem possible that serious injustice may be done to the appellants.

HARMAN L.J. I agree. This was, of course, primarily a matter in the judge's discretion. But if we come to the clear conclusion that he wrongly exercised that discretion—that is to say, that he did not take the right matters into account or give them the right weight—it is our duty to exercise our discretion in this case. The authority for that proposition is Charles Osenton & Co. v. Johnston.[4] It seems to me that to allow two sets of proceedings to go on about practically the same matter, in two different courts at one and the same time must prima facie be a course which the court should avoid. If he resumes the hearing while the High Court action is undecided the county court judge may well be deciding a matter which is purely of academic interest—in fact sitting to hear a moot and not a judicial case at all. For this reason, in addition to those given by my brethren, in my judgment it is our duty to say that until the High Court proceedings are determined the county court should hold its hand.

In re* BLACK BOLT AND NUT ASSOCIATION'S AGREEMENT.

Restrictive Practice—Restriction—Whether contrary to public interest—Price restriction—Black bolt and nut industry—Fixed prices for black bolts and nuts, carriage bolts and nuts and railway fastenings—Fixed prices reasonable—Quantity discount based on aggregate of purchases from association members—Minimum price for large users—Lowest price quoted by members interested—Large variety and number of bolts—Avoidance of necessity of stockholders and large and medium sized buyers to "go shopping"—Whether "the public "as purchasers . . . of any goods"—Whether specific and substantial benefit—Whether benefits or advantages conferred on public by restrictions—Possibility of higher prices under restrictions—Whether restrictions reasonable—Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956 (4 & 5 Eliz. 2, c. 68), s. 21 (1) (b) (g).

Black bolts and nuts, carriage bolts and nuts, and railway fastenings, hereinafter collectively called "fastenings," were mainly used in industry, including building and constructional engineering, mining and railways, as components of some larger finished product or construction. The cost of fastenings was a trivial proportion of the total cost of the finished product of which it formed part, and in the constructional engineering industry, where the proportionate cost of fastenings was highest, a reduction of 10 per cent. in the price of fastenings would only effect a reduction of ½ per cent. in the total cost of finished products. Only a trivial quantity of fastenings was sold direct to the public. The larger manufacturers generally made the standard sizes of fastenings, of which there were over 3,000 varieties, and the smaller manufacturers made the more specialised sizes, of which there were numerous different types. Twenty-six per cent. of all sales in the home market were made to stockholders—the wholesalers in the industry; 30 per cent. of all sales were made to large buyers. Sales to stockholders and large- and medium-sized buyers accounted for at least two-thirds of all sales in the home market.

By an agreement made between all its members, the Black Bolt and Nut Association of Great Britain fixed the prices at which they could sell fastenings. The current price for black bolts was built up from the costings, which were available in 1953, of eleven large manufacturers. The basic price applied to the normal ordering quantity; for other orders there was a system of graduated discounts, and for very small orders the fixed price was obtained by adding a plussage to the basic price. The price list for carriage bolts and nuts was not based on any costings. In addition to the general price restrictions there were three special discounts: a large order discount, a quantity discount, given to purchasers whose aggregate annual purchases from members of the association exceeded a certain amount, and an inter-trading discount, which was given when one member bought fastenings from another. A special procedure governed sales to government departments and other large users. On receipt of an inquiry, members informed the secretary of the price they intended to quote, and the lowest price so reported to the secretary was circulated to all members interested and became the minimum price. Changes in the fixed prices were made solely to reflect variations in the costs of production on distribution.

Despite the absence of price competition, the industry was highly efficient, had made exceptional technical progress, and produced fastenings of the highest quality. The fixed prices were reasonable, whether judged on capital employed or on turnover, and profits were not excessive. There was no scope for any general overall reduction in prices. A single order would generally contain many different items. Were there no uniform price for the numerous different varieties of fastenings, prices for each item would vary from manufacturer to manufacturer, so that stockholders and large and medium sized buyers would have to make a great many inquiries before placing an order—they would have to "go shop-"ping" and that would cause an appreciable increase in their administrative costs which could not be covered in the case of stockholders by their present profit margins.

The association contended that the restrictions conferred on "the public as purchasers, consumers or users of any goods" specific and substantial benefits under paragraph (b) of section 21 (1) of the Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956.[1]

Held, (1) (a) that on the true construction of paragraph (b) of section 21 (1) of the Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956, "the

R. P. Ct.
(E. & W.)

1960

Black Bolt and Nut Association's Agreement, In re.

"public as purchasers, consumers or users of any goods" meant the public viewed as a collective whole in any of the specified capacities, and "the public as purchasers" connoted collectively all persons who purchased the goods, so that while it was not sufficient to show that some small category of purchasers would be denied benefits or advantages by the removal of the restrictions, it was not fatal if some small category would be denied no benefit or advantage (post, pp. 903–904).

(b) That the avoidance of the necessity for stockholders and large and medium sized buyers to "go shopping" was a "specific "and substantial benefit," and that, since removal of the general price restrictions would deny that benefit to purchasers whose purchases accounted for at least two-thirds of all sales in the home market, and the remaining buyers as purchasers would suffer no appreciable countervailing disadvantage or detriment, the circumstances set out in paragraph (b) of section 21 (1) were satisfied in regard to those restrictions (post, p. 905).

(2) But that the restrictions relating to quantity discount, which were only of benefit to the large buyers whose purchases did not account for more than one-third of all home sales, were not a benefit to the public as purchasers, and the restrictions relating to sales to government departments and other large users were of no benefit to the public either as purchasers, consumers or users (post, p. 907).

(3) That the benefit derived from the avoidance of the necessity for the public as purchasers to "go shopping" more than outweighed the possible detriment of higher prices under the general price restrictions, and the association, therefore, had discharged the onus on them of proving that those restrictions were not unreasonable within the balancing provision of section 21 (1) (post, pp. 908, 910).

Accordingly, the general price restrictions would be declared not contrary to the public interest but the restrictions relating to quantity discounts and sales to government departments and other large buyers were contrary to the public interest.

Per curiam. The restrictions contain no express provisions as to the basis on which prices are to be fixed and if the effect of a declaration that the general price restrictions were not contrary to the public interest would be to give carte blanche to the association to fix prices at whatever level they thought fit in the future, the detriment to the public in general would far outweigh the specific and substantial benefits or advantages which the public as purchasers would be denied by the removal of the restrictions, but the court was entitled to take into consideration that the prices in fact fixed were reasonable and changes therein were made only when there were ascertained changes in costs, and if the association were at any time to fix prices which were unreasonable or on some other basis, not being an improvement, that would be a material change in the relevant circumstances entitling the registrar to apply to the court under section 22 (post, pp. 909, 910, 911).

Reference.

On December 30, 1957, the Registrar of Restrictive Trading Agreements, pursuant to section 20 (2) (a) of the Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956, referred to the court an agreement subsisting between members of the Black Bolt and Nut Association of Great Britain, numbered 351 on the register of agreements.

The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment of the court. The Black Bolt and Nut Association of Great Britain, the respondents in this reference, has 44 members who between them produce and supply about 90 per cent. of the black bolts and nuts, carriage bolts and nuts and railway fastenings produced and supplied in the United Kingdom. These goods [" the fastenings "] are widely used in constructional and manufacturing industries where fastenings of high tensile strength are not required. They are made of mild steel by cold forging and hot forging processes. The larger sizes can only be hot forged, which is the older process; smaller sizes can be made by either process, cold forging being more economical and efficient where production in large quantity of a single size is called for. They are produced in a very great variety of standard sizes (viz., about 3,000) mainly to British standard specifications. In addition to the standard sizes, there is a demand for fastenings of shapes or dimensions differing slightly from the standard sizes which are known as " off standard " specials and also for fastenings, generally larger, which cannot be related to standard products which are known as " out and out " specials.

The great bulk of the demand is for use in industry, including building and construction, mining and railways, the fastenings reaching the ultimate user as components of some larger construction or finished product. The quantity which reaches the retail purchaser of nuts and bolts from the ironmonger's shop is trivial in relation to the total production. The demand is thus a " derived " demand depending almost wholly upon the general level of industrial and constructional activity. In general, the cost of the fastenings is a trivial element in the total cost of the final product of which they form part, and even in constructional steelwork, where the evidence was that the proportionate cost of black bolts and nuts is highest, it is only of the order of 5 per cent. In most products in which the fastenings are used it is less than this. Accordingly, the demand responds scarcely at all to changes in prices of the fastenings. Short of price changes sufficiently large to lead to substitution of other types of fastenings for black bolts and nuts, or vice versa, a reduction of price is unlikely to increase the total demand for the product and an increase in price is unlikely to reduce the total demand. The gross annual value of home trade sales in 1959 was some £12½ million; that of export sales about £1 million.

The requirements of individual industrial purchasers of the fastenings vary widely. Some may require small quantities of a relatively great variety of standard sizes; others a large quantity of standard sizes including " off standard " and " out and out " specials. Promptness and certainty of delivery may be vital in constructional work or where the manufacture or installation of valuable machines may be held up for the want of a few pounds' worth of nuts and bolts. About 26 per cent. of the home trade passes through the hands of stockholding merchants, the bulk balance being sold direct by members of the association to the industrial user. The nature of the demand and the importance of prompt delivery make it essential that the fastenings should be produced and stocked in a very large variety of sizes.

Of the 44 members of the association, more than half have very small works and in the years 1954–1956 (which are the last years for which figures are available), between them supplied less than 7½ per cent. of the total quantity of the fastenings produced by the members of the association as a whole. At the other end of the scale, the largest member supplied over 26 per cent. of the whole, and the three next largest a little under 30 per cent. In general, the larger works are best suited to supply economically large orders for standard sizes of black bolts and nuts, particularly the smaller sizes produced by the cold forging process involving "long runs," while the smaller works are better suited for supplying fastenings, particularly "off standard" and "out and out" specials which are required in relatively small batches at a time.

The first attempts to form an association of makers of black bolts and nuts date from the early years of the century but little was achieved. The association was re-formed in 1924, but the trade was shortly overtaken by the general industrial depression and from then until the early thirties conditions in the trade were very bad. Demand, being dependent on the general level of industrial activity in the United Kingdom, was low, imports of low-priced fastenings were substantial, wages were depressed and short-time working common, profits small or non-existent and fresh capital investment in the industry minimal. Competition for the orders available was intense, and the standard of the product variable and often low. It was in these circumstances that in July, 1933, the first effective price-fixing agreement was entered into, when 25 members, representing an estimated 91 per cent. of the production, agreed to charge not less than the minimum prices and to adhere to the regulations and terms as and when fixed by the association from time to time. In the later thirties up to the outbreak of war there was a continuous and progressive improvement in the prosperity of the industry, its manufacturing methods, and the quality of the products.

Statutory control of the prices of the fastenings was introduced on September 1, 1939, and continued until March, 1953. The association's minimum prices (which were then on a weight basis) were initially adopted as the statutory maximum prices. In 1943, after discussions with the Ministry of Supply, a price list on a count basis (viz., "per 100") was issued, and this, with minor amendments as to form and layout in 1950, remained operative as the basic price list throughout the rest of the period of control.

After the end of statutory price control a new price list, known as price list no. 3, was prepared and came into operation on January 1, 1954. It contains fixed prices in shillings and pence per 100 units of a large number of different types of fastenings, each type being specified and priced in different standard sizes.

the number of which in some cases exceed 300 for a single type of black bolt. The majority are described by the appropriate British Standards Institute Specification, but for some types, which include carriage bolts and nuts, there is no British Standards Institute Specification. The fixed prices which are set out in price list no. 3 will be referred to as "the basic price list."

The prices quoted in the basic price list are not those actually charged but form the starting-point from which the price to be charged by members of the association on any particular sale is to be calculated. The basic price list for black bolts and nuts which account for 88 per cent. of the total trade in the fastenings produced by members of the association was based upon costings in a manner to which reference is made later, and was intended to be double the actual prices proposed to be charged upon ordinary industrial sales when it came into operation on January 1, 1954. The actual price appropriate to any particular sale is calculated from the basic price by the application of one or more of a number of discounts or plussages. What may conveniently be called the normal price is ascertained by applying a general discount to the price quoted in the basic price list. The general discount, when the price list was introduced, was 51¼ per cent. in respect of all standard products. It underwent a series of changes between 1954 and 1958, but for the past two years has remained static. The normal price is applicable to normal ordering quantities; for orders for smaller quantities there is a graduated tariff of discounts decreasing as the quantity of any particular standard product becomes smaller until in the case of the smallest orders it is reversed and becomes a plussage of 5 per cent. on the basic price. Similarly, in the case of orders for large quantities of a single standard product, provision is made for a series of additional discounts ["large order discounts"], graduated according to the size of the order and the nature of the product. The large order discount is calculated not on the price in the basic price list but upon the normal price, and rises to as much as 15 per cent. on orders for 500,000 or more of a single size of some widely used products.

Apart from the variation of discounts according to the quantity of a particular product ordered, price list no. 3 provides for discounts of other kinds.

What the association calls quantity discount is allowed to user customers (i.e., excluding merchants) who have purchased products to a minimum value from members of the association during the previous year. The aggregate of the purchases made by the customer from all members of the association are taken into account in assessing his qualification for the quantity discount which at present ranges from 1¼ per cent. in the case of a customer, whose previous year's purchases were not less than £25,000, to 5 per cent. if such purchases were not less than £250,000. The quantity discount is calculated on normal prices.

No special discount is applicable to merchants as such, but merchants who qualify by a minimum holding of stock and minimum annual purchases from members of the association and enter into an agreement, called the stockholders agreement, are termed "stockholders" and are entitled to a fixed discount on all purchases. This is fixed at 5 per cent. for stockholders whose stock is £750 and annual purchases £2,500, and at 7½ per cent. for stockholders whose stock is £2,500 or more and annual purchases are £5,000 or more. The stockholders agreement does not require the stockholder to limit his purchases of the fastenings to members of the association, nor does it compel him to charge upon resale the prices fixed by the association in price list no. 3. In practice, however, stockholders do sell only at the association's fixed prices, since even if their margin of profit (which is small) permitted, they would be naturally hesitant to endanger their relationship with their suppliers by undercutting them; moreover, price list no. 3 is available to their customers so that only rarely would they be likely to find a market at prices higher than those fixed by the association's price list. The latter consideration is accentuated by the prevalence of inter-trading between members of the association encouraged by an inter-trading discount. No manufacturer, not even the largest, makes all varieties and sizes of the fastenings and it is the practice, introduced as long ago as 1945, for members to acquire from other members such types or sizes of the fastenings ordered from them by their own customers as they cannot conveniently or economically manufacture themselves. To all such inter-trading purchases a minimum inter-trading discount of 7½ per cent. applies, and a resolution of October 10, 1945, provides, inter alia, that members who supply goods on inter-trading terms should give at least as much consideration to a purchasing member as regards deliveries as they give to their other customers. The general pattern of inter-trading is between the larger and the smaller manufacturers, arising from their respective capabilities for producing large quantities of standard sizes in wide demand and lesser quantities of standard sizes for which the demand is relatively small or of "off standard specials" or "out and out specials." Inter-trading thus enables the large manufacturer to fulfil his orders completely by sub-contracting that part of them which calls for small quantities of unusual sizes, and the small manufacturer to accept orders for standard sizes in large demand which it is more economical for him to acquire from the large manufacturer at the inter-trading discount of 7½ per cent. than to manufacture himself.

1960

The prices for all standard products are fixed prices ascertained by applying the appropriate discount or discounts or occasionally plussages to the prices quoted in the basic price list which also lays down certain standard conditions of sale. The price list is widely circulated to stockholders and to potential industrial purchasers and the prices are thus well known to those who have regular requirements. In the case of "off standard specials," however, the prices are not fixed prices but minimum prices based on the quoted fixed price of the comparable standard article. In the case of "out and out specials," the price is freely negotiated between the customer and the manufacturer.

A basic price list for carriage bolts and nuts, which account for only 5 per cent. of the total home trade, is included in price list no. 3 and is known as the "8s. 1d. list." It was settled as long ago as the 1930s and is not based on costings. A similar system of discounts and plussages is adopted for ascertaining the fixed prices of these products, but owing to the earlier date and different origin of the "8s. 1d. list," the discounts and plussages applicable are not the same as those applicable to the basic price list for ordinary black bolts and nuts.

There is, however, one exception to the general price restriction scheme. Sales to government departments, railways, harbour boards and other large users do not fall within it. On receipt of an inquiry from any of these customers, a member is required to report to the secretary of the association the price which he intends to quote. The lowest price for each item so reported by any member is circulated to all the members interested in quoting and becomes the minimum price, which any member is entitled actually to quote for that item.

There have, in fact, been numerous changes of one kind or another in the prices set out in or ascertainable from price list no. 3 since it was introduced on January 1, 1954. The basic prices of some items have been altered. The general discount by application of which to the basic prices the normal price of black bolts and nuts is ascertained, was altered on ten occasions between January 1, 1954, and April 14, 1958, but has remained unchanged since that date: the general discount applicable to carriage bolts and nuts was altered on seven occasions, the last of which was on June 1, 1959. The quantity discount was introduced on September 15, 1954, and extended on August 3, 1958. The large order discount was introduced on June 4, 1958, and extended on three subsequent occasions, of which the last was on October 19, 1959. The discount to stockholders has also been amended on six occasions.

The absence of any express provision as to the manner in which prices are to be fixed makes it necessary to examine the procedure and policy which have, in fact, been adopted by the association in arriving at the original basic price list and the subsequent changes in that and in the various discounts.

The starting point for the basic price list of black bolts and nuts was a series of costings supplied in 1953 by 11 members of the association for about 100 different products. These costings were returned on the following basis: (a) the normal level of activity (75 per cent.) which was predetermined by the central council; (b) the cost of materials, assessed by the accounting and costs committee in relation to the materials required to produce bolts and nuts to British standard specification; (c) conversion costs based on individual members machine rates or piecework rates and their assessment of output for economic batch quantities. The number of costings produced by each of these 11 members varied considerably, one member producing costings for as many as 86 items, and at the other extreme one produced costings for no more than four items. In general, a straight average was taken of all the costings available in respect of each item, although in some cases costings of individual members were omitted where they appeared to be out of scale. Nevertheless, the returns included in the average showed a wide variation of costs between different members on individual items; furthermore, in respect of a considerable number of items no more than three and in some cases only two returns were available. It was intended to provide a profit margin of 10 per cent. of the selling price upon the items in commonest production rising by steps of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. to 20 per cent. upon items in infrequent use, and the resulting figure was to be doubled to give the basic price to which a general discount of 50 per cent. was intended initially to be applied. The prices of the many hundreds of other sizes and types for which no costing returns had been made were to be fixed by interpolation from those of the items for which costings had been ascertained.

The strict adoption of the ascertained straight average costs for particular items and adding the prescribed profit margin would have resulted in a price list for those items for which costing returns were available which would have shown no orderly progression in price with increasing length or diameter of items otherwise similar, and would have made the process of interpolation to fix the prices of other sizes and types impossible. Accordingly, very considerable adjustments were in fact made to the arithmetical results of adding the prescribed profit margin to the ascertained straight average cost. In the result, a basic price list was produced which showed an orderly progression in prices with increasing diameter and increasing length, but save that the costings returned by the 11 members provided the starting point for the build-up of the price list in the way which has been described, it cannot be said that the actual prices which finally appeared in the basic price list bore in the case of any particular item any definable relationship to the average costs of making it. In some cases, indeed, ad hoc alterations were made at the eleventh hour on the representations of certain members unsupported by any costing data at all.

Although the original basic price list was designed to be introduced with a general discount of 50 per cent., the various adjustments resulted in the prices as a whole being slightly higher than was intended and the price list no. 3 was introduced on January 1, 1954, at a general discount of $51\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. As already stated, between that date and April 5, 1958, there were 10 reductions in the general discount, each of which followed upon changes in manufacturing or other costs as a result of increases in the cost of raw material, wages, freight or other relevant items. The current general discount is 36¼ per cent. for all items except bolts and nuts over ½″ but under 1″ diameter for which the general discount is 35 per cent. The successive alterations in the general discount were not supported by any comprehensive costings from members, although there was a general costing investigation in 1955, in which nine members submitted costings on the same basis as those which formed the starting point for the basic price list in 1953. The association's witnesses did not appear very clear as to the material upon which the successive decisions as to the amount by which the general discount should be varied were based, but some of the larger manufacturers, at least, maintained adequate costing systems at their works and it would appear that those were the main sources of information from which the decisions of the association as to general increases in prices, by reduction of the general discount, were derived.

Alterations in the general discount did not, however, represent the only changes affecting the prices of the fastenings. The basic price list itself was changed as respects the longer length bolts (i.e., above 4″ in length) in 1956, the price being increased by about 2½ per cent., while in 1959 there was a general reduction in the basic prices of small cold forged nuts as the result of the introduction of a more efficient process. The special discounts, viz., the quantity discount, the large order discount and the stockholders discount, have also been changed from time to time, and since these variations have resulted in larger discounts, they have counteracted to some extent the effect of the increases in the normal price upon purchasers of the classes to which these special discounts apply.

Carriage bolts and nuts constitute an exception to the general method by which the prices have been fixed. For historical reasons the price list is based upon what is known as the 8s. 1d. list. This was introduced in the 1930s when the trade was almost exclusively in United States hands, 8s. 1d. representing the then sterling equivalent of $2, which was the price per gross of the cheapest item sold by United States manufacturers. This list still survives as the basic price list for carriage bolts and nuts, although it is now priced per 100 instead of per gross. Separate discounts and plussages are applicable to the 8s. 1d. list and are adjusted from time to time in the same way as in the case of ordinary black bolts and nuts. Only a few members manufacture carriage bolts and nuts and a predominant share of the trade is in the hands of one member.

The actual terms of the restrictions referred to this court by the registrar are as follows: "Each of the members of the Black "Bolt and Nut Association of Great Britain agree with every "other member—

"7. Save as indicated in restriction no. 6 herein, and save "where and insofar as the standard conditions of government "contracts for stores purchases are adopted and otherwise provide, "not to supply goods to government departments save on the "terms set out at paragraphs (1) to (5) inclusive of restriction "no. 5 herein.

"8. Not to supply goods save on or subject to the terms and "conditions in respect of carriage set out at regulation 3 and in "the 8s. 1d. list forming part of the registered price list no. 3.

"9. Not to supply goods packed otherwise than in accordance "with the standard packing described in regulations 5 and 41 "and the relevant price operative sheets of the registered price "list no. 3 save at a price increased by the charges therein set out "as appropriate to the transaction."

Restrictions 1, 5, 8 and 9 relate to ordinary sales of black bolts and nuts to consumers or stockholders; restrictions 3 and 4 relate to sales to government departments, railways, harbour boards and other large users; restrictions 6 and 7 relate to sales to government departments only; and restriction 2 relates to inter-trading sales between members.

So far as ordinary sales of black bolts and nuts to consumers or stockholders are concerned, the dominant restriction is no. 1, nos. 5, 8 and 9 being ancillary. It is important to note that it contains no provision as to the way in which the prices set out in price list no. 3 are to be fixed by the association. So far as the constitution of the association is concerned, the general council, subject to the approval of the majority of the members in general meeting, have carte blanche to fix prices and terms and conditions of sale as they think fit. There is no express requirement that the prices so fixed from time to time should bear any relation to costs of production or any other factor.

The association sought to justify the restrictions under paragraphs (b) and (g) of section 21 (1) of the Act of 1956.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 15. Diplock J. read the following judgment of the court which stated the facts as set out above and continued: It has been urged for the association that not only the growth in the prosperity of the industry from the later thirties, its manufacturing methods and the quality of its products was the consequence of the price-fixing agreements restoring confidence and order to the trade, but also that the abolition of the price-fixing agreement would result in a reversion to the depressed conditions of the late twenties and early thirties.

We do not accept either of these contentions. The price-fixing agreement followed upon the abandonment by the United Kingdom of the gold standard and the imposition upon black bolts and nuts of import duties which were further increased in August, 1934; it coincided with the beginning of the general improvement in industrial activity in this country. There were far too many factors involved to enable us to form a view as to whether or not any part of the improvement in the industry was due to the inauguration and observance of the price agreement before the war. Furthermore, the economic climate today is so different from that of 30 years ago that the state of the industry in the absence of a price agreement in the 1920s and early 1930s is, in our view, no guide at all as to what would be the consequences of abolishing the price agreement today.

[His Lordship referred to conditions in the 1930s set out above, and continued:] The method of fixing prices adopted by the association is open to obvious objections in principle and in detail. If the proof of the pudding were in the recipe, one would expect consumers to find it an unpalatable comestible. It is significant, however, that not only has there been no evidence of consumers being dissatisfied with the prices charged either generally or in relation to any particular items, but the registrar's witnesses have not contended that the prices have been unreasonable, and all consumers and stockholders called have expressed their satisfaction with the prices and with the price-fixing scheme. It is common ground that the profits made by the industry, whether based on turnover or the return on capital employed, have certainly not been excessive. Whatever the objections to the method adopted in arriving at the fixed prices, it has in fact resulted in prices which are not unreasonable, which appear to have given general satisfaction to the consumer, and which do not result in any profit to the members of the association which is unreasonable.

We are satisfied upon the evidence that the industry is now an efficient industry. Although sheltered for 27 years from the stimulating breezes of price competition, its plant has been modernised and kept up to date as regards new methods of manufacture. Furthermore, a high and uniform standard of product has been achieved and maintained, so that users in practice have such confidence in the quality of the fastenings manufactured by members of the association that they habitually use them without any further testing, although undiscovered defects might well endanger the stability of the valuable structures or the efficiency of the valuable machines of which they form an inexpensive but vital part. Mr. MacKenna, contrasting the present situation in this respect with that which existed before 1933, when plant was obsolete and standards variable and low, has contended that the improvements in these respects are due to the price-fixing agreement. We are not satisfied of this. The price agreement in 1933 may well have been a contribution to stability and confidence in an industry which, like many others on whose prosperity it was dependent, had passed through hard times in the late twenties and early thirties. We do not believe, however, that in the war-time and post-war years the absence of a price agreement would have deterred the larger manufacturers at any rate from modernising their plant or achieving and maintaining the high standard of their products, nor are we satisfied that price competition would have resulted in any widespread lowering of standards. The most commonly used fastenings are sold to British Standards Institute specification which, on the evidence, appears to be adequate for the purposes for which the fastenings are used. It may well be that some manufacturers would attempt to increase their turnover by reducing prices and might be tempted to cut costs by running their plant for unduly long periods before re-tooling or by economising upon inspection or control with a consequent reduction in standards, but such a policy would, we think, have defeated itself in an industry whose output forms a component of relatively small value in the finished products in which it is used, and where maintenance of a high standard is essential to their safety and utility. It is, however, right to observe that the mere existence of such a danger might make it necessary for the consumer to make a practice of testing for himself before using fastenings purchased from a manufacturer upon whose standards experience had not already shown him he could unhesitatingly rely.

It has also been contended on behalf of the association that the price-fixing agreement has resulted in a spirit of co-operation in the industry manifested in the exchange of technical information, joint research and in particular inter-trading.

The evidence has shown an exceptional amount of co-operation between the members and there seems no doubt that there is a free exchange of technical "know-how," which has enabled the smaller members in particular to improve their efficiency; there has also been a certain amount of joint research. We think that it is right to say that co-operation of this kind has been fostered by the absence of price competition, since it is only human nature to be more reluctant to impart "know-how" to a competitor who may use it to undercut one's own prices and take away one's own customers than to a competitor who can only use it to benefit himself and his product.

1960

Inter-trading raises other considerations. The larger and smaller manufacturers fulfil functions that are to some extent complementary. While the large manufacturer can in general produce most economically standard fastenings in common demand which make possible the use of costly equipment and the enjoyment of "long runs," the smaller manufacturer's works are better adapted to short runs of the less commonly needed and in particular the large fastenings, "off standard" specials and "out and out" specials. Orders from consumers are frequently for a variety of different sizes of the fastenings in widely varying quantities and it is common for even the largest manufacturers to obtain particular items included in a single order from smaller manufacturers on inter-trading terms. The smaller manufacturers themselves engage in a considerable amount of inter-trading; one witness stated that as much as 36 per cent. of his sales to his customers were of products he himself acquired from other members on inter-trading terms. In addition to avoiding uneconomical use of plant, this practice is helpful to consumers and stockholders because they can place orders for all their requirements with one or a few manufacturers. The volume of inter-trading has recently increased as a result of the introduction by the co-operative negotiations of the association of a new type of machine [1] for cold forging a range of nuts which has been installed by some large manufacturers. This has rendered obsolescent the older processes used by the smaller manufacturers, who now purchase their requirements on inter-trading terms from manufacturers owning the new machine, who are thereby enabled to use the machine more economically upon "longer runs."

Restriction no. 2 and the complementary resolution about the consideration to be given to inter-trading purchasers as respects advantageous delivery have, we think, undoubtedly fostered inter-trading. No doubt without that restriction and resolution and without the price-fixing scheme some inter-trading would continue, for it is a two-way traffic of advantage to both the large manufacturer and the small; but we think it is probable that the volume of inter-trading would diminish if the restrictions were abolished, because a separate bargain as respects price and delivery would have to be made whenever one manufacturer sought to sub-contract with another. In times of high demand it would be risky for a manufacturer to accept an order which included items which he was not in a position to manufacture himself until he had made inquiries as to the possibility of sub-contracting for those items at a suitable price and date of delivery. It is his knowledge that all members are willing to supply him with available items on inter-trading terms and to give him as much consideration as respects delivery as they give to their own customers that gives him confidence to accept such orders under the present system. Inter-trading under the association's scheme has, we are satisfied, helped to keep the small manufacturer in business and enabled him to perform a useful service to users complementary to that of the large manufacturer.

The greatest emphasis has however been placed by the association upon the advantage of "stability of prices" in this particular trade. This imprecise phrase is here used by them to indicate that as a result of the restrictions: (i) a uniform price for each of the products is charged by all members of the association; and (ii) that uniform price is in practice varied only in response to changes in costs of production and distribution; and (iii) the uniform price is a reasonable price.

We have already indicated in our finding [2] that the uniform prices for the fastenings have since 1954 been reasonable, in the sense that they have resulted in no more than a reasonable return upon turnover and capital employed in the industry, and that the industry is efficiently run. No consumer has complained that the prices have been too high and the registrar does not so contend. It is upon the advantage or detriment of elements (i) and (ii) that issue has been joined.

Certain special features of this trade are claimed by the association to make it one in which uniformity of price is particularly beneficial to purchasers. (a) All but a very small amount of the fastenings are purchased for use in constructional or manufacturing industry as components of finished products of whose total cost the cost of the fastenings forms only a trivial proportion; (b) the demand is dependent upon the general level of constructional and industrial activity and is not responsive to changes in price; (c) the fastenings are required in several thousand different sizes and shapes and single orders by individual users may call for a great variety of different fastenings in widely varying quantities of each type; (d) a uniform high standard of quality is essential since the stability and efficiency of the finished product may depend upon the fastening being up to the specified standard; (e) prompt and punctual delivery is important since completion of the finished product may be held up for the lack of a few fastenings of one particular type; (f) to provide an efficient service to users adequate stocks in a very great variety of shapes and sizes must be maintained and readily available, and facilities must be provided for the speedy execution of special orders.

Only a trivial proportion of the fastenings reaches the public through retail channels. The vast bulk are purchased by industrial users either directly from the members of the association or from stockholders who themselves buy directly from the members of the association at the stockholders' discount.

The advantage of the uniform price to the stockholder is put colloquially that he does not have to "go shopping." He knows the price that he can quote, he knows the price he must pay from whatever manufacturer he buys: date of delivery is the only matter for negotiation. If prices for individual items of the many hundreds of sizes and shapes, which he has to stock, varied from manufacturer to manufacturer, he would be compelled to make many more inquiries before making his purchases and his administrative costs would be increased. The margin of 7½ per cent. upon which he at present operates and which covers not only his overheads and administrative expenses but a return on his capital locked up in stock, would, we are satisfied on the evidence, be scarcely adequate to cover the additional cost involved in "going "shopping," while the profit margin available on the present fixed prices leaves little room for any appreciable overall reduction in prices under free competition, although it may be that there are some imbalances in the present basic price list which under free competition might be adjusted by the price of some items rising and others falling. In the net result, however, we see no prospect of the stockholder recouping his additional expenses of "going shopping," save by raising his own prices to his purchasers.

The position of the industrial user purchasing direct from members of the association is much the same. He, too, does not have to "go shopping." Three witnesses were called from the constructional engineering industry, in which the cost of black bolts and nuts forms a higher proportion of the cost of the finished product than in some other industries, and which would stand to benefit most by a reduction in prices of the fastenings. Even here a difference of 10 per cent. in price of the fastenings would make a difference of only ½ per cent. in the cost of the finished product. All these witnesses were of opinion that a saving of as high as 10 per cent. would not compensate for the trouble and administrative expense of "going shopping." We have already indicated that an overall saving of this magnitude is in our view out of the question; but an obvious answer that suggests itself is that under free competition the industrial user would have the choice of restricting his purchases to one or two selected manufacturers and not going into the market generally to see if the goods can be obtained at a cheaper price. However, the question of timeous delivery would remain as an important one. At present, under the inter-trading arrangements, an industrial user can place his order with a single manufacturer, who can obtain the items which he does not himself make, or which he does make but has oversold, from another manufacturer. In times of great demand, when the problem of delivery is likely to be most important, there would be less prospect than under the present system of the single manufacturer's being able to satisfy the industrial user's requirements as to delivery. It seems to us that, if the uniform price were abolished, the industrial user would either have to incur the trouble and administrative expense of "going shopping" himself or would have to purchase his requirements from a stockholder who would have to go shopping for him.

The industrial users called as witnesses also expressed the fear that price competition might result in lowering of quality standards by some manufacturers and render it necessary for the users themselves to test the products before putting them into use. As we have already said,[3] we are not greatly impressed by this possibility but we recognise that a lack of complete confidence in the quality of the fastenings to be used may make users feel it prudent to take precautions which in the result may prove to be unnecessary. Such precautions add to the expense, it may be considerable, particularly in constructional engineering, where the present practice is to take delivery on the site where the fastenings are to be used.

The fact that the uniform price is in practice varied only in response to changes in costs of production and distribution is alleged by the association to encourage the maintenance of adequate stocks both by manufacturers themselves and by stockholders. Without the price-fixing arrangements, it is contended, prices would fluctuate also with supply and demand and increase the financial risk entailed in maintaining large stocks. We are not satisfied that this premiss is correct, at least as regards the general level of prices. Supply and demand in this industry are not responsive to price changes. The larger manufacturers, who have built up a goodwill with regular customers, would, we think, be unlikely to raise their prices in response to temporarily increased demand, and they are necessarily price leaders; nor do we think that there is sufficient margin of profit in the present fixed prices to permit of anything more than a marginal reduction in the face of falling demand. Furthermore, the size of stocks maintained must vary primarily with anticipated demand. This does not seem to us to be a trade in which speculation in "futures" is ever likely to be a feature and we are not satisfied that the maintenance of stocks would be affected substantially either way by the removal of the restrictions.

As respects the general price-fixing scheme (viz., restrictions 1 and 8), the association rely upon paragraphs (b) and (g) of

[3] Ante, p. 807.

R. P. Ct. (E. & W.)

1960

section 21 (1) of the Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956. Although in form as submitted to us those are two independent restrictions, they in fact form part of a single comprehensive price-fixing scheme containing a number of inter-related provisions of two distinct types, namely: (1) Those that fix the price of the fastenings to purchasers generally according to the size of the order, i.e. (a) the normal prices by the application of the general discount to the prices in the basic price list, (b) the prices for small quantities by the application of various discounts smaller than in (a) or plussages to the basic price list, (c) the prices for large quantities by the application of the large order discounts to the normal prices; (2) those that provide for different prices according to the character of the purchases, i.e. (a) the stockholder's discount of 5 per cent. or 7½ per cent. off normal prices, (b) the quantity discounts varying from 1¼ per cent. to 5 per cent. off normal prices according to the total value of purchases by the purchaser from all members of the association during the preceding year.

The provisions mentioned in (2) above do not differ in character from restriction 2 referred to us, which provides for the discount to be allowed in inter-trading sales. They are, in our view, properly to be treated as separate restrictions and as such, together with restriction 2, are sought to be justified under paragraph (g) of the subsection.

Restrictions 5 and 9, which relate to standard conditions of sale, are sought to be justified under paragraph (g). Restrictions 3 and 4, which relate to sales to government departments, railways, harbour boards and other large users, and restrictions 6 and 7, which relate to government departments alone, are sought to be justified under either paragraph (b) or paragraph (g).

The true construction of paragraph (b) of section 21 (1) of the Act of 1956 has been argued in two previous cases (In re Yarn Spinners' Agreement [4] and In re Blanket Manufacturers' Agreement [5]). In neither case did the court find it necessary to reach a concluded opinion. In view of the nature of the benefits or advantages relied upon by the association, it is necessary that we should do so in the present case.

The relevant words of paragraph (b) are: "that the removal "of the restrictions would deny to the public as purchasers, "consumers or users of any goods other specific and substantial "benefits or advantages enjoyed or likely to be enjoyed by them "as such whether by virtue of the restriction itself or of any "arrangements or operations resulting therefrom."

The words "purchasers," "consumers" and "users" are defined by subsection (2) to include "persons purchasing, con-"suming or using for the purpose or in the course of trade or

"business or for public purposes"; and the expression "purchasers, consumers or users of any goods" in paragraph (b) of subsection (1) must, in our view, be read with this extended meaning.

The expression "any goods" in paragraph (b) is to be contrasted with the expression "the goods to which it—(sc. the "restriction)—applies" in paragraph (a). In our view, it entitles the respondents, upon whom lies the onus of establishing the circumstances specified in paragraph (b), to choose the particular kind of goods in respect of which they seek to satisfy that onus.

The word "other" qualifying "specific or substantial benefits "or advantages" merely excludes the particular benefit or advantage of protection against injury, which is dealt with expressly in paragraph (a).

The main controversy in the arguments before us has been directed to the words "the public as purchasers, consumers or "users of any goods." Mr. Foster contends that this should be read conjunctively and that to satisfy the requirements of paragraph (b) the respondent must satisfy the court that the removal of the restriction would deny specific and substantial benefits to all persons who purchase, consume or use the goods, or at any rate to the majority of such persons. On his contention, it would not be sufficient to show that the removal of the restrictions would deny specific and substantial advantages to all persons who purchase the goods unless denial of specific and substantial advantages could also be shown to all or at least the majority of persons who consume the goods or use them. Mr. MacKenna, on the other hand, goes so far as to contend that the requirements of paragraph (b) are satisfied if he can show that the removal of the restriction would deny specific and substantial benefits or advantages to any particular class of purchasers, such as, in the present case, stockholders.

We do not think that either of these constructions is right. The beneficiaries of the relevant benefits or advantages are "the "public"; not members of the public in general, but in one or more specified capacities, viz., as purchasers or as consumers or as users. The use of the word "or" instead of "and" seems to us to indicate clearly that it is sufficient to show that the removal of the restrictions would deny specific and substantial benefits or advantages to members of the public in their capacity as purchasers, without taking into consideration for the purposes of paragraph (b) what effect the removal of the restriction would have on members of the public in their capacity as consumers or as users. Those matters fall to be considered when balancing under the latter part of subsection (1) the benefits or advantages to the public in their capacity as purchasers against any detriment either to "the public," which includes members of the public in all capacities, or to any persons who are purchasers, consumers or users of the goods, even although such persons represent but a small proportion of the total number of purchasers or of consumers or of users. On the other hand, Mr. MacKenna's construction appears to us to give no effect to the words "the "public." The expression "the public as purchasers," which is to be contrasted with the expression used later in the balancing provisions "persons not parties to the agreement (being pur- "chasers, consumers or users of the goods produced or sold by "such parties . . .)" connotes collectively all persons who purchase the goods whether for resale, like stockholders, or for use whether directly from the members of the association or from stockholders or from retailers. It is not sufficient to show merely that some small category of purchasers would be denied benefits or advantages by the removal of the restriction, nor is it fatal to show that some small category of purchasers would be denied no benefit or advantage or even would receive some benefit or advantage if the restriction was removed, although that would fall to be considered under the balancing provisions at the end of the subsection. What must be shown to satisfy the requirements of paragraph (b) is that looking at all purchasers as a collective whole they can be properly regarded as being denied specific and substantial benefits or advantages if the restriction were removed. It is unnecessary for the decision of the present case to consider whether it would be sufficient to show a benefit or advantage to a bare majority of purchasers either in number or in value. Having regard to the balancing provisions, that is a question which is unlikely to be crucial.

The evidence of the stockholder witnesses is all one way, namely, that the existence of the price-fixing scheme and the fixed stockholders' discount facilitates their operations and enables them to avoid the administrative expense of "going "shopping" which, if it had to be incurred, would make it impossible for them to operate on a margin of 7½ per cent., let alone 5½ per cent. This is a benefit or advantage to them which we think is specific. Having regard to the very large number of individual items involved, in respect of which in the absence of the price-fixing agreement they would have to invite quotations from different manufacturers in connection with their orders, we are satisfied that their present saving in administrative expenses is substantial and that the removal of the general restrictions would deny to stockholders benefits or advantages which are substantial. Sales to stockholders however account for only 26 per cent. of the trade.

The evidence of users, buying direct from members of the association, was to the same effect. The witnesses called were in fact engaged in the constructional engineering industry; but it is in this industry that the cost of black bolts and nuts forms the highest proportion of the cost of the finished article, and users in this category would have the greatest interest in any reduction in price.

These witnesses, who we think can be described as typical medium-sized buyers (their individual annual purchases ranged from £3,000 to £15,000 per annum), were also of the opinion that the administrative expense to them of "going shopping" and the probable need for the precautionary inspection of goods on delivery would be substantial and would exceed any saving in the cost of their requirements which could reasonably be expected to result from price competition in this industry. As we have already indicated,[6] there is no appreciable margin for any overall reduction of prices, and we accept their evidence as to the probable increase in their administrative costs if the general restrictions were removed. As in the case of stockholders, we are satisfied that the saving in administrative costs is a specific benefit or advantage, and that in the case of large and medium-sized buyers with a wide range of requirements it is substantial. The proportion of the total sales which go to purchasers in this class cannot be accurately stated; but since about 30 per cent. of the total home sales are to purchasers, who are entitled to quantity discounts and whose minimum annual purchases must exceed £25,000 sales, sales to stockholders and to large and medium-sized buyers must, we think, account for over two-thirds of the total volume of home sales of black bolts and nuts and carriage bolts and nuts. The "public "as purchasers," however, includes the small buyer who buys his requirements of the fastenings either from the stockholder or directly from the manufacturer. The user who buys all his requirements from the stockholder would probably not "go shopping" even if the general restriction were removed. The same specific advantage now enjoyed by the large and medium-sized buyer would not therefore be denied to such a purchaser from the stockholder if the restriction were removed. The small buyer direct from the manufacturers would also need to "go "shopping": but there is no evidence to satisfy us that in his case the benefit or advantage of not having to "go shopping," which he would be denied if the general price-fixing restrictions were removed, is substantial. Having regard to the view which we take as to the improbability of any appreciable overall reduction in prices if the general price-fixing restrictions were removed, we do not think that the small buyer would obtain any substantial advantage from the removal of those restrictions; indeed it may well be that those who purchase from stockholders would be compelled to pay higher prices than at present owing to the increase in the stockholders' administrative expenses.

In the result, therefore, we are satisfied that purchasers whose purchases account for at least two-thirds of the home sales would be denied a specific and substantial advantage if the general price-fixing restrictions were removed, and that the remaining buyers would as purchasers suffer no appreciable countervailing disadvantage or detriment. This is sufficient to satisfy the onus lying upon the association of proving the circumstances specified in paragraph (b) of section 21 (1).

Black Bolt and Nut Association's Agreement, In re.

We can deal briefly with the association's other contentions in relation to that paragraph. For the reasons which we have indicated,[7] although the maintenance of the general price restrictions do reduce the risk of deterioration in the quality of the products of some manufacturers, we are not satisfied that any significant decline in quality would result from the removal of the restrictions, although we appreciate that some buyers might regard the risk as necessitating precautionary examination of the goods on delivery with a consequent increase in their administrative expenses. The evidence however is not sufficiently strong to satisfy us that this advantage considered by itself is substantial. The same observations apply to the alleged advantage of the maintenance of stocks which, it is contended, would fall if the general price-fixing restrictions were removed.

It was also contended that the general price-fixing restrictions promoted investment in the industry, co-operative research and co-operation in sharing of "know-how," all of which would be reduced if the restrictions were removed. We doubt if these are sufficiently specific advantages or benefits. We do not think that the rate of investment in the industry as a whole would be reduced if the price restrictions were removed, and although the high degree of co-operation between the members, which now exists, might well be reduced, it is, in our view, a matter of speculation only as to what effect any reduction of this kind of co-operation would have in the efficiency of the industry as a whole if price competition replaced the present system. That particular aspect of co-operation within the industry which is represented by inter-trading is, however, of importance, particularly as a factor in avoiding the need for purchasers to "go "shopping," and we have already taken it into consideration. The inter-trading provisions of the general price-fixing scheme, of which they form an integral part, have also, we think, probably resulted in keeping at any rate some of the small manufacturers in business, and avoidance of some plant duplication, and removal of these restrictions would no doubt necessitate some reorganisation in the industry to fulfil users' requirements of standard products in small demand, "off standard specials" and "out and out specials." But such advantages in this respect which users would be denied, if the general price-fixing restrictions, including the inter-trading provisions, were removed, are, in our view, too vague and speculative to be specific.

For the purpose of our consideration of the application of paragraph (b) of section 21 (1) to the general price-fixing restrictions, including the provisions relating to inter-trading, we have not so far sought to distinguish between the individual restrictions nor, in general, is there any need to do so for they form part of an integral whole. There is however one exception, namely, the quantity discount provision as defined in the present case. This is really no more than a sop to the large buyer and an inducement to him to restrict his purchases to members of the association. It is no doubt a specific advantage to the large buyer as a purchaser, but large buyers, including those whose quantity discount is no more than $1\frac{1}{4}$ per cent., account for only about one-third of the trade. This is not a substantial advantage to the "the public as purchasers," more particularly as its effect, under the association's method of fixing the general discount, must have been to increase to some extent the normal prices paid by the rest of the purchasers. A quantity discount based on the aggregate of purchases from all members of the association has no such economic justification as the large order discount, and Mr. MacKenna, in his final speech, has conceded that he cannot justify it under paragraph (b).

Restrictions 5, 8 and 9, which set out the standard conditions of sale, are not unusual and are reasonably required for purposes connected with the general price restrictions. To remove them, while leaving the main restrictions, would re-introduce the necessity of purchasers "going shopping," the avoidance of which is the ground upon which we have held that the circumstances specified in paragraph (b) are satisfied in relation to the main price-fixing restrictions.

It remains to deal with the application of paragraph (b) to restrictions 3, 4, 6 and 7, of which the two former relate to the obligation not to supply goods to government departments, railways, harbour boards or other large users at a price lower than the lowest proposed quotation reported by any member to the secretary of the association, while the two latter relate exclusively to the terms of contracts with government departments. No serious attempt has or, we think, could be made to contend that the removal of these restrictions would deny specific or substantial advantages to anyone as purchasers, consumers or users. Presumably, the members of the association think that these restrictions are advantageous to themselves, but this of course does not satisfy the requirements of paragraph (b) of section 21 (1).

In the result, therefore, we are satisfied that the circumstances specified in paragraph (b) of section 21 (1) exist in the case of restrictions 1 and 2 with the exception of the provisions for quantity discounts contained in the registered price list no. 3. We are also satisfied that the circumstances specified in paragraph (g) of the subsection exist in the case of restrictions 5, 8 and 9. We are not satisfied that any of the circumstances specified in paragraph (b) or (g) of the subsection exist in the case of restriction 3, 4, 6 or 7, or in the case of the provisions for the quantity discounts contained in the registered price list no. 3 referred to in restriction 1. These are, accordingly, contrary to the public interest.

This does not however conclude the matter save as regards the last-mentioned restrictions. The onus lies upon the association also to satisfy us that those restrictions in respect of which the circumstances specified in paragraph (b) or (g) of the sub-section exist are "not unreasonable having regard to the balance "between those circumstances and any detriment to the public "or to persons not parties to the agreement (being purchasers, "consumers or users of goods produced or sold by such "parties or persons engaged or seeking to become engaged in "the trade or business of selling such goods or of producing or "selling similar goods) resulting or likely to result from the "operation of the restriction."

It has not been suggested that non-members of the association engaged or seeking to engage in the trade suffer any detriment from the restrictions, at any rate other than the provisions relating to quantity discounts, which we have already held to be contrary to the public interest. The evidence indicated that they do not in fact undersell the members of the association. In times of heavy demand it may be that they sometimes obtain prices higher than the association's fixed prices.

As regards purchasers, consumers and users of the goods, we have already expressed [8] our view that the prices which have been fixed by the association since January 1, 1954, have in fact been not unreasonable. We do not think that overall they would have been lower had there been free competition in price; nor do we think, if the prices in the future are fixed in the same way as they have been fixed in recent years, they will be higher than they would be under free competition. Competition in price would not increase demand for the fastenings. It may be that owing to imbalances in the price list the prices of some items would fall slightly and of others rise slightly. But on balance there is very little room for any decrease in prices and, subject to certain general considerations with which we deal later, we think that any possible detriment in higher prices under the scheme is more than outweighed by the increased administrative costs of the purchasers in "going shopping."

Although in general the high standard of the fastenings, the maintenance of which is we think undoubtedly encouraged to some extent by the restrictions, is of benefit to users, it has been suggested that the maintenance of the restrictions does operate to the detriment of one class of user. To reduce the standard gives scope for economy in costs of production by running machines longer between re-tooling and by reducing the standards of inspection and control of production. The price-fixing scheme, it is said, prevents a user who would be content with an inferior article from purchasing it at a cheaper price. There is no evidence that there are in fact users in this category or, assuming that there are, that their demands cannot be adequately met by producers outside the association. A producer of inferior fastenings of any particular size or shape would have to produce exclusively for this special market since the economies which would enable him to reduce his price would make it impossible for him to produce a high quality article. There is no evidence that non-members of the association have thought it worth while to cater for such a market and we do not think that, if the price restrictions were abolished, any producers who are members of the association would be likely to do so.

There are however two important general considerations which affect the public. We accept that in general the consequence of competition is to encourage progress and efficiency in an industry; but the evidence here is that, despite the existence of price-fixing in this industry for the past twenty-seven years, it is efficient as compared with its counterpart in other countries and very considerable technical progress has been made during that time and especially in the more recent years. It is incapable of proof either way whether, as the registrar claims, there would have been greater efficiency and progress if there had been no price-fixing, or, as the association claim, there would have been less. There has been in this industry an exceptional amount of technical co-operation and sharing of "know-how" between members which has assisted in raising the efficiency in particular of the smaller manufacturers. There has been throughout the stimulus of competition for business although not the added stimulus of competition in price between members. We do not think that there are any positive grounds for supposing that in this particular and exceptional industry technical progress or improvements in efficiency which would otherwise have been made have in fact been reduced or retarded by the existence of the price-fixing scheme nor do we think that the position in this respect is likely to be different if the price-fixing restrictions continue to operate.

There is, however, another consideration that has given us great difficulty. The restrictions contain no express provisions as to the basis upon which prices are to be fixed; so far as the rules and regulations of the association are concerned, this is left to the discretion of the central council with the approval of a majority of the members in general meeting. However wisely or reasonably they have exercised that discretion in the past, it is contended by the registrar that to declare the restrictions to be in the public interest would be to give carte blanche to the association to fix their prices at whatever level they thought fit in the future and that would be a detriment to the public.

If that were the effect of a declaration by this court that the restrictions were not contrary to the public interest, we should agree that the detriment to the public in general far outweighed the specific and substantial advantages to the public as purchasers of the fastenings, which they would be denied by the removal of the restrictions. But that, in our view, is not the effect of such a declaration. The court has to take into consideration the benefits or advantages enjoyed or likely to be enjoyed by virtue of the restrictions and the detriment resulting or likely to result from their operation. The words emphasised require the court to weigh probabilities: in doing so, it is entitled to take into consideration the way in which the association has exercised its price-fixing power in the past and statements and assurances given by witnesses who are members of the association as to the way in which they intend that that power shall be exercised in the future.

The evidence shows that the association have since government control of prices was abolished in March, 1953, honestly and conscientiously endeavoured to change their fixed prices in accord with actual variations in costs with a reasonable margin of profit. The methods that they in fact adopted in 1953 were open to obvious objections to which we have already referred.[9] and no doubt had the price list no. 3 been inaugurated after the passing of the Act of 1956, a much more defensible method would have been adopted. Furthermore, subsequent alterations in general discount could and should have been supported by more comprehensive and recorded costings. But whatever the theoretical objections, the practical result of the methods adopted has been a price list which is rational and reasonable, resulting in a profit level, whether on turnover or capital employed, which cannot be regarded as in any way excessive. This has been confirmed by the recent costing investigation carried out by the accountants for registrar and the association for the purposes of this hearing.

Responsible witnesses called on behalf of the association have assured us of their intention to operate the scheme in the future as they have operated in the past and to change prices when and only when there are changes in cost of production and distribution and only to the extent of such changes retaining no more than the same percentage profit margins which they have adopted in the past.

It would have been better had the method of fixing prices in relation to costs of production and distribution been expressed in the restrictions, but in the face of the assurances which we have received, and in the light of the association's record in the past, we are satisfied that it is likely that any changes in prices will be made on the same basis as in the past in strict relation (downwards as well as upwards) to changes in costs of production and distribution, and, accordingly, we are satisfied that the specific and substantial benefits or advantages likely to be enjoyed by virtue of the restrictions outweigh any detriment likely to result from their operation, and that having regard to this the restrictions are not unreasonable.

So to determine with the consequent declaration that the restrictions in question are not contrary to the public interest is far from giving carte blanche to the association to fix prices as they please. One of the most important relevant circumstances in enabling us to reach our conclusion in favour of the restrictions is that the prices in fact fixed under the scheme are reasonable, and changes therein are made when and only when there are ascertained changes in costs and only proportionately to such changes. If the association were at any time to fix prices which were unreasonable, or to fix them upon some other basis (not being an improvement, for which there is plenty of scope, in particular in ascertaining the relevant costings, including the actual level of activity of the plant, for the purpose of fixing either the basic prices of particular items or the discounts) this would be a material change in the relevant circumstances entitling the registrar to apply to the court under section 22 of the Act of 1956, and a very different view might be taken by the court in those changed circumstances.

In this connection, it is fitting to point out that the effect of our decision that the association's provision for quantity discounts are contrary to the public interest and, accordingly, void will have the effect of increasing to a limited extent the overall profits of the members of the association and this is a factor to be taken into account in determining any future changes in prices and, indeed, in considering the then consequential change in the general discount which would be appropriate in the immediate future.

Declarations accordingly.

Crown Practice—Certiorari—Error of law on face of record—Agricultural land tribunal—Evidence wrongly admitted—No error of law on face of record—Inadmissibility of affidavit evidence.

Law Report—Citation—Authenticity—Revision of The Law Reports by judges.

An agricultural land tribunal consented to the operation of a notice to quit part of an agricultural holding on the ground that greater hardship would be caused by withholding than by giving consent. In the reasons for their decision the tribunal stated that the tenant had said that the possession of the disputed land was almost vital to his farming economy and that he would go to any lengths to retain it, but that he had had to admit in cross-examination that some three years before he had negotiated with his then landlord to surrender the land if he was paid £3,000, and that there had been further abortive negotiations to surrender the land just before the notice to quit was served. The tenant applied for certiorari to quash the decision of the tribunal on the ground that the negotiations were conducted without prejudice and that the tribunal had thereby taken into consideration matters which they were not entitled to take into consideration. There was nothing on the face of the order or in any part of the record to show that the negotiations were conducted without prejudice, but the tenant filed an affidavit deposing to these facts:—

Held, that there was a clear distinction between a tribunal which acted without jurisdiction and one which went wrong in law while acting within its jurisdiction. In the latter case, unless the error of law appeared on the face of the record, an order for certiorari would not be granted. Here no error of law appeared on the face of the record and it was impossible to go behind it and look at affidavit evidence. Accordingly, the application would be refused.

Application for certiorari.

Dacre James Bracey, the tenant of an agricultural holding, moved for an order of certiorari to bring up and quash an order of the Agricultural Land Tribunal for the South Eastern Area, dated August 26, 1959, whereby the tribunal consented to the operation of a notice to quit part of his holding dated March 18, 1959, served upon the tenant by his landlord, Noel Carrington. The landlord's application for the consent of the tribunal was on one of two grounds: either the ground set out in section 25 (1) (a) or that set out in section 25 (1) (d) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, as amended by section 3 (2) of the Agriculture Act, 1958.[1]

The tribunal, in their reasons, came to the conclusion that the tenant was an exceedingly good farmer, that the landlord was also a good farmer, and that if the land in dispute was transferred to him, the landlord, it would not be farmed any more efficiently. Therefore, there was no question of consent being granted under section 25 (1) (a) of the Act. So far as section 25 (1) (d) was concerned, the tribunal came to the conclusion that, while the land would be a great asset to the landlord in conjunction with his land, the tenant would not be seriously prejudiced by the loss of the disputed land and, exercising their discretion, they consented, by a majority, to the operation of the notice to quit on the ground of greater hardship: In arriving at that conclusion, however, they stated this: "He [the tenant] says that "to lose the disputed land would upset the whole of his economy, "and that the possession of it is almost vital to his farming "economy, and that he would go to any lengths to retain it, but "he had to admit in cross-examination that three years ago he "negotiated with his then landlord to surrender this 328 acres "[the 328 acres included the 115 acres, the land in dispute] that "he was willing to surrender that if he was paid £3,000 and that "in February of this year [that is, just before the notice to quit "was served] through his agents, he again negotiated with the "landlord's agents to surrender the disputed land."

D. A. Grant for the tenant.
Alan Fletcher for the landlord.

The following cases, in addition to those appearing in the judgment, were cited in argument: Reg. v. Bolton[2]; Reg. v. Medical Appeal Tribunal, Ex parte Gilmore[3]; Baldwin & Francis Ltd. v. Patents Appeal Tribunal.[4]

LORD PARKER C.J., having stated the facts, continued: I find it unnecessary to go into the details of the matter as disclosed in the reasons given by the tribunal. The ground upon which the order of certiorari is sought is really this: that those negotiations in February between the landlord and tenant were, if we were entitled to look at them, negotiations conducted without prejudice. Accordingly, it is said here that the tribunal had no right to allow evidence to be given in regard to them, and that they were taking into consideration matters which they were not entitled to take into consideration. I think that if one got as far as that, it would be impossible to say that those negotiations in February, of which evidence was given, did not affect the tribunal's mind. However, the first question is whether we are entitled to look behind the reasons. As has been said many times, certiorari is a special remedy. It goes when there has been a want of jurisdiction, and in that expression, "want of jurisdiction," matters akin thereto are covered, such as a decision obtained by fraud or bias on the part of members of the tribunal or, indeed, a case where there has been a breach of some principle of natural justice like receiving evidence from one party in the absence of the other. The other main ground on which certiorari may be served is when there is a speaking order, as there is here, and there is an error of law on the face of the record. There is, however, this vital distinction between the two main grounds: where it is said that the tribunal have gone wrong in law while acting within their jurisdiction, this court can only interfere if they can see that error on the face of the record; whereas if certiorari is moved for want of jurisdiction the court is entitled to look at affidavit evidence to see whether or not there was jurisdiction. Here, I am quite satisfied that, on the face of this order, it is impossible to say that there was any error of law. There is nothing here to disclose whether these negotiations were without prejudice negotiations or not. Looking at the face of this record, it discloses no error of law, and accordingly, on well-known principles it would be impossible for this court to go behind it and look at affidavit evidence.

Mr. Grant—and the court is indebted to him for his argument—maintains that, on the assumption for this purpose that the negotiations were without prejudice, it is a matter which goes beyond, as he puts it, a mere rule of evidence, and means that the tribunal are taking into account matters which have been referred to in the cases as "sacred." He refers to Hoghton v. Hoghton,[1] and says that certiorari will then lie on the basis that there has been a want of jurisdiction. He relied very strongly on a dictum, and I think that it was only a dictum, of Lord Goddard C.J. in his judgment in this court in Rex v. Fulham, Hammersmith and Kensington Rent Tribunal, Ex parte Hierowski.[2] It is unnecessary to refer to the facts, but in that case, reported in The All England Reports, there is a passage which reads as follows[3]: "But there is another ground on which, in my opinion, "the court is bound to grant certiorari. If it can be shown that "an inferior tribunal has come to its decision by taking into "account matters which it ought never to have taken into account "and are virtually extraneous to what they have to decide, that "is a ground for granting certiorari. The chairman, in his "affidavit, has frankly stated that the tribunal acted as they did "on grounds which appear to this court to be entirely irrele-"vant. . . ." I confess that when I was referred to that passage with which, I, as a member of the court, had agreed, I was worried; but I notice that in the Law Reports,[4] when the matter was revised, that particular passage is omitted.

There is a clear distinction between a tribunal which acts without jurisdiction and one which goes wrong in law while acting within its jurisdiction, for example, acting on no evidence or acting on evidence which ought to have been rejected, or failing to take into consideration evidence which ought to have been considered. Those are all matters of law, and unless the error appears on the record, no order for certiorari can be obtained.

I think that it is unnecessary to read the well-known passages in Lord Sumner's speech in the Privy Council in Rex v. Nat Bell

Accordingly, I would refuse this application.

Husband and Wife—Condonation—Revival of condoned offence—Pleading—Adultery unknown to condoning spouse and not pleaded—Whether capable of constituting revival—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (14 Geo. 6, c. 25), s. 4.

A wife committed adultery with the party cited. The husband condoned that adultery. Subsequently, the wife, unknown to the husband, committed adultery with a man other than the party cited. The husband, not knowing of this latter adultery, had not pleaded it against the wife.

Held, that it was the duty of the court to take into account the unpleaded adultery, in determining the question whether the earlier adultery, which had been condoned, had been revived.

DEFENDED SUIT for divorce.

The parties married in 1947. In 1957, the wife petitioned for divorce on the ground of the husband's desertion, alleging that in March, 1954, the husband left her without cause and had never returned to her. She prayed for the exercise of the court's discretion in respect of her adultery both before and after the parting. The husband, by his answer, admitted leaving the wife in March, 1954, but alleged that he was forced to leave by the wife's expulsive words and conduct. He alleged adultery between the wife and the party cited from June, 1953, onwards. The husband conceded that he had condoned the wife's adultery by taking her back when he knew that she had committed adultery with the party cited in 1953, but pleaded that the condoned adultery had been revived by the wife's desertion. At the hearing of the suit, the wife's evidence disclosed adultery by her in 1956 and 1957, with a man other than the party cited. The husband did not know of this adultery and had not alleged it in his answer. The question arose whether that unpleaded adultery should be taken into account by the court as reviving the condoned adultery with the party cited.

A. C. Goodall for the wife.
Miss Elaine Jones for the husband.
The party cited appeared in person.

Karminski J. referred to the facts and the pleadings and continued: In the course of the hearing it became apparent from the wife's evidence that she had committed adultery long after the husband left, with a man, not the party cited, over a period of months between October, 1956 and 1957, in Wales. The husband had no knowledge of that and has not charged it, but it is said, I think with force, by Miss Jones, that looking at the condonation problem in this case I must have regard to the fact that after she had been forgiven by her husband and after they had parted, whatever the merits or de-merits of the parting, she destroyed the condonation by committing adultery with this other man. With all deference to what Mr. Goodall said, I think Miss Jones's argument on that is well founded because under section 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, it is the duty of the court to inquire into the facts and to ascertain whether there has been any condonation on the part of the petitioner. "The petitioner," for the purpose of this case, means "the respondent," who seeks relief on the ground of adultery. Section 4 (2) provides: "If the "court is satisfied on the evidence that—(a) the case for the peti- "tion has been proved; and (b) where the ground of the petition "is adultery, the petitioner has not . . . condoned, the adul- "tery . . . . ; the court shall pronounce a decree of divorce, but "if the court is not satisfied . . . it shall dismiss the petition." The section then goes on to deal with the discretionary powers of the court.

I am bound to say that the duty of the court, as set out above, makes it imperative to ascertain whether or not at the time of the hearing, the adultery admittedly at one time condoned, still remains condoned. Although I appreciate that the adultery of 1956 and 1957 with another man in Cardiff has not been pleaded, I cannot ignore it when determining whether the wife's earlier adultery with the party cited has or has not been condoned. On the facts before me, that adultery took place and I hold as a matter of law that it has not been condoned, although it was for a period condoned but was subsequently revived.

In 1939 G., a Roumanian merchant, exported a quantity of dried peas, the price of which was over £2,200, to a merchant in the United Kingdom. By virtue of the provisions of section 1 of the Debts Clearing Offices and Imports Restrictions Act, 1934, and the Orders made thereunder, the buyer was required to and did so pay the price of the goods to the Anglo-Roumanian Clearing Office (A.R.C.O.) who credited it in their books to the sub-account of the Roumanian Commercial Bank, who had been nominated by G. as the authorised bank to act as "beneficiary" in respect of the price. In consequence of such payment the Roumanian exporter was entitled to spend the price in buying certain classes of goods for import into Roumania, the function of an authorised bank under Roumanian law being to see that (a) the sterling proceeds were not expended otherwise than for the purchase of goods authorised to be imported into Roumania in compensation for goods exported to the United Kingdom; (b) in default of such import the sterling was duly surrendered to the National Bank of Roumania as required by Roumanian law. Subsequently, G. assigned his rights in respect of £2,193 of the sum in question to the appellant, then a Roumanian merchant, who paid G. for these rights in Roumanian currency. In June, 1940, the appellant gave instructions to the Roumanian Commercial Bank to make the price available to a British company from which he had bought rubber for export to Roumania. Thereupon the bank cabled A.R.C.O. instructing them to pay the £2,193 to the British exporter. A.R.C.O. paid as directed but, owing to the sale falling through, the money was refunded on January 25, 1941, to A.R.C.O., who credited it once again in their books to the bank, and there it remained until the outbreak of war between the United Kingdom and Roumania. Thereupon, pursuant to section 8 of the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, this sum was paid over to the Custodian of Enemy Property. After the conclusion of hostilities money so paid over could not be recovered by the original Roumanian owners as under article 1 (2) and (3) of the Treaty of Peace (Roumania) Order, 1948, it was made subject to a charge which made it available to meet the claims of British creditors of Roumanians, and it was transferred, accordingly, to the respondent, the Administrator of Roumanian Property.

On June 17, 1940, the payments agreement between the United Kingdom and Roumania was abrogated, and by the Clearing Office (Roumania) Amendment Order, 1940, proceeds of debts which had reached A.R.C.O. before that date were left to be applied in accordance with the existing provisions of the clearing scheme, subject to a provision (which never took effect) making the fund applicable in accordance with any arrangements which might be made between the respective countries with a view to winding up and making a final distribution of the sums received by A.R.C.O. In 1948 the clearing office itself was abolished by the Debts Clearing Offices Act, 1948, the effect of which was to vest the rights and liabilities of A.R.C.O. (so far as material) in the Crown.

In 1951 the appellant settled in Israel and became a citizen of that country. In consequence of this and the fact that he suffered persecution in Roumania, the Board of Trade, acting under statutory authority, released the charge on property (if any) belonging to him in the hands of the respondent.

In proceedings in which the appellant claimed to be entitled to recover the sum in question:—

Held, that the appellant was the only person who could have any right, interest or property in this sum, as neither A.R.C.O. nor the bank had any beneficial right of property in it, and that the appellant had a right, which English law would recognise and enforce, to compel the bank to give effect to his instructions and direct the disposition of the fund pro tanto as he should require, since (per Viscount Simonds, Lord Radcliffe and Lord Cohen) (a) the bank's rights as nominated beneficiary were purely ministerial and came to an end on the termination of the clearing scheme and could no longer determine the rights of the holder of the fund; (b) the clearing legislation by impounding the proceeds of G.'s debt and vesting them in A.R.C.O.'s fund, created no new owner of them in the beneficial sense—it merely created over them certain rights of control, out of which he would have got full value in the use of his sterling within the terms of the scheme (post, p. 943); accordingly, the determination of the scheme without the winding up of the fund meant that the restrictions on the free use of the proceeds of his debt were removed, subject only to the impediment by way of the charge imposed by the Treaty of Peace Order, 1948; that, since the charge had been removed, the appellant as G.'s assignee emerged as the true owner of the sterling to which he was entitled accordingly; (per Lord Reid) there was nothing in the Act of 1934, nor in the Order of 1939 made thereunder, which took away the beneficial interest in the sum in question from G. or the appellant as his assignee, and that, as the word "owner" in the context of article 1 (5) (g) of the Order of 1948 must mean beneficial owner, the charge having been removed, the appellant was entitled to recover the money (post, p. 934); (per Lord Denning) the sum in question was money had and received to the appellant's use, for A.R.C.O. was nothing more than a statutory collector of moneys owing to Roumanians. Further, the bank, although the nominated beneficiary, was not the beneficial owner of the money since it had to act on the instructions of the Roumanian creditor who had the right to say how it was to be applied. Hedged round with limitations, as it was, nevertheless it remained money received to his use post, p. 946).

Decision of the Court of Appeal reversed.

APPEAL from the Court of Appeal (Lord Evershed M.R., Sellers and Pearce L.JJ.).

This was an appeal by leave of the House of Lords from an order of the Court of Appeal dated November 18, 1958, (a) allowing an appeal by the respondent, the Administrator of Roumanian Property, from an order of Glyn-Jones J., dated December 20, 1957, whereby judgment was entered in favour of the appellant, Israel Fischler, against the respondent for the sum of £2,193 6s. 8d., (b) directing that the said order dated December 20, 1957, be set aside and that judgment be entered for the respondent with costs.

The question for determination in this appeal was whether the appellant had any proprietary interest, legal or equitable, in certain property, namely, property represented by a sum of £2,193 6s. 8d., formerly part of a general balance standing on February 15, 1941 (the date Roumania became enemy territory) to the credit of the Anglo-Roumanian Clearing Office with the Bank of England and (in accordance with the Clearing Office (Roumania) Amendment Order, 1939) recorded in the books of the clearing office in a separate sub-account in the name of the Roumanian Commercial Bank, it being conceded by the respondent that if the appellant had any such interest he was entitled to succeed in the action.

The following statement of facts is substantially taken from the judgment of Glyn-Jones J.

The appellant, Israel Fischler, was of Roumanian origin. He was formerly a Roumanian national living in Roumania and carrying on business there as an importer. In May of 1940 he was minded to import a consignment of raw rubber into Roumania. He acquired a right, the nature of which was in dispute in these proceedings, to cause the sum of £2,193 6s. 8d.,

H. L. (E.)

being part of a gross sum standing in the books of the Bank of England in the name of the Controller of the Anglo-Roumanian Clearing Office in London, to be paid to the Midland Bank in London to open a letter of credit in favour of the exporter in the United Kingdom of the rubber. The exporter was unable to obtain an export licence and the transaction was not completed, and the sum paid for the letter of credit was repaid to the Bank of England and recredited to the account in the name of the Controller of the Clearing Office.

After the outbreak of war between the United Kingdom and Roumania the sums held by the Bank of England in the name of the clearing office, including this sum of £2,193 6s. 8d. (which had been reduced by certain charges to £2,190 11s. 10d.) were transferred to the Custodian of Enemy Property, and after the signature of the Treaty of Peace between the United Kingdom and Roumania these funds passed to the respondent to be administered pursuant to the terms of the Treaty of Peace (Roumania) Order, 1948. By that Order the property, rights and interests in England of Roumanian nationals were charged with the amounts due at the date when the Treaty of Peace with Roumania came into force in respect of claims by the British Crown or British nationals against the Roumanian Government or Roumanian nationals. Article 1, sub-paragraph (1), read as follows: "In this Article the expression 'property, rights or "'interests' includes real and personal property, and any estate "or interest in real or personal property, any negotiable instru-"ment, any debt or other chose in action, and any other right or "interest, whether in possession or not."

The appellant was a Jew who suffered persecution under the Government of Roumania between 1940 and 1945, and thereafter he was refused permission to leave Roumania until 1950 when he succeeded in leaving. He then settled permanently in Palestine. In view of these facts, the Board of Trade, acting in pursuance of sub-paragraph (2) of article 1 of that Order, released from the charge the property of the appellant, if any, in this sum, leaving to be determined by the courts in the United Kingdom the question whether or not the appellant had any property therein. The contention of the respondent was that the sum was properly credited in the books of the clearing office to the account of the Commercial Bank of Roumania, and that the courts of the United Kingdom could not recognise any person other than that bank as possessed of any property or interest of any kind in the sums so credited.

It is necessary to set out briefly the history of foreign exchange control in Roumania. Exchange control was first introduced in Roumania in October, 1932, and took the form of a law requiring Roumanian nationals to surrender to the National Bank of Roumania all sterling currency, inter alia, owned by them, and forbidding the acquisition of sterling thereafter save from the bank. Proceeds in sterling of exports from Roumania had to be surrendered to the National Bank of Roumania in exchange for Roumanian currency, and the sterling, or part thereof, thus acquired by the National Bank was used to pay for goods to be imported from the sterling area into Roumania. Import licences were required by importers and were issued only to registered importers, that is to say, persons whose names appeared on the register of importers kept by the Chamber of Trade, and to registered importers having import licences the National Bank allocated a quota of the sterling available. From time to time these rules were modified so as to permit an exporter to retain control, or a measure of control, over the whole or a portion of the sterling proceeds of exports by him of Roumanian goods, he being permitted to use the whole or that portion as the case may be to pay in sterling for goods to be imported into Roumania by him or by some registered importer over and above that importer's quota. This was done to encourage exports of particular classes of goods, particularly agricultural produce. But the exporter's control was limited. Appended to Ministerial Decision No. 60955, dated October 3, 1935, were two lists of goods, namely, List A of "Products which may be exported in compensation for "the import of products in List B"; and List B of "Products "which may be imported in compensation for the export of pro-"ducts in List A." The permits to make such exports were described as "compensation" permits and the trade as "com-"pensation" trade; and the same description, "compensation," appears in the corresponding legislation in the United Kingdom hereafter referred to.

On September 3, 1938, a decision of the Council of Ministers of Roumania was made concerning the export of dried peas, namely, "Journal of Council of Ministers No. 2172 of Septem-"ber 3, 1938, concerning the export of peas by compensation." Under this decision an exporter of dried peas was not required to surrender to the National Bank of Roumania any of the proceeds in sterling which became available from the export, but that sterling could be used only in payment for the import of goods in List B or otherwise described or defined in the journal cited.

Towards the end of 1939 or at the beginning of 1940 a Roumanian national named Halpern, who traded under the name of "Granimex," was granted a compensation permit under the provisions of that Journal 2172 to export to the United Kingdom from Roumania a quantity of dried peas. He was required by Roumanian law to carry out the transaction through "the inter-"mediary of an authorised bank who would guarantee the "execution of the compensation." [Quoted from the translation of article 5 of the text of Roumanian Ministerial Decision No. 59101 of October 3, 1935, and see also article 1, sub-paragraph (2) of the Journal 2172 of September 3, 1938, which provided that permitted exports of dried peas pursuant to that decision "will be "guaranteed by the authorised Banks."] Certain banks in Roumania were authorised banks for the purpose of compensation trade, and the collection of foreign currency arising from the export as well as the making of payment for compensation imports in respect of that export had to be effected through one of the authorised banks. The function of the bank was to see to it that (1) the sterling proceeds of sale were not expended otherwise than for the purchase of goods authorised to be imported in compensation, and (2) that in default of such import the sterling was duly surrendered to the National Bank of Roumania as required by Roumanian law.

It appeared from the evidence that the word "guarantee" was not used in the meaning it might bear in English law. The bank was not a surety required out of its own funds to make good any default by the exporter, but was put in a position to see to it, and was required to see to it, that the sterling was not paid out save either in payment for permitted compensation imports into Roumania or to the National Bank as the case might be.

Granimex, therefore, delivered to an authorised bank, the Commercial Bank of Roumania, the customary shipping documents together with a "pink form" which was a copy of the export declaration made to the Roumanian authorities by the exporter and containing information about the transaction, including the name of the exporter and the name of the Commercial Bank as the authorised bank. These documents the bank forwarded to a correspondent in London who presented them to the importer of the peas. The importer, pursuant to the requirements of the English law, paid the sum due in sterling to the Bank of England which credited that sum to a Compensation Transactions Account kept by the bank in the name of the clearing office. At the same time the pink form was delivered to the bank and passed by the bank to the clearing office.

It is now necessary to refer to the provisions of English law governing the constitution and functions of the clearing office. Where a foreign government instituted control over the acquisition by its nationals of British currency the result might be to cause damage to persons residing or carrying on business in the United Kingdom. The rule that exporters of Roumanian goods were required to surrender the sterling proceeds to the National Bank of Roumania made it difficult or even impossible for Roumanian debtors to acquire sterling with which to pay debts due to British creditors.

By the Debts Clearing Offices and Import Restrictions Act, 1934, power was given to the Treasury, if it appeared that in the case of any foreign country payments or transfers to persons ordinarily resident or carrying on business in the United Kingdom were subject to restrictions or prohibited or discontinued, to set up by order a clearing office to deal with the collection of debts due or to become due to persons ordinarily resident or carrying on business in that country in respect, inter alia, of goods imported into the United Kingdom from that country. Where such an order had been made every person in the United Kingdom from whom such debt was due was required to pay that debt or such part of it as might be specified in the order to the clearing office, whose receipt should be a good discharge.

The clearing office was then required to apply the sums so received either (a) in discharging various classes of debts due from persons in the foreign country to which the order related to, inter alia, persons resident or carrying on business in the United Kingdom, etc., or (b) in such manner as might be provided for in any agreement entered into between His Majesty's Government, as it then was, in the United Kingdom and the Government of the foreign country to which the order related.

Pursuant to that statute, the Clearing Office (Roumania) Order, 1936, was made on May 28, 1936, whereby an Anglo-Roumanian Clearing Office was set up. By article 8 of the Order the Clearing Office was required to apply the sterling received in manner provided by two agreements between the respective Governments, and these agreements, called Anglo-Roumanian Payments Agreements, were published as schedules to the Order. Agreements were made from time to time between the two Governments varying the terms of the original payments agreements, and orders were duly made requiring the clearing office to give effect to those agreements. It is unnecessary to make further reference to these agreements or orders apart from that which was in force at the material time.

This was the Clearing Office (Roumania) Amendment Order, 1939, dated July 13, 1939, and appended to it were the terms of the Anglo-Roumanian Payments Agreement dated July 12, 1939. Article 10 of that payments agreement refers to "(1) Such "facilities as may be granted in Roumania for the special "exportation of goods to provide foreign exchange for . . . the "importation of goods into Roumania." This is a reference to compensation trade. By article 3, sub-article (ii), it was provided that so much of any payment received in respect of the price of Roumanian goods under the facilities provided by article 10 as was not required to be surrendered was to be transferred to an account at the Bank of England in the name of the Controller of the Clearing Office known as the "Compensation "Transactions Account." Article 11 of that order provided: "(1) All amounts credited to the Compensation Transactions "Account in accordance with Article 3 (ii) shall be recorded in "the books of the Clearing Office in separate Sub-Accounts in the "names of the persons or banks in Roumania respectively "nominated at the time of payment as the beneficiaries in respect "of the corresponding payments made to the Bank of England. "Subject to the provisions of paragraph (2) of this Article, pay-"ment shall be made from the Compensation Transactions

Fischler v. Administrator of Roumanian Property.

"Account at the sole request of such persons or banks in "Roumania or of their nominees to the extent of the amounts "standing to the credit of their respective Sub-Accounts." Sub-article (2) dealt with the nature and origin of the goods which might be bought with the money in the Compensation Transactions accounts for import into Roumania exported from "a "British overseas territory, colony, or territory under British "protection or mandated territory in respect of which a madate" was exercised by the Government of the United Kingdom. Sub-article (5) provided: "A copy of the export declaration"—that is the pink form—"made to the National Bank of Roumania in "the case of the export of goods from Roumania under the pro-"visions of Article 10 shall accompany such goods imported into "the United Kingdom. The said export declaration should be "attached to the form used for making payment to the Bank of "England in accordance with Article 2 or forwarded direct to the "Clearing Office."

Article 2 provided: "(1) All debts due . . . from persons in "the United Kingdom to persons ordinarily resident or ordinarily "carrying on business outside the United Kingdom in respect of "the price of Roumanian goods imported into the United King-"dom shall be paid in sterling to a non-interest-bearing account "at the Bank of England in the name of the Controller of the "Anglo-Roumanian Clearing Office (hereinafter referred to as the "Clearing Office)."

The nominated beneficiary mentioned in article 11 meant the authorised bank through "the intermediary of which" by Roumanian law the transaction was carried out or, in some exceptional cases where the Roumanian exporter was absolved from the obligation to do business through an authorised bank, the exporter himself.

To revert to the export of peas by Granimex, the pink form having been sent to the clearing office by the Bank of England the payment was credited in the books of the clearing office to a compensation sub-account in the name of the Commercial Bank. Up to this stage no payment had been made to or received from the Commercial Bank by Granimex other than, it may be, whatever sum the bank was entitled to charge for its services in forwarding the documents. Granimex then sought to find a registered importer in Roumania to whom he might dispose, in return for a payment in Roumanian currency, of his right to cause the sterling proceeds of his peas to be used to pay for goods to be imported into Roumania.

In the cross-examination of one of the appellant's witnesses it was suggested by counsel, and denied by the witness, that the transfer by Granimex of the right to use this sterling was a breach of article 3 of the Roumanian Ministerial Decision 59101 of October 3, 1935; but the suggestion was not pressed. That article provided that compensation permits, that is, permits to export compensation goods, and import licences might not be transferred; but Granimex did not transfer the permit but used it to export the peas; nor did Granimex transfer any import licence, for the import licence was not granted to that firm but to the appellant. The judge accepted evidence that it was the right to dispose of the benefit of the sterling proceeds which gave compensation trade its value to the exporter. The agricultural exporter might have no wish to import goods and no knowledge of how to set about doing so; but he could readily find an importer willing and eager to acquire an opportunity to import goods in excess of his quota, and to pay for the right to use sterling for that purpose a rate exceeding the official rate of exchange.

Granimex then made contact with the appellant—whose trade name was Chimicalia—and sold to Chimicalia for Roumanian lei the right to make use of £2,193 6s. 8d. sterling, part of the proceeds of the export of peas, that sum then forming part of the sum standing in the compensation sub-account kept by the clearing office in the name of the Commercial Bank of Roumania.

Chimicalia applied for and obtained an import licence for the import of raw rubber, and Granimex on Chimicalia's instructions then required the Commercial Bank to direct the clearing office to pay on behalf of Chimicalia the sum of £2,193 6s. 8d. to the Midland Bank in London to open a letter of credit in favour of the United Baltic Corporation Ltd., who were the exporters in the United Kingdom of the rubber. The Commercial Bank of Roumania was informed that Chimicalia was the importer. Again there was no need for any transfer of funds or other payments save possibly for charges to the Commercial Bank by Chimicalia or vice versa.

Glyn-Jones J. held that, as a result of the events above referred to, the relation of banker and customer never came into existence between Fischler and the Commercial Bank. The bank was no more than the channel through which Fischler's order to cause sterling to be paid to the United Baltic Corporation Ltd. or, rather, to the Midland Bank the letter of credit, was transmitted to the clearing office. There was no evidence that Fischler ever authorised Granimex to make a contract between him, Fischler, and the Commercial Bank so as to create the relation of banker and customer between them. Granimex had chosen to effect the transaction through the Commercial Bank. Having done so, it was impossible to secure payment out of the sterling proceeds unless the instruction passed through the Commercial Bank, and the Commercial Bank had no freedom to refuse to transmit the instruction and Fischler had no freedom to transmit the instruction through any other channel. In his Lordship's view the relation of banker and customer must have been dehors the contract. The contract required agreement, and there was no evidence whatever of any agreement at any time between the Commercial Bank and Fischler whereby the ordinary commercial relationship of banker and customer between Fischler and the Commercial Bank had ever come into existence at all. If it never came into existence at all in the first instance the learned judge was at a loss to see why the repayment of the sum to the Bank of England by the Midland Bank in London should then have created or brought into existence the relationship of banker and customer between the Commercial Bank of Roumania and Chimicalia or Fischler, the appellant.

The transfer of the £2,193 6s. 8d. by the Bank of England to the Midland Bank to finance the letter of credit was made on June 1, 1940. On January 22, 1941, the Midland Bank repaid this sum to the Compensation Transactions Account kept by the Bank of England less charges reducing the sum to £2,190 11s. 10d. On November 26, 1945, the Commercial Bank wrote a letter to the appellant Chimicalia as follows: "Messrs. Chimicalia I. "Fischler" at the address in Bucharest. "Credit No. 2209 of "£2,193 6s. 8d. in favour of Messrs. United Baltic Corporation, "London. We received from the Controller of the Anglo-"Roumanian Clearing Office, London, a letter dated January 25, "1941, in which we are informed that the sum forming the "object of the credit above has been returned by the Midland "Bank Limited, London, as the credit has not been utilised. "We therefore credit to you in account Compensation Trans-"actions Account any goods with: £2,193 6s. 8d., less £2 15s. 3d. "confirmation commission of our correspondent," which equals £2,190 11s. 5d. "For your guidance we inform you that all sums "which were in the custody of the Controller were paid by the "latter in 1941, to the Custodian of Enemy Property, London." It is to be noticed that the sum is said to be credited in sterling and not in Roumanian lei.

One other clearing office order of the United Kingdom remains to be mentioned. In June, 1940, the Clearing Office (Roumania) Amendment Order, 1940, was made giving effect to the Anglo-Roumanian Payments Agreement of June 6, 1940. This abrogated the Anglo-Roumanian Payments Agreement of July, 1939, but provided that moneys held on June 17, 1940, in accounts opened for the purposes specified in the agreement of 1939 (or, it would seem, repaid thereafter into such accounts) should continue to be applied in the manner provided for in that agreement unless the two Governments should otherwise agree. The order contemplated that the two Governments would make further arrangements to wind up and finally distribute the sums which had been received by the clearing office; but no further agreement was ever made. Accordingly, this money, when repaid to the Bank of England, was once more credited to the Compensation Transactions Account by the Bank of England and to the compensation sub-account kept by the clearing office in the name of the Commercial Bank and remained subject to the provisions of the 1939 Order.

On February 15, 1941, Roumania became enemy territory for the purpose of the Trading with the Enemy Act, and from December 7, 1941, the United Kingdom and Roumania were at war. On February 15, 1941, the total amount to the credit of the Compensation Transactions Sub-Account in the name of the Commercial Bank of Roumania with the clearing office was over £18,000, which included the said sum of £2,190 11s. 10d.

The position then just before the outbreak of war was that the Bank of England was the legal owner of the fund credited to the Compensation Transactions Account. The clearing office had no power to deal with this money save to direct either (a) payment to United Kingdom exporters for compensation imports into Roumania pursuant to the instructions of the nominated beneficiaries of such amounts as stood to the credit of the nominated beneficiaries in their respective compensation transactions sub-account, or (b) the transfer of the amounts not used for compensation imports into Roumania to the account kept at the Bank of England of the National Bank of Roumania, but again it was for the nominated beneficiaries to direct such transfer, and in this case no such transfer had ever been directed. The nominated beneficiary, which was usually, and certainly was in this case, the authorised bank in Roumania, had no control over these funds except (a) a right and duty on the instructions of the Roumanian exporter and holder of the compensation permit who had exported goods, to direct the clearing office that a sum not exceeding the sterling made available by his export should be paid on his behalf or on behalf of any registered Roumanian importer to whom the exporter had disposed of his right, in payment for goods of the permitted class to be imported into Roumania; and (b) a right and duty to direct the transfer to the account at the Bank of England of the National Bank of Roumania of the available sterling proceeds of any compensation export where, under Roumanian law, the right to make a corresponding compensation import had lapsed. If the sterling were transferred to the National Bank's account at the Bank of England, the National Bank would make available in Roumania the equivalent in Roumanian currency for payment to the Roumanian exporter or registered importer to whom that exporter had transferred his right.

The appellant on September 17, 1954, brought an action against the respondent in the High Court of Justice, Queen's Bench Division.

The appellant claimed:

(1) That at all material times prior to October 18, 1950, the appellant was a Roumanian subject resident in Roumania.

(2) In or about the month of May, 1940, there was a sum amounting to not less than £2,193 credited to the Compensation Transactions Account of the Anglo-Roumanian Clearing Office in the name of (one Halpern or alternatively in the name of) the Roumanian Commercial Bank acting on behalf of and/or as trustees for the said Halpern. The said sum was so credited and was held by the Anglo-Roumanian Clearing Office upon the terms of the Debts Clearing Offices and Import Restrictions Act, 1934, and the Orders made thereunder and, in particular, article 6A of the Clearing Office (Roumania) Amendment Order, 1937 (S.R. & O., 1937, No. 510).

(3) Thereafter, on or about June 1, 1940, the right and interest of the said Halpern and of the Roumanian Commercial Bank in the said sum of £2,193 was, with the consent of the Anglo-Roumanian Clearing Offices, transferred and assigned to the appellant for the purpose of enabling the appellant to open with the Midland Bank Ltd., London, a letter of credit in favour of the United Baltic Corporation Ltd., London, for the said sum of about £2,193 in respect of the price of certain goods agreed to be sold by the United Baltic Corporation Ltd. to the appellant.

(4) The said letter of credit was thereupon opened by the Midland Bank Ltd. on or about June 1, 1940, but was not in fact used, the said proposed sale being prevented by cancellation of the necessary export licence. Accordingly, on or about January 22, 1941, the Midland Bank Ltd. repaid the said sum of £2,193 6s. 8d. to the Anglo-Roumanian Clearing Office who at all material times thereafter held the same under the terms of the said Act and Orders on the said Compensation Transactions Account in the name of the appellant or, alternatively, in the name of the Roumanian Commercial Bank acting on behalf of and/or as trustees for the appellant.

(5) The said sum was, together with other sums, subsequently paid by the Anglo-Roumanian Clearing Office to the Custodian of Enemy Property who, in turn, on or about August 19, 1954, paid the same to the respondent, who has wrongly contended and contends that the same is subject to a charge under the Treaty of Peace (Roumania) Order, 1948, as being, on the coming into force of such Order, the property of the Roumanian Commercial Bank.

(6) By reason of the matters set forth, however, the appellant was at all material times the "owner" of the said sum of £2,193 6s. 8d. within the meaning of the Treaty of Peace (Roumania) Order and was entitled to recover the said sum from the respondent under article 1 (g) of the said Order. The respondent had released the interest of the appellant in the said sum from any charge under the said Treaty of Peace (Roumania) Order.

(7) The appellant thereupon claimed a declaration that the said sum of £2,193 6s. 8d. was not subject to any charge under the Treaty of Peace (Roumania) Order, 1948, and that he should be paid the said sum of £2,193 6s. 8d.

The respondent by way of defence pleaded:

(1) That at the material time there was a sum exceeding £2,193, but not any specifically identifiable of that amount or approximate amount, to the credit of the Roumanian Commercial Bank in the Compensation Transactions Account of the Anglo-Roumanian Clearing Office, and that such credit was subject to the terms of the said Act and of the said Order (as amended) mentioned in the statement of claim.

(2) The respondent denied that either the said Halpern or the said bank had any right or interest in the said sum or any sterling sum capable of transfer or assignment to the appellant.

(3) That the said sum was at no material time either held in the name of the appellant by the Anglo-Roumanian Clearing Office, or was held in any capacity of trustee or agent for the appellant by or on behalf of the Roumanian Commercial Bank.

(4) That the said sum was subject to a charge under the Treaty of Peace (Roumania) Order, 1948, as being on the coming into force of such Order the property of the Roumanian Commercial Bank.

(5) That the respondent was content for the purpose solely of the present action to concede a release of the interest of the appellant in the said sum from any charge under the said Treaty of Peace (Roumania) Order, if any.

The action was heard before Glyn-Jones J.

In the course of such hearing the respondent conceded that if the appellant could establish that he had any right, title or interest to the said part of a larger sum admittedly standing at the material time in the books of the Anglo-Roumanian Clearing Office to the credit of the Roumanian Commercial Bank, or any proprietary right of any kind in such part, whether legal or beneficial, he was entitled to succeed in the action; but the respondent contended that no such right, title or interest had been established by the appellant, and that the evidence showed that the only person who had any right, title or interest, legal or beneficial, in the whole of the property represented by such credit was the Roumanian Commercial Bank. Accordingly, the issue in the action was whether it was the appellant or the Roumanian Commercial Bank that at the material time was "the owner" in law or equity of the property represented by that part of the said credit.

On December 20, 1957, Glyn-Jones J. entered judgment for the appellant with costs for the sum of £2,190 11s. 10d. The judge disallowed the claim by the appellant for interest on the said sum under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934.

The respondent appealed to the Court of Appeal and the appellant cross-appealed on the question of interest. On November 18, 1958, the Court of Appeal allowed the said appeal and ordered that the appellant's action should be dismissed.

The following case was cited in argument: Bank voor Handel en Scheepvaart N.V. v. Administrator of Hungarian Property.[1]

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

June 23. VISCOUNT SIMONDS. My Lords, I have had the privilege of reading the opinion of my noble and learned friend, Lord Radcliffe, which will shortly be read. I agree so fully with him in his reasoning and conclusion that I do not think it necessary to add anything. In due course I shall move that the appeal be allowed, and the judgment of the learned trial judge restored. My noble and learned friend, LORD COHEN, who is unable to be here, desires me to say that he also agrees with the opinion of Lord Radcliffe.

LORD REID. My Lords, in 1939 a Roumanian firm, Granimex, exported peas to a buyer in this country. By reason of legislation, which I shall deal with later, the buyer was required to pay the price to the Anglo-Roumanian Clearing Office (A.R.C.O.) and did so. Granimex could then spend the price in buying certain classes of goods for export to Roumania. In fact, Granimex assigned £2,193 of the price to the appellant, and it is not now disputed that this was lawful. As a result of directions given by the appellant this sum was paid by A.R.C.O. to a British company from which the appellant had bought rubber for export to Roumania, but this sale fell through and the money was repaid to A.R.C.O. Nothing more was done about the money before the outbreak of war between Britain and Roumania in 1941. Then under the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, this money was paid to the Custodian of Enemy Property. Then under legislation following on the Peace Treaty with Roumania the money was paid to the respondent who now holds it, and the appellant seeks in this action to recover it.

Money in the hands of the respondent is normally subject to a charge which makes it available to meet the claims of British creditors of Roumanians and the original Roumanian owners cannot recover it. But in 1951 the appellant was able to go to Israel and he is now a citizen of that country. In consequence of this and of the fact that he suffered persecution in Roumania, the Board of Trade, acting under statutory authority, have released the charge on property belonging to him, and the question in this case is whether he is the owner of this sum of £2,193. If he is, this appeal must succeed.

The respondent contends that the appellant is not the owner, and it is for him to prove that he is. The first matter to be considered is the legal position when the price of the peas was paid to A.R.C.O. This payment was made by reason of the provisions of section 1 of the Debts Clearing Offices and Imports Restrictions Act, 1934. Certain countries had adopted forms of exchange control which made it difficult or impossible for British creditors to recover their money and for British exports to those countries to continue unless some way was found to enable the exporters to be paid. The scheme of the Act was to require the price of goods imported from such countries to be paid to a clearing office: it authorised the clearing office to sue and to give a good discharge to a person who paid to the office a debt due to a foreign creditor. The Act did not provide how money received by the clearing office was to be dealt with but left that to be determined by Orders to be made under subsection (6).

It was argued that the effect of these provisions was to deprive the foreign creditor of all right or interest in money paid to a clearing office and to vest in the clearing office not only the legal title but the whole beneficial right in the money. Certainly the legal title was vested in the clearing office, but I am unable to agree that these provisions vested any beneficial right in the office or the Crown. I can see no sign of any intention to confer a financial benefit on the Crown. I think that the effect was merely to impound the money leaving it to Orders to be made under the Act to determine whether or to what extent the foreign creditor's rights were taken away or limited. The respondent's argument appeared to be that it is impossible for a person to retain any property or beneficial right in money if his right to obtain payment of it is taken away. But statutory restrictions on the way in which a person can use his property are a commonplace, and the only effective way of preventing a person from using his money in forbidden ways is to prevent him from getting possession of it: preventing a person from obtaining immediate payment of his money does not cause it to cease to be his money.

So I turn to the relevant Orders to see whether they deprived Granimex of its beneficial right or interest in the price of the peas. The first Order which I need consider is the Clearing Office (Roumania) Amendment Order, 1939. This Order incorporated an agreement between the British and Roumanian Governments, and it provided what was to be done with money of Roumanian creditors paid to A.R.C.O. In some cases deductions were to be made but that did not apply in this case. In fact Granimex could use the whole price of the peas in one or other of two ways but in no other way. Granimex could either direct it to be paid to a British exporter as the price of goods of certain kinds to be exported to Roumania or direct it to be transferred to the National Bank of Roumania so that Granimex would receive in Roumania the equivalent in Roumanian currency at the official rate of exchange. But it seems that the latter was the less profitable way of using the money.

Fischler v. Administrator of Roumanian Property.
Lord Reid.

I have stated the substance of the matter but it is said that we must not look at that because of the terms of the Order. The greater part of the Order is concerned with matters which do not arise in this case and there is no need to consider any of its provisions except those of Article 11. Article 3 required the price of the peas to be "transferred to a non-interest-bearing account "at the Bank of England, in the name of the Controller of the "Clearing Office (hereinafter referred to as the Compensation "Transactions Account) for distribution in accordance with Article "11 of this Agreement." The relevant parts of Article 11 are:

"(1) All amounts credited to the Compensation Transactions "Account in accordance with Article 3 (ii) shall be recorded in "the books of the Clearing Office in separate Sub-Accounts in the "names of the persons or banks in Roumania respectively nomi-"nated at the time of payment as the beneficiaries in respect of "the corresponding payments made to the Bank of England. "Subject to the provisions of paragraph (2) of this Article, pay-"ment shall be made from the Compensation Transactions "Account at the sole request of such persons or banks in "Roumania or of their nominees to the extent of the amounts "standing to the credit of their respective Sub-Accounts.

"(2) Of the amounts credited to each Sub-Account in accord-"ance with paragraph (1) of this Article, 30 per cent. shall be "available for payments to persons in the United Kingdom in "respect of goods grown, produced or manufactured in the United "Kingdom and exported to Roumania, and 70 per cent. shall be "available for payments to persons in the United Kingdom in "respect of any goods imported into Roumania, provided that the "debt in respect of which any such payment is made is due to a "person in the United Kingdom. The amount of sterling avail-"able for payments in respect of any goods if not used for the "purchase of United Kingdom goods shall be utilised so far as "possible for payments in respect of goods grown, produced or "manufactured in a British overseas territory, colony or territory "under British protection or mandated territory in respect of "which a mandate is exercised by the Government of the United "Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

"(3) Any sum standing to the credit of a Sub-Account of the "Compensation Transactions Account may, at the request of the "person or bank in whose name such sum is recorded in accord-"ance with paragraph (1) of this Article be surrendered to the "Special Account."

To comply with Article 11 (1) Granimex nominated the Commercial Bank of Roumania as their "nominated beneficiary," and the price of the peas was credited by A.R.C.O. to the sub-account of that bank. The documents which had to be sent to A.R.C.O. disclosed that Granimex was the seller of the peas and there was nothing in Article 11 to prevent Granimex nominating itself. Indeed, it appears that in some cases Roumanian traders were permitted to nominate themselves. But it appears that Roumanian law required Granimex to nominate a Roumanian bank, in order that the bank should be responsible for seeing that Roumanian regulations were observed. The bank had no financial interest in the money: it was there as a "watch-dog." The relationship between the bank and Granimex was governed by Roumanian law and it is clear from the evidence, first, that the bank was bound to make to A.R.C.O. any request for payment which Granimex might require the bank to make provided that such request was lawful; secondly, that it would have been illegal for the bank to make any request to A.R.C.O. for payment of this money without the consent of Granimex; and thirdly, that if for any reason the money was not forthcoming from A.R.C.O. the loss would have fallen on Granimex and not on the bank. The bank was not a "beneficiary" in any ordinary sense of that word.

It was not argued that the use of the word "beneficiaries" in Article 11 meant or implied a requirement that only persons with a beneficial interest in money received by A.R.C.O. could lawfully be nominated. Such money was the proceeds of trading and it was to be paid out to pay for exports. Roumanian banks were mentioned as beneficiaries and it could not have been supposed that these banks were going to export peas or import rubber or other permitted goods. Moreover, A.R.C.O. was aware from the documents in this case and presumably in other cases that the bank was not the trader, and A.R.C.O. had no reason to suppose that this or other banks had acquired a financial interest in these transactions. Article 11 is part of an agreement between the British and Roumanian Governments and the Roumanian Government at least was aware of its own regulations under which the banks merely acted to see that the law was observed.

Nevertheless, it was argued that the only persons entitled to claim that they were owners of money in the hands of A.R.C.O. were the nominated beneficiaries, and this agreement was accepted by the Court of Appeal reversing the decision of Glyn-Jones J. The Court of Appeal held that there was "no room for considera-"tion of agency or trust" and said: "In order to succeed, the "plaintiff must establish some right, some proprietary or other "interest, by virtue of which the defendant Administrator is "accountable to the plaintiff for the sum of money by him "claimed; and that he cannot do. The rights, duties and obliga-"tions of the Anglo-Roumanian Clearing Office with respect to "the Compensation Transactions Sub-Account in the name of the "Commercial Bank of Roumania were exclusively defined and "limited by the terms of the Act of 1934 and the Clearing Office "(Roumania) Amendment Order, 1939, which give no recognition "to any rights in any other persons on the Roumanian side. We "refer particularly to the use of the word 'shall' in section 1, "subsections (1) and (6), of the Act—which we have read and "do not take time by re-reading. The terms of the 1939 Order "are similarly categorical. As appears from the Order itself and

FISCHLER v. ADMINISTRATOR OF ROUMANIAN PROPERTY.
Lord Reid.

"paragraph 1 thereof in particular, the Order was directed to "giving statutory effect to the Anglo-Roumanian Payments Agree-"ment. All the sums received by the Clearing Office had to be "applied ('shall be applied') in the manner provided by that "Agreement and in no other manner and for no other purpose. "The language of the Articles of the Agreement which we have "read is no less categorical. By virtue of those provisions the "Clearing Office were by force of statute or its equivalent account-"able to no person except as provided by the Orders which were "exclusive of any right in the plaintiff: and the defendant "Administrator as the successor in title of the Clearing Office can, "in our judgment, be in no different position."

It is true that A.R.C.O. was not directly accountable to Granimex, or to the appellant who now stands in its place: any requisition by Granimex for payment by A.R.C.O. had to be made through the Commercial Bank of Roumania. But the question in this case is not whether A.R.C.O. was directly accountable to the appellant. It is whether under the Treaty of Peace (Roumania) Order, 1948, 1948 S.I. 118, the appellant was "owner" of the property held by the respondent, and I can find nothing in the 1939 Order enacting an irrebuttable presumption that the nominated beneficiary is the beneficial owner or otherwise preventing inquiry into the true facts of the case. Let me suppose that it was the nominated beneficiary who had had the charge on his property released. If direct accountability by A.R.C.O. were the sole criterion it would seem that the nominated beneficiary could now claim to be paid not only money which truly belonged to him, but also all other money which was in his sub-account with A.R.C.O. although the whole beneficial interest in it had always been in other persons still in Roumania. I cannot hold that we are driven to a result so completely contrary to the purposes of the Treaty of Peace Order.

Then it was said that because the law of Roumania has nothing corresponding to our law of trust we must regard the nominated beneficiary as the only person who can be called an "owner." But under the law of Roumania the bank could not under any circumstances have treated this money as its own and there was no question of any banker and customer relationship between it and the appellant. If the money were lost the loss would fall on the appellant, and so long as it was available the bank was bound to give to A.R.C.O. such directions for its application as the appellant might require it to give and no others. There would be something far wrong with our law if we had to shut our eyes to these facts and treat the bank as beneficial owner merely because there is no doctrine of trust in Roumania.

It is clear that when the Treaty of Peace Order speaks of an owner it means beneficial owner. The Order was made to give effect to provisions of the Peace Treaty entitling the British Government to seize or retain the property of Roumanians. It charged property rights and interests belonging to or held or managed on behalf of the Roumanian Government or Roumanian nationals with sums due to the British Government or British nationals by the Roumanian Government or Roumanian nationals; and it authorised the respondent to require such property to be transferred to him. Under this authority the sum for which the appellant sues was transferred to the respondent in 1954. Then the Board of Trade directed the respondent to release from the charge the property rights and interests, if any, of the appellant.

Article 1 (5) (g) of the Treaty of Peace Order provides that if it is proved that property rights or interest transferred to the respondent were not subject to the charge "the owner thereof "shall be entitled to recover the same from the Administrator." In view of the release in favour of the appellant, it is admitted that he is entitled to recover this money if he can prove that he had property right or interest in it. "Owner" must in this context mean beneficial owner because this provision only applies where the respondent has become legal owner, the title to the property having vested in him.

I have stated my reasons for holding that the beneficial interest in the price of the peas was not taken away from Granimex or from the appellant, his assignee, by the Act of 1934 or the Order of 1939. But at a late stage the respondent submitted arguments that, even if that were so, that beneficial interest was taken away either by the Debts Clearing Office Order, 1940, or by the transfer of the money to the Custodian of Enemy Property under the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939. I shall not deal in detail with the 1940 Order because I am satisfied that there is no substance in the point based on it. But I think it worth while to draw attention to the reference in it to arrangements to be made "with "a view to the winding up and final distribution of the sums "received by the clearing office by virtue of the principal Order." That appears to me to assume that in 1940 the clearing office had no beneficial interest in the sums held by it and to confirm the conclusion at which I have already arrived.

The argument based on the transfer to the Custodian of Enemy Property seemed to me at first sight to have more substance. Different opinions about the legal effect of such transfer were expressed in this House in Bank voor Handel en Scheepvaart N.V. v. Administrator of Hungarian Property.[1] Lord Asquith of Bishopstone expressed his view that such transfer extinguished former proprietary rights. I thought it unnecessary in that case to decide that matter and I think it equally unnecessary to do so in this case. Even if rights were extinguished the Crown was entitled to restore them. The Peace Treaty and consequent legislation clearly proceed on the assumption that property which had been Roumanian property before the war was still Roumanian property and it is only on that basis that the respondent had any authority to take it. I do not think that it matters whether the property rights had been extinguished and restored or had persisted throughout. The respondent is quite entitled to submit an argument which, if right, would mean that the provisions of the Peace Treaty and consequent legislation were misconceived and ineffective, but I cannot find any good ground for accepting it.

In my judgment this appeal should be allowed and the judgment of Glyn-Jones J. restored.

LORD RADCLIFFE. My Lords, I regard this as a complicated case arising out of the special situation created by the institution of the Anglo-Roumanian Clearing Office (which I will refer to as "A.R.C.O.") and its subsequent dissolution. I do not think that it can be decided exclusively according to the ordinary conceptions of property, legal or equitable, that prevail in more normal commercial transactions. It is rather that a scheme of this sort, when set up under statutory or governmental authority, generates certain rights and duties in respect of the use of property which may itself have for the time being no "owner" in the accepted sense; and the special problem with which the present case has confronted the courts is to determine where ownership resides or in what sense it arises when the scheme and its purposes are brought to an end.

The first thing that I must refer to is the clearing office system itself. I propose to do so in language as simple as possible and with a minimum of citation. The judgment of the trial judge, Glyn-Jones J., contains a comprehensive statement of the basic facts relating to this and other aspects of the case, and I think that I can make my view clear without covering them again in detail.

A.R.C.O. was set up under the authority of the Debts Clearing Offices and Imports Restrictions Act, 1934. The origin of this Act lay in the difficulties which exporters in the United Kingdom were experiencing at that time in getting sterling payments out of the importers in certain countries with whom they had been doing business. The function of a clearing office, when established under the Act, was to impound debts owed or owing on or after a prescribed date in respect of produce or manufactures entering the United Kingdom from the country affected, and to collect the proceeds in an account at the Bank of England in the name and under the control of the clearing office itself. The sterling which thus became available in this fund was intended to be used for the purpose of "facilitating trade and payments" between the United Kingdom and the other country or, to use the accepted jargon, of unfreezing the frozen remittances and thus to make it possible for trade to continue upon a viable basis. In the case of Roumania, at any rate, the means adopted was to make the sterling collected from United Kingdom importers from that country available to satisfy the debts incurred by traders in that country to United Kingdom exporters whether existing at the inauguration of the scheme or arising later. Under this system goods could go into and go out of the country, but the medium of payment itself was not capable of expatriation and the purposes for which it could be employed within the United Kingdom were controlled.

The system was regulated, as was intended, by the provisions of a payments agreement between the Government of the United Kingdom and the Government of Roumania. There were more than one of these agreements, but the only one that matters for the purpose of this appeal is the one that was entered into on July 12, 1939, and was scheduled to the Clearing Office (Roumania) Amendment Order, 1939. The effect of that Order was to provide that any sums received by A.R.C.O. after July 17, 1939, were to be applied in accordance with the terms of this new agreement.

The agreement was of considerable complexity but its relevant provisions can be summarised under the following heads:

(a) All debts due and owing on June 12, 1936, and all debts falling due after that date from persons in the United Kingdom to persons ordinarily resident or ordinarily carrying on business outside the United Kingdom in respect of the price of Roumanian goods imported into the United Kingdom were to be paid in sterling to a non-interest-bearing account at the Bank of England in the name of the Controller of A.R.C.O.

(b) Any payment so made was to constitute a discharge to the debtor for the corresponding amount of the debt.

(c) The moneys coming into the A.R.C.O. account at the Bank of England were to be allocated between several different accounts specified in the agreement. Of these the one that is relevant for our purpose was to be styled the Compensation Transactions Account and (subject to a deduction for the benefit of the National Bank of Roumania of a certain percentage of the sterling received in respect of some classes of debt) this account was to have allocated to it the proceeds of all payments received by A.R.C.O. in respect of the price of Roumanian goods exported under special facilities granted in Roumania for the exportation of goods to provide foreign exchange for the settlement of outstanding trade debts or for the importation of goods into Roumania. It was under these special facilities, which were the subject of article 10 of the agreement, that there was made the export of goods from Roumania which I shall mention later and which is the source of the appellant's claim.

(d) All amounts credited to the Compensation Transactions Account were to be recorded in the books of A.R.C.O. in separate sub-accounts, which were to stand in the names of such persons or banks in Roumania as were nominated at the time when the money was paid into the Bank of England as "beneficiaries in "respect of the corresponding payments made to" that bank. The source of such a nomination must in fact have been the Roumanian exporter: but the formal nomination was presumably made by the United Kingdom debtor acting on his instructions.

Fischler v. Administrator of Roumanian Property.
Lord Radcliffe.

(e) The permitted use of the sterling standing to each sub-account was controlled in the sense that 30 per cent. was available for payments to persons in the United Kingdom in respect of goods grown, produced or manufactured in the United Kingdom and exported to Roumania, and 70 per cent. was available for payments to persons in the United Kingdom in respect of goods of any kind imported into Roumania. Subject to this limitation, the nominated beneficiary in Roumania was to have the sole right of directing payments out of the fund at the Bank of England to the extent of the credit of his sub-account in the Compensation Transactions Account. Thus he could call money out of it so long as he enjoyed a credit with A.R.C.O. but only for the purpose of discharging sterling debts to United Kingdom creditors and according to the proportions specified.

(f) Lastly, any sum standing to the credit of a sub-account of the Compensation Transactions Account could be surrendered to the Special Account of the National Bank of Roumania if the nominated beneficiary so requested.

I now turn to the transaction with which the appellant's claim is connected. Towards the end of the year 1939 or at the beginning of the year 1940 a Roumanian national named Halpern, who traded under the name "Granimex," obtained a permit from the Roumanian authorities to export to the United Kingdom a consignment of dried peas. The permit was obtained, apparently, under the special facilities régime contemplated by article 10 of the Payments Agreement, and the sterling due from the United Kingdom importer passed into the Compensation Transactions Account at the Bank of England. The exact sum paid in is not known, full records not now being available, but it is not in question that it exceeded the £2,193 6s. 8d. which is the subject of the appellant's claim. The sub-account holder to the credit of whose account the money was placed was the Commercial Bank of Roumania.

The evidence called at the trial of the action seems to me to establish with sufficient certainty what was Mr. Halpern's position under the Anglo-Roumanian clearing scheme. First, he lost his right to recover his debt from the United Kingdom importer. Secondly, although, so far as the scheme itself went, it was open to him to be registered with A.R.C.O. as the nominated beneficiary, the Roumanian authorities would not permit the entry in this capacity of any person's name except that of one of a select list of Roumanian banks. Therefore, any directions that he might wish to give as to the disposal of his sterling in the sub-account would have to be given through the bank whom he nominated, the Commercial Bank. On the other hand, having made this export with the approval of the Roumanian authorities, he was entitled to receive and did receive from them in due course an import licence covering a consignment of rubber from the United Kingdom in payment for which he would be able to use his "frozen" sterling. Rubber was one of the commodities specified on an agreed list, the import of which could constitute "compensation" for his export of dried peas.

Mr. Halpern did not want to do business himself in rubber: but it was open to him in Roumania to sell for Roumanian currency the benefit of his import licence and the use of the accompanying sterling. That is what he did and this is where the appellant, who himself carried on business under the name of "Chimicalia," became connected with the transaction. He paid Mr. Halpern in lei for his rights (Mr. Halpern receiving under the Roumanian regulations a preferential rate of conversion for his sterling) and thereupon became entitled as between himself and his vendor to the benefit of the latter's position. In form, however, the import transaction had to be completed in Mr. Halpern's name. In any disposition of the sterling there would thus have to be put in motion a chain of directions passing from the appellant to Mr. Halpern, from Mr. Halpern to the Commercial Bank of Roumania, from that bank to A.R.C.O. and from A.R.C.O. to the Bank of England.

Much has been made to turn in this case upon the position of the Commercial Bank. That was a matter of evidence as given at the trial, and I follow the learned trial judge in the conclusion to which he came. The bank was nominated as beneficiary for the purposes of the scheme simply because the Roumanian authorities would not have it otherwise. Banks so nominated were brought in to act as "watch-dogs" for the authorities. Their function, to quote from the judgment of Glyn-Jones J. was "to "see to it that (1) the sterling proceeds of sale were not expended "otherwise than for the purchase of goods authorised to be "imported in compensation, and (2) that in default of such "import the sterling was duly surrendered to the National Bank "of Roumania as required by Roumanian law." The Commercial Bank, therefore, acquired no personal interest in the sub-account by the fact of nomination. No assignment of the right to or to dispose of the sterling was involved in any sense analogous to that of a transfer of property. It could not use its rights over the sterling as part of its general assets or for the benefit of any of its customers or other persons having business with it. Its duty was to hold those rights as "mandataire" on behalf of the exporter or his assignee, and to accept and implement whatever instructions might be given to it, if consistent with the requirements of Roumanian law, as to the operation of the sub-account in the furtherance of his business and to the extent of his claim on that account. The conception of trust property is not accepted in the law of Roumania. It would be wrong therefore to speak of the Commercial Bank as holding its right or power in trust for Mr. Halpern or the appellant: it would not be wrong, on the other hand, to speak of it as holding such right or power as an agent or as under a duty to exercise it only on behalf of its principal.

FISCHLER v. ADMINISTRATOR OF ROUMANIAN PROPERTY.
Lord Radcliffe.

In fact, the appellant came very near to getting his benefit out of the A.R.C.O. fund. He made a contract with a United Kingdom firm for the export of a consignment of rubber to Roumania and on his instructions, transmitted through the Commercial Bank, A.R.C.O. caused to be paid to the Midland Bank from the account at the Bank of England the sum of £2,193 6s. 8d. to cover a letter of credit in favour of the exporters. In the end shipping space could not be found for the consignment, export licences from the United Kingdom were cancelled. and in January, 1941, the Midland Bank returned the amount so paid to the A.R.C.O. account and it was reinstated in the Commercial Bank's sub-account. The contemplated transaction was thus never completed and the sterling which the appellant was to use remained in the A.R.C.O. fund.

The A.R.C.O. fund came into the hands of the respondent in the following manner. I do not think that the process has any bearing upon the true rights in the present appeal, so I summarise it shortly. The various sub-account balances which made up the balance of the Compensation Transactions Account were transferred from the control of the clearing office to the Custodian of Enemy Property after a state of war was established between the United Kingdom and Roumania. The authority for this transfer was (a) section 8 of the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, under subsection (1) (b) of which clearing office funds of this kind were deemed for the purposes of the Act to be money which would, but for the existence of a state of war, be payable to or for the benefit of an enemy, and (b) the Trading with the Enemy (Custodian) Order, 1939, made under the powers of the Act. The sub-account balance in the name of the Commercial Bank was £18,222 3s. 11d., but, to my mind, nothing turns on this, since the A.R.C.O. records were sufficient to identify the separate transactions, such as Mr. Halpern's export of dried peas. out of which the several credits arose, and it has not been suggested that the total is anything but the sum of the individual parts.

A Peace Treaty was made with Roumania on February 10, 1947; and the Treaty of Peace (Roumania) Order, 1948, made under statutory authority, set up the office of Administrator of Roumanian Property, and charged with the claims of His Majesty's Government and British nationals against the Government of Roumania and Roumanian nationals all property rights and interests within the dominions of His Majesty (other than the Dominions themselves) belonging to or held or managed on behalf of the Roumanian Government or a Roumanian national. By article 1 (8) (g) of the Order the Administrator was given power, on certificate, to call in and vest in himself any property, rights or interests as being subject to the charge: and this power he exercised on August 18, 1954, by calling in from the Custodian of Enemy Property the sum of £27,921 10s. 1d. as being money derived from A.R.C.O. which, but for the existence of a state of war, would have been held for account of the Commercial Bank under the Compensation Transactions provisions and other provisions of the pre-war Anglo-Roumanian Payments Agreement.

The Administrator's certificate, though effective to vest the fund in him, was declared by the Order to be no more than prima facie evidence of the facts which it stated and sub-clause (5) (g) of article 1 concluded as follows: " . . . if it is subsequently " proved that the property, rights or interests were not subject " to the charge the owner thereof shall be entitled to recover the " same from the Administrator, or if it has been sold, the " proceeds of sale, but not to any other remedy."

There has never been any dispute between the parties that if the appellant does own a right or interest in the A.R.C.O. fund now vested in the respondent, that right or interest is free from the Peace Treaty charge, because on August 18, 1954, the Board of Trade, exercising a special power given to it by proviso (ii) to sub-clause (2) of article 1 of the Order, directed the Administrator to release any such right or interest that he might possess from the burden of the charge. This power was exercised in recognition of the fact that the appellant had been a victim of both Nazi and Communist persecution while in Roumania, and had ultimately left that country and taken refuge in Israel. The question which became the issue in the litigation was therefore reduced to the short point, was he at the date of the commencement of his action the " owner " of any such property, right or interest as would entitle him to a judgment for the sterling sum of £2,193 6s. 8d.?

The learned trial judge held that he was, and was consequently entitled to his judgment. In his view, the only person who could have any right, interest or property in this sum, forming part of the A.R.C.O. fund, was the appellant, since neither the clearing office nor the Commercial Bank had any beneficial right of property in it, and the appellant had a right, which English law would recognised and enforce, to compel the Commercial Bank to give effect to his instructions, and direct the disposition of the fund pro tanto as he should require. I am bound to say that I have found great force in his cogently expressed opinion and, though I might not at all points adopt his reasoning, I agree with the substance of the conclusion to which it led him.

The Court of Appeal did not agree that the appellant could succeed. The basis of their view was that the terms of the Debts Clearing Offices and Imports Restrictions Act, 1934, and the system established by the consequent Order left no room for admitting the existence of any trust or agency of the Commercial Bank on the appellant's behalf. The rights, duties and obligations of A.R.C.O. were exclusively defined and limited by the Act and Order, and if, under them, no recognition was permitted of any Roumanian owner except the Commercial Bank, the nominated beneficiary, the Administrator, who had inherited the position of the Controller of the Clearing Office, could not be treated as having any other or different liabilities. There is, no doubt, much to be said for this view of the case. In the end I find that, difficult as the question is, I do not share it. To put my reason for disagreeing with it in one sentence, it is this. While I think that the Court of Appeal's analysis is undoubtedly correct as a statement of the position while the clearing scheme and its attendant legislation remained in operation, that statement does not, in my opinion, conclude the question of the appellant's rights and the Administrator's duties now that the scheme has come to an end and the legislation has been recalled. That circumstance, I think, produces a new situation in which it may be necessary for the purposes of justice to recognise old rights that had been placed in abeyance, or to admit new rights which are the logical expression of their former existence.

It is simpler to analyse the situation without bringing in Mr. Halpern's assignment to the appellant, since it is common ground that the appellant has no better and no worse rights than Mr. Halpern would have had. One must begin with the Act of 1934 and Mr. Halpern's export of dried peas. He parted with his peas and obtained in exchange a right to be paid sterling. The clearing office scheme impounded that sterling and discharged his debtor. It impounded it, however, for the purposes of clearing and the furtherance of Anglo-Roumanian trade, not for confiscation. The use of the sterling for the purpose of acquiring goods or equivalent value in the United Kingdom was not denied to Mr. Halpern: on the contrary, on getting his import licence and giving the appropriate instructions to the Commercial Bank, he could have bought for himself with the sterling the intended consignment of rubber. He could not, of course, have claimed to take the money out of the control of A.R.C.O. and, consequently, he could not have got judgment for the £2,173 against A.R.C.O. at any time while the scheme was in operation: but that was because the terms of the scheme both dictated the permitted uses of the clearing office fund and authorised or directed A.R.C.O. to recognise no instructions except those issued to it by the Commercial Bank.

But the clearing office scheme has now come to an end. In fact, the payments agreement between the United Kingdom and Roumania was abrogated as from June 17, 1940, and by an Amendment Order debts in respect of Roumanian goods imported after that date were to be free from clearing. So far as concerned the proceeds of debts which had reached the fund prior to that date, they were left to be applied in accordance with the existing provisions of the scheme, so that Mr. Halpern could still have used his sterling if he could have secured his rubber or another permitted export: but the Order also added a provision making the fund applicable in accordance with any arrangements that might be made in the future between the respective governments with a view to the winding up and final distribution of the sums which had come into A.R.C.O. under the clearing scheme.

No such arrangements ever were made. A.R.C.O.'s fund, as we know, passed through the Custodian of Enemy Property to vest in the Administrator of Roumanian Property, and in 1948 the clearing office itself was abolished by Act of Parliament [Debts Clearing Offices Act, 1948], any outstanding debts which had not been paid into the fund were released to the creditors who owned them, and existing rights and liabilities of the office were declared to be henceforth rights and liabilities of the Crown.

The whole question is, therefore, who ought to be treated in the courts of this country as owners of the fund now that the clearing scheme has finally come to an end and the debts impounded can never be used for clearing purposes. It is not unfair to say that the argument of the respondent on this, the central issue, wavered between two inconsistent positions. At one time it was said that the effect of vesting a debt under the clearing legislation was to destroy all connection between it and its previous owner, and that there was a legal and beneficial ownership of the fund in A.R.C.O., subject only to any permitted use of it under the clearing scheme by the directions of the nominated beneficiary. At another time—and this, I think, represents the respondent's main position which throughout he has been concerned to assert—it was argued that though, indeed, there were Roumanian owners of the funds, whose interests as such were charged under the Peace Treaty, the effect of the clearing scheme was to exclude Mr. Halpern from any rights of ownership of the proceeds of his debt and to constitute the Commercial Bank the only owner whom the law could recognise.

To take the second argument first. In my opinion it would be quite wrong, now that the clearing scheme is at an end, to treat the Commercial Bank as owning an interest in the fund. We know from the evidence that it was not introduced as nominated beneficiary for any such purpose: it came in merely as Government watch-dog and without any right to treat its sub-account credits as if they were in any sense assets of its own. The nominated beneficiary's rights to direct applications of the fund were ministerial rights accorded for the purpose of the administration of the fund. When those purposes are no longer capable of being given effect to and the legislation which sanctioned them is recalled, the rights which the nominated beneficiary had are no longer of significance in determining the rights and duties of the holder of the fund.

But has Mr. Halpern any surviving right? In my opinion he has. I do not take the view that the clearing legislation, by impounding the proceeds of his debt, destroyed his interest in those proceeds for all purposes. By vesting them in A.R.C.O.'s fund, the legislature created no new owner of them in any beneficial sense: it merely created over them certain rights of control and disposition, out of which he would have got full value in the use of his sterling within the terms of the scheme. I regard that as the crucial point. For, if that is so, the determination of the scheme without the winding up of the fund meant that the restrictions on the free use of the proceeds of his debt were removed, the purposes for which they had been impounded were frustrated, and his original ownership rights which had been placed in suspense during the currency of the scheme revived without any remaining impediment to their exercise except that imposed by the Peace Treaty charge. As that has now been released, I think that he, or rather his assignee, the appellant, emerges as the true owner of the sterling and is entitled to the judgment which he obtained on the trial of the action.

I would allow the appeal accordingly.

LORD DENNING. My Lords, the appellant is a Jew who used to live in Roumania. He suffered persecution there during the war at the hands of the Nazis and later at the hands of the Communists. But in 1950 he succeeded in getting to Israel where he now lives. He seeks in this action to recover the sum of £2,193 6s. 8d. which he claims belonged to him before the war and is now, he says, in the hands of the Administrator of Roumanian Property.

To see the origin of the transaction your Lordships have to carry your minds back to the period before the war when financial transactions between England and Roumania were subject to a strict exchange control. The Roumanian Government did not allow Roumanian currency to be exported from Roumania to England. So our Government did not allow sterling to be exported from England to Roumania. Trade between the two countries would therefore have been at a standstill but for arrangements that were made for a clearing office to be set up. These arrangements, so far as material here, were as follows:

If a Roumanian exporter sold, say, dried peas to a person in England, the English importer had to pay the price in sterling to the Anglo-Roumanian Clearing Office: and he thereupon got a good discharge for the debt. The Roumanian exporter could not demand payment of this sterling in cash, but he could use it so as to buy goods in England for import into Roumania. He could use it, for instance, to buy raw rubber. Or if he was not a rubber merchant himself, he could transfer his import licence to another Roumanian citizen who was a rubber merchant. The transferee could then use the sterling so as to buy raw rubber for import into Roumania. The Roumanian merchant was not, however, allowed to give directions himself to the clearing office. He had to do it through an authorised bank. He had to nominate the bank as the "beneficiary" in respect of the sterling. This was done so as to enable the authorities to keep a watch on these transactions and see that the currency regulations were not evaded. When the time came for payment out of the sterling to the English seller, so as to pay for the raw rubber, the Roumanian merchant gave instructions to the authorised bank, who passed on the request to the clearing house. The clearing house had to act "at the "sole request" of the authorised bank. It could not accept instructions from the Roumanian merchant direct.

The facts in this case can be simply stated: About the end of 1939 a Mr. Halpern, who lived in Roumania and traded under the name of Granimex, exported dried peas to a merchant in England at a price of over £2,200. He nominated the Roumanian Commercial Bank as the authorised bank to act as "beneficiary" in respect of the price. The English buyer paid the sum to the Anglo-Roumanian Clearing Office, who credited it in their books to the sub-account of the Roumanian Commercial Bank. Mr. Halpern afterwards transferred his rights in respect of this sum to the appellant, who also lived in Roumania, but traded under the name of Chimicalia. The appellant paid Mr. Halpern for these rights in Roumanian currency. Having thus got the import rights, the appellant gave an order for raw rubber to an English firm, the United Baltic Corporation Ltd. of London. About June 1, 1940, he gave instructions to the Roumanian Commercial Bank to make the price available to the English firm. In consequence that bank cabled to the clearing office and asked them to pay £2,193 6s. 8d. for the rubber. The clearing office did so. They paid the sum to the United Baltic Corporation. But, unfortunately, that company could not obtain shipping space so as to export the rubber. And on June 25, 1940, all export licences from this country were cancelled. So the United Baltic Corporation refunded the sum to the clearing office. They refunded it on January 25, 1941: and on that day the clearing office credited it once again in their books to the Roumanian Commercial Bank.

Three weeks later on February 15, 1941, Roumania became enemy territory. The money which was held by the clearing office became subject to the Trading with the Enemy legislation. An order was made under which it was paid to the Custodian of Enemy Property: see section 8 of the Act of 1939. After the war when a peace treaty was signed between England and Roumania, the money was not restored to its owners. It was made subject to a charge in favour of British nationals: see article 1 (2) and (3) of the Treaty of Peace (Roumania) Order, 1948. It was transferred accordingly to the Administrator of Roumanian Property. And there it will remain, and it will presumably be made available for British nationals unless the appellant can make good his claim to part of it.

As a first step in making good his claim, the appellant says that, although he was during the war a Roumanian national and therefore to be regarded as an enemy, the Board of Trade have released him from the charge. It has released from the charge any right or interest which he has to this £2,193 6s. 8d. He has produced a release to this effect dated August 18, 1954. The Board of Trade are, no doubt, satisfied that the appellant has throughout been well disposed to the Allied cause and should not suffer the loss of the money if he was the owner of it. The effect of this release is, I think, that your Lordships can disregard all the Trading with the Enemy legislation, and inquire simply whether this money did belong to the appellant. It may be that during the war his right to it may have been extinguished or in statutory abeyance, but on the charge being released, his right is restored just as if the war had never come to deprive him of it.

The question, therefore, is simply whether this sum of £2,193 6s. 8d. belonged to the appellant on January 25, 1941, when it was recredited by the clearing office to the Roumanian Commercial Bank? Mr. Roskill, on behalf of the Administrator of Roumanian Property, said that the appellant was not entitled to this sum of sterling at all. He had at most a very limited right, namely, a right to require the Roumanian Commercial Bank to request the clearing house to pay that sum of money to an English firm in return for goods to be exported from England to Roumania.

My Lords, I am clearly of opinion that this sum of £2,193 6s. 8d. belonged to the appellant: for the simple reason that it was money had and received to his use. It seems to me that the Anglo-Roumanian Clearing Office was nothing more than a statutory collector of moneys owing to the Roumanian creditors. It was enabled by the statute to give a good discharge to the English debtors, but the money which is received was the money of the Roumanian creditors. It held this money in a sub-account of which the nominated beneficiary in this case was the Roumanian Commercial Bank. But the Roumanian Commercial Bank was not the beneficial owner of the money. It could not do as it liked with it. It had to act on the instructions of the Roumanian creditor who had the right to say how it was to be applied. The Roumanian creditor was, of course, much circumscribed as to the use to which he could apply it. But it was, after all, only his use to which it could be put. It could not be applied to the use of anyone else. Hedged round with limitations, as it was, nevertheless it remained money received to his use. Test it this way. Suppose that the Anglo-Roumanian Clearing Office had refused to apply the money as the Roumanian Commercial Bank requested them to do. That bank would, of course, have made its request on the directions of the Roumanian creditor. In such a case would the creditor have any remedy against the clearing office? My answer is "Yes." He could have sued the clearing office either in the name of the Roumanian Commercial Bank, or in his own name, joining the Roumanian Commercial Bank as a party: see Rahimtoola v. Nizam of Hyderabad.[2] And his remedy against the clearing office would have been for money had and received to his use. This remedy for restitution is of wide scope. Its width was well shown by those most learned pleaders, Edward Bullen and Stephen Leake, who in the year 1868 described it in these words: "This is the "most comprehensive of all the common counts. It is applicable "whenever the defendant has received money which in justice "and equity belongs to the plaintiff under circumstances which "render the receipt of it a receipt by the defendant to the use of "the plaintiff": see the 3rd ed., p. 44. Those words fit the case exactly. There is only one person to whom in justice and equity this money belongs. It is not the clearing house. Nor is it the Roumanian Commercial Bank. It is the appellant. The money belongs to the appellant and should be returned to him.

I would therefore be in favour of allowing this appeal and restoring the order of Glyn-Jones J.

The plaintiffs who, in 1932, had erected a garage at the junction of two main roads, had also constructed at their own expense, and to plans approved by the highway authority, a means of access to the highway at the road junction. At the point where the means of access emerged on to the highway there was a gap of 60 feet where there was no kerb, granite sets being set down into the road to form the plaintiffs' means of access. The highway authority now proposed partially to obstruct the plaintiffs' means of access by erecting a structure (which they described as a street refuge) at the road junction and in the middle of the 60-foot-wide gap forming the means of access.

In an action by the plaintiffs for a declaration that the highway authority had no power to obstruct, limit or interfere with the means of access from the garage to the highway:—

Ching Garage Ltd. v. Chingford Corpn.

Held, that the proposed construction was not in relation to "places of refuge" within section 68 (1) of the Highways Act, 1959,[1] for the protection of pedestrians crossing the "carriageway" as defined in section 295 (1), but was to provide a proper and sufficient footway as part of the highway under section 67; and as the proposal did not, apart from a slight diversion, interfere with the plaintiffs' access to the highway, the restrictions imposed by section 85 (3) did not apply and, accordingly, the corporation was entitled to carry out the construction subject to the payment of compensation under section 67 (6) (post, pp. 952, 953, 954, 956).

Decision of Lord Parker C.J. [1959] 1 W.L.R. 959; [1959] 3 All E.R. 175 reversed on different grounds.

Appeal from Lord Parker C.J.

The plaintiffs, Ching Garage Ltd., were the owners of the Ching Garage sited at the junction of Sewardstone Road and Lea Valley Road, Chingford. Both roads were highways repairable by the inhabitants at large. Sewardstone Road ran from north to south and Lea Valley Road from east to west. The defendants, Chingford Corporation, were the highway authority for both roads. According to a statement of facts agreed between the parties the plaintiffs or their predecessors erected the garage in 1932, having obtained permission from the corporation as required by the Town Planning Act, 1925 (the Act then in force). The verge between the plaintiffs' land and the carriageway of Sewardstone Road, which had originally belonged to the Conservators of Epping Forest, had been dedicated by the Conservators as part of the highway in 1928. There was no kerbed or paved footway on Sewardstone Road nor had such ever existed, but Lea Valley Road had had a kerbed and paved footway since before

[1] Highways Act, 1959, s. 67: "(1) It shall be the duty of a highway authority to provide, in or by the side of a highway maintainable at the public expense by them, being a highway which consists of or comprises a made-up carriageway, a proper and sufficient footway as part of the highway in any case where they consider the provision thereof necessary or desirable for the safety or accommodation of pedestrians; . . . (2) A highway authority may provide and maintain in a highway . . . such raised paving, . . . as they think necessary for the purpose of safeguarding persons using the highway. (3) The powers conferred by the foregoing provisions of this section to provide any works shall include power to alter or remove them. . . . (6) A highway authority or council shall pay compensation to any person who has sustained damage by reason of the execution by them of works under subsection (2) of this section."

S. 68: "(1) A highway authority may, in relation to a highway maintainable at the public expense by them, being a highway which consists of or comprises a made-up carriageway, construct and maintain works in that carriageway for providing places of refuge for the protection of pedestrians crossing the carriageway. . . ."

S. 85: "(1) Subject to the provisions of this section, a highway authority may erect and maintain fences or posts for the purpose of preventing access to—(a) a highway maintainable at the public expense by them, . . . (3) The powers conferred by this section shall not be exercised so as to . . . (d) obstruct any means of access which was constructed, formed or laid out before the first day of July, 1948. . . ."

S. 295: "(1) . . . 'carriageway' means a way constituting or comprised in a highway, being a way (other than a cycle track) over which the public have a right of way for the passage of vehicles."

1932. After the erection of the garage the plaintiffs or their predecessors applied to the corporation under section 18 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1907, to carry out works of access. Those works were approved on May 2, 1932, and were ultimately carried out and certified as having been properly carried out by the corporation's surveyor. Means of access were created to Sewardstone Road and at the junction of Sewardstone Road and Lea Valley Road. The latter led first of all on to that part of the highway dedicated by the Conservators of Epping Forest and then over a frontage of about 60 feet on to the carriageway at the junction of the two roads. At that point the kerb along the Lea Valley Road was set down into the road with inset granite blocks.

The corporation now proposed to erect a structure which they termed a street refuge at the junction of the Sewardstone and Lea Valley Roads right in the middle of the 60 feet stretch where the access from the plaintiffs' garage emerged on to the carriageway. The structure proposed would be about 20 feet long, somewhat pear-shaped, and about 15 feet at its greatest width. It would all be raised, at the height of its kerb, 4 inches, and adjoining the carriageway would be a footpath similar to the footpath at each side of the entrance to the garage with a verge at the back. It would be some 15 feet from the garage, that is the plaintiffs' boundary at its nearest point, and so would not prevent access to the highway from any point on the plaintiffs' premises. There would be two wide means of access from the garage to the carriageway on each side.

The plaintiffs claimed that their premises had at all times enjoyed a right of access to the highways in Sewardstone Road and Lea Valley Road. The existing means of access at the junction of the two roads was laid out, formed and constructed, when the premises were erected, at the plaintiffs' expense in accordance with town planning control then exercisable and had at all times since its construction been used as formed, laid out and constructed. They claimed that the corporation now proposed to obstruct their means of access by placing an island in the carriage crossing and to curtail or limit the use of the carriage crossing and that the corporation had not obtained and had not endeavoured to obtain any order under section 26 of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, to impose conditions on the use of the means of access. Accordingly, they claimed (1) a declaration that the corporation was not entitled to obstruct, interfere with or otherwise limit the use of the means of access which the plaintiffs enjoyed with their premises; (2) an injunction restraining the corporation from causing any such obstruction, interference or limitation.

The corporation contended that they proposed to execute works of highway improvement including the erection of a street refuge at and near by the junction of the Sewardstone and Lea Valley Roads and that the works would be executed partly on the land dedicated in 1928 and partly on the existing carriageway. They admitted that the effect of the works on the plaintiffs' existing means of access would be to cause a partial obstruction thereof by a street refuge. They claimed that it was unnecessary to obtain an order under section 26 of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, by reason of the statutory powers conferred upon the corporation, in particular by section 149 of the Public Health Act, 1875; section 18 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1907; section 55 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930; and section 45 of the Road Traffic Act, 1956. They denied that the plaintiffs were entitled to the reliefs claimed.

At the trial, the corporation relied upon the statutory powers conferred on them by section 149 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and section 45 of the Road Traffic Act, 1956, to do what they proposed. Lord Parker C.J. held that neither of those Acts gave them the power to erect the street refuge which they had proposed, and he granted the plaintiffs a declaration that the corporation were not by virtue of their powers under either of the sections relied upon entitled to obstruct, interfere with or otherwise limit the use of the means of access enjoyed with the plaintiffs' premises known as the Ching Garage, at the junction of Sewardstone Road and Lea Valley Road, Chingford, as constructed, formed and laid out. The corporation appealed.

SELLERS L.J. stated the facts and continued: The structure proposed would appear to be of great advantage to pedestrians and, to my mind, of no apparent disadvantage to those using the garage or the plaintiffs themselves. It would, however, take up part of the surface laid down in 1932, of which the plaintiffs or their predecessors paid the cost of laying, and would be a small island in the mouth of the wide exit on to the road junction. It is accepted that the corporation cannot do what they propose to do unless they have statutory powers which permit it with or without compensation. Their efforts to establish adequate powers have been subject to various changes and, to avoid confusion, I will endeavour to state them. Of the numerous statutory powers set out in the defence, only section 149 of the Public Health Act, 1875, with the assistance of section 18 (1) (c) of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1907, and section 55 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, and section 45 of the Road Traffic Act, 1956, were raised at the trial. Lord Parker C.J. would have found,[1] as I read his judgment, in favour of the corporation under section 55 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, but before his judgment to that effect was concluded, it was discovered that the section had been amended and could no longer be relied upon for this purpose. He found against the corporation on the other powers on which they relied. Between that judgment and the hearing in this court, both section 149 of the Act of 1875 and section 45 of the Act of 1956 which were finally considered by Lord Parker C.J. were repealed and replaced by provisions in the Highways Act, 1959. We, therefore, gave leave for the defence to be amended accordingly.

The question now is whether the corporation have power to do what they propose to do, not under those various enactments on which they have previously relied, but under two sections of the Highways Act, 1959, and they pleaded it in this way "under "section 67 or, alternatively, under section 68 of that Act." So pleaded, their claim is a reversal of their previous claims, for it seems they have throughout contended they could do this work without compensation. It has further never been in dispute, at least perhaps right up until the last moment, that if the corporation were to proceed under their statutory powers arising out of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, they could succeed in what they wish to do, but with the obligation to pay that compensation which would be appropriate under that Act. Whilst it has been recognised that the power to do what they wish to do is not to be found in the Act of 1947 directly, I understand Mr. Squibb to recognise that, if properly invoked, power can be found to do that which they want to do once the machinery of the Act of 1947 is brought into force.

Section 68 of the Act of 1959, with which I will deal first, although it is the second submission made on behalf of the corporation, reads as follows: "A highway authority may, in "relation to a highway maintainable at the public expense by "them, being a highway which consists of or comprises a made-"up carriageway, construct and maintain works in that carriage-"way for providing places of refuge for the protection of pedes-"trians crossing the carriageway. . . ." If that section applies, then there appears to be no provision for compensation. This road junction does comprise a made-up carriageway, the Lea Valley Road, and in so far as it forms part of the junction, the other road intersecting, Sewardstone Road. Does that carriageway include the access to the plaintiffs' premises constructed in 1932? That access is certainly made up and as serviceable for the use of vehicles as the carriageway on the road but it is also part of the highway, for that consists of the carriageway plus the footpath from one side to the other. But the area in question was originally a footpath for the use of the public at large with the right of access to the garage in the plaintiffs as occupiers of the abutting garage. "Carriageway" is defined in section 295 (1) of the Act of 1959 in this way: "'carriageway' means a way "constituting or comprised in a highway, being a way (other than "a cycle track) over which the public have a right of way for the "passage of vehicles." I do not find that it has been shown that the public have a right of way for the passage of vehicles over this access. The only contention I think advanced in support of that was to be found in section 18 of the Act of 1907, under which this access was made up at the expense of the plaintiffs in 1932. Section 18 (1) (c) provides: "After the completion of the "works the new means of access may be used, subject to the "conditions which, in pursuance of any provisions of the law "relating to highways, attach to the use for the like purpose of "any carriageway forming part of a highway repairable by the "inhabitants at large."

I accept the argument of Mr. Squibb that that subsection does not give the public any right; it is relating solely to the rights of user by the occupiers who have constructed the means of access. That is a right given to the plaintiffs and a right, which I apprehend, they can exercise to include themselves, their customers and their friends. It may be somewhat odd that this area, which has so many of the attributes of a carriageway and which requires, as a matter of safety, a place of refuge for pedestrians in like manner to the undisputed carriageway, should not fall within the ambit of section 68, but I think the public have the right to use it as a footway only subject to the rights of the plaintiffs to move vehicles in and out across it, and the public have not the right of user as a carriageway under section 68. Therefore, in my view, the corporation fail under section 68.

Turning to section 67, the first three subsections seem to me material, they read: "(1) It shall be the duty of a highway "authority to provide, in or by the side of a highway maintain-"able at the public expense by them, being a highway which "consists of or comprises a made-up carriageway, a proper and "sufficient footway as part of the highway in any case where they "consider the provision thereof necessary or desirable for the "safety or accommodation of pedestrians; and a highway autho-"rity may light any footway provided by them under this sub-"section. (2) A highway authority may provide and maintain in "a highway maintainable at the public expense by them, being a "highway which consists of or comprises a carriageway, such "raised paving, pillars, walls, rails or fences as they think necessary for the purpose of safeguarding persons using the highway. "(3) The powers conferred by the foregoing provisions of this "section to provide any works shall include power to alter or "remove them." Subsection (1) therefore imposes a duty on the corporation (and I emphasise "duty") to provide a proper and sufficient footway for the safety or accommodation of pedestrians where there is a made-up carriageway and they think it is necessary and desirable to make such provision. In the present case there is a made-up carriageway. Subsection (2) covers just what they propose to do here. This can be done at any time. What they propose to do in order to carry out their duty under subsection (1) is to raise some paving over the area, which I have previously described, which will form eventually the island refuge. It falls also under subsection (3) because this work would be an alteration of the condition which has prevailed since 1932, and, if I understand the facts aright, a restoration to a condition of footpath with verge behind it which existed prior to the work which the plaintiffs had undertaken with permission.

Section 67 (6) provides: "A highway authority or council shall "pay compensation to any person who has sustained damage by "reason of the execution by them of works under subsection (2) "of this section." Mr. Squibb referred the court to section 85 of the Act of 1959 and submitted that that section indicated that the obstruction, which was proposed to be put up, could not be put up because it was exempted expressly by the terms of that section. Section 85 reads as follows: "(1) Subject to the pro-"visions of this section, a highway authority may erect and "maintain fences or posts for the purpose of preventing access to— "(a) a highway maintainable at the public expense by them." Then, by subsection (3), it is provided: "The powers conferred "by this section shall not be exercised so as to— . . . (d) obstruct "any means of access which was constructed, formed or laid out "before July 1, 1948, unless it was constructed, formed or laid "out in contravention of restrictions in force under section 1 or "section 2 of the Restriction of Ribbon Development Act, 1935." He read as part of his argument in association with that section 85 (3) (c)—". . . shall not be exercised so as to (c) obstruct any "means of access for the construction, formation or laying out of "which planning permission has been granted under Part III of "the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947."

I think that argument must be rejected. Section 85 is not applicable here. It is dealing with the prevention of access to the highway and what is proposed here in no way prevents access to the highway, nor indeed to the carriageway, except by one direct line and the slightest diversion would give access thereto. This section, as I understand it, is not concerned with access to the carriageway but access to the highway, and there is complete unfettered and unrestricted access to the highway, which includes both footpath and carriageway, and there is a distance of at least

Sellers L.J.

15 ft. before one comes from the boundary line of the plaintiffs' property to this proposed island, which has been referred to as a street refuge.

That brings me to Mr. Squibb's other argument and perhaps his main argument. It has been submitted by him that if what is proposed is a refuge, then it must be erected under what is now section 68 or not at all. That, in my view, is a very narrow and unsustainable contention. Quite why the corporation chose to refer to it as a street refuge I do not know. I think the argument rather indicated that there was something sinister about it because there was an effort to avoid compensation. A footpath is in one sense a refuge and the present Act does not make any reference to a street refuge. In section 68 it says in the appropriate circumstances there may be constructed works in a carriageway for providing places of refuge for the protection of pedestrians crossing the carriageway. Its purpose is for the safety of pedestrians, to define their area from the carriageway. What the defendants propose to do is in my view amply covered by section 67. It is the provision of a footway, indeed the restoration of a footway and an alteration back to what it was before, and whether it is called a street refuge or not, it has the characteristics of one. As it happens there is a wide mouth across this means of access, and an island footpath would resemble in many ways what would be described as a refuge if it was out in the highway. As I see it, the plaintiffs' right of access to the highway still remains intact. Their access to the carriageway is subject only to the slightest diversions of the direct line from any point of the made-up way in their access. On the other hand, if the structure does cause any interference with their rights, then I think the statute impliedly authorises interference with those rights in the public interest and in the present case provides for compensation if any damage has been sustained, and I do not repeat the extract to that effect which was taken by Lord Parker C.J.[2] from the standard work of Pratt & Mackenzie on the Law of Highways, 19th ed. (1952), p. 127.

In my judgment, section 67 defeats the plaintiffs' contention and I would allow the appeal and enter judgment for the corporation.

I do not propose to consider, further, whether the view I have taken of section 67 of this latest Act of 1959 means that I would have allowed the appeal if section 149 of the Public Health Act, 1875, had been in force. I do not feel in all the circumstances that the corporation should have the costs of their defence here or below in any event. They failed on the major issue of compensation, which I am inclined to think has been the real point in issue between the parties, and throughout the powers on which they relied were ill-defined, although I recognise that the Highways Act, 1959, only came into operation after the trial and the corporation cannot be blamed for that. I think the matters referred to by Devlin L.J. at the conclusion of the argument[3] are equally to be taken into consideration on the question of costs, for this does seem to me a case, having regard to the proximity of the Act of 1959 coming into force, where it might well have been put before Lord Parker C.J. that no declaration as a matter of discretion should have been granted even on the view which he held of the rights or the lack of rights of the corporation.

For these reasons, I would allow the appeal but allow it without costs either here or below.

PEARCE L.J. I agree with what my Lord has said. The proposed construction is intended to be put on a part of the highway that is admittedly the footway and not the carriageway. For that part of the highway does not come within the definition of "carriageway" in section 295 (1) of the Highways Act, 1959.

Section 68 of the Act of 1959 deals with such constructions in the carriageway under the name of "places of refuge for the "protection of pedestrians." No compensation is payable under that section, presumably because it was anticipated that under it there would be no interference with a private owner but only an interference with the public in their capacity as users of the carriageway.

Section 67 deals with the provision of a proper and sufficient footway with power to alter. It provides for compensation if any person sustains damage thereby. By common law, the plaintiffs have a right of access to the highway, but the proposed construction would not deprive them of their right of access to the highway. Although that common law right includes a right of access to the carriageway, it does not, as I think, include a right to cross the footway at every place in a direct line from the place where they emerge on to the highway to the place where they debouch on to the carriageway. Even when this construction is built, the plaintiffs will still have a clear and convenient means of access to the carriageway. The construction will to some extent diminish that means of access. In so far as this damages them, they are entitled to damages. The right of compensation under section 67 shows that Parliament anticipated that in providing proper and sufficient footway for pedestrians, the highway authority might cause damage to some adjoining owner.

The plaintiffs' particular means of access that was constructed in 1932 does not I think give them any special vested rights. Once a highway, always a highway. The plaintiffs seek to rely on the fact that section 85 specifically preserves the means of access of such persons as the plaintiffs who obtained their permitted means of access to the carriageway prior to 1948. But that section is directed to the fencing off of the highway to prevent access to it. It is concerned with the prevention of access to the highway and not access to the carriageway. It provides no compensation. It is, therefore, reasonable, when the authority are setting out to fence off persons from the highway without compensation, they should be compelled to respect the rights of persons who had for some time used a permitted lawful means of access constructed for the purpose. Section 67, however, is directed to quite another purpose. It is directed to the safety or accommodation of pedestrians as its objective, and the authority are entitled to provide raised paving as they may think necessary for the purpose of safeguarding persons using the highway. If the accomplishment of that objective entails damage to adjoining owners, the highway authority must pay compensation. I see no reason why under that section the highway authority should not put this isolated raised piece of paving on the footway for the safety of pedestrians. For, in spite of the fact that for the convenience of the plaintiffs this wide area has been constructed and used since 1932 as a carriageway approach, it is still the footway.

Devlin L.J. I agree with the judgments which my Lords have delivered for the reasons which they have given.

Appeal allowed. No order as to costs below or as to costs of appeal. Leave to appeal to the House of Lords refused.

Building—Contract—I.C.E. form—Engineer's certificate—Reference of "dispute" to arbitration—No reference to arbitration "except as "to the withholding by the engineer of any certificate . . . until "after the completion . . . of the works unless with . . . consent "of the employer and the contractor"—Refusal by engineer to include certain claims not in certificate—Whether "dispute"—Whether certificate withheld.

A contract to carry out certain civil engineering works in connection with the construction of a dual carriageway vehicular underpass was comprised in articles of agreement, a form of tender, certain drawings, the I.C.E. General Conditions of Contract, a specification and bills of quantities. Clause 60 of the general conditions provided for monthly payments to the contractor on interim certificates of the engineer, and empowered the engineer to withhold certificates if the works were not being carried out to his satisfaction and to withhold retention money in certain circumstances. Clause 66 provided that in the event of a dispute between the employer or the engineer and the contractor the matter should be referred to the engineer whose decision should be final, but that if either the employer or the contractor were dissatisfied with a decision they could require the matter to be referred to an arbitrator. The clause continued: "Such reference except as to the "withholding by the engineer of any certificate or the withholding "of any portion of the retention money under clause 60 hereof to "which the contractor claims to be entitled . . . shall not be opened "until after the completion or alleged completion of the works "unless with the written consent of the employer and the "contractor."

Before completion of the works a dispute arose, the contractors claiming to be entitled to payment for excavation not only of the space to be occupied by the retaining walls of a tunnel but also the necessary working space, which latter item was not included in the form of tender. The engineer refused to include this claim in his certificate and the contractor procured the appointment of an arbitrator. The employer contended that the dispute could not be referred to arbitration under clause 66 until the works had been completed. On a summons to determine whether, on the true construction of clause 66, the dispute was a dispute as to the withholding by the engineer of a certificate within the meaning of that clause:—

Held, (1) that the words in clause 66 "the withholding by the "engineer of any certificate" were not qualified by the words "under clause 60" but were unrestricted in their context and apt to apply wherever the circumstances were such that the engineer should have given a certificate (post, pp. 965, 966).

(2) That any dispute relating to something in consequence of which a certificate had been refused, which on one view of the question ought to have been given, was a dispute as to the withholding of that certificate; that by refusing to certify for the excavation of the working space the engineer had withheld a certificate and that, therefore, the dispute was a dispute as to the withholding by the engineer of a certificate within the meaning of clause 66. Accordingly, the reference to arbitration might be opened before the completion of the works without the consent of the employer (post, p. 967).

Adjourned summons.

A contract for the construction of an underpass, dated September 9, 1958, and made between the plaintiff company, A. E. Farr Ltd., and the Minister of Transport and Civil Aviation (now the Minister of Transport), incorporated the plaintiffs' tender, certain drawings, the I.C.E. General Conditions of Contract, 4th ed. (1955), approved by the Institution of Civil Engineers and the Federation of Civil Engineering Contractors, and the specification and bill of quantities relating to the works. The works contracted for consisted of the construction of a dual carriageway vehicular underpass about 2,300 feet long including approaches as well as pedestrian subways and ground-level slip roads, together with ancillary works, at the intersection of Western Avenue and Hanger Lane, Middlesex, on the London to Fishguard trunk road. At that point Western Avenue and Hanger Lane were cross roads, and the underpass was to be a tunnel below ground level to carry traffic proceeding east and west along Western Avenue without its coming into contact with traffic travelling north and south along Hanger Lane or changing direction at the cross roads. The tunnel was to be approached at each end by a decline from the level of the traffic way of Western Avenue to the level of the floor of the tunnel, the entrances of these approaches being situated in the centre of the traffic way of Western Avenue. The approaches were to be flanked by retaining walls containing the faces exposed by the excavation of the declining carriageways. The retaining walls had to be built before the core of the excavation was extracted, and to enable that to be done a trench had to be dug along the line of each retaining wall of such a width as to contain not only the space to be occupied by the wall itself, but also a sufficient working space on at least one side of the intended retaining wall to enable the builders to carry out the operation of erecting the wall in the trench. When the retaining walls had been built, but not before, the process of excavating the approaches could be undertaken.

The plaintiffs' tender contained general directions, the effect of which was that the price at which the contractor tendered for the contract would not necessarily be the contract price of the work, since the tender was based on quantities which were not to be treated as final, and it provided that excavation for the structure was normally to be priced and paid for on the basis of the cubic capacity of the relevant structure and that excavation for working space was to be paid for on a different basis measured by the area of the sides of the excavation.

The items relating to retaining walls were as follows: Item 38: "Description: Excavate in trench for retaining walls to 6 in. "above formation level to depth not exceeding 10 ft. Unit—"cubic yard. Amount—5,850. Rate or Price—6s. Total "£1,755." There were similar items numbered 39, 40 and 41 for excavation to depth exceeding 10 ft. but not exceeding 20 ft., exceeding 20 ft. but not exceeding 30 ft., and exceeding 30 ft. but not exceeding 40 ft. respectively. There was no item relating to excavating working space. There were items relating to "ex-"cavation in dumpling between trenches for retaining walls" to various depths which related to the main excavation to form the approach roads. The items relating to pedestrian subways included items relating to "excavation in trench" priced on a cubic capacity basis, that is, excavation to provide space to be occupied by actual structure, and also item 68 in the following terms: "Description: Excavate to allow working areas alongside walls of "subways, ramps and steps and also on concourse, including "breaking out existing roads and all consequent refilling and "making good. Unit—square yard. Amount—1,320. Rate or "price—120s. Total—£7,920."

The I.C.E. General Conditions of Contract defined the engineer for the purposes of the contract as meaning a named firm or such other engineer appointed from time to time by the employer (that was, the Ministry) and notified in writing to the contractor as the engineer for the purposes of the contract in the place of the named firm.

By clause 6 of the general conditions the several documents forming the contract were to be taken as mutually explanatory of one another and in case of ambiguities or discrepancies were to be explained and adjusted by the engineer. Clause 12 (1) provided that the contractor should be deemed to have satisfied himself before tendering as to the correctness and sufficiency of his tender for the works and of the rates and prices stated in the priced bill of quantities and any schedule of rates and prices. By clause 13, save in so far as it was legally or physically impossible, the contractor was to execute, complete and maintain the works in strict accordance with the contract to the satisfaction of the engineer and should comply with and adhere strictly to the engineer's instructions and directions on any matter. Clause 42 required the employer to give the contractor possession of the site in such a way as to enable him to carry out the works in accordance with the programme, and provided that: "If the contractor "suffered delay or incurred expense from failure on the part of "the employer to give possession in accordance with the terms "of this clause the engineer shall grant an extension of time for "the completion of the works and certify such sum as he con-"siders fair to cover the expense incurred which sum shall be "paid by the employer."

Clause 46 provided that the materials, plant and labour were to be provided by the contractor, and the mode of execution and maintenance of the works were to be of a kind and conducted in a manner approved of by the engineer, and clause 48 provided that as soon as in the opinion of the engineer the works had been substantially completed and had satisfactorily passed any prescribed final test the engineer, on receiving a written undertaking by the contractor to finish any outstanding work during the period of maintenance, should issue a certificate of completion and that the period of maintenance should commence from the date of the certificate. The period of maintenance meant twelve months from the date of any such completion certificate, and provision was also made for completion certificates relating to parts of the works.

By clause 49 (2) the contractor was to execute any work of repair that was required by the engineer during the period of maintenance or within fourteen days after its expiration, and clause 50 contained provisions of an ancillary nature requiring the contractor to search for the cause of any defect. Clause 52 (4) provided that the contractor should send to the engineer once in every month an account giving full particulars of claims for any additional expense to which he considered himself entitled and of extra work ordered by the engineer which he had executed during the preceding month.

Clause 60, the only clause which provided in terms for withholding any payment or any certificate was in the following terms: "(1) The contractor shall submit to the engineer after "the end of each month a statement showing the estimated "contract value of the permanent work executed up to the end "of the month (if such value shall justify the issue of an interim "certificate) and the contractor will be paid monthly on the "certificate of the engineer the amount due to him on account "of the estimated contract value of the permanent work executed "up to the end of the previous month together with such amount "(if any) as the engineer may consider proper on account of "materials for permanent work delivered by the contractor on "the site and in addition such amount as the engineer may "consider fair and reasonable for any temporary works or "constructional plant for which separate amounts are provided "in the bill of quantities subject to a retention of the percentage "named in the tender until the amount retained shall reach "the 'limit of retention money' named in the tender (hereinafter "called 'the retention money'). Provided always that no "interim certificate shall be issued for a less sum than that "named in the tender at one time. (2) One half of the retention "money shall become due and shall be paid to the contractor "when the engineer shall certify in writing that the works have "been substantially completed and the other half shall be paid "to the contractor fourteen days after the expiration of the period "of maintenance notwithstanding that at such time there may "be outstanding claims by the contractor against the employer. "Provided always that if at such time there shall remain to be "executed by the contractor any works ordered during such "period pursuant to clauses 49 and and 50 hereof the employer "shall be entitled to withhold payment until the completion of "such works of so much of the second half of the retention money "as shall in the opinion of the engineer represent the cost of "the works so remaining to be executed. Provided further that "in the event of different maintenance periods having become "applicable to different parts of the works pursuant to clause 48 "hereof the expression 'expiration of the period of maintenance' "shall for the purposes of this sub-clause be deemed to mean "the expiration of the latest of such periods. (3) Payment upon "each of the engineer's certificates shall be made by the "employer within the number of days named in the tender after "such certificate has been delivered to the employer and in the "event of failure by the employer to comply with the provisions "of this sub-clause or to pay the retention money or any part "thereof at the times prescribed by sub-clause (2) of this clause "he shall pay to the contractor interest at the rate of 5 per cent.

"per annum upon all overdue payments from the date on which "the same should have been made. (4) The engineer may by "any certificate make any correction or modification in any pre-"vious certificate which shall have been issued by him and shall "have power to withhold any certificate if the works or any part "thereof are not being carried out to his satisfaction."

Clause 61 provided that no certificate other than the maintenance certificate referred to in clause 62 should be deemed to constitute approval of any work or other matter in respect of which it was issued or should be taken as an admission of the due performance of the contract or of the accuracy of any claim made by the contractor or of additional or varied work having been ordered by the engineer, nor was any other certificate to conclude or prejudice any of the powers of the engineer. By clause 62: "(1) The contract shall not be considered as "completed until a maintenance certificate shall have been signed "by the engineer and delivered to the employer stating that the "works have been completed and maintained to his satisfaction. "The maintenance certificate shall be given by the engineer "fourteen days after the expiration of the period of maintenance "or as soon thereafter as any works ordered during such period "pursuant to clauses 49 and 50 hereof shall have been completed "to the satisfaction of the engineer and full effect shall be given "to this clause notwithstanding any previous entry on the works "or the taking possession working or using thereof or any part "thereof by the employer. Provided always that the issue of the "maintenance certificate shall not be a condition precedent to "payment to the contractor of the second half of the retention "money in accordance with clause 60 hereof. (2) The employer "shall not be liable to the contractor for any matter or thing "arising out of or in connection with the contract or the execu-"tion of the works unless the contractor shall have made a claim "in writing in respect thereof before the giving of the mainten-"ance certificate under this clause. (3) Notwithstanding the "issue of the maintenance certificate the contractor and (subject "to sub-clause (2) of this clause) the employer shall remain "liable for the fulfilment of any obligation incurred under the "provisions of the contract prior to the issue of the maintenance "certificate which remains unperformed at the time such certi-"ficate is issued, and for the purposes of determining the nature "and extent of any such obligation the contract shall be deemed "to remain in force between the parties hereto."

Clause 63 entitled the employer to forfeit the contract in certain events, including the event of the engineer certifying that the contractor has abandoned the contract or been guilty of certain defaults in carrying it out, and to require the engineer, in the event of the contract being forfeited, to certify the amount, if any, which the contractor had earned and the cost to which the employer had been put in completing the works and the amount of any damages to which the employer was entitled. Clause 65 provided for the engineer certifying certain amounts in the event of an outbreak of war during the currency of the contract for the purpose of adjusting the rights of the parties in the altered circumstances.

Clause 66 provided: "If any dispute or difference of any kind "whatsoever shall arise between the employer or the engineer and "the contractor in connection with or arising out of the contract "or the carrying out of the works (whether during the progress "of the works or after their completion and whether before or "after the determination abandonment or breach of the contract) "it shall be referred to and settled by the engineer who shall "state his decision in writing and give notice of the same to the "employer and the contractor. Such decision in respect of every "matter so referred shall be final and binding upon the employer "and the contractor until the completion of his work and shall "forthwith be given effect to by the contractor who shall proceed "with the works with all due diligence whether notice of dissatis-"faction is given by him or by the employer as hereinafter "provided or not. If the engineer shall fail to give such decision "for a period of three calendar months after being requested to "do so or if either the employer or the contractor be dissatisfied "with any such decision of the engineer then and in any such case "either the employer or the contractor may within three calendar "months after receiving notice of such decision or within three "calendar months after the expiration of the said period of three "months (as the case may be) require that the matter shall be "referred to an arbitrator to be agreed upon between the parties "or failing agreement to be nominated on the application of "either party by the President for the time being of the Institu-"tion of Civil Engineers and any such reference shall be deemed "to be a submission to arbitration within the meaning of the "Arbitration Act, 1950, or the Arbitration (Scotland) Act, 1894, "as the case may be or any statutory re-enactment or amend-"ment thereof for the time being in force. Such arbitrator shall "have full power to open up review and revise any decision "opinion direction certificate or valuation of the engineer and "neither party shall be limited in the proceedings before such "arbitrator to the evidence or arguments put before the engineer "for the purpose of obtaining his decision above referred to. The "award of the arbitrator shall be final and binding on the parties. "Such reference except as to the withholding by the engineer "of any certificate or the withholding of any portion of the "retention money under clause 60 hereof to which the contractor "claims to be entitled or as to the exercise of the engineer's "power to give a certificate under clause 63 (1) hereof shall not "be opened until after the completion or alleged completion of "the works unless with the written consent of the employer and "the contractor. Provided always: (i) that the giving of a certi-"ficate of completion under clause 48 hereof shall not be a "condition precedent to the opening of any such reference; "(ii) that no decision given by the engineer in accordance with "the foregoing provisions shall disqualify him from being called "as a witness and giving evidence before the arbitrator on any "matter whatsoever relevant to the dispute or difference so "referred to the arbitrator as aforesaid."

On October 3, 1958, the plaintiff company wrote to the engineer claiming to be paid for excavation of working space in the trenching for the retaining walls. On November 7, 1958, the engineer replied: "As no separate item was in fact included in "the bill for working space required for the main deep excava-"tions we agree that some additional item should be negotiated "with you." The parties, however, failed to agree upon how this separate item should be calculated. On January 5, 1959, the engineer wrote that if the plaintiff company did not accept the engineer's proposal the matter would have to be held over until the end of the contract and submitted as a claim. After some further discussion the plaintiff company on May 21, 1959, stated that they wanted the matter to be submitted to arbitration and asked the engineer for his decision in conformity with clause 66. On July 17, 1959, the plaintiff company propounded their claim in a reasoned written form and quantified it at £85,080 in respect of work done to June 30, 1959. On October 23, 1959, the engineer wrote confirming the complete rejection of this claim. On November 19, 1959, the plaintiff company gave notice to the Ministry of its dissatisfaction with the engineer's decision and that they required the claim to be referred to arbitration in accordance with clause 66. They also procured the appointment by the President of the Institution of Civil Engineers of an arbitrator. The plaintiff company had, however, not completed the works and the Ministry contended that the dispute could not be referred to arbitration under clause 66 until the works had been completed. The plaintiff company contended that the dispute was a dispute as to the withholding by the engineer of a certificate and so came within the words of exception.

The plaintiff company had put in, under clause 60, monthly statements including amounts calculated under items 38–41 of the form of tender in respect of excavations in trench for the retaining walls. These amounts, calculated on a cubic capacity basis, related to the cubic capacity of the retaining walls themselves. The plaintiff company had also included in their statements a claim in respect of excavation to allow working areas alongside the retaining walls. The engineer had included in the total amounts of his certificates the amounts calculated on cubic capacity referred to above but had not included any amount claimed in respect of working areas.

The plaintiffs took out a summons against the Ministry as defendants to determine whether, on the true construction of clause 66, the dispute was a dispute as to the withholding by the engineer of a certificate within the meaning of that clause.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 22. Buckley J. read the following judgment: In this case I have to decide a question of construction arising on clause 66 of the general conditions of contract for use in connection with works of civil engineering construction which are commonly known as the I.C.E. conditions of contract and are, I understand, incorporated by reference in a large number of civil engineering contracts.

[His Lordship stated the facts, read the general conditions of contract substantially as set out above, and continued:] I am not concerned with the merits of either party's case or contentions in the dispute, but in order to determine whether the dispute is one which falls within the words of exception it has been necessary for me to state the facts in sufficient detail to demonstrate the nature of the dispute and to refer to the relevant parts of the contract.

Mr. Stewart-Brown, on behalf of the plaintiff company, contends that in clause 66 the words "withholding by the engineer of "any certificate" mean the withholding of any certificate which in accordance with the contract the engineer ought in the circumstances to have given. His contention involves that if for any reason the contractor at any time argues that the engineer has under-certified (it may be as a result of misinterpreting the contract, or as a result of under-measuring the work or of some other cause) a difference will have arisen as to the withholding by the engineer of the certificate which he ought to have given, and such difference would be referable to arbitration before the completion of the works. The good faith of the engineer in giving his certificate is, according to this submission, irrelevant.

It would require very clear language to make me accept this contention in relation to a bona fide difference of opinion between the engineer and the contractor about measurements. The reason why the monthly payments are to be made on the engineer's certificates is clearly to enable the engineer to say how far the contractor's claims are justified, and, if only as a matter of convenience, one would not expect certificates given in good faith to be open to question, particularly having regard to the wide and arbitrary powers conferred upon the engineer by other provisions of the contract. The alternative view would open the door to constant references to arbitration during the currency of the contract. Interim certificates of this kind are not final and conclusive determinations of rights, as clause 60 (4) makes clear, and for this reason also are not, in my opinion, likely to have been intended to be the subject-matter of arbitration while the contract is running. But the dispute in the present case is not, of course, about measurements. The engineer has refused to include certain claims in his certificate at all and may be said pro tanto to have withheld a certificate.

There has been some debate before me as to whether in clause 66 the words "under clause 60 hereof" qualify (a) "the "retention money" only, or (b) "the withholding of any "portion of the retention money" only, or (c) "the withholding "by the engineer of any certificate" in addition to (b).

Mr. Stamp, for the Ministry, has contended in favour of (c). He says that "under clause 60" means pursuant to or in accordance with clause 60 and that this is inappropriate to construction (a), which treats the words "under clause 60" as being equivalent to "referred to in clause 60." He points out that in clause 60 one does find references both to withholding a certificate (clause 60 (4)) and to withholding a portion of the retention money (clause 60 (2)), and that these are the only places where any provisions for withholding a certificate or any retention money are to be found.

On the other hand, Mr. Stewart-Brown points out that clause 60 (2) only refers to a withholding of payment of part of the second half of the retention money, and so must refer to a period later than 14 days after the end of the period of maintenance; that is to say, after the end of 12½ months from the date of the certificate of completion. This, he says, makes it clear that the words of exception in clause 66 cannot relate back to clause 60 (2) because proviso (i) to clause 66 says that the giving of a certificate of completion shall not be a condition precedent to arbitration. Moreover, the giving of a certificate of completion presupposes that the works have then been substantially completed, and that the contractor has undertaken to finish any outstanding work during the period of maintenance. Consequently the works ought to be, and presumably would probably be, entirely completed before the date of payment of the second half of the retention money arrived, so that it would only be in an exceptional case, and one in which the contractor was in default under his undertaking to complete outstanding work, that a dispute about withholding any retention money under clause 60 (2) would arise until after the actual completion of the works.

These seem to me to be strong arguments for not adopting construction (b) and a fortiori for not adopting construction (c). I prefer construction (a). Although "the retention money under "clause 60" may not be very artistic language, it does not, I think, do a violence to it to construe it as meaning either "the "retention money referred to in clause 60" or "the retention "money retained under clause 60."

I therefore reach the conclusion that the words "under "clause 60" do not qualify the words "the withholding by the

1960

A. E. Farr Ltd. v. Ministry of Transport.

Buckley J.

"engineer of any certificate," and that the latter words are unrestricted by their context. They are, in my judgment, apt to apply, for instance, to a withholding of a certificate under clause 42. They are also apt, in my judgment, to apply to a withholding of a monthly certificate under clause 60 if the circumstances are or may be such that the engineer should have given the certificate.

I turn, therefore, to consider whether the dispute in the present case is a dispute as to the withholding of a certificate within the construction which I have put upon clause 60. Mr. Stamp says that it is not, because the dispute is primarily about the true interpretation of the provisions of the contract relating to payments for trenching. The engineer has certified in full in accordance with the prices stated in the bill of quantities for all trenching that the plaintiff company claims to have done. In these circumstances, says Mr. Stamp, there has been no withholding of any certificate, although there is a dispute as to whether in giving his certificate the engineer has properly construed the contract. In other words, Mr. Stamp says that the words of exception in clause 66 say nothing about disputes which relate to the alleged incorrectness of a certificate. Moreover, Mr. Stamp says, even if the engineer can be said to have withheld a certificate in respect of the excavation of working space, the dispute is still not as to such withholding but as to whether under the contract the Ministry is liable to pay anything for this excavation. The withholding of the certificate is said to be merely incidental to the subject-matter of the dispute.

I have already indicated that I should be disinclined to reach the conclusion that, if the engineer, acting in good faith and on proper principles, were to consider that the contractor was not entitled to a certificate to which the latter claimed to be entitled, or to a certificate for the whole amount so claimed, the engineer in acting on that view could be said to be withholding a certificate. In such a case when refusing a certificate or giving a certificate only for a lesser sum, he would, in my view, be discharging his proper function under the contract and could not (at any rate when certifying for a lesser sum) be properly described as withholding anything. But suppose that the engineer, being satsified that the contractor is entitled to a certificate for, say, a sum of £20,000 claimed by the contractor, for some inadmissible reason (as, for instance, that he knows the employer to be in financial difficulties) refuses a certificate altogether, or refuses to certify for more than £15,000: he would, in the one case, manifestly be withholding a certificate, and in the other he would, in my judgment, be withholding his certificate in respect of £5,000 worth of certifiable work. Suppose again that the engineer, acting in good faith but in accordance with mistaken principles, because he has misdirected himself about the law, refuses a certificate altogether or refuses to certify more than £15,000 of a proper claim to £20,000: he would again, in my judgment, in the one case be withholding a certificate, and in the other be withholding a certificate in respect of £5,000 worth of certifiable work. Mr. Stamp would, however, I think, contend that in such case the dispute between the employer, represented by the engineer, and the contractor would not be a dispute as to the withholding of a certificate but a dispute as to the question of principle, the engineer's mistaken view of which has resulted in the certificate being withheld. But the important aspect of the engineer's view of the question of principle is that for the time being by reason of the consequent withholding of the certificate the employer has not to pay and the contractor will not receive so much money. In my judgment, any dispute or difference which relates to something in consequence of which a certificate has been refused, which on one view of the question ought to have been given, is a dispute or difference as to the withholding of that certificate.

Whether the certificate has or has not been rightly withheld is a matter to be arbitrated. It therefore cannot be a question for me in the present case whether the plaintiff company's view as to their right to payment on interim certificates for excavation of working space is correct or not. They contend that under the contract they should be paid for this work on monthly certificates over and above what they are entitled to be paid on a cubic capacity basis for excavation of the space required for the actual structure. The engineer has refused to certify for this work. This is the subject-matter of the dispute or difference. Rightly or wrongly he has withheld a certificate so far as the excavation of working space is concerned. This has given rise to what is, in my judgment, a dispute or difference as to the withholding by the engineer of a certificate. The fact that in the event the engineer may be held rightly to have withheld the certificate does not make it any less such a dispute. Only if it were perfectly clear that the contractor's view could not be upheld, could there be said to be no genuine dispute about the withholding of the certificate. I could not take that view in this case.

For these reasons I reach the conclusion that, upon the true construction of clause 66 of the general conditions, the dispute in question in the present case is a dispute as to the withholding by the engineer of a certificate or certificates within the meaning of that clause, and I will so declare accordingly, and will further declare that the reference of that dispute to arbitration may consequently be opened without the consent of the Minister before the completion of the works which are the subject-matter of the contract.

Declaration accordingly.

Husband and Wife — Adultery — Evidence — Incriminating question — "Proceedings instituted in consequence of adultery"—Party cross-examined charged with cruelty—Party cross-examined alleging adultery—Question relevant to cruelty charge—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (14 Geo. 6, c. 25), s. 32 (3).

Husband and Wife—Adultery—Connivance—Meaning—Husband turning wife out knowing she would return to lover—Absence of "corrupt" intention.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Cross-petition—"Proceedings instituted "in consequence of adultery"—Whether cross-petition for cruelty part of procedings—Meaning of "proceedings"—Question relevant to cruelty tending to show adultery—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 32 (3).

Husband and Wife—Conduct conducing—Desertion, as—Constructive desertion — Wife's adultery condoned — Wife then turned out — Subsequent adultery.

A husband was held to have condoned his wife's prior adultery with the co-respondent during a brief period of reconciliation and to have then turned her out, knowing that she would be likely to return to the co-respondent. Upon his subsequent petition for divorce on the ground of adultery the wife alleged connivance and sought a decree of divorce on the ground of the husband's alleged cruelty. A question was put to the husband in cross-examination upon the cruelty allegation tending to show that he had committed adultery; and objection was taken on the ground that the husband was protected by section 32 (3) of the Act of 1950:—

Held, (1) that the question, though relevant to the cruelty allegation, was inadmissible, for there was one set of proceedings only before the court, and that set of proceedings had been instituted in consequence of adultery.

(2) That a spouse who acts, foreseeing that one of the natural results of his act is adultery on the part of the other spouse, and in that sense intending it, is conducing to his spouse's adultery; but that if the motive for his action is a wish to bring that result about, he may be held not merely to be conducing to the adultery, but conniving at it.

(3) That in the present case the husband had not acted to encourage his wife to commit adultery; he had not cared whether she did nor not. His motive had been to get her out of the house; but there had been no corrupt intention to encourage the continuance of her adultery, and therefore, while there had been misconduct conducing, there had been no connivance.

(4) That the husband should in the circumstances of the case be granted a decree nisi of divorce.

Defended divorce suit, in which the husband by his petition dated June 26, 1958, sought a decree of divorce on the ground of adultery with the co-respondent, and in which the wife by her answer dated December 18, 1958, admitted adultery, but alleged that her adultery prior to April 6, 1958, had been condoned by the husband and that he had connived at her subsequent adultery when he turned her out on April 10, 1958, knowing that she would return to the co-respondent. She cross-prayed for divorce on the ground of cruelty, and alleged that the husband had conduced to her adultery.

The parties were married in 1945 and had three children born in 1946, 1949 and 1951. On April 19, 1957, the wife left the matrimonial home and the children, and it was accepted by the court that she met the co-respondent for the first time on May 11, 1957. Adultery at this stage was denied. Later in May, 1957, she returned home for a short period, leaving again in June, 1957. She continued to keep in touch with the co-respondent, and in September, 1957, she began to live with him in adultery. On April 6, 1958, after negotiations between the parties for a reconciliation during which the assistance of a religious organisation was obtained, the wife returned to the matrimonial home. It was held that marital intercourse took place and that the prior adultery was condoned. On April 10, 1958, the wife again left the home and went back to live with the co-respondent. The facts relating to this period are set out in the judgment: it was held that the husband was determined to get rid of her and that he knew that she would resume her adultery.

After the separation in June, 1957, the husband employed a housekeeper to look after the children, who remained in the home except for the period in April, 1958, when the parties were together.

During the cross-examination of the husband a question was tendered in cross-examination which tended to show that he had been guilty of adultery: his Lordship ruled that the question was inadmissible, and said that he would give his reasons in his judgment.

The case is reported upon the issues arising from the allegation of connivance and the dispute as to the admissibility of the question in cross-examination. (The allegation of cruelty was rejected.)

R. J. A. Temple Q.C. and H. S. Law for the husband.
Neil McKinnon Q.C. and Neil Taylor for the wife.
The co-respondent in person.

The cases cited are referred to in the judgment.

WRANGHAM J. referred to the pleadings and continued: The parties were married on October 6, 1945, and they have three children, all boys, and—with intervals caused by absences of the wife from the matrimonial home—they lived together until June, 1957, and again for a short period in April, 1958. Since June, 1957—omitting the interval in April, 1958—the husband has had a housekeeper to look after the three little boys.

It is perhaps convenient at this moment to deal with the question which arose upon the law of evidence during the course of the trial, on which I ruled at the time but indicated that I would give my reasons in my judgment. Mr. McKinnon, appearing for the wife, tendered in cross-examination of the husband a question, of which I need say no more than this, that, by common consent, it tended to show that the husband had been guilty of adultery. It was not contended by Mr. Temple, for the husband, and could not be contended, in view of that which has been said by the Court of Appeal in Lewis v. Lewis,[1] and by Pearce J. in Sims v. Sims,[2] that the question or the answer to it would be irrelevant. On the contrary, it was conceded that the question and answer must be relevant to the issue of cruelty which arose upon the cross-prayer of the answer. But Mr. Temple objected to this question on the ground that the husband was entitled to the protection of section 32 (3) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, which provides that "in any proceedings instituted in con-"sequence of adultery . . . no witness . . . whether a party thereto "or not, shall be liable to be asked or be bound to answer any "question tending to show that he or she has been guilty of "adultery" with a proviso, which does not apply in this case. Mr. Temple relies, in support of that contention, upon the fact that the petition in this case is a petition based on adultery.

Mr. McKinnon's answer was that the question was not asked in the issue arising out of the prayer for dissolution based upon adultery, but it was, he says, asked in the issue arising out of that part of the answer which was a cross-prayer for dissolution on the ground of cruelty. The question therefore arises whether it can be said that there was one set of proceedings before me at the trial, or more than one set of proceedings. Upon that question there is not, so far as I have been able to find, any direct authority. Taylor v. Taylor and King[3] and S. (orse. G.) v. S.[4] are not, as they might at first sight appear to be, authority upon this point because they turn upon the wording of the Evidence (Further Amendment) Act, 1869, which is not the same in a relevant particular as the wording of section 32 (3) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950. Nor can much reliance be placed upon M. v. D.[5] In that case a petitioner in a nullity petition was held not to be protected by the statute against being cross-examined about adultery, although there was another suit set down for hearing apparently immediately after the nullity suit in which the husband was alleging adultery against his wife. Not much reliance, as I have said, can be placed on that because it appears that the two suits were separate suits which had not been consolidated, but had been set down to be heard, the one after the other. I therefore have to form my own impression as to whether the proceedings before me were one or more than one. Mr. McKinnon's argument involves a separation of the proceedings, of that which goes on at the trial, into various issues, each one of which issues constitutes a proceeding; though, indeed, it is to be remarked that the word in the section is not "proceeding" but "proceedings," which suggests comprehensiveness. Of course, if an issue is ordered to be tried separately there is authority that it constitutes separate proceedings: Evans v. Evans and Blyth.[6] That seems to me to be a long way from holding that a trial can be dissected into a number of issues arising thereat, and that each one of those issues can be called separate proceedings. In many cases, and indeed in this one, only an artificial result would be produced, for if Mr. McKinnon is right in his arguments that the husband could have been cross-examined as to adultery and that answer taken into account in the cruelty proceedings, as they are on this hypothesis deemed to be, the question would arise whether the tribunal was entitled to regard his answer to that question upon the issue of connivance at adultery, which was also raised by the answer, and to which, in the circumstances of this case, such answer might well be directly relevant. If Mr. McKinnon is right, either the husband would lose the protection of the statute upon the very question whether he should obtain a decree for adultery, because the tribunal took into account his answer in cross-examination and was therefore able to find connivance, or was assisted in finding connivance; or the tribunal would have to regard his answer for one purpose of the trial and not for the other; and although the tribunal is expected sometimes to perform artificialities of some kind, it seems to me that Mr. McKinnon's argument is less likely to be sound, if it would produce another artificiality.

Apart from that, the matter is all one of impression. The word "proceedings" is apt to describe that which goes on at the trial. I do not say that it is limited to that, but it is apt to describe the whole of that which goes on at the trial. If the legislature had intended that the protection of the statute should be limited to particular issues arising at the trial, I think the legislature would have said so. I note that in Lewis v. Lewis,[7] to which I have referred, where the proceedings began with a petition by a husband based upon cruelty, met by an answer, also based upon cruelty, which was subsequently sought to be amended by adding adultery to the cruelty, Hodson L.J., discussing the question which arose in that case, said[8]: "These proceedings not "having been instituted in consequence of adultery but in con-"sequence of cruelty, that express statutory provision does not "apply and does not become applicable now that the amendment "has taken place." (The question had been asked in that case before the amendment had been allowed.) "The answer was "given in the witness-box when the proceedings were proceedings "for cruelty." Although the question did not directly arise in Lewis v. Lewis,[7] there is, at least, in Hodson L.J.'s words, no trace of a suggestion that proceedings could be dissected for the purposes of the statute into separate issues each constituting separate proceedings. In my judgment there was one set of proceedings only before me; that set of proceedings was instituted in consequence of adultery. They may have been instituted also in consequence of other things, but that they were instituted in consequence of adultery seems to me to be plain. For those reasons I disallowed the question that was tendered.

[His Lordship then considered the history of the relations between the parties, leading up to the wife's return in April, 1958, and the allegations of cruelty, stating that the wife had left in April, 1957, because there had been constant disharmony. His Lordship continued:] I come back now to the last four days of the matrimonial cohabitation [in April, 1958]. The husband said that the moment the wife had arrived he had noticed that the children did not want her, and that he had changed his mind about a reconciliation and refused to allow his wife to sleep with him. She had, he said, protested about it, but he had slept in one room and she had slept in the other, and after a day or two she had said that she was not prepared to accept the responsibilities of a wife and mother, that that life was not for her, and that she was returning to the co-respondent. She had telephoned the co-respondent and gone back to him. The wife gave evidence that it was quite untrue; that she and her husband had slept together on the first night; that there had been some sort of celebration with a bottle of wine; that they had gone to bed and that marital intercourse had taken place between them and sealed the reconciliation. But the next day, when her husband received a letter from his housekeeper, together with three cards from the housekeeper and the children, he had changed his mind and said that he would have the housekeeper back, preferring her to his wife, and that his wife would have to go, and that he would "play her up." She had accordingly telephoned the co-respondent and gone back to him.

It is impossible, of course, to make a confident finding as to the precise details of what occurred during those four days before she went back to the co-respondent on April 10, 1958. But judging as best I can from the demeanour of the witnesses, and the probabilities of the case, I have come to these conclusions. First, that there was a reconciliation on the first night, that intercourse took place between husband and wife, and that by doing that the husband condoned the wife's adultery, which had of course been no secret from him. I may add that even if I had not found that intercourse had taken place, I would still have found that by restoring the wife to the position of mistress of his household and mother of his children the husband was condoning her previous adultery. Secondly, that the initiative in putting an end to the reconciliation lay with the husband and not with the wife. Precisely what form that initiative took it is impossible to determine; but I think that he made it perfectly clear to his wife that she had got to go, and that he would see to it one way or another that it was too uncomfortable for her to stay. He was determined to get rid of her. It may well be that one of his reasons for coming to that conclusion was that the children were upset. One would not be surprised that the children were upset. They had enjoyed the attention of the housekeeper who, so far as I could judge from seeing her in the witness-box, would be likely to be a much more stable and sensible guardian for them than the mother was. The mother had left several times and had come back again, and that no doubt would be very upsetting for the children. I have little doubt that the children were upset by the mother's arrival, and that they did regret the fact that the housekeeper had left and that the mother had come. It is very unfortunate that that should be so, but the mother was herself to blame. It may be that that was a leading reason why the husband had determined that the reconciliation would not do and that he would get rid of his wife and replace her by the housekeeper. He knew, of course, as a sensible man, that the result would be that the wife would go back to the co-respondent; indeed, no secret was made of that for she had telephoned to find out whether she could do so.

In those circumstances, it is contended on behalf of the wife that the husband had not merely conduced to her subsequent adultery but that he had connived at it. That his conduct conduced to her subsequent adultery seems to me to be plain beyond argument. He was, as I find, driving her out without just cause, and driving her out in circumstances in which he must, as a sensible man, have foreseen that she would be likely to go back to her lover.

The question is whether in those circumstances it should be held that he had connived at her adultery. It is said (see Rayden on Divorce, 7th ed., at p. 209) that the distinction between conduct conducing to adultery and connivance at adultery is one which it is difficult to define; and I was not referred to any authority which assists me to define it. In Churchman v. Churchman Lord Merriman P., delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal, said [9] that the issue on an allegation of connivance was whether on the facts of the particular case the husband had or had not been guilty of corrupt intention in promoting or encouraging either the initiation of or the continuance of the wife's adultery. In this case there is no question of the husband conniving at the initiation of the adultery: it is said that he connived at its continuance. It is to be observed that Lord Merriman P. qualified the word "intention" by the adjective "corrupt"; and it appears from Woodbury v. Woodbury [10] that at least in that case "corrupt intention" was to be interpreted as meaning a willing consent. I hope that I have rightly interpreted Lord Merriman P. if I say that a corrupt intention to encourage the continuance of adultery implies an intention to act with the motive of encouraging the wife's adultery. In other words, a spouse who acts, foreseeing that one of the natural results of his act is adultery on the part of his spouse and in that sense intending it, is conducing to his spouse's adultery; but if the motive for his action is a wish to bring that result about, then he may, at any rate, be held to be not merely conducing to the adultery but conniving at it. There is a difference between motive and intention, as explained in Lang v. Lang.[11]

In this case I do not think that the husband acted as he did from any motive of encouraging the wife's adultery. I do not think that he cared in the least whether she continued to commit adultery or not. His motive was to get her out of the house and to get the housekeeper back again, as he did get her out, and the housekeeper back again, in 48 hours. He might, of course, have acted from the motive of encouraging the wife's adultery because he wished to divorce her; but in this case I do not draw the inference that he did act from any such motive. Had he been at this stage particularly anxious to divorce his wife, he would probably have done so without ever entering into the reconciliation at all. In those circumstances I am not prepared to find that the husband was moved by a corrupt intention to encourage the continuance of the wife's adultery, although I think he foresaw that the continuance of her adultery was likely enough to be the result of what he did.

I need only add that the wife and co-respondent continued to live in adultery from the time that the wife left the husband, in April, 1958, until a date in October, 1959. The result therefore in this case is this: I am satisfied that adultery is proved, both up to April 6, 1958, and between April, 1958, and October, 1959, between the wife and the co-respondent. I am not satisfied that the husband ever connived at that adultery. I am satisfied that the husband constructively deserted his wife by turning her out in April, 1958, and that he thereby conduced to her adultery —not that desertion necessarily conduces to adultery, but in this particular case it did. I am not satisfied that the wife has proved any cruelty against the husband, despite a serious incident of violence which occurred in January, 1956. I do not think that it would be right, in view of the fact that the matrimonial life had continued for two years after that without any other incident of violence at all (indeed, without any other cruelty at all) to find the husband guilty of cruelty. Indeed, the only form of conjugal unkindness that I find proved against him relates to the last three or four days. If I had found that the husband's assault in January, 1956, had been revived by his conduct in April, 1958, so as to amount to cruelty I would nevertheless have refused to exercise my discretion in favour of the wife, because I do not regard the cruelty in any sense as the reason for the break-up of this marriage.

In spite of that which I have found against the husband, I think that it would be right to exercise my discretion in his favour in respect of both the desertion and the misconduct conducing, which indeed are in effect the same thing; and in the discretion of the court to grant him a decree nisi in respect of the proved adultery of his wife. The prayer of the answer will therefore be rejected and a decree nisi granted to him.

Presumption—Death—Long absence—Spouse not heard of for 14 years despite police inquiries—Subsequent marriage—Present spouse aware of circumstances when marrying—Whether estopped from later alleging marriage bigamous.

Estoppel — Conduct, by husband and wife — Bigamy — Circumstances fully disclosed to other spouse at "marriage."

The husband deserted the wife in 1926 and an order for maintenance was made against him in 1929 by the magistrates. In 1930 an order was issued for committal in respect of arrears, but the police were unable to find him and he was never heard of by his wife again, nor did she make inquiries. In 1944 she remarried, describing herself as a "widow." Her second husband knew of the history of her first marriage, but lived with her as husband and wife until 1959, when he left her. Upon the hearing of the wife's complaint that he had deserted her he raised for the first time the suggestion that she was not his wife at all as the marriage had been bigamous and was therefore void. The magistrates held that the marriage was valid and made an order accordingly. The husband appealed:—

Held, that, having regard to the lapse of time between the first husband's disappearance and the second marriage, he should be presumed to have died before that marriage, which was accordingly valid. The wife's failure to make inquiries was justified in the circumstances.

Quaere, whether there might be an estoppel in pais against a husband who sought in such circumstances to prove the marriage void.

Bullock
v.
Bullock.

In March, 1921, the wife, then aged 22 and a spinster, had married one Kelly, then aged 20 and a bachelor. In September, 1926 he left her a few days after the birth of their second child, and on December 6, 1929, the Sheffield magistrates made an order against him on the ground of desertion. He only made, however, a few payments under the order, and a committal order was issued accordingly on August 22, 1930. The police were unable to find him, and it had never therefore been executed. Thereafter nothing further was heard of him, and the wife herself made no inquiries as to his whereabouts.

On May 17, 1944, the wife married her second husband, the appellant, whom she had met soon after the police had failed to enforce the committal order, although there was no evidence of an improper association before marriage. She described herself as a "widow," and her second husband was fully aware of her history. They lived together as husband and wife until he left her in 1959. Both before the magistrates, and on appeal, the husband sought to establish that the second marriage was a bigamous one, and that the magistrates had therefore no jurisdiction to make an order against him. (The finding of desertion itself was not disputed on appeal.)

D. T. Lloyd for the husband.
G. H. Dixon for the wife.

The cases cited in argument are referred to in the judgments.

Lord Merriman P. stated the facts and continued: Thus we have, taking it in the broadest outline, between Kelly leaving the wife in 1926 and the marriage a period of about 18 years, and between the date of the order and the marriage a period of 15 years, which is reduced somewhat by an attempt in 1930 to enforce the order, and then from 1944 to 1959 a further period of 15 years, during which these people had been living together as reputed man and wife, and, so far as I know, it is only when he is threatened with a maintenance order on the ground of his admitted desertion of this woman—if she was his wife—that he raises for the first time the suggestion that she is not his wife at all. I say that in spite of the fact that the magistrates say on the strength of the wife's evidence—and I see no reason whatever to doubt this finding—that the husband knew every bit as much as the wife did about the history of her earlier marriage with Kelly and went through the ceremony of marriage in 1944 with full knowledge of those facts; and I do not think it depends only on what the wife said to the registrar, presumably in his hearing; I think this matter had been discussed between them; I think that is implicit in the evidence.

The magistrates have found, and it is important that one should look to see what they do say: "William Bullock"—that is the husband—"knew of all the circumstances when he "went through the marriage ceremony with her in 1944." Now those circumstances alone inevitably call to mind the well-known opinion of Lord Selborne L.C. in G. v. M.[1] I do not propose to read the whole of it, but in reference to the use of the doubtful phrase "sincerity in the suit"—which was one of nullity—Lord Selborne said this: "I think I can perceive that the real "basis of reasoning which underlies that phraseology is this, and "nothing more than this, that there may be conduct on the "part of the person seeking this remedy which ought to estop "that person from having it; as, for instance, any act from "which the inference ought to be drawn that during the ante-"cedent time the party has, with a knowledge of the facts and "of the law, approbated the marriage which he or she afterwards "seeks to get rid of, or has taken advantages and derived benefits "from the matrimonial relation which it would be unfair and "inequitable to permit him or her, after having received them, "to treat as if no such relation had ever existed." Well, that explanation by Lord Selborne can be referred to known principles of equity, and, I may say, of general jurisprudence. Then he went on to describe the sort of circumstances which would raise that kind of estoppel, and was careful to say that this catalogue was by no means exhaustive but only illustrative, and I need not read any more detail of that. The principle is quite well known.

But it is said that although every word of what I have read could be said to apply to this particular case, the case of a man who for 15 years has lived with a woman whom he was content with full knowledge of the facts to marry as a widow, and then, when he is minded to desert her, seeks to throw the whole thing into the melting-pot, although every word of what Lord Selborne said could well apply to him, it cannot operate as any sort of estoppel in this case for this reason: it is said that there is no such thing as introducing estoppel when one is considering not a voidable marriage, as was the case in G. v. M.,[1] but a marriage which is void ab initio, in other words, because it is bigamous. Of course it stands to reason in this case, if the husband's case is right, that the ceremony of marriage in 1944 with him was a bigamous marriage. This proposition is said to be established by a decision of Dr. Lushington in Miles v. Chilton (orse. Miles).[2] I do not propose to examine that case beyond saying that it was a very plain case of bigamy, of a man setting up his own bigamy in order to get out of the position that he was in. I will read the headnote to show just what the point was. "Allegation on "behalf of a woman, responsive to a libel of nullity of marriage "by reason of bigamy, pleading deception, fraud and cognisance "by the man of the existence of the husband of the first marriage "at the date of the second fact of marriage, rejected. Miscon-"duct, however gross, of a party proceeding, by reason of "bigamy, is no bar to a sentence of nullity. A wife de facto, as "a fact of marriage, is necessarily pleaded in such a suit, is "entitled pendente lite to alimony."

Now if that case stood alone it would, of course, be authority for the proposition that where bigamy is involved even the plainest estoppel will not do. I need not go into the circumstances of that case to emphasise the point. But the case does not stand alone, and it is not, on examination, the law in my opinion that there can be no estoppel where you are dealing with a marriage void because of bigamy. On the contrary there are two cases in the opposite sense. One of them is Wilkins v. Wilkins,[3] and the other is Woodland v. Woodland.[4] I am not going in detail through those cases. It is sufficient to point out how the question arose. Here again, in Wilkins v. Wilkins[5] this was a case of nullity. The actual suit was a suit for nullity by the husband, but during the subsistence of the so-called marriage the wife had petitioned for judicial separation on the ground of the husband's adultery. The husband by his answer denied the adultery and alleged that at the time of his marriage to the petitioner she had a husband living. At the trial the jury found that the husband had committed adultery, and also that at the time of the marriage the first husband was dead. Well, in fact he turned up some years later, and the husband applied to the Court of Appeal to deal with the situation, which could only be dealt with, the Court of Appeal held, by getting rid of the original finding, which obviously, in effect, constituted estoppel per rem judicatam. The parties were husband and wife. If she had sued him as his wife on the ground of adultery it would be an irrelevancy unless they were adjudged to be husband and wife. So, to take it quite shortly, what happened was that on very strict terms about what the husband must do for this woman if leave to appeal long out of time was given by the Court of Appeal, the husband was given leave to appeal on the verdict of adultery and the finding that the husband had been dead. Of course, a new fact was now plain to all concerned, namely, that the husband was very much alive, and therefore had been alive at the time of the marriage, and therefore that the marriage was in fact bigamous. But the only point so far as we are concerned is that it is quite plain that unless this new trial had been ordered, so that the verdict and judgment could be set aside, the husband would have been estopped from denying the validity of the marriage, and, indeed, Lindley L.J. in his judgment, without going through the details, says[6]: "There must be some mode "of getting rid of the difficulty which is created by the verdict "and the decree in the first suit, and the proper mode is a new "trial of that suit"; and Kay L.J. says[7]: "The verdict of the "jury at the trial of the first suit a year ago found erroneously

"that he was dead at the time of the second marriage," and he plainly indicates that that by itself would have been an estoppel; but he agreed that the estoppel could be got rid of by a new trial. So that it is not universally true, certainly as was assumed in Miles v. Chilton,[8] that merely because a bigamous marriage is involved that prevents an estoppel from operating.

The other case is the case of Woodland v. Woodland.[9] Now that is a rather curious case. There the ground of the estoppel was this: Again it was a husband who was praying for nullity of marriage on the ground that his marriage was bigamous, the wife having a husband living at the date of it, and again there had been an earlier suit. That was a suit by the wife for restitution of conjugal rights, which involved the usual finding that the parties were husband and wife, and it proceeded, naturally, upon the basis of their status being thus, as the headnote says, conclusively established inter partes. The husband had only stood by, as I understand it, and let that case go by default; but however that may be there was a decree for restitution of conjugal rights. Hill J.'s finding relies implicitly upon the decision of Wilkins v. Wilkins,[10] to which I have just referred, and the only difference between the two is that there was no appeal to the Court of Appeal to set aside the original decision which operated as the estoppel. Accordingly, the husband's petition was dismissed.

Now, it is said that there is a vital distinction between what is technically known as estoppel in pais of the kind which might be said to result from this case and an estoppel by record or estoppel per rem judicatam. Of course, the two are different; but I am not really convinced in my own mind that if the facts are strong enough to warrant an estoppel in pais, not less strong or cogent than is imported by a description of two parties in a restitution suit as husband and wife, and allowing that to go by default, it is impossible for an estoppel in pais to operate merely because what is being dealt with is a void marriage. However, I do not propose to proceed further with that part of the inquiry beyond saying that I am not convinced that this is not a case in which what Lord Selborne said in G. v. M.[11] could very properly be applied, and I do not pursue it because I think there is another very cogent reason for upholding the decision of these magistrates.

I have given the dates, and I have pointed out already that from the marriage in 1944 no less than 15 years elapsed before this case came before the Sheffield magistrates. I have pointed out that the magistrates have found, on what I think is quite valid evidence, that the husband knew of the circumstances regarding the wife's earlier marriage with Kelly, and that the magistrates plainly showed that they did not approve of a man who, having gone through that form of marriage with the wife, knowing all the facts, had himself held out by his conduct that the complainant was a widow.

But the magistrates also plainly relied on the lapse of time. I do not propose to cite authority for saying that although the critical date is 1944, and that in 1944 only 18 years—I say "only" 18 years in contrast with the whole period—had elapsed since Kelly left the wife, during which time she had last heard of him, according to her evidence, in 1929, when she obtained the order in December of that year in the Sheffield magistrates' court, and although the ultimate issue is "Ought this husband "to be assumed to be alive or dead in May, 1944?" I consider that it is settled beyond all possibility of argument to the contrary that we are entitled at this stage in 1960 to consider the whole lapse of time from the time when Kelly was last heard of. Now it did occur to us that there was one way of testing the validity of the presumption which the magistrates have drawn, and which the wife was entitled to draw, and that was by recourse to the Sheffield magistrates' court. [His Lordship referred to the record of payments made and to the issue of the committal order, which was recorded as not being executed because Kelly could not be found, and continued:] There is one other thing which I think may be stated to be settled, and that is that reliance on the presumption that a man who is completely unheard of for seven years may be presumed to be dead does depend to some extent on the question whether all due inquiries have been made having regard to the circumstances; and that the circumstances may vary between one case and another is plain from various authorities which have been cited to us, quite properly, in the course of the argument.

In this case the importance of the failure to execute that warrant in the case of a man said to be living in or near Sheffield at the time when he left his wife, and certainly at the time of the celebration of the marriage and during the marriage, seems to me to be this, not merely that he could not be found then, but that he could not be found then in circumstances that he had the police, with all the resources that are open to them, after him; and if he could not be found by the police any woman might be fully justified in assuming that he could not be found by her, and it may be a very sensible and satisfactory explanation of the admitted fact that after that time, at any rate, she did not make any inquiries.

I do not want to rely on any particular case, because all these cases differ enormously in their circumstances, but there is no doubt that in one case [12]—it is one of these difficult cases under the Inheritance (Family Provisions) Act, 1938—which was tried by Harman J. he very markedly paid most attention to the lapse of time, and the lapse of time notwithstanding the fact that though other people were said to have made inquiries and given evidence, the wife herself, who had been in touch with the husband's relatives at one time, had never, apparently, even discussed the topic with them, and had herself made no independent inquiries at all. But mainly, I think, without reading the whole judgment, that it is plain from passages in it [13] that it was upon the total lapse of time that he came to the conclusion that it was established that there had been a valid marriage between the parties which qualified her for provision under that Act. Whatever one may feel about a husband being bound not to take what I may call this indecent point against his wife in order to escape liability for the consequence of having deserted her, on this ground alone, the lapse of time, and the lapse of time after the latest time at which she is shown to have known anything about him, or been party to any proceedings in connection with her order, I think that this decision of the magistrates can and should be upheld, and the appeal dismissed.

COLLINGWOOD J. I agree. The magistrates, after saying that "the main point at issue and the matter upon which most of the "hearing was concentrated was the question of whether the com-"plainant was lawfully married to the defendant on May 17, "1944," go on to say in the course of their reasons: "We noted "that 30 years have now elapsed since Edward Kelly was last "heard of, and that 15 years had elapsed before the time of the "second marriage. William Bullock having gone through a form "of marriage with the complainant knowing all the facts, had "himself by his conduct held out that the complainant was a "widow, and it appeared to us reasonable to infer that Edward "Kelly had died prior to May 17, 1944, and that the marriage on "May 17, 1944, was a valid marriage."

It is against that finding that the husband now appeals, and, put shortly, the ground of the appeal is that the magistrates were wrong in holding that that was a valid marriage on May 17, 1944, because, although the seven years had been exceeded by a good many years, no presumption can arise in a case where no inquiries have been made at all by the wife, and in the course of her evidence she said: "I have not seen or heard of him "since. I have not taken any steps since 1929 to find my "husband."

It is not, I think, unimportant to consider what was urged by Mr. Lloyd in what I hope he will allow me to describe as a most admirable argument. He went on to say that at this hearing the wife admitted that she made no inquiries. She did nothing; she did not even go to the police; she did not even go to the court with reference to the order which she had obtained in that court.

Collingwood J.

[His Lordship referred to the date of the order, and to the inquiries made by the police after the committal order had been issued in 1930, and continued:] Not only, therefore, did the wife go to the court but the services of the police were enlisted to try to find Kelly. Not only does that add the efforts of the police to find the man, but in addition to that, in my opinion, it affords justification for the wife's attitude of failing to take any further steps herself. Once it is brought to her notice that a warrant has been put into the hands of the police, and that they have been unable to execute it because they cannot find her husband, she may well be excused for failing herself to start looking for him, and be excused for not having any hope of succeeding where the police have failed. I think that that double reason, the fact of the committal order issued by the magistrates and the failure to serve it upon the man Kelly, meets the objection which counsel has made in this case—"There have been no inquiries as to the "whereabouts of this man."

I entirely agree with what Lord Merriman P. has said with regard to the decision of Harman J. in In re Watkins, decd., Watkins v. Watkins.[14] There the wife had made no inquiries herself. There were relations of the husband with whom she had been in touch until her death, and it was clear from her evidence that although she had seen them from time to time she had never discussed the question whether her husband was alive or dead. Harman J., however, found that she was in fact a widow, quite clearly basing his decision mainly on the long lapse of time, which was something in the neighbourhood of 22 years in that case. Here the total is 30 years, 15 prior to the marriage and 15 since, and I agree with what my Lord has said, that the decision of the magistrates here is correct.

With regard to the question of estoppel, that does not arise now, but I would add this, that I entirely agree with what Lord Merriman P. has said with regard to that matter. I agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Discretion—Failure to pay for exercise—Disclosure of petitioner's adultery after decree nisi but before decree absolute—Leave to amend notwithstanding.

A wife, by her petition, prayed for a divorce on the ground of desertion since 1946. Although she had made a full disclosure of her adultery before her petition was settled, her petition by inadvertence omitted the necessary prayer for discretion, and no discretion statement was therefore filed. After a decree nisi had been pronounced the mistake was realised by her solicitors, and application was made on summons for leave to amend her petition by praying for discretion, and to file a discretion statement. The court was also asked to make the decree nisi absolute. The application to amend was supported by the Queen's Proctor, who had fully inquired into the matter:—

Held, that in such circumstances it was appropriate to grant leave to amend, and to file the discretion statement, but that the application to make the decree nisi absolute should be made in the usual way.

SUMMONS in open court.

The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment: This was a summons by a wife petitioner calling upon the husband respondent and the Queen's Proctor to show cause why leave should not be granted for her to amend her petition without re-service, and to include therein a prayer that the discretion of the court should be exercised in her favour and that she might further be allowed to file a discretion statement. The petition was dated July 24, 1959, and asked for dissolution of the marriage upon the ground of the husband's desertion in September, 1946. The hearing of the petition was on November 4, 1959, when a decree nisi was granted.

The wife gave evidence at the hearing of the summons to the effect that when she first consulted her solicitor in regard to the preparation of the petition she made a full disclosure to him of the adultery which she had in fact committed. An application was then made for legal aid, which was granted. A member of the firm of solicitors representing her also gave evidence, and he agreed that when the wife consulted him she had given a full disclosure of her adultery, and that he had then sent the papers to the committee with the application for the grant of legal aid, forwarding the admission by the wife.

When the papers were returned from the legal aid committee, with a certificate granting legal aid, the partner who had interviewed the wife was away and the matter was then dealt with by an articled clerk in the firm. The result was that when instructions to settle the petition were sent to counsel, the wife's statement

v.
ONIONS.

of her adultery had not accompanied them, so that, when the petition was in fact filed it did not contain any prayer for the exercise of the discretion of the court. This was only realised by the solicitors when the time came to apply for the decree nisi to be made absolute, and a search of the file in the office showed that this statement was not among the papers.

The partner who had taken the original instructions at once realised that an error had been made, and he took the perfectly proper course of at once reporting this matter to the Queen's Proctor and to the Law Society, telling them of the disclosure which had in fact been made to him, and accepting full responsibility for the inadvertent omission which had occurred. He not only expressed his regret to the Queen's Proctor and the Law Society and accepted the responsibility for it, but he repeated this in the witness-box and expressed a desire on behalf of his firm to pay the costs occasioned by this summons, including those of the Queen's Proctor.

Douglas Lowe for the wife.
Colin Duncan for the Queen's Proctor supported the summons.

The case cited in argument is referred to in the judgment.

COLLINGWOOD J. stated the facts substantially as set out above and continued: Mr. Colin Duncan has appeared on behalf of the Queen's Proctor, and I think I am right in saying that not only did he not oppose this application but he gave it wholehearted support.

I have been referred to Gill v. Gill,[1] which was a similar application, being a summons taken out in the same form. But in that case Karminski J. dismissed the summons. In Gill v. Gill[1] the Queen's Proctor resisted the summons, but here, as I have said, counsel for the Queen's Proctor has supported it. In the case before Karminski J. the Queen's Proctor had had no opportunity of making any inquiries at all; here the Queen's Proctor has had the opportunity of making the fullest inquiries, and has in fact made those inquiries as a result of the communication of the facts. Not only that, but he has done what there was no opportunity of doing, as was pointed out by my brother in Gill v. Gill,[1] that is to say, he has consulted the Attorney-General as to what steps he wished to take, and the Attorney-General has intimated that he desires to take no step in the matter himself. Moreover, a portion of the communication from the Attorney-General has been read by Mr. Colin Duncan, and in that document it appears that the Attorney-General himself suggested that the wife should take out the present summons in the form in which it was taken out in Gill v. Gill.[1]

I need hardly say that I respectfully agree with everything that was said by Karminski J. in Gill v. Gill[1] as to what is the proper and more usual course to take in circumstances such as these, and that it is only in an exceptional case that there should be any deviation from that procedure. Here the Queen's Proctor agrees that it is an exceptional case, and clearly, from the attitude taken by the Attorney-General, he agrees with that view. The inquiries which have been made by the Queen's Proctor include inquiries with regard to the husband himself and his conduct, and I am quite satisfied that the wife's adultery had no bearing whatever upon the desertion by her husband in September, 1946.

Therefore, I am prepared to accede to the application and grant leave to amend the petition, without the necessity for re-service, by the inclusion therein of a prayer for the exercise of the discretion of the court. I further give leave to the wife to file the discretion statement which she put in today. I also exercise my discretion in her favour in respect of her adultery.

I am asked to grant a decree absolute. I think that the proper course to adopt would be not to grant a decree absolute, but to give leave to the wife to apply in the usual course for the decree to be made absolute.

Leave to amend petition.

Husband and Wife—Marriage—Declaration of validity—Power of court to make—R.S.C., Ord. 25, r. 5.

The husband had lived with another woman abroad prior to his marriage in 1948 in England. Doubts having been raised by the Home Office upon his being granted in 1957 a certificate of naturalisation, he applied under R.S.C., Ord. 25, r. 5, for a declaration that the marriage was valid:—

Held, that the court had power to make a declaration of validity, and that upon the evidence such a declaration should be made.

PETITION FOR A DECLARATION.

The husband was born in Poland in 1898 and in 1932 he began to live with a widow in that country; but they never went through a ceremony of marriage. In 1939 both were deported to Russia; and in 1941 the husband was released for service in the Polish Forces. He obtained the woman's release from a forced labour camp in Russia by making a false declaration to the Polish Army authorities that she was his wife; but she never joined him thereafter. In December, 1947, his records in the Polish Record Office of the Polish Resettlement Corps were changed to show him a single and not a married man. He acquired a domicile of choice in this country and went through a ceremony of marriage at the Chelsea Register Office on August 7, 1948.

In August, 1957, he was granted a certificate of naturalisation in England; but the Home Office refused to register the woman with whom he had gone through a ceremony of marriage on the ground that she was not his lawful wife as he had at the time been married to the other woman. He accordingly petitioned for a declaration that the marriage in 1948 was a valid marriage. It appeared that there had been some misunderstanding when a police officer, who was called in these proceedings after an adjournment to allow the Home Office to be represented, spoke to the husband, who had difficulty with the English language, at the time of the application for naturalisation and registration.

Har-Shefi v. Har-Shefi [1] was referred to in argument.

MR. COMMISSIONER EDGEDALE Q.C. I thought that the husband was telling the truth, and a consistent story. The detective who gave evidence got the impression that the husband was telling him that he did go through a civil marriage in 1932, but he has frankly explained to me that it is possible that there was some misunderstanding, because when the husband was speaking in English I found him almost unintelligible.

In those circumstances I am asked to declare that this marriage is valid. I am satisfied that I have got power to make such a declaration and I do make that declaration.

Husband and Wife—Justices—Submission of no case—Submission upheld — Appeal — Rehearing ordered — Right of husband to call evidence at rehearing.

Husband and Wife—Justices—Public interest in proceedings—Election to call no evidence—Whether evidence may be called at rehearing.

A wife's appeal against a decision of the magistrates that there was no case for her husband, who had elected to call no evidence, to answer, was successful, and a rehearing was ordered:—

Held, that, since the overriding consideration in matrimonial cases was the effect of a decision upon status, the husband should be allowed, notwithstanding his election at the first hearing to call no evidence, to give such explanations as might be open to him at the rehearing.

Dicta in Preston-Jones v. Preston-Jones [1951] A.C. 391, 401, 417; [1951] 1 T.L.R. 8; [1951] 1 All E.R. 124, H.L. applied.

APPEAL from the Bristol magistrates.

The wife had made a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895–1949, that her husband had been guilty of adultery with a woman unknown at a place unknown. At the hearing a submission had been made on behalf of the husband that there was no case for him to answer, and his representative had elected to stand on his submission and to call no evidence.

The magistrates upheld the submission and dismissed the complaint. The wife appealed.

The case is reported solely upon the question whether the husband should be allowed to call evidence at the rehearing, which was ordered by the Divisional Court, in spite of the earlier submission of no case to answer.

Holroyd Pearce for the wife.

J. A. Cox for the husband.

LORD MERRIMAN P. I have come to the conclusion that the decision was wrong. In circumstances like the present it would

1960

v.
HORTON.

Lord Merriman P.

be open to us to find, not only that the submission and the ruling that there was no prima facie case were wrong, but also that the magistrates ought to have made an order on the evidence before them and that we, therefore, ought to make an order on it. Although that would be a possible conclusion, I, for my part, think that it is better that the case should be sent back for a rehearing, and I think that the reason for that will become apparent as I discuss the details.

In particular, I am influenced by the fact that only last week we resisted a submission [1] that where an election and a decision to stand on it had been made, we could not send the case back, but must deal with it ourselves because, if we sent it back, the election to give no evidence would still stand and the husband would be barred from giving any evidence at all. I do not take that view, and, indeed, we expressly declined to take it in that particular case, because the overriding consideration in these matrimonial matters is that we are dealing with status. I do not need to refer to authority about it, but in one of the cases that has been cited to us, Preston-Jones v. Preston-Jones,[2] concerning the onus of proof, Lord MacDermott [3] with whom Lord Simonds agreed,[4] emphasised the point that these cases deal with questions of status in which the public—the unseen third party, as the public has sometimes been called—has a very great interest. For that reason alone I should be against any attempt to shut out the husband, who made this sumbission and elected to stand on it, from giving any of the explanations which may be open to him to give on the rehearing. I realise that when one orders a rehearing in these cases it does give both sides a chance to improve their case, and there may be (though I am not going to point them out) places in which the wife could dot the i's and cross the t's in the evidence which she produced, and there would be nothing to stop her from doing so. Similarly, it may be open to the husband to give such explanation as he can of the circumstances.

[His Lordship then considered the evidence and held that the wife had established a case which the husband should have been called upon to answer.]

COLLINGWOOD J. concurred.

Landlord and Tenant—Business Premises (security of tenure)—Discovery—Landlords' intention to demolish or reconstruct—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954 (2 & 3 Eliz. 2, c. 56), s. 30 (1) (f).

Practice—Discovery—Originating summons—Landlord and tenant—Application for a new lease — Affidavit evidence — Summons adjourned for trial on affidavit and oral evidence—Whether tenants entitled to discovery.

Landlords served a notice under section 30 of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954,[1] determining a tenancy of business premises, and stated in the notice that they would oppose any application for a new tenancy on the ground that they intended to demolish or reconstruct the whole of the premises and could not reasonably do so without obtaining possession. The tenants served a counter-notice under the Act stating that they were unwilling to give up possession, and applied to the court by originating summons for the grant of a new tenancy.

The tenants filed an affidavit stating that they did not admit that the landlords had the requisite intention to demolish or reconstruct the premises on the termination of their tenancy, and the master adjourned the originating summons into court to be tried on cross-examination of the deponents on their affidavits and on oral evidence in chief to be cross-examined to.

The tenants applied by summons for further directions asking for discovery of a large number of documents.

Buckley J. ordered discovery of documents bearing upon the question whether the landlords had a firm and settled intention to carry out the project. On appeal from that decision:—

Held, that an order for discovery on an originating summons was only made in very special circumstances, and there were none in the present case which would justify such an order.

Wine Shippers (London) Ltd. v. Bath House Syndicate Ltd.

Act, 1954, to tenants, Wine Shippers (London) Ltd., determining their tenancy of premises known as 83, Piccadilly, London, W.1, on March 31, 1960: the notice stated that the landlords would oppose an application to the court under Part II of the Act for a new tenancy on the ground open to them under section 30 (1) (f), that, on the termination of the current tenancy, they intended to demolish or reconstruct the whole of the premises, and that they could not reasonably do so without obtaining possession of the premises.

On November 24, 1959, the tenants served a counter-notice under the Act, stating that they were unwilling to give up possession of the premises on March 31, 1960, and on January 27, 1960, they applied by originating summons under the Act for the grant of a new tenancy. In their affidavit in support of the originating summons they set out proposals for the new lease.

The landlords filed an affidavit by one Maurice Wohl, stating that the landlord company was entitled to the reversion immediately expectant on the applicant tenants' lease, and was entitled also to the reversion of the adjoining premises, Nos. 82 and 84, Piccadilly; that the landlord company was formed with the intention and for the purpose of carrying out the redevelopment of the properties facing Piccadilly between Bolton Street and Clarges Street; that they had instructed architects to prepare plans and act on their behalf in obtaining all necessary permissions to enable the proposed redevelopment to be carried out, and that application had been made to the London County Council for town planning permission, and the permission obtained from the council was exhibited to the affidavit. That permission was for the erection of an office, showroom and residential building on the site of 82, 83 and 84, Piccadilly, subject to certain conditions: the first condition was: "The submission to, and approval by, the council "before any building work is commenced, of details of the "external facing materials to be used on the infilling panels "between the windows, and the type of rendering proposed for "the roof structure on the Bolton Street block," and the second condition was: "No works (including works of demolition) being "commenced (sic) unless and until the developers have acquired "and are to the satisfaction of the council in possession of the "necessary interests in 83 and 84, Piccadilly to ensure that they "are able to proceed with the entire development and that no "part of Bath House"—Bath House was 82, Piccadilly—"shall "be demolished until the aforementioned properties have been "demolished." The reasons given for imposing these conditions include: "To ensure that the whole of the site, particularly the "frontage to Piccadilly between Clarges Street and Bolton Street, "shall be treated comprehensively and in such a way as may "justify the demolition of Bath House."

The deponent further stated that the architects had proceeded with preparing the necessary agreements for the demolition of No. 83, and there was exhibited a letter from the architects to the landlord company setting out the steps which were being taken to procure the carrying out of the demolition and eventual reconstruction of No. 83. Owing, however, to the interposition of the proceedings by originating summons the programme originally contemplated was already running a little behind time.

The tenants, in answer, put in evidence an affidavit in which they stated, among other things: "The applicant company does "not admit that the respondent company has the requisite inten-"tion to demolish or reconstruct the said premises on the "termination of the applicant company's current tenancy." The master adjourned the originating summons into court to be tried on cross-examination of the deponents on their affidavits and on oral evidence in chief and cross-examination.

On April 12, 1960, the tenants applied by summons asking that the following further directions be given in the proceedings by originating summons: 1. That the landlords within 14 days file an affidavit of the documents which were or had been in their possession or power relating to the following matters: (a) Planning permissions, building and by-law consents for the proposed demolition and/or the proposed reconstruction of the three properties, Nos. 82, 83 and 84, Piccadilly, and each of them in force or in respect of which application was being made or was required or was required by the appropriate authority to be made together with all correspondence in connection with any such application; (b) agreements or contracts for the proposed demolition and/or tenders, agreements or contracts for the proposed reconstruction of the three properties, and each of them together with all correspondence in connection with any proposed agreement or contract for any such purposes; (c) the financial position of the landlords to meet the expenditure involved in the proposed demolition and the proposed reconstruction, being balance-sheets and profit and loss accounts for the last two accounting years of the landlords for which accounts had been completed, together with any agreements entered into between the landlords and any other party for the provision of finance in connection with the proposed demolition or reconstruction; and (d) (i) the respective interests of the various occupiers of No. 84, Piccadilly and (ii) the steps taken by the landlords to determine each such interest together with all correspondence in connection therewith. 2. That there be inspection of documents by the tenants within 14 days of the filing of that affidavit. 3. That such further or other directions be given as the court might deem to be fit and proper in the circumstances. In support of the application the tenants filed a further affidavit drawing attention to a number of matters as to which they said they had no knowledge, and in relation to which they sought discovery.

HODSON L.J. stated the facts and continued: The judge made an order for discovery, and it is against that order that the landlords have appealed. If the matter had been res integra, I, for my part, should have approached this case upon the footing that it was obviously a matter in the discretion of the judge, with which this court could not be expected to interfere. There being a question between the parties, inter alia, as to the intention of the landlords and whether theirs was a firm and settled intention to carry out their project, that was a matter for the landlords to establish and one which the tenants were anxious to dispute. But the matter is not res integra, and it is (as the judge recognised) governed by authority.

This procedure by originating summons, unlike proceedings in an action, is designed to deal rapidly and simply with a number of matters—usually matters which arise in the Chancery Division, and this originating summons was issued in the Chancery Division. There are no rules dealing with discovery in matters raised by originating summons; and there is authority which is binding on this court to the effect that, although there is a discretion to make orders for discovery in these cases, that discretion will only be exercised in special circumstances. The authority, which is that of Lord Greene, is taken from In re Borthwick.[1] The words of the judgment which are relied upon are these[2]: "The view that Roxburgh J. took, and, I think, rightly took, was "that discovery in proceedings in the Chancery Division by "originating summons ought only to be ordered in very special "cases where the facts are such as to justify such an order being "made." I should explain that the Borthwick case[3] was not a matter arising under the Landlord and Tenant Act but under the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, which had not very long been in operation, and which had annexed to it, as it were, special rules in R.S.C., Ord. 54F, one of which, rule 9, provides: "The court or a judge may require evidence in regard "to any matter which the court or a judge considers to be "relevant to the application and may direct any party to the "proceedings or any person on whom notice of the proceedings "has been served to attend on the hearing of the application and "give evidence orally or to be cross-examined on any affidavit "made by him." Roxburgh J., who refused to make an order for discovery in that case, based himself not on the narrow ground that in proceedings under the Inheritance Act and the rules made thereunder discovery could not ordinarily be ordered, but on the broad ground which was accepted by the Court of Appeal, as shown by the judgment of Lord Greene, with whom the other member of the court, Asquith L.J. agreed.

I think that it is to be taken to be the rule, at any rate in the Chancery Division, where proceedings are taken by originating summons, that discovery will not be ordered except in what are described as [4] "very special cases where the facts are such as "to justify such order being made." It may be that matters have changed since the originating summons was first thought of and that in modern light and in the complexity of modern litigation it may well be desirable that discovery should be ordered in all cases where the judge in his discretion thought fit. That is a matter for consideration by the Rules Committee; and we here are aware that there is in existence a report [Report of the Committee on Chancery Chambers and Chancery Registrars' Office (Cmnd. 967)], for which one member of this court is responsible, which indeed made recommendations on this particular subject, but those recommendations have not yet been adopted, and we have to administer the law and practice as it is laid down by authority; otherwise, indeed—apart from the fact that it is our duty to do so—we should create great confusion.

The judge did not purport to do other than to follow the decision of the Court of Appeal in In re Borthwick,[5] but he felt able to make the order for discovery in this case upon consideration of what had taken place before the Master when the matter came before him because (as I read from the headnote [6]) the Master thought it would be a convenient course to adjourn the originating summons into court to be tried on oral evidence not merely on cross-examination of deponents upon their affidavits but on evidence to be given orally in chief and cross-examined to in the ordinary way. The judge felt himself able to say that that was a peculiar position and came within the heading of [7] "very special cases where the facts are such "as to justify such an order being made." He said in part of his judgment [8]: "The issues have not been defined in "pleadings, and although they may be capable of being "inferred from the affidavits which have been filed, I do not "think that it would be right to say that they have been "defined by those affidavits. On the other hand, the evidence "so far filed is not anything like the whole evidence which it "will be necessary for the parties to adduce at the trial."

I may say that he accepted the submission made by Mr. Harman on behalf of the landlords that the nature of the proceedings themselves cannot be special circumstances but there must be some circumstances peculiar to the particular case. So far as I can see, there were no special circumstances in this case which in themselves differ from those in other cases; and the mere fact that the evidence before the Master was incomplete and that the matter was directed to be tried by oral evidence does not make it in any sense a special case of very special facts.

But Mr. Sophian does not only depend upon that. He says that this is one of those cases where, within the Borthwick [9] principle (as he described it), discovery ought to be ordered because (he says, and he emphasises this) there is real doubt as to the landlords' case. I think that that submission cannot be accepted as a ground in this case for making an order for discovery. The position which the tenants have taken up is that they do not know anything about the landlords' financial position, anything about the arrangements which have been made with regard to disposal of the tenants in other buildings in the same block, and although they have seen the planning permission they say that it is conditional and unsatisfactory. The judge took the view that the evidence before the court when it is given orally ought to be properly tested and that in order to enable it to be properly tested he thought it right that the tenants should have an opportunity of subjecting the deponents to cross-examination.

Lord Greene said in the Borthwick case [10]: "The plaintiffs, "however, have not put forward a single shred of fact or a single "suggestion casting doubt on the fairness or accuracy of the "executors' evidence on the subject of value. Indeed, their "complaint is this: 'We cannot do that without some materials "'and the reason why we want discovery is to enable us to test "'what the executors have said and to see whether or not we can "'find something on which to attack their estimate.' In ordinary "litigation, of course, the ordinary rules of discovery enable liti-"gants to conduct such an examination, but this is a very special "jurisdiction under a very special Act. . . ." He went on [11]: "The judge has ample power, if he is not satisfied or if he thinks "there is a reasonable ground for doubting the accuracy of such "an estimate as this, to require further evidence on the point, "to summon the executors before him, to put questions to them "and to subject them to cross-examination." He is dealing there with the language of rule 9 of Order 54F, which I have read. "If he thought that was the proper course and if the matter "was a matter of doubt or if suspicion was aroused, that no "doubt would be the course that he would take." Then he went on to deal with the facts of the particular case; but in his judgment he lends no support to the view that an application for discovery ought to be acceded to merely in order to arm the applicants with material for cross-examination.

In this case there was no material put before the court to form the foundation for any doubts as to any of the matters referred to. All that the tenants were able to do was to express ignorance. I mention that because reference has been made to a decision of Danckwerts J. in In re St. Martin's Theatre,[12] where there were special circumstances. The judge does not in terms refer to the Borthwick case[13] in his judgment, although it was cited to him in argument as justifying an order for discovery being made against the tenants because on a report by the official referee it was shown that dilapidations for which the tenants were liable amounted to some £16,000 and in those circumstances he felt justified in making an order (which I regard as an order made in very special circumstances having regard to the facts of the case) for discovery against the tenants.

But the rule itself must necessarily apply just as much in proceedings instituted under the Landlord and Tenant Act as in any other proceedings commenced by originating summons; and, as the judge did, I also reject the argument that the Borthwick case[14] has no application to any other subject-matter than an originating summons issued under the Inheritance Act. The ground which the court stood upon was a wider ground than that: it was expressed quite clearly to be a ground applicable to an originating summons. In those circumstances I think that this court has no alternative but to allow this appeal.

The evidence before the judge has been supplemented, by leave today without opposition on the part of the landlords, in the form of an affidavit by a clerk in the employment of the solicitors for the applicants, which has shown that they have inspected at Bush House the file of the landlords; some information is given as to the capital of the company such as would be expected to appear on the register; and there is a description of the mortgages and charges. That information, of course, could have been obtained by the tenants at any time. It has provoked in answer a letter (which is later in date than the judgment of the judge) written to the representative of the landlords from an insurance company showing the arrangement which has been tentatively reached between the insurance company and the landlords for providing building finance. That is the only additional evidence which has been put before us.

I do not think it is necessary for me to go through the order which the judge has made. He recognised that a summons for discovery could not be at large, as in cases where issues have been defined by pleadings and discovery has to be given touching all the matters in issue between the parties; and with the assistance of counsel an order for limited discovery was made. It is quite clear that, the proceedings being by originating summons, where issues are not clearly defined by pleadings, unless points of claim and of defence are ordered, it must necessarily be that a special order for discovery is made and not one in the widest form. But since the parties have not had any difficulty in agreeing the form of discovery order which would be appropriate in such a case as this, there seems to be no point in my going through the details of it.

The tenants, in support of their argument, have in addition referred to the practice in the county court as it was under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, and pointed out that in the county court where the premises were within the county court jurisdiction the proceedings there taken out, involving an original application and an answer to that application, opened the way to an application for discovery as a matter of common form. That may be a recommendation in support of the argument that the position should be the same in the High Court. But proceedings in the High Court are not always regulated in the same way as proceedings in the county court, and we have to take proceedings in the High Court as we find them. Even if other counsels may prevail in future, it seems to me that at present this court is bound, following the Borthwick case,[15] to come to the conclusion that here there was really no material on which to find that the exception—that is, the very special case "where the facts "are such as to justify an order being made"—has been established.

For those reasons I would allow the appeal.

Ormerod L.J. I agree; and although we are differing from the judge there is nothing I wish to add.

Harman L.J. I agree, but with reluctance. It seems to me that in cases involving questions of fact of this sort discovery should go as a matter of ordinary discretion. It further seems to me that the present case and the last one that we heard in this court, Metropolitan Storage & Trading Co. Ltd. v. Michael Nairn & Co. Ltd.,[16] both under the Act of 1954, do show that R.S.C., Ord. 53d regulating procedure under that Act is in need of attention. But as matters stand I do not feel we are at liberty to do anything but allow the appeal.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL OF NEW ZEALAND.

Libel and Slander—Newspaper—Republication—Innuendo—Onus of proof—Alleged misdirection.
New Zealand—Libel.

In the course of an article calling for an inquiry into the issue in New Zealand of import licences a newspaper stated that a man had seen one J., to whom an import licence had been issued, with the object of getting information from him about import procedure, and that J. had told him to "see Phil and Phil would fix it . . . "By 'Phil' his caller understood him to mean the Hon. Philip "North Holloway, the Minister of Industries and Commerce." The minister thereupon brought this action for libel against the newspaper, pleading an innuendo—that the words meant that he "was a person who has acted and is prepared to act dishonourably "in connection with the issue of import licences." Damages having been awarded against the defendant newspaper, it appealed on the ground that there had been misdirection by the trial judge:—

Held, (1) that there was nothing wrong in the judge's direction to the jury that "on the question of whether the passage that is "complained of bears the meaning that the plaintiff alleges that "it bears, the fact that the newspaper might have been calling "for a general inquiry has no bearing at all."

(2) Nor was there anything wrong with the direction that "it "is not a defence at all that a statement that might be defamatory "is put forward by way of report only . . . The case is properly "to be dealt with as if the defendant itself said 'See Phil and "'Phil would fix it.'" Every republication of a libel is a new libel, and each publisher is answerable for his act to the same extent as if the calumny originated with him.

The judge was right in directing the jury "that it should be "established by the plaintiff that the words bear the meaning "alleged by him" and that no lesser meaning would suffice. If the jury had thought that the words conveyed, not an imputation of guilt, but only of suspicion, the plaintiff would have failed to prove his innuendo.

Mountney v. Watton (1831) 2 B. & Ad. 673, 678; Simmons v. Mitchell (1880) 6 App.Cas. 156, P.C. applied.

There had been no misdirection, but even if there had been, the summing-up as a whole provided the jury with a fair guide. "A summing-up is not to be rigorously criticised; and it would not "be right to set aside the verdict of a jury, because in the course "of a long and elaborate summing-up the judge has used inaccurate "language."

Clark v. Molyneaux (1877) 3 Q.B.D. 237, 243 applied.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal of New Zealand affirmed.

APPEAL (No. 15 of 1960) from a judgment of the Court of Appeal of New Zealand (November 16, 1959) dismissing an appeal from a judgment of Hutchison A.C.J. in the Supreme Court (July 23, 1959).

The following facts are taken from the judgment of the Judicial Committee: On March 24, 1959, a weekly newspaper in New Zealand called "N.Z. Truth" published an article which contained a reference to the Hon. Philip North Holloway, the Minister of Industries and Commerce. On April 24, 1959, Mr. Holloway brought an action for libel against the newspaper in respect of a passage in this article. He pleaded that it bore an innuendo which was defamatory of him. The newspaper denied that it bore this innuendo. It also pleaded that the occasion was privileged. The case was tried in the Supreme Court of New Zealand between June 2 and 8, 1959, before Hutchison A.C.J. and a common jury. The jury gave a verdict in favour of Mr. Holloway and assessed the damages at £11,000. Despite this verdict, the newspaper moved Hutchison A.C.J. for judgment in its favour on the ground that the occasion was privileged: or, alternatively, for a new trial on the ground that the judge had misdirected the jury. The judge ruled that the occasion was not privileged. He refused the motion for a new trial and on July 23, 1959, he ordered judgment to be entered for Mr. Holloway for £11,000. The newspaper appealed to the Court of Appeal of New Zealand (Gresson P., North and Cleary JJ.), who heard the appeal between September 21 and 24, 1959. On November 16, 1959, the Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal. The newspaper now appealed to Her Majesty in Council.

The newspaper did not raise before the Board many of the issues which had been debated in the court of New Zealand. It did not challenge the ruling that the occasion was not privileged. It confined itself to the contention that the judge had misdirected the jury and sought a new trial on that ground. In order to explain this contention the material facts and pleadings must be set out.

On March 24, 1959, the newspaper published an article calling for an inquiry into the activities of one Harry Judd, whose real name, it said, was Hyman Yudt. He was said to be a Russian by birth but had taken British nationality. The article was headed in bold letters: "This Ex-Russian's Import Licences should "be investigated." It started with the opening words: "The "Government should take immediate steps to hold a full, "searching and impartial inquiry into import and other dealings "between an Auckland importer of Czechoslovakian glass, one "Harry Judd, of 160 Upland Road, Remuera, and Mr. Warren "Freer, M.P. . . ." And it finished with the concluding words: "In Truth's view the New Zealand Labour Government should "show itself no less meticulous in preventing any suspicion of "under-the-counter dealings with Parliamentarians than did the "British Labour Government when it dealt with Sidney Stanley."

So the article opened and finished with a call for an inquiry. In the course of the article the newspaper described an interview with Mr. Judd. It was the description given of this interview which was said to be a libel on Mr. Holloway. The words complained of were as follows:

"He [Mr. Judd] told a man who approached him some time "subsequently about import procedure that he was 'sick of "'things here' and that '25,000 smackers had just gone like "'that.'

"He [Mr. Judd] gave the impression that there was nothing "doing (in the import field) for him any longer. He told the "caller that he had come too late, that there was 'no use "'talking' and that the Prime Minister, Mr. Nash, had put "his foot down.

"At a subsequent discussion with the same man, the discon-"solate Judd told his caller to 'see Phil and Phil would fix it.' "He warned him, whatever he did, not to let Mr. Nash hear "about it.

"By 'Phil' his caller understood him to mean the Hon. "Philip North Holloway, the Minister of Industries and "Commerce."

It was not suggested at the trial that those words, when taken in their natural and ordinary meaning, were defamatory of Mr. Holloway: but it was said that there was an innuendo which was defamatory of him. The innuendo was pleaded in the statement of claim in this way:

"By the said words the defendant meant and was understood "to mean that the plaintiff is and was a person who has acted and "is prepared to act dishonourably in connection with the issue of "import licences."

In answer to a request for particulars of the facts and matters relied upon in support of the innuendo, the plaintiff said he relied "on the fact that the words 'see Phil and Phil would fix it,' "in the context in which the said words were used, were capable "of being understood and were understood in a sense defamatory "of the plaintiff, more particularly in that the word 'fix' was "used in the said context in a secondary or colloquial meaning,

"connoting irregular and dishonourable conduct on the part of "the plaintiff in connection with the issue of import licences."

The following cases, in addition to those referred to in the judgment, were cited in argument: Stubbs Ltd. v. Russell[1]; Braddock v. Bevins[2]; Dakhyl v. Labouchere[3]; Turner v. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Pictures Ltd.[4]

July 26. The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by LORD DENNING, who stated the facts set out above and continued: It was, of course, entirely a question for the jury whether the words bore the innuendo which the plaintiff alleged they did: but the jury had to be warned that no lesser meaning would suffice. And the judge gave them that warning. He said to them: "When he [the plaintiff] alleges a special defamatory "sense, he is bound by that special sense, or innuendo as we "call it, and nothing short of that will suffice . . . if he does not "succeed in showing that the words to the ordinary reader would "mean that the plaintiff is and was a person who has acted and "is prepared to act dishonourably in connection with the issue "of import licences, then the plaintiff will fail. He sets up that "meaning and it is on that meaning that he takes his stand."

No exception was taken to that direction, which was clearly right and, indeed, favourable to the defence. Once the plaintiff had acknowledged that the words were not defamatory of him when taken in their natural and ordinary meaning, then it was absolutely incumbent on him to prove they bore the meaning alleged in the innuendo. If he only proved a lesser meaning, he would fail. A good illustration was given in the course of the argument. The innuendo in this case imputed that the plaintiff "has acted and is prepared to act dishonourably." That is an imputation of guilt. If the jury thought that the words conveyed, not an imputation of guilt, but only of suspicion, the plaintiff would fail to prove his innuendo, with the result that he would fail in his action, see Mountney v. Watton,[1] by Lord Tenterden C J.; Simmons v. Mitchell.[2] The reason is this: If the plaintiff had by his innuendo said the words only imputed suspicion, it would be open to the defendant to plead justification if it had sufficient evidence at its disposal to warrant suspicion: but as the plaintiff says that the words impute guilt, the defendant cannot justify that meaning unless it has sufficient evidence to prove guilt, which is, of course, a higher burden than proving suspicion. So as matter of pleading, in order not to put the defendant to any disadvantage, the plaintiff is pinned to his innuendo.

Their Lordships notice, however, that this distinction between guilt and suspicion which was taken so clearly before them, was not pressed before the jury: and they think they can understand why. The jury would not be likely to view with favour defendants who came into court saying: "We did not say he was actually "guilty of dishonourable conduct. Our words only meant that "he was suspected of it." It is defamatory to say of a man that he is suspected of dishonourable conduct. The defendants would, by imputing suspicion, be willing to wound, and yet afraid to strike—an attitude which a New Zealand jury would like no better than an English jury.

The case which the defendants put before a jury was rather different. They said that the words bore a lesser meaning than that alleged in the inuendo. In looking to see what that lesser meaning was, their Lordships find it succinctly expressed in the words of Mr. Cooke when he addressed the judge at the end of the summing-up: "If the jury thought that the meaning was, "in view of Judd's remarks, that an inquiry should include the "question whether or not the plaintiff has acted dishonourably "in connection with import licences—if they thought the words "bore that lesser meaning, a different meaning from the one "assigned by the plaintiff, then the defendant would be entitled "to a verdict."

There was some question as to the exact answer given by the judge, but it may for present purposes be accepted to be as follows. The judge said: "I do not wish to add anything to "what I have already said on that matter. I have told the jury "that it should be established by the plaintiff that the words "bear the meaning alleged by him and I want to leave it at that."

Their Lordships find it a little difficult to understand quite what Mr. Cooke was contending the words did mean: but he stressed the importance to his case of the call for an inquiry; and their Lordships can only conclude that, according to the defendants, the words meant this: "We call for an inquiry "because, amongst other things, Mr. Judd has made remarks "about Mr. Holloway. And we say that, in view of his remarks, "the inquiry should include the question whether Mr. Holloway "has acted dishonourably." But their Lordships would observe that this does nothing to elucidate what Judd's remarks did mean: and this is the crux of the case.

Their Lordships have no doubt that Mr. Cooke put before the jury the lesser meaning for which he contended: and it is plain that the jury rejected it. They held that the words did bear the innuendo alleged by the plaintiff and they awarded £11,000 damages. That being so, the defendants have no hope of upsetting this award unless they can show a misdirection by the judge on an important ground. Mr. Cooke originally complained of eleven passages in the summing-up which he said were misdirections, but when the case reached their Lordships, the passages were reduced to three. The first of these was this: "(d) Directing the jury that on the question whether the passage "complained of bore the meaning alleged by the plaintiff the "fact that the newspaper might have been asking for a general "inquiry had no bearing at all." The words actually used by the judge to the jury were these: "For your purposes, on the "question as to whether the passage was defamatory, in my "direction to you, the fact that the paper was calling for a "general inquiry is not an answer on the question whether "the passage was defamatory. That fact that it was so calling "may be a circumstance to be considered on the question of "damages if you come to the question of damages, but I will "mention that later, but my direction to you is that, on the "question of whether the passage that is complained of bears "the meaning that the plaintiff alleges that it bears, the fact "that the newspaper might have been calling for a general "inquiry, has no bearing at all."

v.

Their Lordships see nothing wrong in that direction. If a newspaper says: "We call for an inquiry because a man called "Judd has made such and such remarks about Mr. Holloway," and you want to know what the newspaper is talking about, you have to know what Judd's remarks were. To get at the meaning of the passage, the jury have to see what remarks were attributed to Judd and then ask themselves what those words mean. If Judd had said that the Minister was "bungling" or "imprudent," there might still be a call for inquiry. If he had said that the Minister was "suspected" of dishonourable conduct, a call for inquiry might be made just the same. In any case the call for an inquiry does not help.

The second of the alleged misdirections was this: "(e) Direct-"ing the jury that the case was properly to be dealt with as if "the defendant itself had said: 'See Phil and Phil would fix it.'" The words actually used by the judge to the jury were these: "If you accept that those words were spoken by Judd, it is "not a defence at all that a statement that might be defamatory "is put forward by way of report only. It does not help the "defendant that the way that it is put is that Judd said 'See "'Phil and Phil would fix it.' The case is properly to be dealt "with as if the defendant itself said 'See Phil and Phil would "'fix it.'"

Their Lordships see nothing wrong in this direction. It is nothing more nor less than a statement of settled law put cogently to the jury. Gatley opens his chapter on Republication and Repetition with the quotation: "Every republication of a "libel is a new libel, and each publisher is answerable for his "act to the same extent as if the calumny originated with him."

see Gatley on Libel and Slander, 4th ed., p. 106. This case is a good instance of the justice of this rule. If Judd did use the words attributed to him, it might be a slander by Judd of Mr. Holloway in the way of his office as a Minister of the Crown. But if the words had not been repeated by the newspaper, the damage done by Judd would be as nothing compared to the damage done by this newspaper when it repeated it. It broadcast the statement to the people at large: and it made it worse by making it one of the grounds on which it called for an inquiry, for thereby it suggested that some credence was to be given to it.

The third of the misdirections alleged is this: "(f) Directing "the jury that they should find for the defendant if they thought "that the words sued on did not mean what was alleged by the "plaintiff, but might mean something less than that, that the "Minister was bungling or incompetent or something of that sort, "but refraining from specifically directing the jury upon request "that they should find for the defendant if they thought the "meaning was that, in view of Judd's remarks, an inquiry should "include the question whether or not the plaintiff had acted "dishonourably in connection with import licences."

Their Lordships have referred to this request earlier: and they find no fault in the answer the judge gave to it. It is difficult to know what meaning the defendants were seeking to put on the words complained of. The request by counsel did nothing to elucidate the meaning of "Judd's remarks" on which the whole case turned. The judge gave the right answer when he declined to embark on a course so confusing to the jury. He said: "I have told the jury that it should be established by the "plaintiff that the words bear the meaning alleged by him and I "want to leave it at that." That was short, simple and correct.

Their Lordships are therefore of opinion that there was no misdirection: and they think that Hutchison A.C.J. was right in refusing the motion for a new trial.

The Court of Appeal seem to have thought that there may have been a misdirection in directing the jury that the call for an inquiry had no bearing: but they dismissed the appeal on the ground that the summing-up considered as a whole provided the jury with a fair guide when they came to consider their verdict. Their Lordships think there was no misdirection. But if there had been, they would unhesitatingly affirm the view of the Court of Appeal. It has been well said that "a summing-up "is not to be rigorously criticised; and it would not be right to "set aside the verdict of a jury, because in the course of a long "and elaborate summing-up the judge has used inaccurate "language," see Clark v. Molyneaux,[3] by Bramwell L.J.

The issues in this case were fairly and properly left to the

* DAVIES v. DAVIES.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Costs—Statement taken by petitioner's solicitor from respondent—Costs incurred excluded by commissioner—Whether wrongly excluded.

Solicitor—Discipline—Jurisdiction of court—Deprivation of costs—Inapt in case of alleged professional misconduct.

The costs incurred by a solicitor acting in a divorce suit for a wife petitioner in taking a statement from the husband which contained a confession of adultery was disallowed by the commissioner on the ground of his disapproval of solicitors taking such statements, which he thought should be taken by inquiry agents:—

Held, that it was not a proper exercise by the commissioner of his discretion to exclude costs because the evidence had been obtained in a particular way; any question of professional misconduct was a question for the Law Society and in the circumstances the costs were wrongly excluded (post, p. 1006).

Per Willmer L.J. It was impossible to say that in all circumstances such a practice was either right or wrong; every case had to be judged on its own particular facts (post, p. 1008).

Per Devlin L.J. The object of the commissioner's order was to penalise the solicitor for having acted in a way which, in the commissioner's view, was improper, and although the commissioner had power under R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 11, or under the inherent jurisdiction of the court to make such an order, there was here no question of these costs having proved fruitless, and there was, therefore, no power under the rule or under the inherent jurisdiction to make it and it was misconceived. In the absence of a clear practice, a solicitor was entitled to use his own judgment.

APPEAL from Judge O. Temple-Morris (sitting as commissioner).

By this appeal the court was asked to set aside that part of an order of the commissioner, whereby he excluded certain items of costs incurred by a solicitor acting for a wife petitioner in a divorce suit in taking a statement from the husband respondent and all expenses connected therewith.

The order in question was made on October 26, 1959, and by it the commissioner pronounced a decree nisi of divorce on an undefended petition on the ground of the adultery of the husband with a woman, service upon whom had been dispensed with; that part of the order stood. The situation had been that on June 23, 1959, the commissioner, not being satisfied as to the absence of collusion, adjourned the matter for the assistance of the Queen's Proctor, who appeared by counsel on October 26, 1959, and said that the Queen's Proctor had made inquiries and proposed to take no further part in the case. On that occasion the husband gave evidence of his own adultery and the decree was pronounced.

The order, so far as relevant, was in the following terms: "... and condemned the respondent [the husband] in the costs "incurred and to be incurred on behalf of the petitioner [the "wife] up to June 23, 1959, in this cause excluding all solicitor's "costs relating to the statement made by the respondent on "September 11, 1958, his attendances upon the respondent, and "the telephone conversation in relation thereto, and the pre-"paration of the affidavit in support of the application for leave "to dispense with service of the petition on the woman named "therein such costs to be taxed as between party and party."

"And it is ordered that the costs of the petitioner excluding "all solicitor's costs relating to the statement made by the "respondent on September 11, 1958, his attendances upon the "respondent, and telephone conversations in relation thereto, "and the preparation of the affidavit in support of the application "for leave to dispense with service of the petition on the woman "named therein, be taxed as between solicitor and client in "accordance with the provisions of the Third Schedule of the "Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949."

C. Trevor Reeve for the wife and for the solicitor.

The husband was not represented and did not appear.

The following case, not referred to in the judgment, was cited in argument: Wagman v. Vare Motors Ltd.[1]

HODSON L.J. stated the facts and said that, so far as the party and party costs involved in this appeal were concerned, leave to appeal was refused and this court could only entertain the appeal, at any rate on that part of the order, on the basis that the judge did not exercise any judicial discretion in dealing with the matter as he did. He continued: The commissioner was concerned, and rightly concerned, to see that justice was done in accordance with the law, which requires him, in an undefended (as in a defended) case, to be satisfied as to the charges which are to be proved, and also to be satisfied as to the absence of collusion. What happened was this. The wife consulted her solicitor and gave instructions. Inferentially it appears from the evidence that the instructions were based upon the supposed fact that the husband had committed adultery. Following upon that, a telephone number which the husband had given to the wife—they were living apart—was given to the solicitor, and the solicitor spoke to the husband on the telephone and obtained an admission from him to the effect that he had committed adultery. This was followed by an interview which the solicitor had with the husband in which, after being warned that anything he said would be used in evidence against him and that he need not say anything, the husband made a statement which was reduced into writing.

On the first day of the trial the only evidence of adultery which was produced was this statement made by a man who clearly on the face of it was importuning his wife for a divorce and anxious that a divorce should be pronounced against him on the ground of adultery. In circumstances of that kind the court is naturally concerned as to the weight of the evidence, because a statement of that kind, unless strongly supported by surrounding circumstances, must necessarily be of little weight. So far as the weight of the evidence is concerned, nothing in the end turned upon that—I do not know if the commissioner had ever been concerned with that aspect of the case—because the husband eventually swore on oath (the previous statement being unsworn) that he had committed adultery, and upon that evidence being accepted the decree was pronounced.

But the commissioner, in depriving the wife of part of the costs, was actuated by the disapproval which he expressed as to the way in which the evidence had been obtained in the first instance, in that the solicitor had communicated with the husband and obtained the statement in the way which I have described, saying in terms that he did not think that was the right thing to do: he had passed it once but when it was repeated he thought it was time to show his disapproval in no uncertain way by disallowance of costs, so that the matter should never be conducted in that way before him in similar cases in the future. He pointed out that there were plenty of inquiry agents, and if that sort of work was to be done it should be done by the inquiry agents.

With all respect to the commissioner, I do not think that in exercise of his duty in trying a case depending upon evidence it was any part of his function to say whether the solicitor as a professional man was acting properly or improperly in behaving as he did. So far as the evidence is concerned, the weight does not vary because the person who obtains a statement is a solicitor—necessarily at any rate—as against the case where similar evidence is obtained by an inquiry agent; and any matter of professional ethics is a matter surely not for the commissioner but for the disciplinary body, namely, the Law Society, which has to do with the professional conduct of solicitors. I do not see that it is a judicial exercise of discretion to deprive the solicitor of any part of the costs because the evidence has been obtained in that particular way.

I will read what the commissioner said, in order to show the way in which it appears that he—with the best intentions in the world—appears to have approached this case. He said: "I have "in the past, for this particular firm, seen Mr. Myer Cohen [the "solicitor involved] go into the witness box and give evidence "that he has interviewed the respondents at his office and I have "not said one single word, and I have granted a decree, because "I thought, when he did so, it was an isolated incident. I saw "him repeat it, I have not said anything; but when I saw that "this was looking as though it was going to be a practice—and "as I again say, no other firm appearing before me has ever "indulged in this practice—then I thought it right, and I still "think it right, to say that in my view it should not be indulged "in as a practice, as in the main it is very highly undesirable."

At the end of his judgment he said: "A judge has autonomy "in his own court in matters of policy as to the methods of proof; "provided always he obeys the laws of the land and follows "decisions of higher courts. I am within the law; I am not "violating any superior decision in saying, in matters of general "policy, what finds favour and disfavour with me; and con-"sequently I said what I had to say and I disallowed those "particular few items of costs. A judge is entitled to state his "preference as to the best ways on matters of presentation of "evidence in the cases before him. He accepts and applies the "standards of proof required by law; it is for him to state how "those standards are to be reached in his court, each case being "decided on its own facts, proved in evidence. It has been my "experience in the past that members of the Bar, and solicitors, "members of the Law Society, have welcomed such assistance "and expressed their appreciation therefor. In my view, Mr. "Myer Cohen is endeavouring to exaggerate incidents into a "crisis, and if he were more amenable to the court's wishes, it "would certainly be more helpful to the administration of this "court."

In my judgment the commissioner has there really confused in his mind two matters, namely, on the one hand the question of admissibility of evidence and the weight to be attributed thereto, and on the other hand the method in which evidence is laid before the court; and in dealing with the matter in the way in which he has I am bound to say I think it is outside his function to disallow costs for the reasons which he there stated. Therefore I think that this appeal should be allowed.

WILLMER L.J. I agree with the judgment which my Lord has delivered, both with regard to its conclusions and with regard to the reasons given. I desire to add but a few words of my own.

The commissioner, as I understand his decision, made his special order with regard to the costs of this case by way of marking his disapproval of what he thought was the regular practice followed by the petitioner's solicitor of approaching the respondent in matrimonial proceedings direct for the purpose of obtaining a statement. We were informed by Mr. Reeve, who argued this appeal, that that was a matter with which the Law

Willmer L.J.

Society were very much concerned, and he invited us to give a general ruling on the propriety or otherwise of the so-called practice. I fear that if the Law Society are hoping for a general ruling they will be disappointed; for I think it is quite impossible to say that in all circumstances such a practice is either right or wrong. In my judgment, every case must be judged on its own particular facts; and it is precisely here that, as it seems to me, the commissioner fell into error. He dealt with this case on the basis that the practice followed by the solicitor was in all circumstances open to objection, and failed to apply his mind to the particular circumstances of this case or to exercise his discretion with regard thereto. In such circumstances, it seems to me to follow that there has in this case in fact been no judicial exercise of discretion with regard to the question of costs. It is therefore open for this court to interfere.

Having examined, so far as we have been able to do so, the particular circumstances of this case, it seems to me that there is no ground for complaining in this case of the way in which the solicitor behaved; and in such circumstances it could not be a proper exercise of discretion to make such an order as to costs as the commissioner made. I therefore agree that this appeal should be allowed.

DEVLIN L.J. We have here before us what are in reality two appeals, because there are two orders that have been appealed against by two different appellants. The main order is the one in which the commissioner ordered that the costs of the petitioner [the wife] that were to be taxed as between solicitor and client should exclude all solicitor's costs relating to the statement made by the husband on September 11, 1958. That he has power to make an order of that sort, which in effect makes the solicitor personally liable for the costs incurred, is beyond doubt. He has power both under the rules of court, R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 11, and also under the inherent jurisdiction of the court. It is a separate proceeding quite independent of the divorce suit, and one in which the solicitor has been called upon to show cause why he should not be treated in this way. He was not formally called upon in this case to show cause, but no complaint can be made or has been made about that because there is no doubt that the commissioner gave him ample opportunity to put his point of view in the witness-box. However, it is, as I say, a separate proceeding; and he, also represented by Mr. Reeve, has appealed against that order.

The other order, the order in the suit itself, is in my judgment merely supplementary. The object of what the commissioner was doing was to penalise the solicitor for having acted in a way which in his, the commissioner's, view was improper; and of course it follows incidentally from that that if he were going to make the solicitor pay the costs personally then they should not be included in the petitioner's bill against the respondent. That is the other subsidiary order that he has made.

I propose to deal with this matter in relation to the first order, the order against the solicitor. I do not want to discuss the principles that emerge from Donald Campbell & Co. v. Pollak [1] and Baylis, Baxter Ltd. v. Sabath,[2] to which the commissioner referred in the course of his judgment. It is quite clear, and it has been so held, that from an order made against a solicitor personally an appeal lies to the court without leave. Therefore, no special rules regarding interference with the commissioner's discretion have there to be considered. If that order is, in the view of this court, wrong, then there is plainly no material at all to support the order in the taxation as between party and party, and its rescission necessarily follows.

As I have said, an order against a solicitor personally can be made under R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 11, which provides, so far as is material, "If in any case it shall appear to the court or a judge "that . . . by reason of any misconduct or default of the solicitor, "any costs properly incurred have nevertheless proved fruitless "to the person incurring the same, the court or judge may call "on the solicitor of the person by whom such costs have been so "incurred to show cause why such costs should not be disallowed "as between the solicitor and his client."

There can be no question in this case of these costs having proved fruitless. If the commissioner had refused to admit the evidence, then it might well have been said that the costs of taking the statement were fruitless. If he had said that, though admitting the evidence, he attached no weight at all to it, the same might conceivably have been said. But in the course which the commissioner took he accepted the evidence and acted upon it. I think that is a fair inference. It is true, as Hodson L.J. has pointed out, that the evidence was supplemented by the admission of the husband himself; but there is nothing in either of the judgments that the commissioner gave on this point to suggest that he would have rejected the solicitor's evidence. In those circumstances, it is clear that, so far from the costs incurred in the taking of the statement proving fruitless, they have in fact enabled the same result to be reached more economically than it could by any other means.

It is plain, therefore, that there is no case here under the rules. As I have said, the rule leaves untouched the inherent jurisdiction of the court; but I apprehend that where costs are concerned the same principle must operate. If the solicitor is to be deprived of some of the costs which he has earned, it must be because his misconduct has caused costs to be incurred which would not otherwise have been incurred. A solicitor is sometimes deprived of costs, or a party is sometimes deprived of costs, as it is said, to mark the disapproval of the court; and I am not suggesting for a moment that some round sum may not be imposed in that way where costs which it may not be possible exactly to quantify have been thrown away. But where there is no question of costs being thrown away, an order of the sort made by the commissioner cannot stand. We have not discussed whether the inherent jurisdiction of the court permits it to impose a penalty or a fine upon a solicitor for his misconduct. As my Lord has said, the ordinary course is to report the matter to the Law Society so that his professional brethren may deal with it. I need say no more about that because it is clear that the commissioner here was not imposing a fine or a penalty in terms and was not directing his mind to that at all: the order relates to costs.

In my judgment, therefore, the order is misconceived, there being no power to make it either under Ord. 65, r. 11, or under the inherent jurisdiction of the court. But I ought to add the expression of my own view, since Mr. Myer Cohen's conduct has been called in question, that I can see nothing in what he did that amounts to misconduct at all.

In saying that, I am not seeking either to uphold or to condemn the practice which the commissioner said was improper, namely, the taking of a statement from a respondent by the solicitor to the petitioner and not by an inquiry agent. On that I have nothing at all to add to what has been said by my brethren, who are much more familiar with the right principles to be applied in cases of that sort than I am. But taking it (as they have said) that there is no universal practice one way or the other, it seems to me that it is impossible to say that what Mr. Myer Cohen did amounted in any way to misconduct. Had there been a clear practice which he had infringed, it might be different. Without there being a clear practice, it could not be said that what he did amounted to misconduct. In the absence of a clear practice, he was entitled to use his own judgment. The reasons which he gave for what he did appear to me to be sound and sensible ones, and indeed I should like to say that the impression which his evidence makes on my mind—given in answer to the questions from the commissioner, Mr. Myer Cohen being thus not in a very easy position—is altogether a good one.

I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed and that part of commissioner's order excluding certain items from the solicitor and client bill and party and party bill set aside.

[1959 T. No. 1114.]

Trusts—Variation—Act of 1958—Rectification of settlement—Fund divided in equal shares between son and daughter—Son absolutely entitled to share on attaining 30—Gift over to daughter's share should son die under 30—Income from daughter's share payable to daughter for life and after her death capital held on trust for her children—Omission to provide for children of son should son not attain 30—Omission not intended by settlor—Application for variation to rectify—Settlement—Whether for benefit of "any "person unborn"—Variation of Trusts Act, 1958 (6 & 7 Eliz. 2, c. 53), s. 1.

By a settlement dated April 4, 1951, it was provided that certain funds should be held by the trustees for the settlor's son and daughter in equal shares. Clause 1 (3) provided that if the son attained the age of 30, he should become absolutely entitled to his share, and clause 1 (5) that if he should die before attaining that age, then his share was to accrue to the daughter's share. The settlement provided that if the daughter should attain the age of 30 the income of her share should be payable to her during her life and after her death the capital was to be held on trust for her children.

The settlor applied to the court under section 1 of the Variation of Trusts Act, 1958, for approval on behalf of unborn persons interested in the settled funds of a variation of the trusts of the son's share whereby, should the son die before attaining the age of 30, leaving a child or children who attained the age of 21 one-half of the son's share should be held on trust for such child or children, and that clause 1 (5) should be made subject to a new clause to that effect. At the date of these proceedings, the son and daughter were both unmarried and under 30 years of age:—

Held, that the court could not sanction the proposed variation, which was, in fact, a claim for rectification of the settlement, unless it was satisfied that it would be for the benefit of the unborn children of the daughter; that this proposal to give away half of that to which those children would be entitled if the son died under 30 years of age could not possibly be said to be for their benefit; and that, therefore, the variation would not be approved.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

By a settlement dated April 4, 1951, made between the settlor, Derek Tinker, and Derek Tinker, his wife, Margaret Isobel Tinker, and Arthur Maxwell Ramsden (an independent trustee), it was provided, by clause 1 (1), that the income of the settlor's son Clive's share (which was one half of the settled fund) should be subject to a trust for accumulation until the settlor's death or until Clive attained the age of 30, whichever first happened. Clause 1 (3) provided that if Clive attained that age, then the trustees should hold the capital of his share for him absolutely; and clause 1 (5) that if he should die before attaining that age, then his share would accrue to the settlor's daughter Sandra's share. The income of Sandra's share (which was the other half of the settled fund) was subject to a similar trust for accumulation, and if Sandra attained the age of 30, then the income was payable to her during her life, and from and after her death the capital was to be held on trust for her children as she might by deed or will appoint and in default of appointment for her children in equal shares.

A prior settlement, dated June 28, 1945, of a smaller fund had provided that the son and daughter should not have the income of their shares of the settled fund until they attained the age of 25, both their shares being settled with remainder to their children. The settlor deposed that when the settlement of 1951 was under consideration he had given instructions that he wanted it to "be along the lines" of the 1945 settlement, except that the son was not to have the capital of his share until he was 30 and that the daughter was not to have the income of her share until she was 30. In fact the settlement of 1951 departed very materially from the terms of the 1945 settlement and the settlor deposed that he had not appreciated that under the 1951 settlement, should the son die under the age of 30 leaving children, his share would go over to the daughter's share, and his children would take no interest. He further deposed that he would not have executed the settlement if he had understood that that was the effect of the trusts.

At the date of these proceedings the son Clive was a bachelor, aged 25 years, and the daughter Sandra a spinster aged 22 years.

The settlor applied to the court under the Variation of Trusts Act, 1958, for (1) an order under section 1 of the Act approving on behalf of all unborn persons interested in the settled funds an arrangement for such variation of the trusts of the settlement as would terminate the trusts for accumulation of the incomes of the respective shares of Clive and Sandra under the settlement, which trusts might terminate on the settlor's death and give rise to liability for estate duty in respect of the settled funds, and (2) such variation of the trusts of Clive's share as would prevent the whole of his share accruing to Sandra's share in the event of his dying before the age of 30 leaving issue surviving him. The summons set out the suggested form of a new subclause (3) in clause 1 of the settlement in the following terms: "(3) If the "son dies before attaining the age of 30 years leaving a child or "children who being male attains the age of 21 years or being "female attains that age or marry, one half of the son's fund "shall be held upon trust for such child or children . . . in equal "shares absolutely." It was also suggested that clause 1 (5) should be prefaced with the words "subject to the trusts "aforesaid."

B. L. Bathurst Q.C. and Hector Hillaby for the settlor.
D. S. Chetwood for the son.
B. J. H. Clauson for the daughter.
G. B. H. Dillon for the independent trustee of the settlement.

No cases were cited in argument other than that referred to in the judgment.

RUSSELL J. I am prepared in this matter to approve an arrangement whereby the trusts of this settlement are altered so as to put an end to an accumulation period. The accumulation period must necessarily relate to the death of the settlor, when the trusts might become extinct and give rise to a liability for estate duty. I have no doubt that it will mean that income in the case of the son's half, which would probably have accumulated in the next four and a half years, and, in the case of the daughter's half, for the next nine years, with the additional benefit of capital will not so accumulate. Nevertheless, it seems to me, weighing the risks one against the other, that it must be for the benefit of the next generation, for whom I am now concerned, that the accumulation should be put an end to.

I am also asked to make a provision to cover this defect in the settlement, namely, that the son is given the capital of his half absolutely on attaining 30 years of age, but it is provided that if he should die under 30 his half goes over to the daughter's half which is settled upon her for life with the remainder to her children. It will be observed at once that if he himself has children in the next four and a half years before he is 30, and then dies under 30, no part of his share will go for the benefit of his children: it will all go over to the daughter's half. Evidence in the form of an affidavit by the settlor is before me to suggest that there is a possible claim to be made for rectification of the settlement so as to procure the son's half in that event going to his own children.

It is quite clear that I must be satisfied before I sanction that arrangement, which involves half of the son's half being given, so to speak, in the particular event to his children and not over to the daughter's family, that such an arrangement is beneficial to the unborn children of the daughter. It seems to me that it is about one of the thinnest and weakest claims for rectification that I have seen, perhaps only rivalled by that in Constantinidi v. Ralli,[1] and I cannot think that I would be benefiting the daughter's children if I gave away half of that which they would come into if the son dies under 30.

Mr. Bathurst has said that one can look at this sort of thing in two ways and ultimately combine the two. First, that this is a sensible and fair thing to do because somebody has blundered —somebody has forgotten about the son's children—and it would seem very hard that this half of this substantial settlement should go away from his children to his sister and her children, and, secondly, that it would in a broad sense be beneficial to the sister's children as members of this whole family. I cannot apply the jurisdiction under the Variation of Trusts Act in that broad way. Although it may very well be that one can throw that kind of consideration into the scale in order to increase a financial benefit which is already established, yet one cannot regard it as a benefit in its own right. I would be only too pleased if I were able so to hold, but, having regard to the type of claim for rectification which is adumbrated, I do not find myself able to approve a compromise or arrangement or variation under the Act as is sought by paragraph 2 of the summons.

A company sent to its members short notice of a resolution to be passed at an extraordinary general meeting as a special resolution for the reduction of capital. The directors later wished to propose a second resolution for the payment of a premium to the holders of preference shares paid off on the reduction and, appreciating that they could not give the statutory period of notice for the second resolution, requested the shareholders at the meeting to sign a consent to the second resolution being proposed, notwithstanding that the statutory notice had not been given. The consent was signed at the meeting by shareholders being a majority together holding more than 95 per cent. in nominal value of the shares. Subsequently, the company obtained the written consent of every shareholder to both resolutions being treated as valid special resolutions.

On a petition for confirmation of reduction of capital presented on the footing that the written consent of every shareholder to treat both resolutions as valid special resolutions had been obtained:—

Held, (1) that the proviso to section 141 (2) of the Companies Act, 1948, required persons agreeing to a resolution being passed on short notice to appreciate that fact, and that since the shareholders did not appreciate that the initial notice of the first special resolution was defective in point of time, the consent given at the meeting could not cure that defect.

(2) But that since every shareholder had in fact subsequently consented to both resolutions being treated as valid special resolutions, and the petition had been presented on that footing, no shareholder could be heard to say that they had not been validly passed, and that, accordingly, the reduction in capital would be confirmed.

PETITION.

By a notice, dated March 7, 1960, the petitioning company, Pearce Duff & Co. Ltd., gave notice to its members of a resolution to be passed as a special resolution at an extraordinary general meeting to be held on March 29, 1960, for the reduction of capital. The company sent the notice to its members on March 8, 1960, and it was conceded that the statutory period of 21 days' notice had not been observed.

The board of directors then formed the opinion that it would be right that the holders of 22,500 £1 fully-paid preference shares, which were being paid off, should receive not only repayment of their capital but also a premium distributed out of the available accumulated profits of the company, and they resolved that a further resolution to that effect be submitted to the meeting to be held on March 29. The directors appreciated that they could not give the proper period of notice in respect of this second resolution, and therefore at the meeting, at which shareholders holding upwards of 95 per cent. of the shares of the company were present, they required the shareholders to sign a document in the following terms: "We, the undersigned, being "a majority in number of the members of the above-named "company entitled to attend and vote at the extraordinary general "meeting of the company convened for this day and the holders "of more than 95 per cent. of the ordinary shares giving that "right, hereby consent to the following additional special "resolution being proposed and considered at that meeting "notwithstanding that the statutory notice of meeting has not "been given in regard to such resolution, viz. . . . (3) That "contingently upon the said reduction taking effect the holders "of the said 22,500 issued preference shares be paid out of the "general reserves of the company available for distribution among "the shareholders a premium of one shilling on each such "preference share payable at the same time as the return of "the capital paid up thereon." That consent was signed by all the shareholders present at the meeting. Later, the company obtained the written consent of all the shareholders to both resolutions being treated as valid special resolutions.

The company presented a petition for confirmation of the reduction of its capital on the footing that the consent of every shareholder to the resolutions being treated as valid had been obtained.

The following case, in addition to those referred to in the judgment, was cited in argument: In re Hector Whaling Ltd.[1]

BUCKLEY J. stated the facts substantially as set out above and continued: It is contended in the first place that the fact that shareholders holding more than 95 per cent. of the shares entitled to attend and vote at the meeting signed the consent was sufficient to surmount the difficulty with regard to the inadequate notice given in relation to the resolution set out in the original notice of the meeting. It is pointed out that the resolution which is set out in the form of consent is a resolution which is expressed to be contingent upon the reduction taking effect, the reduction being the subject-matter of the earlier resolutions referred to in the original notice of the meeting. It is contended that by inference, therefore, all the shareholders who signed the consent consented not only to the resolution No. 3 being passed as a special resolution notwithstanding short notice, but consented to all the other resolutions also being passed as special resolutions notwithstanding short notice.

In my judgment, that is not the effect of the consent. Section 141 (2) of the Companies Act, 1948, requires 21 days' notice in the case of a special resolution, with the proviso as to resolutions being passed on short notice which is to be found in that subsection. In my judgment, that proviso requires the persons who agree to a resolution being passed on short notice to appreciate that the resolution is being passed on short notice and to agree to its being so passed with that consideration in their minds. I think that it is clear that in the present case the shareholders who signed the consent did not have it in their mind at all that the initial notice was defective in point of time. So, in my judgment, this consent does not cure the matter in that way.

However, since the date of the meeting, the consent of every shareholder has been obtained to these resolutions being treated as valid special resolutions, and this petition has been presented upon that footing. I have been referred to In re Oxted Motor Co. Ltd.[1] and Parker and Cooper Ltd. v. Reading,[2] which show that in certain circumstances all the corporators, if they agree, can bind the company. Those cases, I think, relate to a rather different subject-matter from that which I have to consider, because, as I see it, I have to consider not whether these resolutions bound the company as special resolutions but whether any shareholder could now say that the resolutions were not properly passed as valid special resolutions. Having regard to the 100 per cent. consent which has been obtained to the resolutions being treated as valid and to the fact that the petition has been presented upon that footing, I do not think that this court ought to hear any of the shareholders to say that those resolutions were not validly passed.

In those circumstances, I think, the case being a rather exceptional one, that I am entitled to regard this special resolution as sufficient basis for the reduction which the court is asked to confirm; and accordingly, subject to being satisfied on the evidence as to excess of wants, I will confirm the reduction.

Declaration accordingly.

Fox
v.
General Medical Council.

The terms of the Medical Act, 1956, which confer a right of appeal from a decision of the General Medical Council acting by its Disciplinary Committee do not limit or qualify in any way the appeal which, in a general sense, is nothing less than a rehearing of the case and a review of the decision. There is no useful analogy between the position of the Board on an appeal under the Medical Act and the position of an appellate court dealing with an appeal from a judge sitting with a jury. A much closer and more useful analogy is between the Board's position and that of a court of appeal hearing an appeal from a judge sitting alone without a jury, though there remains the distinction that in hearings before the Medical Council no reasoned judgment is delivered, but only a finding that the Disciplinary Committee has or has not found the facts alleged in the charge to have been proved to their satisfaction. In such circumstances, the Board's inability to know, except by inference, what considerations of fact or law have proved the determining ones, sometimes requires that the Board shall take a comprehensive view of the evidence as a whole and form its own conclusion whether a "due inquiry" was held and a proper finding made having regard to the rules of evidence under which the Disciplinary Committee's proceedings are regulated.

While there can have been no due inquiry if the rules of natural justice have not been observed (General Medical Council v. Spackman [1943] A.C. 627; 59 T.L.R. 412; [1943] 2 All E.R. 337, H.L.), it would be an undue limitation of the Board's duty and powers in dealing with the statutory appeal to require no more for the upholding of a determination than observance of the rules of natural justice. The Board is bound to consider complaints made on any appeal against the background of the rules governing the proceedings of the Disciplinary Committee, but it would not necessarily be assumed that merely because something inconsistent with the rules had taken place that there had been no "due inquiry."

At the hearing of a doctor's appeal against a decision of the General Medical Council, acting by its Disciplinary Committee, it was alleged that there had been defects in the conduct of the inquiry in that, inter alia, (1) though letters left by a woman patient (since deceased) with whom the doctor was charged with having committed adultery had been excluded on the advice of the legal assessor, material obtained from them had been used in the cross-examination of the doctor, and (2) that evidence of a friend of the doctor, to whom, it was alleged, the doctor had told the same general story about his relations with the woman patient, had been wrongfully excluded:—

Held, (1) that an advocate was entitled to use his discretion whether to put questions in cross-examination which were based on material which he was not in a position to prove directly (post, p. 1023).

(2) That such confirmatory evidence as the statement alleged to have been made by the doctor to his friend was, generally speaking, immaterial and not admissible. One head of exception from that general rule was that if in cross-examination a witness's account of some incident or set of facts was challenged as being a recent invention, thus presenting a clear issue as to whether at some previous time he had said or thought what he had been saying at the trial, he might support himself by evidence of earlier statements by him to the same effect. The application of that exception must be, within limits, a matter of discretion. The friend's evidence, as tendered, did not come within the exception, and its exclusion was not wrongful in the legal sense, for the challenge to the doctor's evidence raised by the cross-examination was not of the order that could be affected by proof of statements made by him to the friend.

Decision of the General Medical Council affirmed.

Appeal (No. 55 of 1959) by Dr. Kenneth Merrall Fox from a determination of the Disciplinary Committee of the General Medical Council made on November 27, 1959, that he had on numerous occasions committed adultery with the late Mrs. Kathleen Margery Thomas, who was his patient, and upon that finding judged him to have been guilty of infamous conduct in a professional respect, and ordered his name to be erased from the Medical Register. Mrs. Thomas committed suicide on April 17, 1959. The appellant had denied the charge.

Fox
v.
General

against a decision of the General Medical Council, acting by its Disciplinary Committee, that the appellant, Dr. Kenneth Merrall Fox, had been guilty of infamous conduct in a professional respect and that his name should be erased from the Register of Medical Practitioners. The decision of the council was arrived at on November 27, 1959, after a three-day hearing. The charge preferred against the appellant was that for a period of some three years ending in April, 1959, he had improperly associated with a patient of his, the late Mrs. Kathleen Margery Thomas, and committed adultery with her on numerous occasions. The course of proceedings before the committee and on the appeal before this Board made it plain that the charges of improper association and of adultery were to be considered as interdependent, and that the decision to remove the appellant's name from the register must stand or fall according to the view taken of the relevance and cogency of the evidence on the adultery charge.

It is necessary at the outset to say something as to the nature of an appeal to the Board in a matter of this kind, because upon that depends to some extent the Board's approach to questions that relate to the evidence taken at the hearing, and the treatment of it before the committee during the course of the hearing. The appeal in this case lies as of right and by statute—see section 36 of the Medical Act, 1956. The terms of the statute that confers the right do not limit or qualify the appeal in any way, so that an appellant is entitled to claim that it is in a general sense nothing less than a rehearing of his case and a review of the decision.

Nevertheless, an appellate court works under certain limitations which are inherent in any appeal that does not take the form, as this does not, of starting the case all over again and hearing the witnesses afresh. In the High Court, where appeals to the Court of Appeal are by function by way of rehearing, there are well-recognised principles which give some measure of precedence to the decisions of the tribunal that has seen and heard the witnesses over what might otherwise be the view of the facts preferred by the appellate court which has only the record of the evidence to study. Moreover, if the trial at first instance has been by judge and jury, only misdirection by the judge or such special cases as a perverse verdict or a verdict wholly contrary to the weight of the evidence are allowed to justify a reversal of the finding of the jury.

It does not seem to their Lordships that it is possible to find an exact analogy between the position of the Board on an appeal under the Medical Act, and the position of an appellate court dealing with an appeal either from a judge sitting with a jury or from a judge sitting alone to decide both law and fact. With the former there is no useful analogy. The decision arrived at in a hearing before the Medical Council is indeed that of a body of persons, but there is no distinction between their responsibility for deciding on the law and their responsibility for deciding on the facts. There is no judge to conduct the proceedings, to direct the jury on matters of law or to sum up for them on issues of fact. Although the Disciplinary Committee has the assistance of a legal assessor at its hearing, as required by the Act, it is the President of the court and not he who is in charge of the proceedings, and his duties are confined to advising on questions of law referred to him, and to interventions for the purpose either of informing the committee of any irregularity in the conduct of their proceedings which comes to his knowledge, or of advising them when it appears to him that, but for such advice, there is a possibility of a mistake of law being made.

There is no doubt a much closer and more useful analogy between the Board's position and that of a court of appeal hearing an appeal from a judge sitting alone without a jury, and for many purposes this analogy will suffice. But even here there is a distinction which may be important in some instances. A judge delivers a reasoned judgment; he puts on record his findings where there is material conflict of evidence and the conclusions that he has formed as to the credibility or reliability of the witnesses he has heard; he indicates his views on the law and the bearing of those views on the conclusion that he comes to. It is with this judgment before it that the appellate court proceeds to its hearing of the appeal. But in the case of hearings before the Medical Council no judgment is, of course, delivered. There is only a finding such as we have here that "the committee "have determined that the facts alleged . . . in the charge have "been proved to their satisfaction." It is not possible to tell, except by inference, what has been the weight given by the committee to various items or aspects of the evidence, or what considerations of fact or law have proved the determining ones that have led the members to arrive at the decision finally come to. Such considerations, which are unavoidable in appeals of this kind, do sometimes require that the Board should take a comprehensive view of the evidence as a whole, and endeavour to form its own conclusion as to whether a proper inquiry was held and a proper finding made upon it, having regard to the rules of evidence under which the committee's proceedings are regulated.

The validity of any determination by the committee is, certainly, dependent upon the performance of its statutory duty to hold a "due inquiry" into the matter, and the Board will need to be satisfied as to this if it is challenged on an appeal. But to say that there must be due inquiry does not greatly elucidate the question unless there is some exhaustive definition of the conditions which such an inquiry postulates. It has been said in an earlier case (see General Medical Council v. Spackman [1]) that there can have been no due inquiry if the rules of natural justice have not been observed, and this is true. At the same time it must be remembered that before there was a statutory right of appeal to the Board under the Medical Act the only way of attacking a decision of the council was by way of certiorari proceedings or, at any rate, one of the other prerogative writs. Such proceedings are not truly by way of appeal. The court in granting or refusing the writ does not investigate the merits of the decision: its only concern is to satisfy itself that certain essential rules of procedure, which are treated by it as constituting the requirements of natural justice, have been duly observed. Their Lordships think, therefore, that it would be an undue limitation of their duty and powers in dealing with the statutory appeal to require no more for the upholding of a determination than observance of what are known as the rules of natural justice.

There are now detailed rules governing many aspects of the proceedings of the Disciplinary Committee—see the General Medical Council Disciplinary Committee (Procedure) Rules Order in Council, 1958. An important provision of these rules is that which deals with the reception of evidence, see rule 43 (2): "The committee may receive as evidence any such oral, documentary or other matter as, after consultation with the legal assessor, they may think fit: Provided that, where any matter is tendered as evidence which would not be admissible as such if the proceedings were criminal proceedings in England, they shall not receive it unless, after consultation with the legal assessor, they are satisfied that their duty of making due inquiry into the case before them makes its reception desirable." There is also a separate set of rules laying down the functions and duties of the legal assessor—see the Medical Disciplinary Committee (Legal Assessor) Rules, 1951. The Board is bound to consider complaints made on any appeal to it against the background of these special regulatory provisions. It may be that in some cases an appellant will be able to show in positive terms that there has been a departure from what the rules required. In any such case the departure will be a matter for comment and, in the absence of any actual indication of the significance or bearing that it had upon the ultimate decision, their Lordships cannot well escape the responsibility of assessing for themselves what that significance or bearing should be taken to be. It is sufficient at this stage to guard themselves from the assumption that merely because something inconsistent with the rules can be shown to have taken place, there can have been no "due inquiry," and the decision appealed from must necessarily be reversed.

With these considerations in mind their Lordships turn to the circumstances of the present appeal. The relevant facts that appeared at the inquiry were few and there is in effect no dispute about them. [His Lordship stated the facts, and continued:] Taking the recited facts by themselves, it is plain that they amount to no evidence of adulterous intercourse. They show an intimate association between the appellant and Mrs. Thomas, an association, it may be said, of a somewhat unusual character.

They show, too, that there were numerous occasions of opportunity for adultery, if adultery took place. But any interpretation of these facts that supported the charge brought against the appellant must have depended entirely upon certain things said or admitted by him in the course of several conversations which he had with a Mrs. Monck-Mason during the months that followed Mrs. Thomas's death. Here again, with the exception of two points, neither of which appears to their Lordships to be of any crucial importance, there is no conflict of evidence between the appellant and Mrs. Monck-Mason as to what was actually said. The conflict arises in the significance to be attached to certain remarks, in the bearing which they are thought to have upon what had gone before, and in the relative plausibility of the explanations offered by the appellant as to his meaning or purpose in saying them. Having no guidance as to the view formed by members of the tribunal on these matters, their Lordships can only proceed by setting out the essential passages of each conversation and assessing their weight as evidence before a tribunal of fact.

[His Lordship referred to the revelant conversations and continued:] Their Lordships feel no doubt as to what all this evidence must have amounted to in the eyes of the tribunal. Much of what passed in these conversations is consistent with either view of the appellant's relations with Mrs. Thomas, but not all of it tallies with his version. The tribunal was fully entitled to make the finding that it did on the evidence before it, and it would be impossible for an appellate court to reverse the finding on any contrary view of the facts. It follows that the appeal must fail unless there was some defect in the conduct of the inquiry, by way of admission or rejection of evidence or otherwise, that may fairly be thought to have been of sufficient significance to the result to invalidate the committee's decision. It is to this that their Lordships now turn.

Points were raised on behalf of the appellant which were said to involve breaches of the Disciplinary Committee rules of procedure, or otherwise to amount to misconduct of the proceedings. The second point made was that, though the letters left by Mrs. Thomas had been excluded on the advice of the legal assessor, material obtained from them was used in the cross-examination of the appellant. Even if it was, there is nothing necessarily improper in that. An advocate is entitled to use his discretion as to whether to put questions in the course of cross-examination which are based on material which he is not in a position to prove directly. The penalty is that, if he gets a denial or some answer that does not suit him, the answer stands against him for what it is worth. The whole episode apparently—their Lordships do not know the contents of the letters—comes down to one question: "Q. Did you seduce her in the surgery very soon after "that (a visit of Mrs. Thomas in 1956)? A. I did not." As the legal assessor immediately intervened with the words "I don't "think we can have this," the matter was not pursued further. There is nothing in the point.

Next, the objection was made that on the "direction" or advice of the legal assessor inadmissible evidence had been admitted on the issue of adultery. To appreciate what weight there is in this, it is necessary to set out something of the context in which the point arose. What happened was this. In the course of the cross-examination of Mrs. Monck-Mason by the appellant's solicitor she gave an answer to one of his questions which introduced a story about something which Mrs. Thomas had said or implied to her connecting the appellant with the paternity of Anne Thomas while the Thomases and Monck-Masons were on holiday together in Somerset in the year 1958. The answer did not strictly arise out of the question put to her. It might have been objected to on the spot as not being "responsive" and the tribunal invited to ignore it. In any event, a report of some statement made by Mrs. Thomas would not have constituted any evidence against the appellant on the issue of adultery. No objection was taken: the appellant's solicitor, probably exercising a wise discretion, paid no attention to the matter and returned to another point. He did, however, make an allusion to Mrs. Monck-Mason's answer in the course of his closing address to the committee. There was no need for him to do this unless he chose to. The respondents' solicitor had never made any reference to it or at any time suggested that it could be evidence against the appellant, nor had he examined or re-examined Mrs. Monck-Mason on it. The objection taken fails, the truth being that the presence of this inadmissible piece of evidence in the case at all, and any weight that may conceivably have been given to it, must be ascribed to the conduct of the case on behalf of the appellant, and it would be altogether anomalous if he were now to profit by it.

The remaining objection taken relates to what was said to be the wrongful refusal to admit a piece of relevant evidence for the appellant. It was sufficiently apparent that the appellant's solicitor wished to call a Mr. Frampton—an old friend of the appellant—to confirm that on April 15 the appellant had told him the same general story about his relations with Mrs. Thomas, in particular that her outburst of the previous day was not induced by any improper conduct of his, that constituted his defence to the charge before the committee. The purpose of such evidence of a witness's previous statement is and can only be to support his credit, when his veracity has been impugned, by showing a consistency in his account which adds some probative value to his evidence in the box. Generally speaking, as is well known, such confirmatory evidence is not admissible, the reason presumably being that all trials, civil and criminal, must be conducted with an effort to concentrate evidence upon what is capable of being cogent and, as was remarked by Humphreys J. in Rex v. Roberts,[2] it does not help to support the evidence of a witness, who is the accused person, to know that he has frequently told other persons before the trial what his defence was. Evidence to that effect is therefore in a proper sense immaterial.

There are, however, certain special exceptions, or at any rate one head of exception, from this general rule. If in cross-examination a witness's account of some incident or set of facts is challenged as being a recent invention, thus presenting a clear issue as to whether at some previous time he said or thought what he has been saying at the trial, he may support himself by evidence of earlier statements by him to the same effect. Plainly the rule that sets up the exception cannot be formulated with any great precision, since its application will depend on the nature of the challenge offered by the course of cross-examination and the relative cogency of the evidence tendered to repel it. Its application must be, within limits, a matter of discretion, and its range can only be measured by the reported instances, not in themselves many, in which it has been successfully invoked.

Thus, in Reg. v. Cole,[3] a police witness who identified an accused in his trial evidence as being present at and party to the crime charged, being cross-examined on an earlier information sworn by him that did not mention the name of that accused, was allowed to give evidence to the effect that he had mentioned the name in an information of still earlier date. The admission of his evidence seems to be have been treated by the court as coming within the "recent invention" exception. That apart, it seems to have been little more than a permissible exercise of the right of re-examination to ask him in effect whether or not the second of the two informations may not have been due to inadvertence, and thus to displace the inference which the cross-examination had sought to draw from its contents.

Rex v. Benjamin[4] is often referred to in this connection. A police witness, whose account of what he saw in certain premises was challenged in cross-examination, was allowed to refer to a contemporary entry in his official note-book showing that he had immediately made a report to the same effect to his superior in the police force.

Perhaps the best example of the way in which the exception can be properly invoked and applied is offered by Flanagan v. Fahy.[5] There a witness who had testified to the forging of a will was cross-examined to the effect that he had invented his story because of enmity between him and the accused, the beneficiaries under the propounded will. He was allowed to call confirmatory evidence to show that before the cause of this enmity had arisen he had told a third party the story he was now telling. In that situation the issue raised by the cross-examination was clearly defined: a recent invention due to a specified cause, and if the witness could show that his account had been the same before the cause existed he was certainly adding a relevant fact in support of his credibility.

Did Mr. Frampton's evidence, as tendered, come within the exception? In their Lordships' opinion it did not. It is impossible to say that its exclusion was wrongful in the legal sense. The cross-examination of the appellant on behalf of the respondents had not in fact challenged his account of what had passed between him and Mrs. Thomas on April 14. It did not need to, since nearly everything that, according to him, was said could have been said consistently with either view of the case. What was, no doubt, challenged was his whole story that there had been no adulterous relations between them, and that her outburst of April 14 had come as a complete surprise to him. According to him he was "appalled" by the predicament in which this placed him; he had become "more and more worried by the turn of "events." In that state he went to seek advice from an old friend. Could it have made any contribution to the committee's judgment on the veracity of his whole account for them to know that in such a situation he had told the old friend substantially the same story as to his innocence of the matters charged as he was now telling at the hearing? Their Lordships do not think that it could. In their view, the challenge to the appellant's evidence that was raised by the cross-examination was not of the order that could be affected by proof of statements made by him of that kind at that date. No tribunal that was not otherwise prepared to accept the appellant's general story could have been led to do so by hearing what he had told Mr. Frampton on April 15. So regarded, the evidence rejected is no more than the previous assertion of the defence story told at the trial, which Humphreys J. pointed out in Rex v. Roberts[6] is clearly inadmissible.

As already announced, their Lordships have humbly advised Her Majesty that the appeal ought to be dismissed. The respondents have asked for their costs of the appeal, and their Lordships know of no ground upon which they can refuse the application.

Partnership — Dissolution — Continuance of business afterwards — Proprietary rights of former partners.

By a deed of partnership dated January 17, 1957, a testator and his son entered into a partnership for their joint lives in the business of farming. The deed provided, inter alia, that the capital of the partnership should include the then value of the live and dead stock, agricultural machinery and implements, book debts and other assets of the farming business then carried on by the testator, that the profits should be divided and the losses borne equally and that on the death of either partner the survivor should have the option, exercisable within three months of the death, of purchasing the share of the deceased partner in the capital and assets of the partnership. The deed further provided that if on the death of either partner the other should not exercise the option, then the partnership should be wound up in accordance with the Partnership Act, 1890.

By a codicil to his will dated January 19, 1957, the testator gave all his share of the capital and assets of the partnership with his share of any partnership profits due to him at his death to the son absolutely, subject to any duties payable in respect thereof by reason of his death. Consequently, on the testator's death on February 22, 1957, the son never exercised the option.

On a summons to determine whether the estate duty payable on the testator's death in respect of his share or interest in the farm machinery and plant should be charged in accordance with the reduced rate of duty prescribed by section 28 (1) of the Finance Act, 1954,[1] in which the executors of the testator's estate contended that the testator had an interest in the partnership business which passed on his death within section 28 (1) and the Commissioners of Inland Revenue contended that that section was inapplicable:—

assets of the partnership, and it followed that when a partnership business survived the dissolution as a going concern, each partner retained an interest in that business as well as in every asset employed in it. In any case, therefore, where a partnership for joint lives became dissolved and liable to be wound up on the death of a partner and where the partnership business was a going concern, it necessarily followed that an interest in that business passed on the death of the deceased partner (post, p. 1035). Accordingly, an interest in the partnership business did pass on the tetator's death.

(2) That on the testator's death estate duty became chargeable "in respect of" the plant and machinery used in the partnership business within the meaning of section 28 (1) for there was a sufficient nexus between the value of the testator's share in the business and the assets employed in it to describe the duty as payable in respect of those assets. Accordingly, the estate duty payable on the testator's death in so far as it was chargeable in respect of the share or interest of the testator which passed on his death in the machinery and plant used in the partnership business should be charged in accordance with the reduced rate of duty referred to in section 28 of the Finance Act, 1954.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

The following facts are taken from the judgment of Buckley J.: By a deed of partnership dated January 17, 1957, the testator, H. S. H. Burdett-Coutts, entered into partnership with his son, M. S. Burdett-Coutts, as from October 12, 1956, during their joint lives in the business of farmers. The deed provided that the capital of the partnership should consist of the net value as at October 11, 1956, of the live and dead stock, agricultural machinery and implements, book debts and other assets of the business of a farmer then carried on by the testator, less the outstanding liabilities of that business, and should be credited to the testator as his capital, and that any further sums which either partner should contribute should be credited to such partner as capital of his. In fact, the son did not contribute any capital during the continuance of the partnership. The deed provided that the profits should be divided and the losses borne equally. The deed also provided that on the death of either partner the survivor should have the option, to be exercised within three months of the death, of purchasing the share of the deceased partner in the capital and assets of the partnership: it also contained corresponding provisions applicable upon the expulsion or retirement of a partner. The deed further provided that, if on the expulsion, retirement or death of either partner the other should not exercise his option, then the partnership should be wound up in accordance with the Partnership Act, 1890, but so that on a sale of the partnership assets by auction each partner or his personal representatives should be entitled to bid.

On February 22, 1957, the testator died. At that date there were undistributed profits amounting to £687 3s. 11d., one half of which fell to be added to the capital account of each partner as at the date of the testator's death. Consequently, the partners' capital accounts then stood at £27,077 1s. 10d. for the testator and £343 11s. 11d. for the son. The assets of the partnership included plant and machinery used in the farming business worth about £6,600.

By a first codicil to his will, dated January 19, 1957, the testator gave all his share of the capital and assets of the partnership, together with his share of any partnership profits due to him at his death, to the son absolutely, subject to any duties payable in respect thereof by reason of his death. Consequently the son, having become entitled to the testator's share in the partnership under the codicil, never exercised the option under the deed of partnership. The residuary estate of the testator was amply sufficient to meet all the debts and liabilities of his estate (other than estate duty on his share of the partnership) without recourse to his said share or to any other property specifically disposed of.

By an originating summons the plaintiffs, the executors of the testator's will, Whimbrel Esther Burdett-Coutts and John Burne Turner, asked the court to determine whether a proportionate part of the estate duty chargeable on the death of the testator in respect of his share or interest under the deed of partnership ought to be treated as "chargeable in respect of" such of the assets of the partnership as consisted of plant and machinery used for the purposes of the partnership business within the meaning of section 28 of the Finance Act, 1954,[1] and ought, accordingly, to be charged in accordance with the reduced scale of rates of duty referred to in that section.

The plaintiffs contended that the testator had an interest in the partnership business which passed on his death within the terms of section 28 (1). The defendants, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, contended that the section was applicable only to a share in a partnership business which passed on a death in specie, that is, where the death had no effect on the continuance of the partnership even as regards that share, which passed intact to someone else.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 12. Buckley J. read the following judgment, in which he stated the facts as set out above, and continued: What I have to decide in this case is whether the estate duty payable on the testator's death in respect of his share or interest in the plant and machinery which I have mentioned ought to be charged in accordance with the reduced rate of duty prescribed by section 28 of the Finance Act, 1954, as the plaintiffs, who are the testator's executors, contend, or at the normal rate applicable to the testator's estate. Section 28 (1) is in the following terms: "Where a "business or an interest in a business passes on a death, any "estate duty chargeable on the death in respect of industrial "hereditaments used in and occupied for the purposes of the "business or in respect of machinery or plant so used shall "(except as hereinafter provided) be charged in accordance with "a scale of rates of duty representing the usual scale for the time "being in force with a reduction of forty-five per cent. in each "of the rates." Subsection (2) deals with any case in which duty is chargeable in respect of shares or debentures of a company which fall to be valued by reference to the value of the company's assets in accordance with section 55 of the Finance Act, 1940. Subsection (3), inter alia, extends the operation of the section to any case in which the relevant business is carried on not by such last-mentioned company but by a subsidiary thereof. Subsection (4) deals with any case where the hereditaments, machinery or plant in question were leased by the deceased to a company to which subsection (2) applies. Subsection (5) deals with any case in which a company's business is treated as passing on a death by virtue of section 46 of the Finance Act, 1940. The section is thus designed to grant relief from duty in respect of plant and machinery in cases in which the deceased's interest in the business for the purposes of which the plant or machinery is used is direct or arises indirectly through the medium of a company or companies. The plaintiffs claim that the testator in the present case had an interest in the partnership business which passed on his death within the terms of subsection (1). The defendants, on the other hand, contend that the section is only applicable to a share in a partnership business where that share passes on the death in specie, that is to say, where the death has no effect on the continuance of the partnership even as regards that share, which passes intact to someone else.

Defendants' counsel have referred me to the observations of Lord President Clyde in Glen v. Inland Revenue.[1] The question in that case arose under the Finance Act, 1914, section 15 of which, so far as relevant, provides as follows: "Where the Commissioners of Inland Revenue are satisfied that estate duty has become payable on any property consisting of . . . any interest in . . . a business passing upon the death of any person, and that subsequently within five years estate duty has again become payable on the same property or any part thereof passing on the death of the person to whom the property passed on the first death, the amount of estate duty payable on the second death . . . in respect of the property so passing shall be reduced" to the extent specified in the section. The facts in Glen v. Inland Revenue [2] were somewhat unusual. "A father and two of his sons carried on business in partnership. By a re-arrangement of the partnership relations the father accepted a sum of £124,646 in full satisfaction of his whole rights in the old firm and its assets, and agreed to allow this sum to remain as a loan to the new firm at 4 per cent. interest, on condition that, if called up by him, or in any event on his death, it was to be repaid by ten yearly instalments. The father contributed no capital to the new firm apart from the loan, but had an interest in the profits to the extent of a one-tenth share. He died in 1922, leaving a will by which he bequeathed the residue of his estate (including the loan) to his family, in certain shares, and estate duty was duly paid thereon. The two sons, who continued to carry on the business, thereafter came to an arrangement with their father's executors, under which the sons agreed to repay the loan at once in return for a certain discount; and, in settling with the executors, they retained in the business the respective shares of the loan falling to them, by crediting themselves with the amounts in the books of the firm. Within two years of the father's death one of the sons died, and estate duty became payable on his estate. His executrix having claimed a reduction, under section 15 of the Finance Act, 1914, of the estate duty payable on the sum credited to the son in the firm's books in respect of his share of his father's loan, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue refused the claim."

The Lord President opened his judgment with the following general observations on the relevant section [3]: "The section applies to estate duty which falls twice in rapid succession upon certain kinds of property passing on death. The property which it is the object of the statute to protect is described as consisting of two kinds: it may be (a) 'property consisting of 'land' or of 'any interest in land,' or it may be (b) property consisting of 'a business' or 'any interest in a business.' The crippling effect of the repeated incidence of estate duty on the management of landed estate and on the conduct of industrial or commercial business is the mischief for which the section offers a palliative. If two successive owners of an estate, or

Buckley J.

"of a business, die within a short interval, the last successor "must denude the estate, or bleed the business, to whatever "extent may be necessary to enable him to pay the double estate "duty, with disastrous results to the estate or the business.

"Whatever may be the precise content of the expression 'any "'interest in land' and 'any interest in a business,' it seems "safe (having regard to the intention of the enactment) to say "that the interest referred to must be such that the exhaustion "of it in paying repeated estate duties will be detrimental to the "landed estate, or to the business, as the case may be. In other "words, the interest must be such that its fate and fortune is "one with the fate and fortune of the land or business. A share "in a partnership may, by the terms of the articles of copartnery, "be descendible to heirs or legatees; or its value may, on the "death of the partner, become a debt to his representatives. In "the latter case, what reason could there be for protecting the "jus crediti of the representatives (qua creditors of the firm) "from the effects of repeated incidence of estate duty any more "than in the case of any other asset—whether in the form of "jus crediti or of property—which formed part of the deceased's "estate? The diminution of the estate passing to the representatives, as the result of the exaction of estate duty, is no doubt "grievous for the persons entitled to it, but it infers no prejudice "to the business, which in terms of the partnership articles is in "any case liable for the value of the deceased partner's share, "neither more nor less. The same reasoning applies to a charge "on a landed estate. It is true that, in popular language, both "a charge on land and the loan capital of a business might be "called an 'interest' in the land or in the business; but the fact "that the jus crediti in the secured charge or in the loan of "capital passes several times on successive deaths, and so suffers "exhaustion (more or less) in the hands of those who succeed to "it by the payment of estate duty, has no prejudicial effect on "either the landed estate or the business. On the other hand, "the repeated incidence of estate duty on a business or on shares "therein to which successive partners became entitled in terms "of the partnership is a drain on the life-blood of the business."

Later he said this[4]: "A good deal of argument was presented "to us as to the precise nature of the father's loan capital and "the executors' right to repayment of it. There is no ground "for regarding it as anything else than a loan. Whether the "case would be different if the interest of the father had consisted of an ordinary contribution of partnership capital it is "unnecessary to consider. Confining attention to the actual "case before us, the question is whether the right which emerged "to the father's executors to be repaid the loan of £124,646 was "an 'interest in the business' which the partnership had carried "on down to the father's death. In view of the considerations

"explained in the earlier part of this opinion, it seems plain that "the answer to that question must be in the negative. The "father's loan was no more an 'interest in the business' than "any other loan obtained for the purpose of use in the business "would have been."

He also gave as an additional reason for holding the section to be inapplicable that the property or interest which passed on the son's death was not the same property or interest which passed on the father's death. None of the other three judges said anything about the Lord President's general observations. Lord Skerrington held that the interests which passed on the two deaths were not identical. Lord Cullen held that quoad the loan the father had no interest in the business. Lord Sands, while concurring in the result, safeguarded himself in the following terms [5]: "I am not satisfied that where there are two partners "all the working capital they provide may not in certain circum-"stances be held to represent respective interests in the business, "although in order to hold a balance as between the parties in "respect of inequality of interests it may not all be treated in "the same way in the partnership accounts."

I have referred to this case at some length because counsel for the defendants say that Lord Clyde's general observations are authority or justification for the view of the Estate Duty Office which I am told has been and is the basis of departmental practice in cases such as the present one under section 28 (1) of the Finance Act, 1954. That view is stated in the Law Society Gazette for July, 1956, p. 320, as follows: "1. The reduced rate "is applicable where—(a) the right of the deceased partner's "representatives is to a share of the partnership assets as such "(an uncommon case); or (b) the deceased's share of the part-"nership assets passes to a beneficiary under the partnership "agreement, either directly or by virtue of the exercise by the "deceased of a power conferred by the partnership agreement. "2. In the case of a partnership at will without an agreement, "a share in the assets of the business does not pass on the death "of a partner and estate duty is accordingly payable at the full "rate. The partner's death dissolves the partnership (Partner-"ship Act, 1890, section 33 (1)) and his interest in the business "—to be ascertained according to the rules set out in section 44 "of the Act—is a sum of money constituting a debt due from "the surviving partners (see section 43)." This practice is recognised in leading textbooks on Death Duties: Dymond, 13th ed., p. 535; Green, 4th ed., p. 323; Hanson, 10th ed., p. 1050.

The first thing that should be said of Lord Clyde's general observations is that in their general application they were, in my respectful opinion, clearly obiter dicta. His rationes decidendi were (a) that the father's loan was no more an "interest in the "business" than any other loan would have been, and (b) lack of identity in the property passing on the two deaths. Secondly, Lord Clyde expressly reserved his opinion whether the case would have been different had the father contributed to the partnership capital. Thirdly, none of the other judges based his decision in any way on Lord Clyde's general observations. Lastly, the general observations related to an enactment differing in important respects from the section which I have to consider, affording, in my judgment, a much stronger context for justifying the judge's view of the nature of the property to be protected from the adverse effects of taxation than section 28 of the 1954 Act affords. I do not feel, therefore, that I derive much assistance in the present case from Lord Clyde's remarks, or from the decision in Glen v. Inland Revenue.[6]

BURDETT-COUTTS v. INLAND REVENUE COMRS.

Buckley J.

I turn, therefore, to consider the terms of section 28 (1) of the Act of 1954. To secure the benefit of that subsection it must in the present case be established (1) that an interest in the partnership business passed on the death of the father, and (2) that estate duty became chargeable on the father's death in respect of machinery or plant used in the partnership business. For the purpose of considering whether an interest in the business passed on the death, I am content to assume that on the true construction of the deed of partnership the partnership was dissolved immediately upon the father's death. I am inclined to think that this is probably the correct view, although I think it is arguable that the partnership continued until the end of the option period with the consequence that the father's share did pass in specie at his death.

Upon the footing that the partnership became dissolved immediately upon the testator's death, the rights which vested in his personal representatives were not identical with those which were vested in the testator immediately before his death, but was the change such that his personal representatives became entitled to no interest in the business? This question must, I think, be answered in the negative. The defendants say that, the partnership having become dissolved, all that the testator's estate was entitled to immediately after his death was a sum of money to be ascertained on taking an account in the winding up of the partnership, had the option been exercised, a sum of money representing the purchase price payable upon an exercise of the option and ascertained in accordance with the provisions of the deed in that behalf; and they contend that what passed was the right to such a sum of money only, and that this did not comprise any interest in the partnership business.

I feel unable to accept this argument. No doubt it is true to say that, when a partnership is dissolved and to be wound up, the ultimate rights of the former partners (including legal personal representatives of deceased former partners) inter se are to receive the amounts which turn out to be due to them respectively on the final account. No doubt it is also true that (apart from some exceptional agreement) none of them has any exclusive interest in any asset of the partnership or, at any rate until all the liabilities of the partnership have been paid, any definite share or interest in any one partnership asset capable of being realised and got in otherwise than in the liquidation of the partnership: Rodriguez v. Speyer Bros.[7] But this is not to say that they have no interest in the assets of the partnership pending the final liquidation.

In Manley v. Sartori[8] Lord Romer as a judge of first instance had to decide how profits earned after dissolution of a partnership by a continued employment of partnership assets in a continuance of the partnership business should be distributed. Following Wigram V.-C. in Willett v. Blanford,[9] he held that such profits belonged to the former partners in the proportions in which they were interested in the assets employed in earning those profits. Lord Romer, after reading section 42 (1) of the Partnership Act, 1890, which in terms refers to a deceased partner's share of the partnership assets, said[10]: "Now the rights of the deceased "partner or his legal personal representatives are rights over all "the assets of the partnership. He has an unascertained interest "in every single asset of the partnership, and it is not right to "regard him as being merely entitled to a particular sum of cash "ascertained from the balance-sheet of the partnership as drawn "up at the date of his death. So that if, after the death of "Charles James Calder, any profits were in fact earned by using "any single partnership asset, the profits so far as attributable "to the use of that partnership asset are profits in which the "executors of Charles James Calder have a share to the extent "of their share in that particular asset; that is to say, in propor-"tion to their share in the total assets of the partnership." This case is authority for the view that, when a dissolved partnership is to be, or is in course of being, wound up, each partner or his estate retains an interest in every single asset of the former partnership which remains unrealised or unappropriated, and that that interest is proportionate to his share in the totality of the surplus assets of the partnership. It follows that, where the partnership business survives the dissolution as a going concern, each partner retains an interest in that business as well as in every asset employed in it.

The advice of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Perpetual Executors and Trustees Association of Australia Ltd. v. Commissioners of Taxes of the Commonwealth of Australia[11] is to the like effect. In any case, therefore, where a partnership at will or for joint lives becomes dissolved and liable to be wound up on the death of one of the partners, and at the date of the death the partnership business is a going concern, it necessarily follows, in my judgment, that an interest in that business passes on the death of the deceased partner. The testamentary dispositions of the deceased partner may, as in the present case, do away with the necessity for a winding up of the partnership by constituting the surviving partner the sole owner of the partnership assets, but this cannot affect the character of the property which passes on the death of the deceased partner to his legal personal representatives; nor can the fact that the surviving partner after the death buys up the interest of the deceased partner either under an option (as in the case last cited) or by negotiation with the deceased partner's legal personal representatives do so. For these reasons I reach the conclusion in the present case that on the death of the father an interest in the partnership business did pass.

The defendants contended that, although this view might be correct if there were no context in other estate duty legislation showing in what sense the legislature used the term "interest "in a business" in such legislation, the use of the same expression in section 15 of the Finance Act, 1914, and the observations of the Lord President in Glen v. Inland Revenue,[12] show that in enactments on this subject the term is used with a restricted meaning. I have already stated my reasons for thinking that that case does not assist me, nor do I consider that there is a sufficiently close relationship or similarity between section 15 of the Act of 1914 and section 28 of the Act of 1954 to justify an inference that the legislature meant to use the expression in precisely the same sense in the later enactment as in the earlier, if in the earlier enactment it ought to bear a restricted meaning.

I turn now to the question whether on the death of the testator any estate duty became chargeable "in respect of" the plant and machinery used in the partnership business within the meaning of section 28 (1). Mr. Borneman, for the defendants, has contended that no duty became payable in respect of any specific asset of the partnership: the duty became payable, he says, on the value of the testator's share, there being no sufficient nexus between the value of that share and the assets employed in the partnership to make it appropriate to describe the duty as payable in respect of any of those assets. This is an argument which, if valid, must be equally applicable to any share in a partnership, whatever the effect of the death may have been upon the partnership, upon the share, or upon the partners' respective rights. It would exclude every case of partnership from the operation of the section. It would, so far as I can see and so far as Mr. Borneman has suggested, confine the operation of section 28 (1) in its application to the passing of an interest in a business to cases where a business is held in joint ownership by persons who are not partners, which would be, one would think, most exceptional, and possibly cases where a business is held by trustees in trust for persons beneficially interested in undivided shares. But the commonest and most obvious way in which a man may have an interest in a business, otherwise than through a company, is a partnership, and one must, I think, at least start with a disposition to suppose that the legislature had partnership in mind in framing this subsection. The value of the assets of a partnership underlie and are directly related to the value of each partner's share, just as the value of a company's assets underlie and are directly related to the value to be attributed to shares which have to be valued in accordance with section 55 of the Finance Act, 1940. There is, in my judgment, as close a nexus between partnership assets and the value of a partner's share as there is between the value of a company's assets and the value to be placed on a shareholder's holding which falls to be valued under the last-mentioned section. It is clear from section 28 (2) of the Act of 1954 that relief under the section is available in the latter case and, in my judgment, relief is also available under section 28 (1) in any case in which the value of machinery or plant used in the relevant business underlies and contributes to the value of the deceased's interest in that business. Mr. Borneman submitted that "in respect of" in section 28 (1) meant the same as "on" and that no duty could properly be said to be payable on any of the partnership assets by reason of the testator's death. Even in the case of the death of a sole proprietor of a business no duty could, in my judgment, be said with strict accuracy to be payable "on" any plant or machinery used in his business, for duty is not payable on specific assets comprised in a dead man's personal estate but on the value of his net personal estate after making such allowances for liabilities as are prescribed by section 7 of the Finance Act, 1894. The value of the assets employed in the dead man's business, however, are an element of the value of his net personal estate and must be ascertained before the value of the net personal estate can be ascertained. Just so, in the case of a partner whose death dissolves and may necessitate the winding up of his partnership, the value of his interest in the partnership is an element of the value of his net personal estate, and the value of that interest and consequently the value of the net personal estate can only be ascertained after ascertaining the value of the partnership assets. In each case it is, in my judgment, equally appropriate to describe some part of the duty chargeable on the death as being chargeable "in respect of" the assets employed in the business.

For the purposes of arriving at the net value of any assets in respect of which duty is to be charged at a reduced rate under section 28 (but for that purpose only) section 31 (6) requires the assets of the business to be marshalled in the manner there laid down, but this can have no bearing on the question whether a given case does or does not fall within section 28 (1) and cannot,

Buckley J.

I think, affect the reasons which I have endeavoured to express for holding that in the present case estate duty became chargeable on the testator's death in respect of machinery or plant used in the partnership business.

Subject to any observations counsel may wish to make about the precise form of the order, I will consequently declare that the estate duty payable on the death of the testator so far as it is chargeable in respect of the share or interest of the testator which passed on his death in the machinery and plant used at the time of his death in the business of the partnership constituted by the deed of partnership should be charged in accordance with the reduced scale of rates of duty referred to in section 28 of the Finance Act, 1954.

Declaration accordingly.

Company—Director—Managing director—Service agreement for ten years—Resolution of company removing from directorship and terminating appointment as managing director—Whether breach of contract—Companies Act, 1929 (19 & 20 Geo. 5, c. 23), Sch. I, Table A, art. 68.

Damages—Mitigation—Service agreement—When duty to mitigate arises—Reasonableness of offer.

The plaintiff sold the share capital of the defendant company to L. Co. for £25,000 and it was agreed that the defendant company would enter into a ten-year service agreement to employ the plaintiff as managing director at £3,000 a year plus commission and expenses, which agreement was executed on April 8, 1958. In August, 1958, L. Co., having offered the plaintiff alternative employment to which he appeared agreeable, sold the share capital in the defendant company to M. Co., who did not wish to retain the plaintiff's services. No concluded agreement as to the plaintiff's employment by L. Co. was ever reached and the plaintiff refused all subsequent offers of employment by them. At an extraordinary general meeting of the defendant company on November 21, 1958, the plaintiff was removed from office as a director. L. Co. made further offers to employ the plaintiff in February and March, 1959, which he refused. The plaintiff claimed damages against the defendant company for wrongful dismissal:— incorporated into the articles of the defendant company, nevertheless there was an implied term in the plaintiff's agreement that the defendant company would do nothing of its own motion to put an end to the state of circumstances which enabled the plaintiff to continue as managing director and, accordingly, the defendant company was in breach of its contract with the plaintiff.

Co. and thus mitigate his damages prior to the breach of contract on November 21, 1958; that the subsequent offers of employment by the L. Co. were genuine but having regard to all the facts, including the pending litigation, the plaintiff was not unreasonable in refusing those offers and was entitled to damages of £7,500.

ACTION.

The plaintiff, Israel Shindler, claimed £33,126 damages for wrongful dismissal from his employment as managing director of the defendant company, the Northern Raincoat Co. Ltd. On a date early in 1958 the plaintiff and his wife sold the £2,000 share capital of the defendant company, which the plaintiff had built up over the previous ten years, to Loyds Retailers Ltd. for the sum of £25,000. It was a further term of this agreement that the defendant company should enter into a service agreement with the plaintiff for a period of ten years at a salary of £3,000 a year plus 10 per cent. commission on the audited annual profits over £15,000, and such an agreement was entered into under the seal of the company on April 8, 1958. From April until August, 1958, the business of the defendant company was carried on by the plaintiff as managing director under the directions and control of Loyds, whose aim at this time, as at the time of the acquisition, was to integrate the business of the defendant company with their own similar business.

In August, 1958, J. Mandleberg & Co. (Holdings) Ltd. offered to pay Loyds £65,000 for the shares of the defendant company.

"a director so appointed shall not, "while holding that office, be sub-"ject to retirement by rotation, or "taken into account in determining "the rotation or retirement of direc-"tors; but his appointment shall be "subject to determination ipso facto "if he ceases from any cause to be "a director, or if the company in "general meeting resolve that his "tenure of the office of managing "director or manager be determined." These matters are dealt with in similar terms in Article 107 of Table A of Sch. I to the Companies Act, 1948, save that that Article ends with the words: ". . . if he cease from any "cause to be a director," and does not provide for termination by resolution of the company. The removal of a director by resolution of the company is there dealt with in Article 96, which concludes: "Such removal "shall be without prejudice to any "claim such director may have for "damages for breach of any contract "of service between him and the "company."

Shindler v. Northern Raincoat Co. Ltd.

They did not wish to retain the plaintiff's services, and it was a term of their offer that the agreement between the defendant company and the plaintiff should be rescinded. On August 18, 1958, Symons, a director of Loyds and of the defendant company, told the plaintiff of Mandlebergs' offer, and added that if the offer was accepted the plaintiff's contract with the defendant company would come to an end, but Loyds would be prepared to employ him on a ten-year agreement at the same salary and with the same expenses, as controller of their shops, or in the mail order or credit trade sides of their business. The plaintiff was at this stage willing to fit in with these proposals.

On the afternoon of the same day the plaintiff saw the managing director of Mandlebergs, and told him that he would be seeing Loyds when Mandlebergs were willing to release him from his agreement with the defendant company. On this date Loyds accepted Mandlebergs' offer for the shares of the defendant company. The next day the plaintiff had a further interview with Symons at his own request, from which they parted on bad terms. Thereafter there was an exchange of correspondence in which the defendant company repeated the offers of employment by Loyds, and the plaintiff refused to accept these offers, mainly on the ground that they involved a drop in status from managing director to employee.

On November 21, 1958, after certain Chancery proceedings directed to that end, an extraordinary general meeting of the defendant company was called by the plaintiff. At this meeting resolutions were passed removing the plaintiff from his directorship of the defendant company, and terminating the service agreement. Thereafter the plaintiff commenced this action.

The defence raised three matters: (1) That the agreement of April 8, 1958, was not enforceable, in that Symons, who purported to act as a director of the defendant company in affixing the company's seal to the agreement, was not in fact a director since he did not hold the qualification share required by the articles. The defendants abandoned this point by certain admissions in their rejoinder to matters pleaded in the reply.

(2) That the agreement of April 8, 1958, was subsequently rescinded, or the plaintiff was estopped from asserting any rights under it after November 30, 1958. This situation was alleged to arise in one of three ways:

(i) At the interview of August 18, 1958, the plaintiff accepted the offer made by Symons on behalf of Loyds to employ him for ten years from a date not later than November 30, 1958, as controller of their shops at a salary of £3,000 per annum plus expenses; further, the plaintiff, or the plaintiff together with Symons, accepted this on behalf of the defendant company as a novation of the plaintiff's agreement with the defendant company.

(ii) At the interview later the same day with Symons and Strauss, the plaintiff agreed with the defendant company, through Symons, to rescind his agreement with them by stating that he had agreed to enter the employment of Loyds from a date not later than November 30, 1958, and would co-operate in the running of the defendant company for so long only as Mandlebergs wished.

(iii) In reliance upon the plaintiff's above statement as to his agreement with Loyds, the defendant company changed its position by conducting its business in accordance with the directions of Mandlebergs, and the plaintiff was therefore estopped from asserting any right to be employed by the defendant company for any period after November 30, 1958.

The plaintiff by his reply denied that there was any binding agreement between himself and Loyds.

(3) That it was a condition of the plaintiff's right to remuneration under the agreement of April 8, 1958, that he should continue to be managing director of the defendant company. The articles provided that an appointment to the office of managing director should be determined ipso facto if the holder ceased to be a director. On November 21, 1958, by a resolution passed in accordance with the articles, the defendant company removed the plaintiff from his directorship, and accordingly his dismissal from the position of managing director was lawful and not actionable.

The plaintiff by his reply admitted that he had been duly removed from his directorship, but asserted that the defendants were nevertheless liable in damages for his dismissal.

The defendant company by their rejoinder relied upon certain further offers of employment made by Loyds to limit any damages to which the plaintiff might be entitled.

D. Brabin Q.C. and C. N. Glidewell for the plaintiff.

Fenton Atkinson Q.C. and Lionel Cohen for the defendant company.

The following cases were cited in argument, in addition to those referred to in the judgment: Ross v. Pender[2] and Payzu Ltd. v. Saunders.[3]

DIPLOCK J. stated the facts and found that there was no concluded agreement between Loyds Retailers Ltd. and the plaintiff on August 18, 1958, and that the plaintiff's service agreement with the defendant company was accordingly not rescinded. His Lordship then passed to consider the third head of defence and the question of damages, on which matters alone this case is reported: The articles of association of the Northern Raincoat Co. incorporated by article (1) the articles set out in Table A of the Companies Act, 1929, and among the articles so incorporated was article 68 about managing directors which is in the following terms:

[2] (1894) 1 R. (Ct. of Sess.) 352; 11 Sc.L.R. 175.

Shindler v. Northern Raincoat Co. Ltd.

Diplock J.

"The directors may from time to time appoint one or more of "their body to the office of managing director or manager for "such term and at such remuneration (whether by way of salary, "or commission, or participation in profits, or partly in one way "and partly in another) as they may think fit, and a director so "appointed shall not, while holding that office, be subject to "retirement by rotation, or taken into account in determining "the rotation or retirement of directors; but his appointment "shall be subject to determination ipso facto if he ceases from "any cause to be a director, or if the company in general meeting "resolve that his tenure of the office of managing director or "manager be determined." Since on November 21, 1958, the plaintiff was removed from office as a director and thus ipso facto ceased to be managing director, and his tenure of office was determined by the company in general meeting, the defendants contend that as a matter of law he was not wrongfully dismissed and he had no claim in this connection. In support of that contention, Mr. Atkinson, for the defendants, relied upon a number of cases, of which the most important are Bluett v. Stuchbury's [1] and the decision of Harman J. in Read v. Astoria Garage (Streatham) Ltd.[2]

The argument for the defendants on this matter, which gains some support from the cases I have referred to and from Nelson v. Nelson (James) & Son Ltd.,[3] must, I think, be put thus: where a company's articles of association include article 68, the directors have no power to appoint a managing director on terms which purport to exclude the company's right to terminate his office and his appointment as managing director ipso facto upon his ceasing to be a director, or by resolution in general meeting to resolve that his tenure of office as managing director be determined. That argument can be put in alternative ways, either that an agreement for a fixed term which does not incorporate the right of the company set out in article 68 is ultra vires, or else that an agreement for a fixed term must be subject to the implied term, that it is terminable in either of the circumstances set out at the end of article 68.

It seems to me that this point is concluded against the defendants by the decision of the House of Lords in Southern Foundries v. Shirlaw.[4] That case was somewhat complicated, and gave rise to a division of opinion in the House of Lords. Two of their Lordships who were most familiar with the chancery side came to one conclusion, and three of their Lordships who were perhaps more familiar with the common law side came to another. There are some references in subsequent cases in the Chancery Division which suggest that it is difficult to ascertain what Southern Foundries v. Shirlaw[4] determined. It does, however, seem to me that all five of their Lordships in the Southern Foundries case[4] were agreed upon one principle of law which is vital to the defendants' contention in this case. That principle of law is that laid down in the case of Stirling v. Maitland,[5] where Cockburn L.J. said[6]: "if a party enters into an arrangement which can "only take effect by the continuance of a certain existing set of "circumstances, there is an implied engagement on his part that "he shall do nothing of his own motion to put an end to "that state of circumstances under which alone the arrangement "can be operative." Applying that respectable principle to this case, there is an implied engagement on the part of the company that it will do nothing of its own motion to put an end to the state of circumstances which enables the plaintiff to continue as managing director: that is to say, an undertaking that it will not revoke his appointment as a director and will not resolve that his tenure of office be determined.

It is necessary to say a word about the circumstances of the Southern Foundries case.[7] In that case the plaintiff had a ten-year contract as managing director of Southern Foundries Ltd. At the time when he was appointed the articles of the company were not in the form of article 68. The relevant articles were these:—

Article 90: "The directors may from time to time appoint "any one or more of their body to be managing director, or "managing directors, for such period and upon such terms as "they think fit . . ."

Article 91: "A managing director shall not while he continues "to hold that office be subject to retirement by rotation and he "shall not be taken into account in determining the rotation of "retirement of directors; but he shall, subject to the provisions "of any contract between him and the company, be subject to "the same provisions as to resignation and removal as the other "directors of the company, and if he cease to hold the office of "director he shall ipso facto and immediately cease to be a "managing director."

Article 105 is important: "The company may by extraordinary "resolution remove any ordinary director before the expiration of "his period of office, and may, if thought fit, by ordinary resolu-"tion appoint another director in his stead . . ."

Thus there was in the articles in force at the time that the managing director's agreement was entered into an article which enabled the company by extraordinary resolution to determine his appointment by removing him as a director. Subsequently, the articles were changed and an article was inserted which gave another company, the Federated Foundries Ltd., a stranger to the contract of employment, power at any time, by an instrument in writing, to remove from office any director of Southern Foundries Ltd. The matter which gave rise to a dissension of opinion in the House of Lords was whether when Federated Foundries Ltd. exercised that power as they did by removing the plaintiff that constituted wrongful dismissal of the plaintiff. The majority of the House held that the fact that it was done by a third party who was given power to do so by the new article did not prevent this being wrongful dismissal although it was done by a stranger to the contract and did not, on the face of it, come within the principle in Stirling v. Maitland.[8] The minority took the view that it did not come within the Stirling v. Maitland[8] principle because the articles were altered in good faith and the act was the act of a third party. All of their Lordships made it quite plain that in their view if the company did exercise the power under the original articles by removing the plaintiff as director by extraordinary resolution, that would have been a breach of the implied term laid down in Stirling v. Maitland[8] and would have given rise to the right to damages.

Lord Maugham said[9]: "In my opinion it would have been a "breach of the negative term properly understood for Southern "to have removed the respondent under article 105 from his "position as director during the ten years; but I am also of "opinion that it was not a breach of any implied term in the "agreement for Southern to alter its articles as was done and "to include in the altered articles the new article 8." Lord Atkin said,[10] after referring to Stirling v. Maitland[11]: "I think "it follows that if either the company of its own motion removed "the respondent from the office of director under article 105, or "if the respondent caused his office of director to be vacated by "giving one month's notice of resignation under article 89, either "of them would have committed a breach of the agreement . . ." Lord Wright, who is with the majority, came to the same conclusion.[12] Lord Romer, who was the other member of the minority, deals with this matter thus[13]: "But the agreement "by Southern to employ the respondent, or his agreement to "serve them, could only take effect for the full ten years, if the "respondent continued to be a director during that period. In "these circumstances there was in my opinion an implied "engagement on the part of Southern that they would not during "that period exercise their power of removing him from his "directorship under Article 105, and an implied obligation on "his part that he would not during that period serve notice of "resignation under Article 89 (f)." He then referred to Stirling v. Maitland.[11]

It seems to me, therefore, that the decision of their Lordships in Southern Foundries v. Shirlaw,[14] which is, of course, binding on me, is conclusive in the plaintiff's favour and that this defence fails. I should, however, be doing an injustice to Mr. Atkinson's argument if I did not refer to the cases on which he relies and in particular to Reid v. Astoria Garage (Streatham) Ltd., before Harman J.[15]

That was a case where a company whose articles included article 68 of Table A, and whose directors had by resolution appointed the plaintiff to be managing director of the company at a salary of £7 a week from Monday, February 1, 1932. On September 28, 1949, an extraordinary general meeting of the company passed a resolution dismissing him and resolving that his tenure of office be terminated. In these circumstances, he brought an action for breach of contract, alleging that he was entitled, as servants normally are, to reasonable notice. Harman J. held that the action failed, and I think it is plain that the ratio decidendi, if it could be reconciled with the House of Lords' decision in Southern Foundries (1926) Ltd. v. Shirlaw,[14] would be in favour of the defendants.

Harman J. said[16]: "It is difficult to find any direct authority "for this matter. The nearest case, I think, is Nelson v. Nelson "(James) & Sons Ltd.,[17] where the facts were quite different "because, for one thing, there was a special article expressly "empowering the board to revoke a managing director's appoint-"ment and not a Table A article, and for another thing (to quote "the headnote): 'The board appointed the plaintiff to be "'managing director upon the terms of an agreement which "'provided that he should hold office so long as he should remain "'a director of the company and retain his due qualification "'and efficiently perform the duties of the office.' The board "subsequently revoked that appointment, relying on their express "power to revoke. Lord Reading C.J.[18] said that one must "read that power to revoke as subject to the contract which "had been made, and that contract, he said, was for a term "of years, and the power to revoke only gave the directors "'power to take away that which they had given provided that "'they had not bound themselves to give it for any period of "'time.' He said that that was an appointment for a period "of time and could not by the exercise of a power of revocation "be altered. Swinfen Eady L.J., however, does deal with "Table A. He says[19]: 'The articles may give a power to the "'directors to appoint one of their number to be managing "'director, but no power to revoke or cancel the appointment. "'The company may keep that power in its own hands to be "'exercised in general meeting.' That is the position under "Table A in the Companies Act, 1908, which is the same for "this purpose as the Act of 1929. He goes on: 'With an article "'in that form it is manifest that the directors can only appoint " ' a managing director subject to the right of the company in " ' general meeting to resolve at any time that his tenure of the " ' office of the managing director is to be determined.' These " observations are obiter, but, nevertheless, they are germane " to the matter in question.

" In Southern Foundries (1926) Ltd. v. Shirlaw,[20] there was " a division both in the House of Lords and in the Court of " Appeal. The majority held that there was a breach of contract " if a company which had appointed a managing director for " ten years allowed its articles to be so altered that a power to " remove was imported. I do not think, in view of the unfor- " tunate differences of opinion which made themselves plain, " that the case helps very much.

" It seems to me that I ought to apply the observations of " Swinfen Eady L.J. in the Nelson case.[19] The article does, " after all, say quite clearly that the appointment is ' subject " ' to determination ipso facto if the company resolve ' that that " be so. So, everybody who becomes a managing director of " this company which has adopted Table A knows that he has " certain rights, and that the board cannot alter them. It may " be that the company cannot, by altering its articles, give them " power to do that. That would seem to be so from the majority " decision in the House of Lords in Southern Foundries (1926) " Ltd. v. Shirlaw.[21] But that does not, it seems to me, forbid, " as being a breach of contract, the company itself (having power " to dismiss) to exercise that power, because every contract which " is entered into with the company must on the face of it be " subject to that chance."

There is no doubt that in that judgment the ratio decidendi is in the defendants' favour, although it seems to me, with the greatest respect, that it cannot be reconciled with the opinions of their Lordships in Southern Foundries.[21] Reid v. Astoria Garage (Streatham) Ltd. went, however, to the Court of Appeal, where the decision was upheld.[22] The Court of Appeal did not, however, as I read it, adopt the ratio decidendi of Harman J.

After referring to the passage I have already read in the judgment of Harman J., in which he refers to the judgment of Swinfen Eady L.J. in Nelson v. Nelson (James) & Sons Ltd., Jenkins L.J. continues[23]: " It will be seen that the learned Lord " Justice was there recognising that where a company in general " meeting reserves the right to determine the appointment of a " managing director, the directors cannot by the appointment of a " managing director for some fixed term, override that power in " the company. At all events, I think it is plain that where " there is an article in that form, a managing director, whose " appointment is determined by the company in general meeting " in exercise of that power, cannot claim to have been wrongfully "dismissed unless he can show that an agreement has been "entered into between himself and the company, the terms of "which are inconsistent with the exercise by the company of "the power conferred on it by the article to determine a managing "director's appointment in general meeting. In the present case, "as I have said before, there is no evidence of the existence of "any such contract." It seems to me that Jenkins L.J. did not accept the full ratio decidendi of Harman J. and left open the question of whether, where an agreement has been entered into between the managing director and the company, the terms of which are inconsistent with the exercise of the company's power conferred upon it by the articles, and the company exercise that power, there is an action for wrongful dismissal. Having regard to the articles I have indicated and to the authorities in particular, and to Southern Foundries v. Shirlaw,[24] I answer this question in the affirmative and hold that the defence fails on this point.

That leads me to the last question which I have to determine, the matter of damages. It is a matter which has given me very great difficulty and I must deal with two contentions on behalf of the defendants. The relevant facts are these: The plaintiff was dismissed on November 21, 1958. He advertised in December for employment, but without success, and he answered a large number of advertisements in the Press. He has provided me with a schedule of advertisements, offering his services for high executive posts. He was unsuccessful, he says, in obtaining any employment of that nature, and it was not until February 5, 1960, well over 12 months after his employment was terminated, that he got a job as a salesman at a salary of £9 a week, plus £5 expenses and commission on the amount of business which he obtains. That job he holds now. After the termination of his employment and while he was seeking work, Loyds Retailers Ltd. wrote him a letter, dated February 11, 1959, in the following terms:

"Dear Mr. Shindler,

"I am writing to you as I understand that you have recently "advertised for a position. As you know, this company was very "interested in acquiring your services and, despite the events of "the past months, we would still be interested in your joining "us on the shops side, at a salary of £3,000 per annum, plus "full time use of a car and expenses incurred. The position "would, of course, be on a full time basis. I look forward to "hearing from you.

"Yours faithfully,

"(signed) L. Symons."

The plaintiff took no notice of that letter and on March 2 a further letter was written by Mr. Symons as follows:

Shindler v. Northern Raincoat Co. Ltd.

Diplock J.

"Dear Mr. Shindler,

"Would you please let me know whether or not you are "interested in the offer made to you in my letter of the 11th "ultimo. We desire to fill this position with all speed and as "we feel that you suit our requirements I have left several "other interviews pending waiting for your reply. Will you, "therefore, please be good enough to get into touch with me as "quickly as possible and if I do not hear from you within the "course of the next week then I shall have to reluctantly assume "that you are not interested. This would leave me with no "alternative but to carry on with other interviews to fill the "position as the matter to us is most urgent."

That drew a reply on March 5 from the plaintiff, at great length, which I need not read. It was an abusive and bitter letter, turning down the offer.

I must first deal with the contentions made by the defendants. It is said on their behalf that it is the duty of the plaintiff to mitigate his damages—or perhaps a better way of putting it is that he is under a duty to take reasonable steps to mitigate his damages: alternatively, it is said that the true measure of damages is the loss which can reasonably be expected to result from the breach and that includes loss arising during a reasonable time spent in obtaining other employment. The first contention of the defendants is, that being so, that the plaintiff ought to have accepted the original offer of £3,000 a year, which was made in August and September, 1958. There seems to me to be two objections to that: one of fact and one of law. I will deal with the objection in law first.

The position was that, on the correspondence, the defendants had, by the letter dated September 2, 1958, told the plaintiff that his service with them would terminate not later than November 30, 1958. That was a wrongful repudiation of contract which the plaintiff had an opportunity either to accept by rescinding the contract and thus entitle himself to sue for damages, or to continue to treat the contract as subsisting and to continue to serve as managing director. He elected to do the latter and there was accordingly no breach of the contract on which he could sue until his office as director was terminated on November 21, and between September 2 and November 21 the defendants had a locus paenitentiae in which they could have changed their minds and decided to go on employing him. It seems to me that on a matter of law it cannot be said that there is any duty on the part of the plaintiff to mitigate his damages before there had been any breach, which he has accepted as a breach.

The objection in fact seems to be this. In his solicitor's letter dated September 27, 1958, the plaintiff expressed willingness to accept, or, as it was put, was "not unwilling to accept," the alternative post offered by Loyds Retailers Ltd., provided his functions were clearly defined and the letter continued: "the "acceptance is on the strict understanding that in so doing he "does not in any way prejudice his claims arising out of the "breach of his contract. . . ." The letter in reply, dated October 1, stated that the proviso "is of course not acceptable to "our clients. . . ." Therefore, the only offer which was before him at that moment was an offer of employment on the terms that he should not act on such legal rights as he had for damages for breach of contract against the defendants. It seems to me that it was not reasonable to ask him, or to require him, to accept such an offer. That matter is self evident.

The second contention of the defendants is that whatever may be said about the earlier offers, namely, those made in February and March, 1959, after he had been dismissed, there were further offers which ought to have been accepted by the plaintiff if he were acting reasonably. The plaintiff invites me to say that these offers were not sincerely made. They were merely offers designed to reduce the possible damages in this litigation. Since that charge has been made, I think it right to say that I am satisfied that these offers were genuine offers and that Loyds considered that the plaintiff was a man with a flair who could be useful to them in their business and they were prepared, despite what had gone before, to make use of his services. But the fact that I have found that the offers were genuine offers, of course, does not conclude the matter, because I have to consider whether it was reasonable for the plaintiff to refuse them. I may have indicated that I have no great moral admiration for the attitude which the plaintiff has taken in this case, but I have still got to consider, using common sense, whether it was reasonable in all the circumstances to expect the plaintiff to accept the offer of employment from Loyds made in February and March, 1959. The plaintiff said that he thought that the offers were not genuine, and I have no doubt that he did so think.

It seems to me that in all the circumstances, having regard to the row which had taken place between the plaintiff and Mr. Symons of Loyds at their last significant meeting, to the fact that there had already been litigation about the calling of the meeting on the question of the dismissal of the plaintiff, to the fact that the litigation in this action had already reached the stage at which the pleadings were being delivered thick and fast, and to the fact that the letter offering the employment was not sent, as it might well have been at that stage, through the solicitors; and having regard especially to the fact that the employment was one of personal services where the plaintiff would have to act under the direction of Mr. Amelan, the managing director of Loyds, and Mr. Symons, I think as a matter of common sense it would not be right to say that the plaintiff was unreasonable, at that time in those circumstances, in refusing the offer. These are the two contentions of the defendants which go to the root of the question on the amount of damages.

I am in great difficulty in assessing the damages in this case.

SHINDLER v. NORTHERN RAINCOAT CO. LTD.

Diplock J.

I am surprised—and I express my surprise—that the plaintiff has failed to get any substantial employment, or indeed any employment at all for some 12 months afterwards, and I feel a little dubious as to whether he has tried as hard as he has sought to give the appearance of trying. It would not, however, be right for me to say that I am satisfied that he could have got other employment at a comparable salary, at £3,000 a year, during the period which has elapsed until now; but having seen him, I feel pretty confident that once this action is over he will overcome some of the difficulties which have presented themselves until now and obtain employment, and I do not doubt that during the course of the next eight years, and pretty soon, he will find some employment in which his undoubted flair can be used at a level more commensurate with it than that which exists at the moment in his present employment.

This is a case in which I have got to take into consideration the principles laid down in British Transport Commission v. Gourley[25] as to the incidence of taxation, and in which I have got to make the best forecast I can as to his future employment and to take into consideration what would be the worth of the 10 per cent. commission on profits over £15,000 a year, in the management of the defendants by Mandlebergs.

Taking the best view I can and making the best estimate I can, and taking a more optimistic view than the plaintiff does as to the prospects of his future employment, I think that a proper figure for damages in this case is £7,500.

Trusts—Variation—Act of 1958*—Protective trust—Exercise of power of appointment—Appointment to enable arrangement for division of trust fund—Intention to benefit appointees—Consequential benefit to appointor—Whether fraud on power—Whether court should approve arrangement—Variation of Trusts Act,* 1958 (6 & 7 Eliz. 2, c. 53), s. 1.

Power of Appointment—Fraud on power—Benefit to non-object—Purpose to benefit objects—Subsequent discovery of possible benefit to appointor—Whether purpose changed—Whether fraud on power.

A testator devised and bequeathed part of his estate on trust for his son, the applicant, for life on protective trusts and after his death upon trust for such of the applicant's issue, born within 21 years of the applicant's death, as he should by deed, revocable or irrevocable, or by will or codicil appoint, and in default of appointment on trust for his children equally.

The applicant, who had three children, desired to make some immediate capital provision for them consistently with his being in no worse position financially. He was advised that, having regard to the protected life interest it was not possible for him to deal with the capital of the trust fund without the approval of the court under the Variation of Trusts Act, 1958. It was, therefore, proposed that he should exercise his power of appointment irrevocably in favour of his three children equally and that the court should be asked to approve an arrangement whereby the capital of the applicant's share in the trust fund was to be divided between the applicant and his children in accordance with the actuarial values of their respective interests therein. Subsequently he was advised that the capital sum which he would receive on such a division would purchase an annuity of an amount larger than the amount of the income he was then receiving. On February 8, 1960, the applicant made the proposed appointment.

On an application under section 1 of the Variation of Trusts Act, 1958,[1] for the court's approval of the proposed arrangement on behalf of the persons who would be entitled to a discretionary interest under the protective trusts if the applicant forfeited his life interest:—

Held, that the fact that the applicant was at an intermediate stage advised that his financial position would be improved if the appointment were made and the arrangement approved by the court did not justify the supposition that his original purpose and intention to benefit his children and not himself were changed or added to. The appointment was not, therefore, a fraud on the power of appointment and the arrangement was one which the court could approve.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

By his will, dated November 18, 1933, the testator, William Bruce Robertson, devised and bequeathed his residuary estate to his executor and trustee, the Royal Bank of Scotland, upon trust to set aside such sum as should be sufficient to produce a sum of £1,100 per annum to be paid to his wife during her life, and after her death to be divided between his children on certain trusts. Subject thereto the trust fund was to be held on trust to divide it into five equal parts and to hold two such fifth parts on trust for the applicant, one of the testator's children, the remaining shares in the trust fund to be divided amongst the testator's other children on similar trusts. Clause 13 of the will provided that the children's shares in (inter alia) the trust fund were not to vest absolutely in them but were to be held upon trust for such child during his or her life until he or she did or attempted to do or suffered any act or thing (other than an advance under any statutory or express power) whereby, if the income were payable absolutely to such child, he or she would be deprived of the right to receive the same or any part thereof, in which case that trust of the income was to fail or determine. If the trust did fail or determine during the life of such child then, during the residue of that period, the income was to be held upon trust for the maintenance or support, or otherwise for the benefit of all or any of the following: (a) such child and his or her wife or husband (if any), and his or her children or remoter issue (if any); (b) if there were no wife or husband or issue of such child, he or she and the persons who would, if he or she were dead, be entitled to the trust property as the trustee or trustees for the time being in its or their absolute discretion thought fit. After the death of such child, his or her share was to be held upon trust for such one or more of his or her issue born before the expiration of 21 years after his or her decease as he or she might by deed, with or without power of revocation, and new appointment or by will or codicil appoint. In default of, and subject to such appointment, the share was to be held upon trust for all the children or any the child of the child of the testator who attained the age of 21 years, if more than one equally. The will further provided that the bank might exercise the statutory power of advancement contained in section 32 of the Trustee Act, 1925, in favour of any of the testator's grandchildren, but so that not more than £2,000 should be advanced to any one grandchild.

The testator died on July 19, 1934, and his widow on September 28, 1955.

The applicant had three children, Ian Bruce Robertson, born on April 16, 1932, Gillian Mary Robertson (now Gillian Mary Foster), born on August 9, 1936, and William David Robertson, born on June 21, 1939. In January, 1953, the bank advanced £2,000 to the applicant's elder son; and in November, 1955, advanced £2,000 to each of his other two children.

The applicant wished to make some immediate capital provision for his sons and to provide for his daughter on her marriage, which took place on March 30, 1960. His elder son, a captain in Her Majesty's Army, was married with three infant children. His younger son wished, when he had completed his National Service in the Army in January, 1961, to become an underwriter at Lloyd's, for which a substantial deposit of capital would be required. The applicant also wished to reduce the estate duty which would become payable on his death in respect of the trust fund.

According to additional information supplied to the court, the applicant was advised by counsel on October 5, 1959, that because of the protective trusts affecting his interest in the trust fund he could not release it without the assistance of the court; but that he could exercise his power of appointment in favour of his three children and apply to the court to approve an arrangement whereby he would release his life interest. At a conference with counsel on October 29, 1959, the applicant stated that he was not in a position to give up completely his interest in the trust fund; the possibility of dividing his share in the trust fund between himself and his children in accordance with the actuarial values of their respective interests in it was suggested by counsel and agreed to by the applicant, provided that an actuarial valuation showed that the amount he would receive would be sufficient to purchase an annuity to replace the income he would be giving up. On November 11, 1959, a fellow of the Institute of Actuaries valued the applicant's interest in his two-fifths share in the trust fund at 33/75 of the share, and the children's interest at 42/75 of the share, and advised that the applicant's 33/75 share would purchase an annuity of an amount in fact larger than the amount of the income he was at present enjoying from the trust fund.

By a deed of appointment dated February 8, 1960, the applicant, in exercise of the power of appointment given to him by the will, irrevocably appointed that from and after his death, and in the meantime subject and without prejudice to the prior interests therein during his life, the trustee or trustees for the time being of the will should hold his two-fifths share in the trust fund as to one equal third part thereof in trust for each of his three children absolutely, the interest of his younger son being contingent on his attaining the age of 21 years (which he did on June 21, 1960).

By an originating summons dated February 15, 1960, to which the bank and the applicant's three children were respondents, the applicant asked the court to approve an arrangement whereby the bank should, as from the operative date, divide his two-fifths share in the trust fund into 75 equal parts, and should hold 33 parts for the applicant absolutely, and 14 parts for each of his three children absolutely. The arrangement also provided that the three children should effect a single premium policy or single premium policies with such insurance company as they might select for the aggregate sum of £9,200 payable to them in equal shares in the event of the death of the applicant within five years from the operative date, which premium or premiums should not exceed (unless such respondents otherwise agreed) in the aggregate £1,200. The operative date was defined as the date on which the insurance or, if more than one, the last of the insurances should be effected.

Peter Oliver for the bank.
D. J. Nicholls for the applicant's two elder children.

RUSSELL J. I myself raised the question whether possibly the appointment was a fraud on the power because, if so, the proposed scheme of arrangement, involving the disbursement of the fund, would be one which the court ought not to approve. I have considered the evidence and the additional information supplied to the court as to the working out of the scheme, and I am satisfied that there is no reason to continue to suppose that there was a fraud on the power. It is quite plain that, from the inception, the purpose and intention of the applicant was to benefit the three children and not himself by making the appointment in question: his only requirement was that he should be in no worse position with regard to the trust fund whether the scheme went through or not. It is the fact that he was at an intermediate stage advised that his financial position would actually be improved if the appointment was made and the court approved the scheme. I do not think that justifies the supposition that his purpose or intention was changed or added to. I do not think it appropriate that I should deliver a judgment discussing and adding to the reported authorities on the subject of fraud on a power. I have had a number of such authorities cited to me; but I do not think it necessary for me to deal with them, though I am very much indebted to counsel for drawing my attention to them.

Order made approving the scheme. Costs and expenses incidental to the application and costs of the other parties on the common fund basis (including costs of the negotiation and preparation of the scheme preceding the issue of the summons) to be paid out of the applicant's two-fifths share in the trust fund. A memorandum of the order to be endorsed on the probate of the will.

[1957 O. No. 657.]

Master and Servant—Remuneration—Absence from work through sickness—Production manager employed at basic salary plus bonus—Whether implied term negativing employee's right to payment during period of sickness—Whether employee entitled to be paid bonus.

Master and Servant—Contract of service—Implied term—Absence from work through sickness—Whether remuneration payable—Notice ending service—Whether one week sufficient—Weekly salary.

The defendants advertised for a production manager for their skirt factory and the plaintiff, who was experienced in the manufacture and design of skirts, answered the advertisement. An interview took place during which the defendants offered to engage the plaintiff at a salary of £30 a week, but no concluded agreement was reached. The plaintiff did not consider £30 a week a satisfactory salary and he wrote to the defendants asking to see their managing director again. A further interview took place and, as a result, on December 1, 1954, the defendants wrote to the plaintiff confirming that "we are agreeable to engage you as "production manager . . . at a salary of £30 a week with an "addition of 2d. per skirt bonus on all skirts manufactured at the "factory . . ." On the following day the plaintiff accepted the position. In accepting the defendants' offer the plaintiff did not have in mind the matter of payment of salary during periods of absence from work through sickness; had the matter been broached, the defendants would have proposed that in the event of absence through sickness he should be entitled to receive his salary and bonus for one week only, and the plaintiff would not have agreed.

The plaintiff worked for the defendants until November 12, 1956, when he became ill and was unable to work until January 19, 1957. On that day he was ready to return to work, when he found that he had been replaced as production manager and would be required to work on different terms. He thereupon wrote to the defendants giving three months' notice of his resignation and the defendants, treating his letter as one week's notice, terminated his engagement on January 29, 1957. The defendants in fact paid the plaintiff his basic salary of £30 a week during the time he was away ill and up to January 29, 1957, although not admitting any obligation to do so for more than one week. On a claim by the plaintiff that he was also entitled to payment of the bonus of 2d. a skirt on all skirts produced at the factory during that period:—

Held, (1) that where a written contract of service was silent as to payment during periods of absence through sickness, the employer was liable to pay the employee until the contract was determined unless he could establish an implied term in the contract negativing the employee's right to receive payment and that, since the plaintiff and the defendants would have at once been in disagreement had the matter been mooted when the contract was entered into, no such term could be implied, so that the defendants were liable to pay the plaintiff during the time he was ill (post, pp. 1064, 1067).

(2) That, on the facts, it having been first suggested that the plaintiff should work for a basic salary of £30 and then that he should receive the basic salary plus the bonus, the plaintiff's remuneration under the contract was his basic salary plus bonus, and it was that full remuneration which he was entitled to receive while absent through sickness. Accordingly, the plaintiff was entitled to recover the amount of the bonus claimed.

Semble. Seven days was insufficient notice to terminate the contract of service (post, p. 1066).

ACTION.

In December, 1954, the plaintiff, Lewis Orman, was engaged by the defendants, Saville Sportswear Ltd., as production manager at their skirt factory. The plaintiff, who had had great experience in the production and design of skirts, answered an advertisement of the defendants and, as a result, on November 20, 1954, had an interview with the defendants' managing director. No concluded agreement was reached at that interview, but the managing director offered to engage the plaintiff at a salary of £30 a week. The plaintiff did not consider that a satisfactory salary in view of the work he would be required to do, and he asked to see the managing director again. The managing director wrote to him: "I am in receipt of your letter and note your mis-"giving that in your estimation the factory is not large enough for "your capabilities. I am prepared in the circumstances to wait "until you are in a position to make a definite decision regarding "the change, but I would ask you to let me know within the next "week or so. Finance is of secondary interest to me as it is my "intention to build up a nucleus of a larger project to this factory. "Please bear this in mind if you think there will be any loss to "you financially, as I feel that this side could be overcome "amicably between ourselves."

A further interview took place, as a result of which the two letters forming the contract of service were written. The first, dated December 1, 1954, from the managing director to the plaintiff was as follows: "Further to our interview on Monday, "we confirm that we are agreeable to engage you as production "manager of our factory . . . at a salary of £30 per week with "an addition of 2d. per skirt bonus on all skirts manufactured at "the factory, commencing Monday, January 10, 1955. We shall "be glad to have your confirmation to this letter and we feel sure "that a pleasant relationship will develop to our mutual advan-"tage." On the following day the plaintiff replied: "I thank "you for your letter dated the 1st inst., in which you give me "the position stated, and confirm that I am pleased to accept "this, to commence on January 10, 1955." In accepting the defendants' offer the plaintiff did not have in mind the matter of payments of salary during periods of absence from work through sickness. The managing director did have that matter in mind but did not broach it to the plaintiff; had he done so, he would have proposed that in the event of absence due to illness the plaintiff should be entitled to his salary and bonus for one week only, and, had the matter been mooted, the plaintiff and the managing director would have been in disagreement.

The plaintiff worked for the defendants as their production manager until November 12, 1956, when he became ill and unable to work, suffering from coronary thrombosis, from which he did not recover until January 19, 1957. On that date, being ready to return to work, he visited the defendants' factory and found that he had been replaced as production manager and would be required to work on different terms. On the same day he wrote to the defendants giving three months' notice of his resignation, and on January 23 the managing director wrote to him, treating his letter as one week's notice, and terminating his engagement on January 29, 1957.

The defendants in fact paid the plaintiff his salary of £30 a week from November 12, 1956, during the period he was unfit to work and up to January 29, 1957, as, so they maintained, an act of grace, and not because they were under any legal obligation to do so. The plaintiff now issued a writ against the defendants claiming, inter alia, an account of the number of skirts manufactured from November 6, 1956, to January 29, 1957, and of the sum due to him in respect thereof at the rate of 2d. a skirt, payment of the amount found to be due to him on the taking of such an account, and damages for wrongful dismissal. The defendants alleged, inter alia, that it was an implied term of the contract of employment that the plaintiff was not entitled to remuneration if, by reason of ill-health or sickness, he was unable to perform his duties. They also alleged that one week was reasonable notice for the determination of the contract.

A sum of money was paid into court by the defendants in respect of the claim for damages for wrongful dismissal and certain other items, which sum the plaintiff agreed to accept, and, accordingly, the only issue before the court was the plaintiff's claim that he was entitled to be paid the bonus of 2d. a skirt on all skirts manufactured at the factory between November 6, 1956, and January 29, 1957; by agreement the amount of such bonus was quantified at £250 6s. 2d.

v.
SAVILLE
SPORTSWEAR
LTD.

PILCHER J. In this case the plaintiff, who was the production manager to the defendants, Saville Sportswear Ltd., brings this action against the defendants claiming a number of matters. Whilst the point which I have had to determine is a short one, I think it is impossible to appreciate the case fully without seeing a little of the background.

Having entered into a contract of service with the defendants, the plaintiff was absent owing to sickness for a period of about 10 weeks, and disputes arose between the parties as to his right to receive remuneration during his period of sickness.

The broad outline of the facts in the case is this. Having been engaged as production manager of the defendants early in December, 1954, the plaintiff worked for the defendants as their production manager until November 12, 1956, when he became unfitted for work and had to go sick, suffering from what turned out to be a coronary thrombosis. By January 19, 1957—that is, some nine weeks later—the plaintiff said he had recovered and was ready to return to work. But for reasons which I will indicate, he did not return to work, and on January 29, 1957, the defendants terminated his employment.

On May 31, 1957, the plaintiff issued a writ against the defendants calling for an account and payment of the amount due to him on the account, and also damages for wrongful dismissal, and certain other matters in dispute between the parties.

The statement of claim was delivered on June 4, 1957, and the defence on July 4, 1957. At a later date the defendants, having considered their position, paid into court the sum of £183 to cover the plaintiff's claim for wrongful dismissal and certain other small items in account between the parties. After further correspondence between the respective solicitors, the plaintiff agreed to accept the sum paid into court in respect of all the matters in dispute between the parties except one matter, to which I now refer, and that is the only matter which I have to determine in this case.

The plaintiff contends that under the terms of his contract of service he was entitled to receive, during the period of his absence from work due to illness until the date of his dismissal, not only what I may call his basic salary of £30 a week, which was in the contract of service, but also an appropriate sum by way of bonus to which he was also entitled under his contract of service, at any rate so long as he worked. Greatly to the advantage of everyone, the parties agreed that, if the plaintiff was entitled to recover this sum by way of bonus, it should be quantified at a sum of £250 6s. 2d.

[His Lordship read the two letters forming the contract of service, stated the facts set out above, and continued:] The contract of service is silent in regard to the matter now in issue, namely, the plaintiff's legal right to be paid either salary or salary and bonus during his absence from work due to sickness. The defendants contended that they were not liable in law to pay the plaintiff anything at all—that was their original intention—whilst he was away sick. They have now paid his basic salary, but they have not paid him the bonus which is now represented by this agreed sum of £250 odd. The only point I have to determine is whether, having regard to the terms of the plaintiff's contract of service, in all the circumstances of the case it is possible or proper to imply a further term into the written contract—namely, that the plaintiff is entitled in law to recover the bonus which he would have earned if he had continued to work for the 10 weeks that he was away sick and until his contract was terminated.

On behalf of the plaintiff it was contended as a matter of law by Mr. Bridge that the facts of this case and the evidence in the case did not permit of the implication or the introduction of any implied term. He referred me to the well-known case of Reigate v. Union Manufacturing Co. (Ramsbottom) Ltd.[1] That case concerned a contract made by a company for a fixed period to pay an agent certain commission. The company went into liquidation, and the question was whether or no, although the company had gone into liquidation, the agent was entitled to claim damages by way of commission after the company ceased to exist.

I need not go into the facts any more than that, because I cite the case only for the well-known passage in the judgment of Scrutton L.J. which deals with the implication of terms into written contracts. He said[2]: "The first thing is to see what the "parties have expressed in the contract; and then an implied "term is not to be added because the court thinks it would have "been reasonable to have inserted it in the contract. A term "can only be implied if it is necessary in the business sense to "give efficacy to the contract; that is, if it is such a term "that it can confidently be said that if at the time the contract "was being negotiated someone had said to the parties, 'What "'will happen in such a case,' they would both have replied, 'Of "'course, so and so will happen; we did not trouble to say that; "'it is too clear.' Unless the court comes to some such con-"clusion as that, it ought not to imply a term which the parties "themselves have not expressed."

Then he went on to say[3]: "As I understand, it is suggested "that the contract is only to remain in force so long as the "company carry on their business. Is that a necessary implica-"tion? If this matter had been mooted at the time when the "contract was being negotiated, I expect that the parties would "at once have disagreed as to what the position was. Unless we "are satisfied that it is an implication which must necessarily "have been in the minds of both parties, we cannot imply a term "which they have not expressed." Accordingly, the Court of Appeal refused to imply a term in that case, because there was no certainty that, if the attention of the parties had been drawn to it when the contract had been made, they would have been in agreement as to what the term was to be.

Mr. Bridge, on behalf of the plaintiff, set out the following proposition which he submitted was accurate in law: Where the contract contains no express term, and no unexpressed terms can properly be implied as to the remuneration during periods of illness, the presumption is that the contractual remuneration remains payable until the contract of service is determined. He further submitted that, on the facts and the evidence in this case, it did not permit of the implication of any term in regard to payment during absence due to sickness, and the plaintiff was accordingly entitled as a matter of law to recover during the period of his absence the whole of this remuneration consisting of basic salary and bonus.

In support of that proposition, Mr. Bridge referred me to a line of cases on this topic dealing with wages during periods of illness, starting with Marrison v. Bell.[4] I will not read the headnote in that case because it has been subject to a certain amount of criticism. It was a case in which a fruit salesman, who had been employed at £3 10s. a week for a long period by the defendant, and before that by the defendant's father, was stricken with rheumatism. He was away for several months. When he returned, he was given a week's wages in lieu of notice, so that his contract of service continued throughout the period of his absence due to sickness. The real point in that case was that the plaintiff had received National Insurance benefits during his period of sickness. The county court judge held that, having regard to that fact and other matters, he was not entitled to recover wages whilst he was absent from work due to sickness.

But the county court judge's finding was reversed by the Court of Appeal, and I only refer to Marrison v. Bell[4] because of certain passages in the judgment of Scott L.J. which are, of course, binding upon me, and which I think, if they do not completely state the law on the subject, at any rate afford a basis for it. In allowing the appeal Scott L.J. said[5]: "A long series "of decisions has been given in our courts making it quite clear "that the common law of this country does not recognise any "such rule in contracts of service as is suggested by the learned "county court judge. On the contrary, those cases say, in my "opinion quite clearly, that under a contract of service, irrespec-"tive of the question of the length of notice provided by that "contract, wages continue through sickness and incapacity from "sickness to do the work contracted for until the contract is "terminated by a notice by the employer in accordance with the "terms of the contract."

Scott L.J.[6] went on to refer to a number of cases, starting with Cuckson v. Stones[7] and Warren v. Whittingham,[8] both of which were cases in which the employee had been engaged for a period of years and was nonetheless held entitled to receive his contractual salary during the period of illness so long as the contract was subsisting.

Scott L.J. then referred to Niblett v. Midland Railway Co.[9] and said[10]: "The plaintiff was a railway employee who, upon "entering the company's service, signed an undertaking to abide "by the rules of the company. One of these rules required him "to join the railway company's friendly society, which was "independent of the company, but to the funds of which the "company contributed. By the rules of the society a member "was entitled to sick pay during illness, but not if he was "receiving wages from the company. The plaintiff became ill "in February, 1905, and received sick pay until September, when "he received notice terminating his employment. It was held "that he was not entitled to his wages during the period of his "illness on the ground that, having regard to the rules which "had to be signed by an employee as a term of his contract of "service, the rules must be read into the contract of service, and, "when so read in, necessarily involved the implication of a term "of the contract of service to the correlative effect of the rules "of the society." It was there said that if it is impossible to say that the rules were part of the contract, they were read into the contract and, consequently, governed the position of the parties. So there was no necessity there to imply a term except that, having agreed to be bound by the rules, the plaintiff was so bound and must accept whatever the rules provide.

Scott L.J.[11] then referred to Warburton v. Co-operative Wholesale Society Ltd.[12] and cited the headnote of that case: "The fact that a workman stays away from work and receives "compensation from his employers during temporary incapacity "for work resulting from injury received by him during the course "of his employment does not of itself terminate the employment, "even though the contract of his employment is merely at will." Scott L.J. went on[13]: "This is one of the cases mentioned by "the learned judge in his judgment"—that is the county court judge in Marrison v. Bell[14]—"and no doubt he had that decision "in mind when he held that the contract of employment was not "terminated by the plaintiff's illness. In that case, where the "workman was suing for wages, Lord Cozens-Hardy M.R. "said[15]: 'It has been long settled that a contract of service "'is not terminated by incapacity to work by reason of temporary " ' illness, and that on return to work the man can recover his " ' wages during the period of his absence.' "

Those are the only passages from which I wish to cite in Marrison v. Bell.[16] The next case to which I was referred was Petrie v. Mac Fisheries Ltd.[17] That was a case of a smoker packer in the defendants' fish smoking department who was absent from his work owing to illness. I need not trouble a great deal with the facts of the case, but it was proved that the defendants had put up a notice in the plaintiff's work place. The plaintiff said that he had never seen it, but he had knowledge of the arrangement referred to in the notice, and he had on two previous occasions in 1933 and 1936 been absent from work by reason of illness and had accepted half-pay in accordance with the terms of the notice. When he was taken ill again in July, 1938, he took his half-pay for five weeks and did not return to work until January, and then he later commenced an action asking for full wages during the period of illness. I refer to that case only because of the passage from the judgment of du Parcq L.J. which I think is helpful. He said[18]: " I quite see, looking again at " Marrison v. Bell,[19] and at the case which was there cited of " Warburton v. Co-operative Wholesale Society Ltd.,[20] that if " a reader of the report of Marrison v. Bell[21] confines his atten- " tion to one sentence and reads it divorced from its context, and " without relation to the subject-matter, he may come to a " wrong conclusion as to what the case decided. It is true that " Marrison v. Bell[21] adopted and approved the observations of " Lord Cozens-Hardy in the Warburton case,[22] which, when they " were spoken by Lord Cozens-Hardy, were, I think, merely dicta " and not binding on the court. It is true, if you look at the " single sentence which was cited by Scott L.J.[23] : ' It has been " ' long settled that a contract of service is not terminated by " ' incapacity to work by reason of temporary illness, and that " ' on return to work the man can recover his wages during the " ' period of his absence,' that in citing it he pointed out, as " was perfectly correct, that the words were unlimited and " unqualified. It was right to point out in Marrison v. Bell[24] " that no qualification was introduced by Lord Cozens-Hardy, " because so far as Marrison v. Bell[24] was concerned it was " material to notice that no such qualification was introduced or " suggested as would have prevented those words from applying " to the particular facts of that case, and I venture to say with " great respect that Lord Cozens-Hardy said nothing inaccurate " in that statement if it is read by somebody who does not expect " to find in a short sentence a complete statement of the whole " law. Lord Cozens-Hardy was stating a general proposition,

"which I believe to be accurate, and I think it is clearly this: "If you have a weekly hiring of a servant without more, and with "nothing in the terms of it, whether they are expressed or "implied, to suggest that during temporary absence through "illness he is not to be paid, then you may assume that he is to "be paid, and that it was the intention of the parties that he "should be paid." Those words seem to me to be important. It is true that du Parcq L.J. went on in the following sentence [25]: "I only hope that, in saying that, I have not said something "which, again taken from its context, may lend colour to argu-"ment which I certainly do not intend my words to support."

On the following page du Parcq L.J. went on to say [26]: "The "first thing to remember is that one must find out what the "contract is. It is plain that Lord Cozens-Hardy did not mean "that every contract of service, whatever terms were contained "in it, must result in a liability to pay a workman during the "time that he is ill. The terms in the contract may be express, "or they may be implied. You may have a custom" and so on.

Then, in the same case, Atkinson J. said at the conclusion of his judgment [27]: "In my opinion, Scott L.J. said nothing in "Marrison v. Bell [28] which was inconsistent with that submis-"sion." That is a submission which is referred to in the preceding paragraph. "It must be remembered that the "passage to which I have referred followed a reference to what "the county court judge had said, namely: 'When off sick, in "'the absence of any express contract, no wages due.' I think "the Court of Appeal meant that the truer view was the other "way round, and that where there is nothing in the contract, "express or implied, to the contrary, the consideration for wages "is not the actual doing of the work contracted for, but the readi-"ness and willingness, if of ability, to do the work. If that view is "right, the judge below should have asked himself the compara-"tively simple question: 'Did the terms on which the plaintiff "'was employed in 1938 exclude the right to wages if through "'illness he did no work?'" That is what, it seems, to me, I have to apply my mind to.

There is one other case to which I ought to refer, and that is O'Grady v. M. Saper Ltd. [29] I do not think that it is a very helpful case because, if I may say so, the decision was one which could hardly have been other than what it was, and it was no doubt because of the unfortunate wording of the headnote in Marrison v. Bell [30] that the county court judge decided the case in the way he did. It was the case of a commissionaire who was receiving £2 15s. or £3 a week and had been absent sick on a number of occasions. He had never been paid during the period of his sickness, and the defendants contended that the plaintiff was employed on the basis of pay when he was working, and when he ceased to work, through ill-health or for any other reason, he received no pay. The plaintiff, in substance, admitted that he never expected to be paid when he was not working, but he had seen what appears to be a garbled report of Marrison v. Bell[30] in a popular paper which led him to go to his solicitors and start proceedings. No doubt he was delighted when he succeeded before the county court judge, and equally disgusted when the defendants' appeal was allowed by the Court of Appeal. But there was no question there but that both parties knew, by the time the plaintiff started his action, that the defendants never intended to pay during the period of sickness, and that the plaintiff knew that they did not intend to pay. That was clearly a case in which it was proper to imply a term which was well known to both parties, to which they would have both assented if it had been raised when the contract was made.

MacKinnon L.J., having criticised the headnote in Marrison v. Bell,[30] said[31]: "Now the sort of contract which is involved "is usually concluded orally by people who rarely think out, and "still more rarely express any terms. The whole difficulty in "such a case is to ascertain what in truth were the terms of the "contract. Where the thing is not expressed it may be that you "have to ascertain the terms as a matter of implication, but, "in any case, it is a question upon the evidence in the case: "What were the terms of the employment? Were they an agree-"ment that the man should be paid when ready and willing to "work, or only that he should only be paid when he was actually "working? It depends upon the evidence what the terms were. In "this case, as it seems to me, there was abundant evidence that "the terms, not expressed but no doubt implied, upon which this "man was employed were that he should not be paid wages "whilst he was sick." Then the Lord Justice gave some further reasons for arriving at that conclusion, and went on[32]: "If "somebody had raised the question when they were originally "making the bargain what would they both have said about it? "What in this case they would both have said about it is best "proved, and I think is conclusively proved, by what the parties "did when the event arose. When the event arose, and he "was away ill, and he was not paid, he acquiesced in it, and, "as he said, he did not think he ought to have it; he did not "expect to get it. I come without hesitation to the conclusion "that the terms of the contract between these parties were that "he should be paid not during the period when he was ready and "willing to work but only during such period as he did work."

Having considered all these cases and the careful argument addressed to me by counsel, it seems to me that they establish the following proposition. Where the written terms of the contract of service are silent as to what is to happen in regard to the employee's rights to be paid whilst he is absent from work due to sickness, the employer remains liable to continue paying so long as the contract is not determined by proper notice, except where a condition to the contrary can properly be inferred from all the facts and the evidence in the case. If the employer—and, of course, it will always be the employer—seeks to establish an implied condition that no wages are payable, it is for him to make it out, and the court, in construing the written contract, will not accept any implied term which will not pass the test laid down by Scrutton L.J. in Reigate v. Union Manufacturing (Ramsbottom) Co. Ltd.,[33] to which I have referred earlier in this judgment.

In my view, it is clear from the evidence in this case that if the matter had been mooted when the contract of service was made between the plaintiff and the defendants' managing director, the situation envisaged by Scrutton L.J. in the Reigate case,[33] namely, that the plaintiff and the managing director would at once have disagreed, would have obtained. I am accordingly of the opinion that in this contract no implied term in regard to payment during the period of illness can properly be introduced at all. It follows, therefore, that on the authorities the defendants remain liable to pay the plaintiff from the time when he ceased work until the contract of service was determined.

As I have said earlier in this judgment, the defendants paid the plaintiff for the material period what I call his basic salary of £30 a week. All I have to determine is whether he is entitled to the £250 6s. 2d. which represents the appropriate amount of bonus during the period which he was away. The defendants' managing director, who was for my purposes the defendant company, was at first insistent that the defendants had only paid the plaintiff his basic salary as an act of grace. But eventually he conceded that he recognised that the defendants were liable to pay the plaintiff both basic salary and bonus, but he limited his understanding of the matter to there being a legal liability to pay that for seven days. He agreed that he was anxious to retain the plaintiff's services, and might have been prepared to pay him his basic salary for a longer period as an act of grace. This was clearly not the view which the plaintiff formed in regard to his rights, although he admitted that, when he entered into the contract of service, he had not the matter of payment during periods of sickness in his mind at all.

I propose to read one or two short passages from the plaintiff's and the managing director's evidence. The plaintiff said: "I "never thought about the question of illness at all when I took "the job on. I always had good health, so I cannot tell you "now what I might have had in mind as I never considered the "matter at all." That seems to me to be exactly what one would expect, and I accept that entirely from the plaintiff.

The managing director said this: "Although I had the point

Pilcher J.

"about payment during illness in mind at my interview with the "plaintiff, I never broached it to him. I should consider the "plaintiff legally entitled to his salary and his bonus if he were "away for two or three days owing to illness. I would also have "paid him his salary and bonus if he had been away a week. "I agree that when we were making the contract neither the "plaintiff nor I would have thought for a moment that the plain-"tiff was not entitled to salary and bonus if absent from work "through illness for a week. If I broached the matter at our "interview, I should have proposed that in the event of absence "due to illness the plaintiff should be entitled to salary and bonus "for one week only. I might quite easily have gone on paying "him longer as an act of grace. Although I had the question of "pay during illness in mind, I did not mention it to the plaintiff, "as I thought I could dismiss the plaintiff on a week's notice. "When the plaintiff fell ill, I thought I was entitled to give "him a week's notice. He was, however, a very good man, and "I wanted to keep him on the hook." I think that was my expression, and not the managing director's.

I hope I can say without offence that I rather doubt whether he had the matter so cut and dried in his mind when he was interviewing the plaintiff as he now feels he did. I am satisfied of one thing, that if he thought, nothing having been said about it, that this was the type of contract which could be determined by seven days' notice, he was wrong. The plaintiff was earning, in total, something in the neighbourhood of £2,500 a year and had a very important and responsible job. I think that the managing director was wrong in what he thought, but that does not matter, except in so far as it may have influenced him in the length of time during which he was prepared to pay the plaintiff while he was sick.

There are two letters in the correspondence to which I think I ought now to refer. On January 19 the plaintiff was recovered from his illness—so he thought, and so he said. I am sure he said it honestly. He was invited round to the managing director's office, and when he got there he was very upset, and why he was upset is set out in this letter: "Having now recovered from "my illness, and upon calling at your request at your office this "morning to discuss my return to the factory as factory manager "(as hitherto) I am amazed to find that during my enforced "absence through illness I have been replaced in my position "by another, and that the conditions under which I would be "permitted to return to the factory would be such as to be most "degrading in respect of the position I held at the time I became "ill. In the circumstances I must advise you that it is impos-"sible for me to return to the factory under such conditions as "this would place me junior to a newcomer, and consequently "I must advise that if this is your final word, then this letter "be taken as my formal three months' notice of resignation, "terminating my association with the company on April 19 this "year. Should you so desire, I shall be pleased to work out "these three months at the factory in my original capacity or "failing this I am prepared to terminate all association with the "company forthwith and upon receipt of salary in lieu of such "notice up to above mentioned date. In closing I would remind "you that holiday pay up to April 19 this year will become due," and I will not trouble about that.

On January 23 the managing director replied: "I am in "receipt of your letter of the 19th instant. I do not propose to "enter into a correspondence with you regarding either your past "employment or your return to employment, except to say that "none of your complaints have any foundation whatsoever, and "you well know that to be so. The terms of your employment "with us were such that only one week's notice of termination "on either side was required. You have no right to give notice "of termination to take effect on April 19 next, and I do not "accept your letter as any notice of that kind. I accept your "letter as one week's notice, and enclose herewith cheque value "£60 2s." That is made up of a number of items, the first of which is one week's pay to January 22, 1957, "as an act of "grace." That, so far as I know—because I accept what the plaintiff says—is the first intimation the plaintiff ever had that this weekly payment was being made as an act of grace to him.

I think it right that I should also mention this. The plaintiff, who had, at any rate during the earlier part of his illness, been a very sick man, had accepted the £30 thinking, no doubt, that he was entitled to it, but had not suggested that he ought to have anything more by way of bonus. The plaintiff explained that in this fashion. He said: "I was ill. In the past I have very "often only collected my bonus every couple of months. I had "the material from which to calculate it, and the fact that I did "not mention it does not mean that I did not think I was entitled "to it." If that be material, I accept what he says.

The plaintiff then put the matter in the hands of solicitors, and on January 25 they wrote a long letter setting out the plaintiff's case. In that letter they said: "The calculation you have "made in your letter of the 23rd instant is only upon the basic "salary and does not take into account the bonus." If I may say so, the plaintiff's solicitors were quickly on to the point, whether or not it had been in the plaintiff's mind before that.

I am satisfied in this case upon the authorities that, when the written contract is silent as to payment during absence through sickness, the employer must continue to pay his employee unless he, the employer, can satisfy the court that it is a case in which a term negativing the employee's right to remuneration can properly be implied, such an implied term being one which would satisfy the test laid down by Scrutton L.J. in Reigate v. Union

Manufacturing (Ramsbottom) Co. Ltd.[34] Upon the admitted facts and the evidence in this case it is reasonably clear that, if the matter had been mooted when the contract was made, the plaintiff and the managing director would at once have been in disagreement. It follows that no term can be implied and the defendants remain liable to the plaintiff until the contract of service is terminated. They paid his basic salary and, as I have already said, I am doubtful whether the managing director really applied his mind to whether those payments were made as an act of grace or not. I am satisfied that the plaintiff, being a very sick man, did not apply his mind to the question whether he was entitled to bonus, at any rate until he went to see his solicitor. No doubt he hoped he would get it, but he had not made any formal claim. These matters are not of any great importance once the legal rights of the parties are ascertained.

It was argued by Mr. Levene, rather attractively, that a very clear distinction should be drawn between the plaintiff's legal right to his basic salary and his legal right to the bonus. Mr. Levene put it in this way. He said that the consideration for payment of the basic wage may be willingness or readiness to work, but the consideration of payment of bonus must be the work itself. He continued by saying that it might be that the managing director realised that he was legally bound to pay the plaintiff his basic salary, but never dreamed that he might be legally bound to pay the bonus. Then he added: "The plaintiff "did not apparently think that he was entitled to any bonus." Mr. Levene argued that a bonus was an incentive to production and, consequently, if you are unable to work it was wrong that bonus should be included in the wage you are entitled to recover whilst you are sick.

On the other hand, it was argued by Mr. Bridge for the plaintiff that you could not differentiate between basic salary and bonus, and that what the plaintiff was entitled to recover was the remuneration which he had been receiving. Without going into the matter in any detail, the plaintiff's remuneration here was his basic salary and his bonus which, at the material time, was worth about £20 a week to him. That bonus depended upon the number of garments sold, and that in turn depended upon work which, in broad measure, was the work which had been done by the plaintiff over the preceding months in organising the equipment and the production from the new factory.

I think this is a very difficult point to determine, and it is the only point I have to determine in the case. But it is impossible to understand it without having had the background. I put myself this question. It was at first mooted that the plaintiff should work for the defendants for a basic salary simpliciter, and it was then arranged that his remuneration should consist of salary plus bonus. I suppose it might well have been that the plaintiff and the managing director might have said: "I know "you are a good man. If you work well you will do extremely "well out of this. I will give you a nominal salary and add "larger bonuses," so that the plaintiff's remuneration really consisted of his bonus, and his salary would have been a matter of less importance.

Having given the matter the best attention I can, and bearing in mind the argument of Mr. Levene, I have come to the conclusion that what I have to consider here is what was his remuneration. His remuneration was somewhere in the neighbourhood of £50 a week. That was salary plus bonus, and the bonus ingredient is represented by the agreed sum of £250 6s. 2d. The realities of the situation, in my view, demand that the plaintiff should be paid during the absence due to sickness the full remuneration which he would have received so long as his contract of service subsisted. The result, therefore, is that in my view the plaintiff is entitled to recover the agreed sum of £250 6s. 2d.

Ecclesiastical Law—Faculty—Demolition of church—Jurisdiction.

A faculty was sought to enable a church to be demolished:—Held, the court had jurisdiction to grant such a faculty, the procedure by petition being preferable to the statutory alternatives.

PETITION for a faculty.

The rector and churchwardens of the parish of St. George, Birmingham, petitioned for a faculty to demolish the parish church. The petition was unopposed.

No counsel appeared on the hearing of the petition.

July 21. HENRY SALT Q.C., Ch. In this case I have allowed the evidence of the petitioners to be given in an affidavit sworn by the incumbent, the Rev. J. A. Carr, and that of the Archdeacon of Birmingham, the Ven. S. Harvie Clark, in whose archdeaconry St. George's Church is situated, to be given in an affidavit sworn by him. Both deponents are present and are represented by their respective solicitors. They have been given the opportunity of supplementing their affidavits by oral evidence, but there has been no need to do so, thanks to the full and clear affidavits. Nor has there been any cross-examination, since the petition, following general citation in due form and time, is unopposed. I wish to express to the parties and their solicitors my obligation to them for the way the case has been prepared and presented to me.

Having listened to the evidence and exhibits read to me, I feel bound, while sharing the reluctance of the petitioners and the archdeacon, to accede to the prayer of the petition and grant the requisite faculty for the demolition of St. George's Church. The order, however, will contain two reservations: first, that the tomb of Thomas Rickman, the architect of the church, shall be left undisturbed in the adjoining graveyard; and secondly, that all memorial tablets within the church itself shall be carefully taken down and stored, with a view to their use hereafter in any new, and perhaps smaller, church which may be erected on the present site, or part thereof, or in some neighbouring church, if that can be arranged under the supervision, in the first instance, of the archdeacon.

It is always a serious matter to authorise the demolition of a parish church. Where it must needs be done, in the interests of the cure or care of souls, which is, of course, a paramount consideration, because, for example, of reorganisation in a diocese to enable the church to meet the needs of growing population in suburbs and new residential areas, while redeploying the ministry where central areas have become substantially less populous, or because a consecrated building has become ruinous past hope of repair, it may be possible, and even desirable, to have recourse to the machinery provided by one or more of the measures in this behalf. This enables the matter to proceed under what is, in effect, statutory sanction.

Parallel with this, and in my judgment quite unaffected by it, there remains the ancient jurisdiction of this court to entertain, and in a proper case to accede to, a petition by persons having a proper locus standi, for a faculty to enable the demolition to be carried out.

In the present case, procedure by petition for a faculty is not only suitable but (subject to certain procedural safeguards) preferable to the statutory alternatives.

In the first place it is in the very nature of it swifter; and there can be no doubt that the urgency of the matter is fully made out. I took a view of St. George's on my way to this court, and even the untrained eye can see that the masonry is in a very dangerous condition. The evidence is that pieces of masonry have fallen from the pinnacles and endangered the children and staff of the church school in the adjoining playground, which has been fenced off. Passing members of the public are also at risk, and there is evidence that in at least one instance there has been what the armed forces of the Crown would term a near miss. Plainly this state of affairs cannot continue, and the provisional arrangements made with a contractor for taking down the structure ought to be authorised so as to take effect under the sanction of this court while the school holidays are current, as they will be within a few days from now.

Secondly, I am satisfied that it would be quite unrealistic to expect this church to be preserved or reconstructed. Redevelopment is going on all round it, and the population of the parish has diminished, and will further diminish below the present estimate of 10,000 souls. It is not a wealthy parish, nor in a wealthy area. The bishop's fund for building churches has gone a substantive way towards its target, but has by no means yet reached it. I am told that this fund is de facto earmarked, from the point of view of subscribers, towards building new churches where the need is greatest in newly populated districts, and cannot very well be resorted to for repairing such a church as St. George's where the need is less. Moreover, before the present incumbency began in 1954, some £14,000 had already been raised and spent in patching the fabric. A conservative estimate by experts is that to put the church into repair would cost a further sum of no less than £35,000. Manifestly this is beyond the scope of the parishioners, even if outside aid were forthcoming.

The church was built about 1820, and is one of the "Water-"loo" churches, for which the State provided or contributed funds. It occupies a dominant position in the city of Birmingham and presents a beautiful silhouette as designed by Thomas Rickman.

In all the circumstances I directed the Archdeacon of Birmingham to be specially cited, over and above the general citation. I also requested the learned registrar to inquire of the Central Council for the Care of Churches whether that body, although having no locus standi to oppose or support the petition as a party, wished to tender any evidence today which would or might assist the court. This I was entitled to do under rule 6 of the Faculty Jurisdiction Rules, 1939. Their secretary writes in reply that they cannot in the circumstances usefully tender any evidence. I adjourned the petition for hearing in open court, in order that, in a matter of this moment, justice should not merely be done but manifestly be seen to be done, and to enable objections, if any, to be heard. There is no objector, but the safeguard of a public hearing in such a case as this is, in my judgment, desirable.

The requirements of notification of the Ministry of Works and the local authority are satisfied

I, therefore, accede to the petition and grant the faculty prayed, subject to the two reservations I have mentioned.

1960

St. George's Birmingham, In re.

The petitioners must bear their own costs and, since the archdeacon's appearance has been helpful to them, must pay those of the archdeacon, which costs cannot be heavy and can, perhaps, be agreed.

The defendant, a professional photographer, was commissioned to take photographs of the plaintiff's wedding; the copyright in the photographs vested in the plaintiff. Two years later, when the plaintiff's wife was expecting a child, her father was murdered in circumstances which attracted publicity. The defendant, without authority, sold certain of the photographs to representatives of the press and one of them, showing a wedding group, was subsequently published prominently in two national newspapers. The plaintiff brought an action in the High Court claiming, inter alia, damages for breach of copyright in the photographs. The plaintiff's solicitors in due course took out a summons for directions and sent it to the defendant's solicitors under cover of a letter in which they asked whether the defendant agreed to the action being transferred to the county court; the defendant's solicitors replied that they had no objection to this course being followed. The master made an order on the summons that the action be transferred by consent to the county court. He made no indication of the provision under which he purported to act, nor did he record any inquiry as to any abandonment by the plaintiff of the excess of his claim over £400; no such abandonment was ever made expressly in the statement of claim or elsewhere. At the trial the judge found that the defendant's explanation of his conduct was very dishonest, and that he was an accessory before the fact to vulgar and offensive behaviour by the newspapers, the principal villains; he regarded it as a shocking case and awarded vindictive damages of £1,000. No formal memorandum of agreement had ever been prepared by the parties, nor were the letters containing the agreement to transfer the action filed by the plaintiff until after the hearing. The defendant appealed, contending that the judge had no jurisdiction to award damages exceeding £400 and that, in any case, the award was excessive:—

Held, (1) that having regard to the provisions of the County Courts Act, 1934,[1] and the County Court Rules, 1936,[2] the facts showed that the action was transferred under section 65 and pursuant to section 43 of the Act of 1934 (now replaced respectively by sections 67 and 42 of the County Courts Act, 1959) and not under section 45 and pursuant to section 42 (respectively sections 45 and 41 of the Act of 1959); and that, therefore, the jurisdiction of the county court judge in regard to damages was unlimited.

(2) That although the agreement between the parties was contained in two documents it was a memorandum within the meaning of section 43; and that the facts that it was not in existence at the

[1] County Courts Act, 1934 (as amended), s. 42: "(1) Where a plaintiff has a cause of action for more than £400 in which, if it were not for more than £400, a county court would have jurisdiction, the plaintiff may abandon the excess, and thereupon a county court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the action, so, however, that the plaintiff shall not recover in the action an amount exceeding £400. . . ."

S. 43: "If, with respect to any action other than an action which, if commenced in the High Court, would, under the Acts and rules applying to that court, have been assigned to the Chancery Division or to the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division, the parties to the action agree, by a memorandum signed by them or by their respective solicitors, that a county court specified in the memorandum shall have jurisdiction in the action, that court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the action accordingly."

S. 45: "(1) In any action commenced in the High Court to which this section applies, any party may at any time apply to the High Court or a judge thereof for an order that the claim . . . shall be transferred— (a) to any county court in which the action might have been commenced if the subject matter and the amount thereof had been within the jurisdiction of the court; or . . . (c) to any county court which the High Court or judge may deem the most convenient to the parties; and the High Court or judge may thereupon, if the court or judge thinks fit, order that the claim . . . be so transferred accordingly. (2) This section applies to any action where— (a) the plaintiff's claim is founded either on contract or on tort and the amount claimed or remaining in dispute in respect thereof does not exceed £100. . . ."

S. 65: "If, where proceedings have been commenced in the High Court, an agreement is made under the provisions of section 43 . . . of this Act, that a county court shall have jurisdiction in those proceedings, the High Court or a judge thereof shall, on the application of any party to the proceedings, order that the proceedings be transferred to that county court."

Ord. 16: "r. 10 (2) The party [lodging with the registrar the documents prescribed by s. 74 (1) (a) or s. 138 (2) of the Act] shall at the same time file in the court office . . . date of the issue of the summons and that it was not filed until after judgment (in breach of Order 16, r. 10 (2) (b) of the County Court Rules, 1936), were procedural blemishes which did not deprive the county court of jurisdiction.

Reg. v. Judge Willes, Ex parte Abbey National Building Society [1954] 1 W.L.R. 136 applied.

(3) That the judge was entitled, not only at common law but by the provisions of section 17 (3) of the Copyright Act, 1956,[3] to award vindictive damages; and that having regard to the scandalous conduct of the defendant and the flagrant infringement of the plaintiff's copyright the damages were not too high (post, p. 1082).

Per Sellers L.J. An action transferred by agreement under section 65 and pursuant to section 43 is a High Court action, unlimited and unrestricted, which falls for trial in the county court.

Per Harman L.J. It would be a salutary practice that orders for transfer should state ex facie the section under which the transfer is being made.

APPEAL from Judge Blagden sitting at Westminster County Court.

The defendant, Frank Settle, who carried on business as a professional photographer, took certain photographs of the wedding of the plaintiff, Donald Brian Williams, in 1956. These photographs were taken at the request of the plaintiff and were paid for by his wife's father (one Baker), and it was eventually admitted that the copyright in them was in the plaintiff.

In June, 1958, when the plaintiff's wife was expecting a child, Baker disappeared from his home and, shortly before the birth of the child, it was discovered that he had been murdered. These matters attracted publicity. The defendant was pressed by representatives of newspapers for copies of the photographs, and he sold several, including one showing a wedding group, to a newspaper representative for £15. Five days after the birth of the child the "Daily Express" and the "Daily Mail," both national newspapers with large circulations, published fairly large reproductions of the photograph with captions describing the persons shown in it by name; the "Daily Mail" gave a particular description of the plaintiff's wife.

The plaintiff obtained an apology from the Press Council, a body set up, inter alia, to protect the public from journalistic misbehaviour, £52 10s. damages and costs from the "Daily

[3] Copyright Act, 1956, s. 17: "... (3) Where in an action under "this section an infringement of "copyright is proved or admitted, and "the court, having regard (in addi-"tion to all other material con-"siderations) to—(a) the flagrancy of "the infringement, and (b) any bene-"fit shown to have accrued to the "defendant by reason of the infringe-"ment, is satisfied that effective relief "would not otherwise be available to "the plaintiff, the court, in assessing "damages for the infringement, shall "have power to award such additional "damages by virtue of this subsection "as the court may consider appro-"priate in the circumstances."

"Express," and an apology and undertakings from the "Daily "Mail," and brought the present proceedings against the defendant, claiming, inter alia, damages in a High Court action for infringement of his copyright in the photographs. The defendant by his defence denied that he had been commissioned by the plaintiff to take the photographs and that the plaintiff was the owner of the copyright in them, and contended that he had an implied licence to hand the negative of the photograph published to the "Daily Express" for the purposes of its reproduction in that newspaper.

Five months after the issue of the writ the plaintiff's solicitors wrote to the defendant's solicitors a letter which contained the following passage: "We are enclosing copy summons "for directions . . . We shall be pleased to hear that you . . . "agree to the action being transferred to the Westminster "County Court, as otherwise it will be necessary for us to put "the summons in counsel's list." The summons was in common form and requested that the place of trial should be the Westminster County Court. The defendant's solicitors replied in a letter containing the following passage: " . . . we have today "heard from our professional clients that they have no objection "to this action being transferred to the Westminster County "Court."

On the hearing of the summons the master made his order ". . . that the action be by consent transferred to Westminster "County Court . . ." The master made no reference to any statutory or other provision under which he acted, nor did he record any inquiry as to any abandonment by the plaintiff of the excess of his claim over £400; no such abandonment was ever made expressly in the statement of claim or elsewhere. The plaintiff made no attempt to prepare or file a formal memorandum of agreement to transfer, nor were the letters containing the agreement filed until after the hearing of the action.

The action proceeded in the county court and, on December 17, 1959, Judge Blagden gave judgment for the plaintiff for, inter alia, £1,000 damages and costs to be taxed on the High Court scale to the date of the transfer and on county court scale 4 thereafter. The judge, in the course of his judgment, referred to the fact that the parties had been together at school, set out the history of the case, describing the conduct of the two newspapers as vulgar and offensive, and continued: "It is difficult to find "language strong enough to describe this grossly offensive "behaviour on the part of the two newspapers. Even when it "takes its most merciful possible form, the very sudden death "of those nearest and dearest to us is a most appalling shock, "as I can testify from recent personal experience. What it "must be to be informed suddenly that your father or husband "or father-in-law has been murdered I tremble to think. It was "on top of this that these newspaper chose to blazon this picture "of a happy occasion of a few years ago. Anything more calculated to wound and hurt bitterly the feelings of all members of the family I can hardly conceive. Mr. and Mrs. Williams' wedding anniversary must always be marred by the thought of what these disgusting newspapers did. No doubt these papers are in fact managed by people who in their private lives are decent, honest and reputable citizens. But it does seem that somehow or other there is a tendency on the part of these people to lose, when they get to their offices, all sense of respect for other people's feelings, and just to publish anything regardless of whether it will hurt other people's feelings, providing it will sell the paper . . . the defendant says that he was approached in the first place by a representative of the 'Daily Express' who said that if he supplied photographs of the wedding group this would assist the discovery of the murderer. That, indeed, might be some matter of mitigation, but I do not accept the defendant's story. Very dishonest. He says—again I disbelieve him—that the 'Daily Express' representative told him that he was authorised by the widow to obtain photographs and that they would only publish a photograph of Mr. Baker. His evidence here was most unsatisfactory . . . I disbelieve him. The most serious point is as to who gave the instructions. At first the defendant said he was entitled by custom to the copyright, and this was persisted in during the correspondence . . . The story adopted since April this year was that Mr. Baker ordered the photographs . . . I have not the slightest doubt whatever that Mrs. Williams did give the instructions on behalf of her then fiancé. That leaves only the question of amount. The relevant section of the Copyright Act, 1956, is section 17. I have considered the question of jurisdiction in another case and am of opinion that I have unlimited jurisdiction. The fact is that the defendant was only paid £15 which (having regard to the decreased value of money since the time of Judas Iscariot) makes the thirty pieces of silver for which the latter betrayed his Master a sum comparable to that for which the defendant sold intimate pictures of his former school fellow's wedding. There is no force in his argument based on public spiritedness. The excuse that the papers undertook not to publish the whole of the wedding group is nonsense; it was like selling a jemmy to a known burglar on his undertaking not to use it for breaking and entering houses. Principal villains are the two newspapers but an accessory before the fact can be morally just as guilty. The newspapers could not have done what they did if he had not supplied them with the materials. I regard this as a shocking case. I regard it as my duty to award damages that are really vindictive. . . ."

The defendant appealed. The grounds of the appeal as stated in his notice of appeal were, inter alia, that the judge had no jurisdiction to award damages in excess of £400, that the amount of damages was excessive, and that the judge was wrong in awarding vindictive damages.

Neil Lawson Q.C. and T. Ian Payne for the defendant.
D. Tolstoy Q.C. and L. J. Belcourt for the plaintiff.

The following cases, in addition to those referred to in the judgments, were cited in argument: Simpson v. Crowle [4]; Lea v. Moore [5]; Roberts v. G. W. King & Co. [6]

SELLERS L.J. On December 17, 1959, Judge Blagden, sitting in the Westminster County Court, awarded the plaintiff £1,000 damages against the defendant. The defendant appeals, alleging first of all that the judge, sitting in the county court, had no jurisdiction to award damages in excess of £400 and, secondly, if he had, that they were excessive, because they were too much in themselves for the wrong done, and because they had also an element in them of what is described in the notice of appeal as vindictive damages; and it was said, too, in the course of argument, that in what I will describe as some minor matters the judge misdirected himself on the evidence.

[His Lordship stated the facts, observed that the judge's comments on the conduct of the newspapers were by no means too strong, that the defendant's conduct was aggravated, inter alia, by letters written on his behalf attempting to justify his conduct, and that the defendant must have known the use which would be made of the photographs which he supplied, and continued:] The first point taken by the defendant was that, this being an action tried in the county court and the county court jurisdiction admittedly being limited to £400, that was the limit of damages which could have been awarded in any event. It was further said that even £400 would have been excessive.

This action, however, was not commenced in the county court and therefore, on the face of it, was not limited by the county court's limits on jurisdiction. It was commenced in the High Court on August 13, 1958, by a writ, and the pleadings (the statement of claim and defence, further and better particulars and various interrogatories) all followed under the procedure of the High Court. Then there came a time when it was desired by the plaintiff to transfer this action from the High Court to the county court. The summons to that effect was dated January 15, 1959, and was in the common form of a summons for directions; by the material paragraph it requested that the place of the trial should be the Westminster County Court. On the next day, January 16, that summons was sent to the solicitors for the defendant with a letter which contained this sentence: "We "shall be pleased to hear that you are willing to give the "particulars and agree to the action being transferred to the West-"minster County Court, as otherwise it will be necessary for us to "put the summons in counsel's list." On January 23, 1959, the defendant's solicitors replied: " . . . we have today heard from "our professional clients that they have no objection to this action "being transferred to the Westminster County Court." In due course the summons came up for hearing and an order was made by the master at the request of the parties to this effect (it being dated April 2, 1959): "It is ordered that the action be by "consent transferred to Westminster County Court, and that "the costs of this application be in the discretion of the county "court judge."

It has been argued by the defendant that the transfer to the county court must be held to have taken place under section 45 of the Act of 1934, which was in force at the material time. It is submitted on behalf of the plaintiff in reply to that argument that the proceeding took place under section 43 of the Act of 1934 and thereby it was a transfer of a High Court action for trial in the county court, a claim for an unliquidated amount with unlimited jurisdiction. Various matters have been discussed to ascertain what was in the minds of the parties when they agreed to transfer this action to the county court.

It does not seem to me very profitable to try to resolve what they respectively had in mind and whether either of them applied their minds to which section was the appropriate section for the transfer. Having looked at the two sections I am ready without hesitation to accept the submission made by Mr. Tolstoy on behalf of the plaintiff that section 45, on the facts of this case, does not seem to be appropriate and that the terms of section 43 have, by what took place, been fulfilled, and that is the section which it is appropriate to hold was the section under which this action in the High Court was transferred to the county court.

Section 45, which I need not read, related to transfers where the amount in the High Court action remaining in dispute was within the county court jurisdiction or had fallen within its jurisdiction by reason of what had taken place, so that it would come under the total sum of £400. Section 43 was of a different character and it read as follows: "If, with respect to any action "[assigned for the time being to the King's Bench Division of "the High Court] the parties to the action agree, by a memoran-"dum signed by them or by their respective solicitors, that a "county court specified in the memorandum shall have jurisdic-"tion in the action, that court shall have jurisdiction to hear "and determine the action accordingly." That, excluding as it did proceedings in the Chancery Division and proceedings in the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division, applied clearly to those actions which fell within the jurisdiction of the Queen's Bench Division, as an action for copyright in fact does.

Has there, then, been an agreement? Have the parties agreed by a memorandum signed by them or by their respective solicitors? The point taken by Mr. Lawson for the defendant, which has been advanced still further by Mr. Payne, is that that section required a memorandum of the agreement to be in one document only and, recognising that that has not been a requirement for a note or memorandum in writing under the Statute of Frauds, 1677, or the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, which have kindred requirements for writing, it has been argued that this should be construed strictly and that there has not been a fulfilment of that section in the circumstances of this case, where an agreement is contained in writing by the solicitors but in two documents.

I can see no justification for so holding. It would seem to be wholly unreasonable and I can see no reason whatsoever for arriving at that conclusion. The essential thing is that the parties should agree. There was, once the action was transferred, a certain procedure to be followed, and, in respect of a transfer under section 43, Order 16, r. 10 (2) (b), of the County Court Rules, 1936, required that where a transfer was ordered under section 65 of the Act the agreement that the county court should have jurisdiction in the proceedings should be filed. It seems to me that, if the argument stressed by Mr. Payne that the agreement must be in one document is right, it would at least be more appropriate in that rule if it had said that one memorandum should be filed rather than that the agreement should be filed; but I can see no substance in that interpretation at all.

Therefore one has within the four corners of section 43 an action in the High Court in the Queen's Bench Division and one has the agreement of the letters and the memorandum. The agreement is as to an agreed county court, the Westminster County Court. That gives the county court jurisdiction. Jurisdiction for what? "... that court shall have jurisdiction to "hear and determine the action accordingly." In my view those final words mean that it is not a curtailed action reduced by the amount of damages but it is a High Court action, unlimited and unrestricted, which falls for hearing in the county court. Indeed, it is not the only circumstance in which an action of the High Court can be tried with unlimited jurisdiction, because that also arises under at least one other section of this Act, to which I need not refer.

Once the order had been made, then section 74 (section 77 as it now is) came into play: it provided that where an action, counterclaim or matter was ordered to be transferred from the High Court, any party might lodge with the registrar of the county court various documents; and the officer in the Supreme Court was to do what was necessary to transfer the action to the county court. That took place. What did not take place (and this is relied upon) was that the requirement of Order 16, r. 10 (2) (b), for the filing of the agreement, the two letters, was not

1960
WILLIAMS v. SETTLE.
Sellers L.J.

complied with. This is taken as an answer to the plaintiff's contention that the jurisdiction of the county court was unlimited. Another point was also taken of a somewhat similar kind. That was that the agreement had not come into existence when the summons was taken out on January 15, and that it only came into existence afterwards.

To my mind neither point goes to the jurisdiction. The point with regard to the summons has been answered by authority, because it is sufficient if the consent is in existence at the time the order is made; and that clearly was the case here. The question arose in Reg. v. Judge Willes, Ex parte Abbey National Building Society,[1] a case in the Divisional Court. Lord Goddard C.J., having read section 43, said[2]: "That section deals with "common law matters, and section 53 also gives jurisdiction by "agreement in equity proceedings; so that the parties, being "quite willing for the judge to proceed with the case and give "judgment, had only to put their agreement into writing to "confer ample jurisdiction on the judge. But the judge did not "give the parties a chance of putting their agreement into writing "but proceeded to give a judgment saying that he had no juris-"diction to hear the case." Lord Goddard's judgment was the judgment of the court, the other two members, of whom I was one, agreeing with what he said. I would agree again, as I did there, that it is sufficient if the consent is in existence at the time when the judge took the case, and I think that has been followed in practice within my own experience, that the consent has been signed and put into writing even on the threshold of the court itself.

With regard to the failure to file the agreement with the court, that, I understand, was rectified after the trial. It was not a matter which was objected to by the defendant at the trial or in the course of the trial, although this point of jurisdiction was taken and, whilst it was a procedural blemish, it was not one, to my mind, which undermined the jurisdiction. It was waived, as it could be in the circumstances, by the defendant.

On this point of jurisdiction the court has not had the matter dealt with in any detail in the decision of the judge. Apparently the point was taken before him. How far it was argued I do not know, but he seems to have dealt with it quite shortly by saying that he had considered the matter, he had had it in some previous case and he was satisfied that he had jurisdiction. Under what section he was proceeding is not made clear, but the section which does apply, to my mind, as I have indicated, is section 43 and no other. It is perhaps unfortunate that the judge did not look to see what the agreement in writing was, because then, no doubt, it would have been forthcoming and put before the court and the rule would have been complied with. So much then for the contention that the county court judge had no jurisdiction to award damages in excess of £400. I think that in the circumstances of this case he had.

Then it is said that the damages are in any case excessive on two grounds, excessive because they are too much in any case for the wrong done to the plaintiff and excessive because they include something over and above ordinary compensatory damages. We were referred to some observations on vindictive or punitive damages made in a judgment of McCardie J. in Butterworth v. Butterworth and Englefield.[3] That judge reviewed the law at considerable length. In the course of his judgment, given with his "customary thoroughness, he cited from Sedgwick on Damages, and he said[4]: "The meaning of the phrase 'exemplary damages' "is aptly put in Sedgwick on Damages, 9th ed. (1913), s. 347, "where that distinguished author says: 'In actions of tort where "'gross fraud, wantonness, malice or oppression appears, the jury "'are not bound to adhere to the strict line of compensation, but "'may, by a severe verdict, at once impose a punishment on "'the defendant and hold him up as an example to the com-"'munity . . . damages assessed on this principle are called "'exemplary, punitive or vindictive damages.' The origin of "the doctrine of exemplary damages is ably dealt with by Sedg-"wick in the treatise just mentioned. The illustrative English "decisions are neatly and fully collected in Halsbury's Laws of "England, vol. 10, pp. 306–307. There it is well said: 'Where "'the wounded feeling and injured pride of a plaintiff, or the "'misconduct of a defendant, may be taken into consideration, "'the principle of restitutio in integrum no longer applies. "'Damages are then awarded not merely to recompense the "'plaintiff for the loss he has sustained by reason of the "'defendant's wrongful act, but to punish the defendant in an "'exemplary manner and vindicate the distinction between a "'wilful and an innocent wrongdoer.'" Perhaps, so far as the present case is concerned, one matter, among others, justifying heavy damages is that they may well hold the defendant up as an example to the community, that is to say, that they may act as a deterrent to others who are willing to supply to the press information which they know is going to be used in a manner which will be so hurtful and distressing to the people involved.

We were referred also to Loudon v. Ryder,[5] which was a case with a jury tried before Devlin J. which came before this court for consideration on damages. Objection was there taken by the appellant to the item of punitive damages which Devlin J. had put before the jury as being damages rather like imposing a fine. In the course of his judgment Singleton L.J. referred to that objection and, whilst he may not have upheld fully the similarity with a fine, he did say it was no objection to the summing-up that the judge had put the matter in that way. He said[6]: "... "the judge was entitled to direct the jury that they could give "damages of an exemplary or punitive kind."

In the present action the judge was clearly justified, in the circumstances in which the defendant, in breach of the plaintiff's copyright, handed these photographs to the press knowing the use to which they were going to be put, in awarding substantial and heavy damages of a punitive nature. The power so to do, quite apart from the ordinary law of the land, is expressly given by statute. By section 17 (3) of the Copyright Act, 1956, it is provided: "Where in an action under this section an infringement of copyright is proved or admitted, and the court, having "regard (in addition to all other material considerations) to— "(a) the flagrancy of the infringement, and (b) any benefit shown "to have accrued to the defendant by reason of the infringement, "is satisfied that effective relief would not otherwise be available "to the plaintiff, the court, in assessing damages for the infringement, shall have power to award such additional damages by "virtue of this subsection as the court may consider appropriate "in the circumstances." It seems that this is not a case where there is any effective relief which could be given. The benefit which can be shown to have accrued to the defendant is meagre, so much so that the judge made some references to the £15 to which exception was taken by the defendant. It is the flagrancy of the infringement which calls for heavy damages, because this was a scandalous matter in the circumstances, which I do not propose to elaborate and about which I do not propose to express a view. It is sufficient to say that it was a flagrant infringement of the right of the plaintiff, and it was scandalous conduct and in total disregard not only of the legal rights of the plaintiff regarding copyright but of his feelings and his sense of family dignity and pride. It was an intrusion into his life, deeper and graver than an intrusion into a man's property.

In the course of the argument reference was made to an old case which concerned an intrusion into property.[7] This seems to me something much more serious, as I say. I cannot think that this court is called upon to reduce the damages, high as they are, for they are damages which the judge, having seen the witnesses and heard the case, thought to be appropriate. Whether I should have given so much I do not know, but, having seen the figure, I am not prepared to say that it is too high.

There are only one or two other matters I ought to mention, just to indicate that they have not been overlooked in the argument, but I think they have no real bearing on the quantum of damages which the judge awarded. It is said that the judge took into consideration the feelings of the wife and the family and not only the feelings of the plaintiff, that the judge did not realise the anguish which the murder itself would entail and that it was really the press publication which caused the trouble and not the conduct of the defendant. When one looks at the setting of this case, it seems to me that the defendant, at the time when he did what he did, ought to have realised its consequences, and that in the circumstances his conduct did aggravate all that anguish which no doubt would be present without the publication of photographs, and therefore it only added to the distress and great hurt. It is bad enough to be subjected to such distress without having further injury imposed on top of it. A very minor matter is something which the judge said about the defendant being a school friend of the plaintiff. That again, I think, is not strictly right. They were not contemporaries, but they were members of the same school, and there really is no valid criticism of the judgment which the judge has given. I would dismiss this appeal.

[6] [1953] 2 Q.B. 202, 209.

[7] Merest v. Harvey (1814) 5 Taunt. 442.

WILLMER L.J. I have come to the same conclusion. At the time when this action was tried the County Courts Act in force was the 1934 Act, as amended in 1955. I shall refer to the sections as they were numbered in that Act, and not as they are now numbered in the Act of 1959.

The first and most important question is whether the judge ever had jurisdiction to award more than £400. That depends on the section under which the transfer was made; for I am satisfied that the judge would have had unlimited jurisdiction if the transfer were made under section 65, that is to say if it were made on the basis that the action was one to which section 43 applied. The contrary was somewhat faintly argued, but no authority was cited and it seems to me that we ought to follow the very clear expression of view in Reg. v. Judge Willes,[8] that where the parties consent to the case being heard in the county court no question of jurisdiction arises.

The substantial question is whether section 43 is the section applying to this action or whether, on the contrary, the transfer ought to be regarded as having been made in pursuance of section 45. The plaintiff contends that the case falls within section 43; the defendant argues for section 45. It must be one or the other, because there is no other section under which the transfer could have been made in this case. So far as section 45 is concerned, the transfer could only be made if the amount claimed or remaining in dispute did not exceed £400. Here the action started as a High Court action, and on the face of the pleadings the claim was for unliquidated damages without any stated limitation. There was machinery under section 42 which enabled a plaintiff, if he so desired, to abandon the excess of his claim over £400; but if he did that, Order 7, r. 1 (2), provided that the abandonment of the excess should be entered at the end of the particulars. It is said that the particulars there referred to are not the same thing as the statement of claim delivered in a High Court action. That, I think, is an unnecessarily subtle point. Certainly the fact is that no note of the abandonment of the excess was ever made in this case, and neither the defendant nor anybody else has suggested that the plaintiff ought to have entered in the pleadings a statement as to the abandonment of the excess.

C. A.

Willmer L.J.

The power to transfer under section 45 was a discretionary power; the court or a judge might, if it or he thought fit, order that the claim or counterclaim be transferred. It is perfectly true that in this case there was no contest with regard to the order, the parties both being agreeable to the transfer; but even so one might have thought that, if the transfer was sought to be made under section 45, the master before making the order would have made some inquiry as to the abandonment of the excess, seeing that there was nothing on the face of the pleadings to show that the excess was being abandoned by the plaintiff. I am bound to say that, having regard to the failure to use the machinery available under section 42 for abandoning the excess, and having regard to the absence of any inquiry at the time of the hearing of the summons for directions, I find it difficult to accept the argument that the plaintiff, by applying for the transfer, must be taken as impliedly abandoning the excess. So much for section 45.

With regard to the other possibility, Mr. Tolstoy has presented a formidable argument in support of his contention that the transfer in this case must be regarded as having been made under section 65, that is to say, on the basis that the action was one falling within section 43. As he pointed out, there were three requirements to be satisfied under that section: first, the action must not be one which was of a kind assigned to the Chancery Division or to the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division; secondly, there must be an agreement between the parties; and, thirdly, there must be a memorandum signed by them or by their respective solicitors. The first requirement is clearly satisfied. The action is undoubtedly one of the type which section 43 envisaged. Secondly, the parties undoubtedly did agree. As to the question whether there was a memorandum, that which is relied upon is the exchange of letters between the solicitors. Notwithstanding the powerful argument addressed to us this morning by Mr. Payne, I can see no reason why the memorandum required by the section must necessarily be contained in one document, or why an exchange of letters between the solicitors cannot be held to amount to a sufficient memorandum within the section.

Two objections, however, have been put forward as militating against the view that this was a transfer of an action falling within section 43. In the first place it is objected that the memorandum was not in existence at the time when the summons for directions was issued, namely, January 15, 1959. The letters relied on are in fact dated respectively January 16 and January 23. There is in my judgment no substance in that point. The memorandum, in the shape of the letters, was certainly in existence at the time when the summons for directions was heard, namely, April 2, 1959. I can see no warrant for the suggestion that the memorandum referred to by the section must necessarily be in existence at the time when the summons is taken out. Indeed, there is good authority for the proposition that a memorandum prepared and put in at the time of the trial is sufficient. That was the view expressed by Lord Goddard C.J. in Reg. v. Judge Willes [9] and concurred in by the other members of the court. There is therefore in my view no substance in that first objection taken on behalf of the defendant.

The other objection is that, according to Order 16, r. 10 (2) (b), where a transfer was ordered under section 65, which is what the plaintiff contends for here, the agreement that the county court should have jurisdiction had to be filed in the county court office at the time when the other documents were lodged as required by section 74 of the Act. Admittedly nothing of the sort was done in this particular case. The letters relied on were not filed at all before the hearing, but we have been informed that since the hearing, and since the judgment of the judge, they have been filed. The omission to file the letters in accordance with the rule has been relied on as showing that the transfer cannot possibly have been a transfer made in pursuance of sections 43 and 65. The answer to that point, in my judgment, is that furnished by Mr. Tolstoy, namely, that the provisions of Order 16, r. 10, are merely procedural requirements which can be waived; they are not requirements which go to the question of jurisdiction. No doubt if objection had been taken an order to file the documents could have been obtained, and such order might possibly have been coupled with a stay to operate until the order was complied with; but it is impossible to argue from that that this requirement goes to the question of jurisdiction. Moreover, as I have pointed out, there is good authority for the proposition that it is sufficient if the memorandum is actually filed in court at the time of the trial.

One other observation falls to be made, I think, as tending to assist the plaintiff's rather than the defendant's argument. That is that under section 65 no discretion was conferred upon the court, but it was mandatory to make the order if the application was made in a proper case arising under section 43. For what it is worth, it seems to me that the fact that nothing was said, and no inquiry was made, either by the master or by either of the parties, at the time when the order was made on the summons for directions goes rather to show that section 65 must have been regarded as applying rather than section 45, which, as I have said, was a section calling for the exercise of discretion.

In those circumstances I am satisfied, as a result of Mr. Tolstoy's argument, that in this case we must regard the transfer as having been made under section 65, that is to say, on the basis that the action fell within section 43; and accordingly I am satisfied that the judge had unlimited jurisdiction with regard to the damages to be awarded.

On the other matters I have but little to add to what my Lord has already said.

The second question that arises is whether this is an appropriate case for the award of exemplary as opposed to compensatory damages. I am abundantly satisfied, for the reasons already stated by my Lord which I need not repeat, that this was a proper case in which to award exemplary damages. The third question is with regard to the quantum of damages awarded. It has been suggested that the judge misdirected himself, in that he took into consideration in awarding the damages matters which he should not have taken into consideration. For instance the judge himself said, in one passage in his judgment, that the real villains in this case were the newspapers rather than the defendant. In those circumstances it is said that it was wrong to award heavy damages against the defendant, whose act merely created the occasion for the newspapers' behaviour. As to that point, I think it is to be emphasised that the judge did not accept the defendant's evidence with regard to what the press representatives who called on him said. In particular, he did not believe the defendant when he said he was told that the photographs were required merely to assist in the discovery of the murderer; nor did he believe the defendant's evidence that he was told that only the photograph of Baker, the father-in-law, would be published. The judge was entitled to take that view of the defendant's evidence, and it is not a view with which we can interfere. If he did take that view of the defendant's evidence, it seems to me that he was abundantly justified in coming to the conclusion, as he did, that the defendant must be regarded as being in the position of an accessory before the fact, so as to share with the newspapers the guilt for what was done.

Another matter objected to was that the judge wrongly took into consideration the suffering of the plaintiff's family, and in particular the plaintiff's wife, in awarding the damages which he did. There can be no doubt that the publication must have come as a terrible shock to the plaintiff's wife, because it appears that these events, by a terrible mischance, happened to coincide with the time of her own confinement. With regard to that point it seems to me that, assuming, as I think we are entitled to assume, that the plaintiff and his wife were a normally affectionate married couple, there is no reason why the distress caused to the wife should not be regarded as part of the injury suffered by her husband. The mere fact that injury was caused to the wife was itself distressing and injurious, I should have thought, to the husband. I am unable, therefore, to say that the judge fell into any error with regard to that aspect of the case.

If the judge is not to be criticised for having taken into consideration matters which he ought not to have done, then the only question remaining is one of pure quantum. This was a case in which the damages were very much at large. I, or any one of us, had we been sitting at first instance, might have arrived at some quite different figure; but this much can surely be said, namely, that having regard to the conduct of the defendant it was clearly a case which did call for heavy damages. The judge has arrived at his figure and, whatever figure I might have arrived at for myself, I am quite unable to say that his figure is so far wrong that we ought to interfere. In those circumstances I agree with my Lord that this appeal must be dismissed.

HARMAN L.J. I, too, agree. The procedural question of county court jurisdiction was nicely poised. It may well arise out of the fact that neither party paid particular attention at the time when the transfer was agreed on to which section it was that was being used as the vehicle of transfer. This court, however, when appealed to on the subject, must make up its mind which section is pointed at. Neither was exactly complied with but, if you treat the transfer as being under section 45, you have got to imply an agreement by the plaintiff to limit his damages. That seems to be a very big implication to make. On the other side, if you are looking at section 43, you are met with the fact that there was a procedural defect in that the memorandum was not filed as it should have been when the other papers were filed with the county court. That, no doubt, is not only a procedural defect but also some evidence that the solicitors who had charge of the matter did not think that they were pursuing a remedy under section 43. As my Lords have pointed out, a procedural defect is not fatal to the action in which it happens. It may be waived, and one finds it stated in the High Court practice (and I have no doubt that it is the same in the county court) that non-compliance with the rules never makes proceedings void. Therefore I am in agreement with my brethren in coming down on the side of section 43 as opposed to section 45. It seems to me that it would be a salutary practice that orders for transfer should state ex facie the section under which the transfer is being made. If then section 43 be here the operative one the damages are, as the judge thought, unlimited and on that footing I for one should be very far from interfering with what he has done. The new Copyright Act specifically provides by section 17 (3) that punitive damages may be awarded. If ever there was a copyright case in which that was appropriate it is this one. Indeed, if the blow which has fallen upon the defendant comes as a shock it may be a salutary one, and possibly act as a warning to other persons holding similar documents in which the copyright is not in them not to yield to the craving of the press for sensation. If it has that effect I for one should agree that the result, though severe, is salutary.

WILLIAMS v. SETTLE.

PRACTICE NOTE.

Court of Appeal—Appeal out of time—Legally aided case—Notice of appeal should be filed without waiting for the grant of legal aid.
Legal Aid—Certificate—Appeal—Notice of appeal to be filed without waiting for grant of legal aid.

Where a party desires to appeal against a decision and also wishes to obtain legal aid, the notice of appeal should be filed within the proper time without waiting for the grant of a legal aid certificate.

APPLICATION for leave to appeal notwithstanding time had expired.

F. S. Laskey for the appellant.
J. A. P. Hazel for the respondents.

In the course of granting an application for leave to appeal, notwithstanding the time within which notice of appeal should be filed and served had expired, HODSON L.J. made the following observations: We cannot do other than extend the time, but I should like it to be publicly known that a great deal of money has been wasted in this case.

We give leave, but it seems to me a very serious matter that expenditure should have been incurred as it has been in this case, and, indeed, in other cases. An appellant who has the right to appeal wishes to appeal, and a notice of appeal comes into existence. In this case the notice was sent to the opposition, but the step was not taken of filing it in the appropriate registry. The reason was because there was delay in seeking and obtaining legal aid, but the costs have been incurred today on behalf of both parties in order to secure an extension of time for leave to appeal. If the notice had been filed within the proper time it would have been a matter involving little expense and all this could have been avoided.

I confess I cannot understand why parties are not prepared, if they wish to appeal, to incur the very small expense of giving notice of appeal, and filing it in the proper place, without waiting to see whether the public purse will bear the cost of their litigation. I do not see why, however, the appellant should suffer for what has happened, and we must I think, therefore, extend the time for leave to appeal.

May 23, 24, 25.
Wrangham J.

Husband and Wife—Cruelty—Insanity—As defence—Whether genuine belief in false accusations arising from mental disorder is a defence to a charge of cruelty based thereon—Reasonable apprehension of injury to health.

A wife filed a petition seeking a decree of divorce on the ground of her husband's cruelty. She also filed a supplemental petition alleging further cruelty in that the husband had, in September, 1959, falsely accused her in the presence of a third party of an improper association with another man and of being a moral danger to the child of the parties. By a second supplemental petition she further alleged an incident in May, 1960, in which the husband slapped her across the face and took the child of the parties by the throat. The husband denied the cruelty alleged.

At the hearing of the suit Wrangham J. found that the matters alleged in the wife's petition did not amount to cruelty, that the accusations as alleged in the supplemental petition were without foundation, that at the date of the incident alleged and for some years prior thereto the husband was suffering from mental disorder as a result of which he firmly believed the accusations to be true and that the husband's conduct as alleged in the second supplemental petition was unjustifiable.

Held, (1) that, owing to mental illness, the husband did not appreciate that his conduct as alleged in the supplemental petition was wrong and that he, therefore, had a good defence to the charge of cruelty made therein.

(2) That the gravity of the assault alleged in the second supplemental petition in relation to the future was to be judged in the light of the whole previous history of the marriage and the husband's mental instability; in all the circumstances it gave rise to a reasonable apprehension that the wife's health might be impaired in the future, the wife was, therefore, entitled to a decree nisi of divorce on the cruelty alleged in the second supplemental petition only.

Defended petition for divorce.

The wife filed a petition seeking the dissolution of the marriage on the ground of the husband's cruelty. She subsequently filed a supplemental petition and a second supplemental petition, each of which alleged a further act of cruelty. At the hearing of the suit Wrangham J. found that the incidents in the petition did not amount to cruelty and the matter is reported only as to the two supplemental petitions. The husband, who at all relevant times was acting in person, by his answers denied the cruelty alleged.

The events which led to the filing of the supplemental petition were as follows: The wife had for some years been a friend of a neighbouring couple. The husband objected to the association for reasons which were found to be of no substance. On September 30, 1959, a quarrel arose over the association which led to the husband refusing to let his wife into the house, with the result that the wife sent for the police. It was plain from the evidence of the police constable first, that the husband had, in fact, refused to allow the wife to enter the house: secondly, that he was objecting to her associating at all with the husband of the neighbouring couple: and thirdly, that he was saying that the child of the marriage, a girl of 12, was in some form of moral danger. To such an extent did he make that suggestion that the police officer thought it right to point out that it would be possible for a woman police constable to visit the little girl to see if she was in need of care and protection.

The mental state of the husband was on that occasion illustrated by the fact that he told the police constable that the wife's brother was spying on him (an allegation which was unfounded) and that he proposed, if anybody interfered with his domestic matters, to summons the State or the Crown, and, according to the police constable, rambled on in a way which was very difficult to follow.

On May 15, 1960, there occurred the events which gave rise to the second supplemental petition. The wife, in her evidence, said that the husband sent the child to her to say that he wanted to see her, so she went to see him upstairs. He then accused her of taking some money, quite unjustly, and when she denied it he said that he would call the police. She invited him to do that and he thereupon slapped her upon the face, in the presence of the daughter, and when the daughter screamed as a result, gripped the daughter by the throat. The wife managed to release the daughter and told her they would go for the police. Thereupon the husband repented of what he had done, put his arm round his wife's shoulders and said he loved them both and asked her not to go for the police. The husband gave no evidence to contradict that account of the events.

Medical evidence was before the court that the husband had, in 1955, suffered from delusions of persecution and conspiracy against him, and that, as a result, he had been admitted to a mental hospital from which he had discharged himself in 1956. After his discharge the husband had exacted a promise from the wife that she would not call a doctor to him again and he had, in consequence, thereafter received no medical treatment.

Mrs. Esther Iwi for the wife.

The husband appeared in person.

The following cases were cited in argument in addition to that referred to in the judgment: Palmer v. Palmer [1]; Swan v. Swan.[2]

WRANGHAM J. referred to the facts alleged in the supplemental petition, stating that he was satisfied that at the time of the incident alleged the husband was mentally very far from well and indeed in need of medical advice, and continued: I accept that the husband did entertain the belief that the wife was improperly associating with the husband of the neighbouring couple and that the child was in moral danger. I equally accept that there was absolutely no ground whatever for either of those beliefs, and that they were entertained by him, not on any reasonable ground, but because he was a man with a sick mind who was capable of forming such unfounded ideas, as he had formed the ideas of persecution and conspiracy in November, 1955. It is said, and said with justice, that this is not pleaded in any answer. In answer to the first supplemental petition it could have been pleaded that the husband was not responsible for the way in which he behaved on that occasion owing to the operation of the M'Naughten Rules. But at the time when the supplemental petition was served, and when the answer was filed, the husband was acting for himself, and one can understand that it might be a little difficult for a husband acting for himself to plead that he was not responsible for what he did because he did not at the time understand the nature and quality of his act or that what he was doing was wrong. In those circumstances, I think I ought to give effect to my finding, whatever the state of the pleadings. I think that at that stage, by reason of his mental illness, he did not realise that it was wrong for him to make those accusations against his wife because he firmly believed them to be true.

[His Lordship then referred to the facts alleged in the second supplemental petition and continued:] I am, therefore, left with this, that at the moment when this petition was shortly to be heard, perhaps because of that fact, the husband so far lost control of himself as to slap his wife across the face, and in her presence grab the little girl by the throat. It is clear that that conduct was wrong. If one is to be technical, it was an assault on the wife and, indeed, in her presence on the child. It was not justified by anything; there was no sort of provocation. It was not justifiable or excusable in any way. So I start with this, that on May 15, 1960, the husband did something to his wife which was indefensible. Of course, the mere slaps on the face, or the momentary alarm of seeing her child taken by the throat, which had no ill consequences upon the child, was in a sense so slight that it would have had no ill effect on the wife's health at all. But the way in which the case, as I understand it, was put upon the second supplemental petition is this: Here you have an unjustifiable act committed by the husband which, although it did not affect the wife's health, did give rise to a reasonable apprehension that the wife's health might be affected in future if she continued to live with her husband. She has only lived with him for eight or nine days, or rather less than that since that event, so that the mere fact that she did continue with him for a time after the event is not really any reason for supposing that the event itself did not give rise to a reasonable apprehension that her health might be impaired in the future.

If this scene had occurred between a sane and rational husband and a sane and rational wife, I do not think that I would have inferred that the wife's health was likely to be impaired in the future because she had, on one occasion, been slapped in the face. The question, therefore, is whether I am entitled to view the quality of that act differently because the act was committed by a man who is shown by the whole history of this case to be a man of substantial mental instability. In Astle v. Astle,[1] a husband who violently assaulted his wife in 1927, at a time when he was so insane as not to know the nature and quality of his acts, in 1931 uttered a threat against his wife which, had it come from a man without the previous history of insane violence in 1927, would not have been cruelty sufficient to entitle the wife to a decree. But Henn Collins J.[2] held that as that threat had been uttered by a man who had, in fact, committed acts of violence when insane, four years before, the quality of the threat was, so to speak, thereby altered; and that he was entitled, in the circumstances, to say that there was a reasonable apprehension of danger to the wife's health in the future because the threat came from a man who had been insane, and violent when insane, four years earlier. As he pointed out,[3] by implication rather than expressly, it was, as it were, unlucky for the husband that the threat acquired the gravity which it did by reason of the acts for which he was not responsible, but, nevertheless, it did. As it seems to me, the same principle holds in the present case. If I hold, as I do, that the husband committed an indefensible assault upon his wife on May 15, 1960, I am entitled to judge the gravity of that assault in relation to the future by the whole of the previous history of the marriage, and in particular by reference to the husband's mental illnesses. It does in a way seem unfair that an act committed by a man of mental instability should be visited by consequences which would not follow in the case of the same act committed by a man of mental stability. That is why I am sympathetic with both sides, because on the one side I think there is, as a result of the assault on May 15, a real reason for regarding the wife's health as endangered by continuing to live with her husband, so that it would be unfair to the wife to refuse a decree; but, on the other hand, I quite see what would apparently be the unfairness to the husband, of relying on an act which, committed by a different kind of man, would not give rise to the inference of danger for the future. But I have made up my mind that where there is an indefensible act, in the present case an assault, which when committed by the particular man who committed it gives rise to an apprehension of injury in the future, that must be good ground for a finding of cruelty, even though such an act, when committed by a different kind of man, would not give rise to that inference and, therefore, would not be described as cruelty.

I have tried as hard as I can to explain, particularly to the husband, the reasons for my finding, because I should not like him to think that I had accepted the whole story of cruelty which the wife has told me, most of which I regard as either exaggerated or untrue. But on the very limited basis which I am endeavouring to define, I think that I am bound to find the husband guilty of cruelty on the second supplemental petition only.

WHITEHOUSE
v.
BOARD OF CONTROL.

No appeal lies to the House of Lords from a refusal of the Court of Appeal to grant leave to appeal from an order of the High Court refusing leave to institute proceedings under section 330 (2) of the Lunacy Act, 1890, as substituted by section 16 (1) of the Mental Treatment Act, 1930.[1]

Lane v. Esdaile [1891] A.C. 210, H.L. applied.

PETITION for leave to appeal.

This was a petition by Amy Jane Whitehouse for leave to appeal to the House of Lords and to appeal out of time, from two decisions of the Court of Appeal dated respectively June 8, 1959 (Morris, Ormerod and Willmer L.JJ.), and February 15, 1960 (Ormerod and Willmer L.JJ.). The respondents were the Board of Control, Dr. Arthur Noel Pearson who was a party to the certification of the petitioner under the Lunacy and Mental Treatment Acts, 1890 to 1930, and the Glamorgan County Council, and Evan John Powell, the duly authorised officer. The respondent, Dr. Cyril John Morgan, had died before the commencement of these proceedings and his personal representatives did not appear and were not represented, they not having been served with the proceedings.

On May 14, 1959, Glyn-Jones J. refused (a) the petitioner's application by originating summons for leave under section 330 (2) of the Lunacy Act, 1890, as substituted by section 16 (1) of the Mental Treatment Act, 1930, to bring proceedings against the respondents for damages for negligence and breach of statutory duty and false imprisonment; (b) leave to appeal from his decision. The petitioner thereupon applied to the Court of Appeal for leave to appeal, and, on June 8, 1959, the Court of Appeal refused such leave. On that occasion the petitioner appeared in person and the Court of Appeal went into the merits. On February 15, 1960, the Court of Appeal dismissed the petitioner's application for leave to appeal to the House of Lords. The petitioner now sought leave to appeal to the House of Lords from the refusals of the Court of Appeal to grant leave to appeal to itself and to the House of Lords. On the hearing of the petition, preliminary objection was taken on behalf of the Board of Control.

R. A. Barr for the Board of Control. In this type of case no appeal lies to the House of Lords from a refusal by the Court of Appeal to grant leave to appeal to the Court of Appeal. The order of the judge refusing leave under section 330 (2) of the

[1] Lunacy Act, 1890, s. 330 (2), as substituted by s. 16 (1) of the Mental Treatment Act, 1930: "No proceedings, civil or criminal, shall be brought against any person in any court in respect of any such matter as is mentioned in the last preceding subsection, without the leave of the High Court . . ."

Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1876, s. 3: ". . . an appeal shall lie to the House of Lords from any order or judgment . . . (1) of Her Majesty's Court of Appeal in England . . ."

Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 31 (1): "No appeal shall lie—. . . (i) without the leave of the judge or of the Court of Appeal from any interlocutory order . . . made or given by a judge . . ."

Lunacy Act, 1890, as substituted by section 16 (1) of the Mental Treatment Act, 1930, is an interlocutory order.

[LORD KEITH OF AVONHOLM. Interlocutory in what sense? It is final, because it disposed of the matter.]

It is submitted that the order is interlocutory, but for the purposes of the argument it matters not whether it is interlocutory or final. If it is final, the petition is misconceived because the petitioner could have given notice of the substantive appeal to the Court of Appeal and no such notice was given in this case.

Section 31 (1) (i) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, provides that no appeal lies without leave of the judge or the Court of Appeal from any interlocutory judgment made or given by a judge. It is submitted that the refusal of the Court of Appeal to grant leave to appeal to the Court of Appeal is not an order or judgment contemplated by or within the meaning of section 3 of the Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1876, and that, accordingly, no appeal lies to this House. Where Parliament has provided, as it has in the present case by the Act of 1925, that there should be no appeal unless some particular body or bodies named in the statute permit an appeal, such a provision is clearly intended as a check on appeals which may be brought and to prevent frivolous and unnecessary appeals. If it is to be said that there is a right of appeal against the refusal itself, the statutory provision is set at naught and becomes an absurdity, since two appeals would be possible instead of one, namely, one against refusal of leave and another against the substantive decision itself. Reliance is placed on Lane v. Esdaile,[2] which was followed in In re Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, Ex parte Stevenson,[3] where it was held that no appeal lay.

On the question whether an order made under section 330 (2) of the Lunacy Act, 1890, as substituted by section 16 (1) of the Mental Treatment Act, 1930, is interlocutory: see In re Page [4] and also Hunt v. Allied Bakeries Ltd.,[5] per Lord Evershed M.R. The principle of Lane v. Esdaile [6] would, however, apply whether the order were interlocutory or not.

To summarise: first, under section 330 (2) of the Lunacy Act, 1890, as substituted by section 16 (1) of the Act of 1930, the leave required is the leave of the High Court and that cannot be the leave of the Court of Appeal; and that upon the refusal of the leave by the judge in this case the matter was disposed of, and no appeal lies. In the alternative, the order was an interlocutory order, and the right of appeal is limited by section 31 (1) (i) of the Judicature Act, 1925, to leave given either by the judge or by the Court of Appeal, but not by your Lordships' House. If both the above contentions be wrong, then it is submitted that the order was a final order and no leave to appeal was necessary; that the proper course was for the petitioner to have instituted a substantive appeal to the Court of Appeal, and that as no substantive appeal has been heard, there is nothing from which to appeal to this House. [Reference was also made to Kay v. Briggs.[7]]

P. E. Webster for Dr. Pearson, and J. G. Wilmers for the Glamorgan County Council and Powell, adopted the argument for the Board of Control.

John Platts-Mills for the petitioner. Lane v. Esdaile[8] is distinguishable and should not be applied to the present case. That decision is limited by all the speeches, except that of Lord Halsbury L.C. within narrow limits, namely, that the House will not interfere with the discretion of the Court of Appeal in matters relating to the extension of time for leave to appeal to the Court of Appeal. The order asked for here is an order to the effect that the Court of Appeal should have given leave to appeal to that court.

[LORD COHEN. In the last paragraph of Lord Herschell's speech in Lane v. Esdaile[9] he says: "My Lords, I am quite "aware that Sir Henry James on behalf of the appellants "attempted to distinguish the two cases by reason of a difference "of language." I read the next sentence, altering it as I think it would have to be altered to fit the present case: "In the "present case it is said that no suit shall be instituted except by "special leave, whilst in the other case it is said that the deter-"mination of the appeal shall be final. I do not think that there "is any difference in the meaning of those two expressions."[10] The principle in the last part of the judgment applies also, I think, to the present case.]

It is submitted that since the enactment of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, a distinction should be drawn between cases in which it is provided by statute that a particular decision is final and cases where proceedings may not be taken without leave of the High Court. In regard to a provision such as the latter that means the High Court as controlled by the superior jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal, and that, in turn, by such other jurisdiction as there may be in proper cases. Accordingly, unless one finds words which necessarily point to the finality of the character of the decision, the expression the "High "Court" in such an enactment as section 16 (1) of the Act of 1930, does not exclude the right of appeal which is prescribed by the Judicature Act, 1925, and R.S.C., Ord. 58. The only group of cases where the House will not interfere with the use of the [10] The original passage reads: "In "the present case it is said that no "appeal shall lie after a year except "by special leave, whilst in the other "case it is said that the determina-"tion of the appeal shall be final "unless special leave to appeal be "given. I do not think there is any "difference in the meaning of those "two expressions."

Court of Appeal's discretion is that narrow group relating to the extension of time for leave to appeal to the Court of Appeal.

On the question whether the original order was final or interlocutory, the proper conclusion should be that if leave to commence an action under section 330 were refused, that would be a final order because it finally disposed of the right of the party to sue. If, however, leave were granted, the order would be interlocutory because the proceedings would be continuing. It is submitted that the order of June 8, 1959, refusing the application for leave to bring proceedings is, therefore, an order within the Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1876, and that it would be proper to allow an appeal to be heard. [Reference was also made to the first note in vol. 2 of The Annual Practice (1958) at p. 3173, on section 31 (1) (h) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, and to the note in vol. 1 of The Annual Practice (1960) at p. 1663, under the heading "Interlocutory order" on R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 4.]

The Appeal Committee refused the petition.

LORD COHEN. We are satisfied that the preliminary objection must be sustained, and that this case is covered by the principle of Lane v. Esdaile.[11] In those circumstances, we think it better to express no opinion on the merits of the appeal in the interests of the petitioner. The petition is refused.

Leave to appeal to the House of Lords refused.

(inter alia) the same property in favour of the plaintiff and five other persons. All interest due on the first mortgage was paid down to June, 1959, but no part of the principal sum or interest secured by the second mortgage was ever paid.

In November, 1938, a receiving order in bankruptcy was made against the mortgagor. No proof of the debt secured by the second mortgage was then submitted by the second mortgagees. The mortgagor did not obtain his discharge and in January, 1958, the plaintiff, who was then the only person entitled to the benefit of the second mortgage, submitted a proof of debt for £3,061 18s. 9d., and valued the security constituted by the second mortgage at £2,250. In May, 1958, the plaintiff served on the official receiver, as trustee in bankruptcy of the mortgagor, a notice under rule 13 (c) of the Second Schedule to the Bankruptcy Act, 1914,[1] requiring him to elect whether he would or would not exercise his power of redeeming the security or of requiring it to be realised. No election was made by the official receiver within the six-month period allowed by the rule.

In June, 1959, the plaintiff issued a summons claiming (inter alia) a declaration that his right to redeem the first mortgage was still subsisting. He conceded that, as against the mortgagor, his remedies by action were statute barred:—

Held, (1) that when the plaintiff's rights against the mortgagor became statute barred in 1942, by operation of section 16 of the Limitation Act, 1939, his estate and interest in the property came to an end; that, since no one who had no estate or interest in land could have an equity of redemption, he then ceased to be entitled to redeem the first mortgage; and that, having lost his status as a legal mortgagee of the property, the plaintiff was no longer entitled under section 95 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, to give directions to the first mortgagees with regard to the redemption of the first mortgage which would override any directions given by the mortgagor (post, p. 1102).

(2) That the doctrine that time ceased to run under the Limitation Act, 1939, when a party became bankrupt only applied "in "the bankruptcy" and had no effect on the operation of the statute upon any rights or remedies which were unaffected by the bankruptcy, and a mortgagee who relied on his security, as the plaintiff did, retained and stood on rights which he had before the bankruptcy, and which were unaffected by it so that, in respect of those rights, time continued to run notwithstanding the bankruptcy; that, the plaintiff and his predecessors in title having become debarred from foreclosing or recovering possession of the property in 1942, the plaintiff was not in January, 1958, a secured creditor within the meaning of the rules in the Second Schedule to the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, and was not entitled to give notice under rule 13 (c); and that, therefore, the official receiver's failure to elect did not operate to vest the mortgagor's equity of redemption in the plaintiff. Accordingly, the plaintiff's right to redeem the first mortgage was no longer subsisting (post, p. 1105).

[1] Bankruptcy Act, 1914, Sch. II, r. 13 (c): "... the creditor may at "any time, by notice in writing, re-"quire the trustee to elect whether he "will or will not exercise his power of "redeeming the security or requiring "it to be realised, and if the trustee "does not, within six months after "receiving the notice, signify in "writing to the creditor his election "to exercise the power, he shall not "be entitled to exercise it; and the "equity of redemption, or any other "interest in the property comprised "in the security which is vested in "the trustee, shall vest in the "creditor ..."

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

By a mortgage, dated March 13, 1930, the mortgagor, Lisle John Forman Mantle, demised certain freehold property known as Malvern Cottage, Malvern Road, Shirley, Southampton, to John Johnson Martin for a term of 1,000 years from the date thereof by way of legal mortgage to secure the principal sum of £900 and interest. On September 30, 1932, John Johnson Martin transferred the benefit of this mortgage to himself, Marion Lillian Martin, the first defendant Thomas Ralph Plumer Price, and the second defendant, Robert William Lewington. Marion Lillian Martin died on November 17, 1947, and John Johnson Martin on November 26, 1955.

By a further mortgage, dated May 13, 1930, made between the mortgagor of the first part, Clement George Knight, William Hector Mackenzie and the plaintiff, Frederick Wynn Cotterell as sureties of the second part, Francis Fred Hawkins, Sidney John Hawkins, Thomas Palmeiras Hawkins and Charles Robert Hawkins as first lenders of the third part, William Hector Mackenzie as second lender of the fourth part, and the plaintiff as third lender of the fifth part, the mortgagor demised (inter alia) the property comprised in the first mortgage to the first, second and third lenders for 3,000 years to secure the repayment of the principal sum of £2,321 12s. 5d. and interest. The second mortgage was expressed to be subject to the first mortgage and contained a covenant by the mortgagor and the sureties with the first lenders and by the mortgagor with the second and third lenders that the mortgagor would, on August 13, 1930, pay to the first lenders £2,121 12s. 5d.; to the second lender £125 and to the third lender (the plaintiff) £75, all with interest. The second mortgage was registered as a puisne mortgage under section 10 (1), Class C (i) of the Land Charges Act, 1925, on May 14, 1930.

Charles Robert Hawkins died on February 25, 1933, and, by a transfer of mortgage endorsed on the second mortgage, the three surviving first lenders transferred the benefit of the second mortgage to Clement George Knight, William Hector Mackenzie and the plaintiff in consideration of the aggregate sum of £2,861 18s. 9d. William Hector Mackenzie died on January 27, 1957, and on October 16, 1957, Clement George Knight and the plaintiff transferred all their interest in the second mortgage to the plaintiff. Notice of this transfer was given to the mortgagor in 1957 and to the first mortgagees' solicitors in 1958.

On November 15, 1938, a receiving order was made against the mortgagor in the Southampton County Court (In Bankruptcy). No proof of the debt secured by the second mortgage was at that time submitted by the plaintiff and his co-mortgagors.

PRICE.

The mortgagor had never obtained his discharge and, on January 3, 1958, the plaintiff submitted a proof of debt for the sum of £3,061 18s. 9d., and valued the security constituted by the second mortgage at £2,250. By a notice dated May 13, 1958, given pursuant to rule 13 (c) in the Second Schedule to the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, the plaintiff required the official receiver, as the mortgagor's trustee in bankruptcy, to elect whether he would or would not exercise his power of redeeming the security mentioned in the proof of debt or of requiring such security to be realised. The notice was served on the official receiver on May 14, 1958, but no election was made by the official receiver within the period of six months allowed by rule 13 (c).

The mortgagor remained at all times in occupation of the property. No part of the principal sum secured by the first mortgage was repaid, but the interest was paid down to June 29, 1959. No part of either the principal sum or interest secured by the second mortgage was ever paid.

On June 16, 1959, the plaintiff issued an originating summons, to which the surviving first mortgagees and the mortgagor were defendants, claiming a declaration that his right to redeem and to require a transfer to himself of the first mortgage was still subsisting; if necessary, an account of what was due under the first mortgage and a declaration that upon payment by the plaintiff to the first mortgagees of the sum due under the first mortgage the plaintiff might be at liberty to redeem the first mortgage.

BUCKLEY J. This is an originating summons taken out under R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A, in which the plaintiff claims a declaration that as second mortgagee of property he is entitled to redeem a first mortgage on that property, and for consequential relief.

[His Lordship referred to the facts, and continued:] Mr. Bradburn, who appears for the plaintiff, concedes that as against the mortgagor the plaintiff's remedies by action under the second mortgage are statute barred; but he says, notwithstanding that fact, the plaintiff's right as against the first mortgagees to redeem the first mortgage remains unaffected.

The sections of the Limitation Act, 1939, to which it is relevant to refer, are first of all section 18 (1), which provides: "No action shall be brought to recover any principal sum of "money secured by a mortgage or other charge on property, "whether real or personal, or to recover proceeds of the sale of "land, after the expiration of twelve years from the date when "the right to receive the money accrued." The legal date for redemption was August 13, 1930, and that was the date for payment under the covenant. Time would then have begun to run in respect of the obligation to pay under the covenant, and would have expired in 1942.

As regards foreclosure, section 18 (4) provides: "Nothing in "this section shall apply to a foreclosure action in respect of "mortgaged land, but the provisions of this Act relating to "actions to recover land shall apply to such an action." That refers back to section 4 (3), which provides: "No action shall be "brought by any other person to recover any land after the "expiration of twelve years from the date on which the right of "action accrued to him . . . " So that the right to foreclose or the right to sue for possession would also have become barred in the year 1942.

I ought also to mention that section 16 provides: "Subject "to the provisions of section 7 of this Act and of section 75 of "the Land Registration Act, 1925, at the expiration of the period "prescribed by this Act for any person to bring an action to "recover land (including a redemption action) or an action to "enforce an advowson, the title of that person to the land or "advowson shall be extinguished."

Mr. Bradburn says, although as against the mortgagor the plaintiff's rights to foreclose and sue for possession or to sue upon the covenant are barred, his right to redeem the first mortgage remains wholly unaffected. The only provision of the Limitation Act dealing with redemption actions is section 12, which provides that: "When a mortgagee of land has been in "possession of any of the mortgaged land for a period of twelve "years, no action to redeem the land of which the mortgagee "has been so in possession shall thereafter be brought by the "mortgagor or any person claiming through him." Mr. Bradburn's argument is that, section 12 being the only provision in the Act for barring a redemption action, that is the only way in which his client could become deprived of his right to redeem the first mortgage and that, the first mortgagees never having been in possession, the section cannot operate in the present case. In those circumstances he says he is entitled, under section 95 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, to give directions to the first mortgagees with regard to redemption of the first mortgage which override any directions that the mortgagor might give. Subsection (2) of section 95 provides that "The rights conferred by this section "belong to and are capable of being enforced by each incum- "brancer, or by the mortgagor, notwithstanding any intermediate "incumbrance; but a requisition of an incumbrancer prevails "over a requisition of the mortgagor." Mr. Bradburn says that his client is an incumbrancer whose requisition is entitled to take precedence over any requisition of the mortgagor relating to the redemption of the first mortgage. To bring himself within the provisions of that section, it is necessary for him to show that he is an incumbrancer within the meaning of the Law of Property Act, 1925. That term is defined in section 205 (1) (vii) of the Act in such a way as to mean a person entitled to the benefit of a legal or equitable mortgage, or a trust for securing money, or a lien or a charge of a portion, annuity or other capital sum or annual sum, so that, in the circumstances of the present case, the plaintiff's right to be regarded as an incumbrancer within the meaning of the Law of Property Act depends upon the answer to the question whether he is entitled to a legal mortgage of the property.

In my judgment, on the second mortgagee's right against the mortgagor becoming statute barred, the second mortgagee lost all estate and interest in the mortgaged property. He could no longer foreclose as against the mortgagor; he could no longer sue for possession, and as a result of the provisions of section 16 (to which I have referred) his estate in the land had come to an end. It seems to me that, as a result, he lost his status as a mortgagee. An equity of redemption is an incident of the status of mortgagor or puisne incumbrancer entitled to redeem the higher mortgage. It is part of the machinery provided by equity for enabling anyone who is mortgagor of land, or who stands to any extent in the shoes of the mortgagor of land, to redeem the pledge of the land. The very term "equity of "redemption" suggests that that is the character of the right; the equity of redemption exists for the purpose of assisting him who has a right to redeem to redeem the land and to get the land back.

In my judgment, no one who has no estate or interest recognised by law in the land can have an equity of redemption of that land, and, when a second mortgagee loses his position vis-à-vis the mortgagor, as a mortgagee of the land, he ceases to be entitled to an equity of redemption of any prior mortgage. What the plaintiff is really attempting to assert here is not a right to redeem the land but a right to insist upon a transfer of the first mortgage to him. He wants to get in the first mortgage in order that he may be in a position to exercise certain rights under the first mortgage, and thereby to put himself in a position to retain moneys in satisfaction of the debt due under the second mortgage without having to have recourse to remedies in the courts which, as against the mortgagor, he is debarred from having by reason of the Limitation Act. Therefore, it seems to me that Mr. Bradburn's submissions on this part of the case are fallacious because they assume (wrongly, as I see it) that the plaintiff's equity of redemption of the first mortgage can survive, in gross, the demise of the second mortgage as a mortgage enforceable against the mortgagor.

That is not the end of the matter, for Mr. Bradburn says that as a result of the notice which was served under rule 13 (c) of the Second Schedule to the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, he has a statutory title (under the rules and schedules to that Act) which enables him to assert against the first mortgagees that he is in a position to redeem their first mortgage. The plaintiff's rights as second mortgagee to redeem the first mortgage were not barred by statute at the commencement of the bankruptcy. As I have stated, time began to run in 1930, and the receiving order was made in November, 1938, so only a little over eight years had run at the time when the receiving order was made. Mr. Bradburn says the effect of the receiving order was to put an end to the operation of the Statutes of Limitation so far as any remedies within the bankruptcy are concerned so that, vis-à-vis the trustee in bankruptcy, the plaintiff remained a secured creditor entitled to adopt any of the courses open to him under rules 10 to 13 of the rules contained in the Second Schedule to the Bankruptcy Act. Those are the rules which deal with proofs by secured creditors. The first rule, rule 10, provides what shall happen if the secured creditor realises his security; rule 11 provides what happens if he surrenders his security; and rule 12 requires that "If a secured creditor does not either realise or "surrender his security, he shall, before ranking for dividend, "state in his proof the particulars of his security, the date when "it was given, and the value at which he assesses it," he is only to be entitled to prove for the balance. Rule 13 applies where a security is so valued: "the trustee may at any time redeem it on "payment to the creditor of the assessed value," or he may require the property to be sold. Sub-paragraph (c) of rule 13 provides: "Provided that the creditor may at any time, by "notice in writing, require the trustee to elect whether he will "or will not exercise his power of redeeming the security or "requiring it to be realised, and if the trustee does not, within "six months after receiving the notice, signify in writing to the "creditor his election to exercise the power, he shall not be "entitled to exercise it; and the equity of redemption, or any "other interest in the property comprised in the security which "is vested in the trustee, shall vest in the creditor, and the "amount of his debt shall be reduced by the amount at which the "security has been valued."

Mr. Bradburn's contention is that, as the result of the notice served under rule 13 by the plaintiff and the default of the trustee in electing within the six months, the mortgagor's equity of redemption of the second mortgage has become barred and the estate of the mortgagor, including his equity, to reedem the first mortgage, has vested in the plaintiff.

The doctrine that time ceases to run under the Statute of Limitations where a party becomes bankrupt has been dealt with in certain cases to which I have been referred. The first I should mention is Ex parte Lancaster Banking Corporation,[1] a decision of Bacon V.-C., as he later became, who was then Chief Judge in Bankruptcy. In the course of his judgment he said[2]: "The Statute of Limitations has nothing to do with the "bankruptcy laws. When a bankruptcy ensues, there is an end "to the operation of that statute, with reference to debtor and "creditor. The debtor's rights are established and the creditor's "rights are establishd in the bankruptcy and the Statute of "Limitations has no application at all to such a case, or to the "principles by which it is governed." What the judge was saying there is that the operation of the statute is at an end with reference to debtor and creditor. He is not asserting that the bankruptcy puts an end altogether to the operation of the statute in relation to all matters affecting the debtor's property, but in regard to the relation between the debtor and his creditor.

The other case I wish to refer to is In re Benzon,[3] a decision of the Court of Appeal. There the court had to consider whether, in a case where a debtor was adjudicated bankrupt in 1890 and remained bankrupt until his death in July, 1911, the fact that he had by his will exercised a general testamentary power and thereby made the subject-matter of that power assets for payment of debts on his own death, enabled creditors against whom time had started to run before bankruptcy, to say that they were entitled to come in and participate in the distribution of that asset and were not statute barred. Channell J., who delivered the judgment of the court, said[4]: "On the point of the Statute of "Limitations, inasmuch as the debts were incurred by the "bankrupt before 1890 and 1892 respectively, they would prima "facie have been barred long before his death in 1911. The "contentions of Mr. Hansell on this point on behalf of the appel-"lants were, first, that the exercise of the power of appointment "which made the fund available as assets gave them a new right "of action or proceeding which was not barred, and, secondly, "that, even if that was not so, the effect of the bankruptcy was "to prevent the statute running." I need not deal with the first point, which the court did not think a good point. Channel J. went on[5]: "As to the second point, cases were quoted beginning "with Ex parte Ross,[6] which show that in the bankruptcy a debt "does not become barred by lapse of time if it was not so barred "at the commencement of the bankruptcy, and of this there can "be no doubt, but this is only in the bankruptcy." The court, accordingly, held that, although the appointment at death gave creditors a new fund out of which they could get payment, and a new mode of proceeding in order to get it, that was merely a new remedy and not a new cause of action—the cause really being the old debt—and that the statute, having begun to run against the creditors before the commencement of the bankruptcy, continued to run notwithstanding the bankruptcy, and that the claims of the creditors on that fund, not being claims in the bankruptcy, were statute barred.

The importance of that case [7] and of the way in which the doctrine is stated in the judgment of the court is that it makes it clear that it is only "in the bankruptcy" that the statute ceases to operate. It does not have any effect on the operation of the statute on any rights or remedies which are unaffected by the bankruptcy. In my judgment, a mortgagee who relies upon his security retains and stands on rights which he had before the bankruptcy, and which remain unaffected by the bankruptcy. Rules 10, 11, 12 and 13 do not in any way regulate what a mortgagee is to do qua mortgagee; they only limit the extent to which he is to be entitled to prove in competition with unsecured creditors, notwithstanding that he is a mortgagee and has rights and remedies which are peculiar to him and available to him outside the bankruptcy.

Section 7 of the Bankruptcy Act, after providing in subsection (1) that once a receiving order has been made "no "creditor to whom the debtor is indebted in respect of any debt "provable in bankruptcy shall have any remedy against the "property or person of the debtor in respect of the debt, or shall "commence any action or other legal proceedings, unless with "the leave of the court and on such terms as the court may "impose," goes on in subsection (2): "But this section shall not "affect the power of any secured creditor to realise or otherwise "deal with his security in the same manner as he would have "been entitled to realise or deal with it if this section had not "been passed."

Although the bankruptcy takes away the rights of ordinary creditors to sue for their dues and regulates their right of proof in the bankruptcy, the rights of secured creditors are unaffected under that section, and there is no reason, in my judgment, why time should not continue to run under the Limitation Act as regards those rights and remedies which the secured creditors have outside the bankruptcy.

In the present case, the second mortgagees' right to foreclose or to take possession of the subject-matter of the second mortgage arose not later than August 13, 1930. Many more than twelve years have elapsed since those rights accrued and they have long been barred, and were barred long before the date in 1958 when the plaintiff served the notice under rule 13.

Therefore, the plaintiff and his predecessors having become debarred from foreclosing or recovering possession of the land, whether as against the trustee in bankruptcy or against the mortgagor, in my judgment, in 1958 the plaintiff was no longer a secured creditor within the meaning of the rules in the Second Schedule to the Bankruptcy Act, and I do not think that, at that date, it was open to the plaintiff to give the notice which he did give. It may be that his right to sue on the covenant for payment contained in the second mortgage (being a right which was merely a right to sue in debt) was a right which was affected by the supervention of the bankruptcy so as not to have become statute barred, but that is not a matter with which I have any concern, because that right alone would not constitute the plaintiff a secured creditor within the meaning of the rules. A secured creditor must, for present purposes, be somebody who has some interest in property which is security for his debt, and not merely the benefit of a covenant.

In those circumstances Mr. Bradburn's second submission also fails because, for the reasons which I have endeavoured to express, the notice which was served in 1958 was served in circumstances in which the plaintiff was not entitled to serve it, and, accordingly, was of no effect. I therefore declare that the plaintiff's right to redeem the first mortgage is no longer subsisting.

the profits tax legislation. In 1951 H., a director and member of the company, invented a special type of "cable gland" used for engineering purposes which he patented in 1952. On December 31, 1954, he entered into an agreement with the company whereby he granted a licence to the company to manufacture and sell the patented article, and the company covenanted to pay him £7 10s. per cent. of the selling price of every such article manufactured and sold. The company made payments under the agreement totalling £4,072 during the period March, 1955, to its termination in September, 1955. The Crown claimed that these payments were an amount applied for the benefit of H. within the meaning of section 36 (1) (c) of the Finance Act, 1947,[1] and must accordingly be deemed for the purposes of section 35 of the Act to be a "distribution" to him of that amount. The special commissioners found that the agreement was a genuine commercial agreement under which the company received full consideration for the payments made to H., and that the payments were not a "distribution" within the meaning of the subsection. On appeal by the Crown:—

Held, that, a payment made for the benefit of any person by way of "remuneration; loans or otherwise" did not require an element of bounty in order to bring it within the scope of section 36 (1) (c), and, therefore, although the company had received full consideration for the payments made to H., the payments were nevertheless to be deemed a "distribution" under section 36 (1).

Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Lactagol Ltd. (1954) 35 T.C. 230 distinguished.

CASE STATED by the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts.

The respondent company, H. Dunning & Co. (1946) Ltd., appealed to the special commissioners against assessments to profits tax for the chargeable accounting periods March 1, 1955, to October 31, 1955, and November 1, 1955, to February 29, 1956, in the sums of £1,000 and £600 respectively, the question for determination being whether a sum of £4,072 paid to one, William Hawke, a director of the company, under the terms of an agreement of December 31, 1954, was to be deemed to be a distribution within the meaning of section 36 (1) (c) of the Finance Act, 1947,[1] more particularly, whether that sum of £4,072 was "applied . . . otherwise for the benefit of" William Hawke.

The following were among the facts stated by the commissioners: The company was incorporated in 1946, and carried on the business of light engineering. It was director-controlled, within the meaning of section 36 (1) (c) of the Act of 1947, and William Hawke (hereinafter called "the director") had been a director since its incorporation, but was not a whole-time service director. At all material times he held one £1 share out of 1,000 issued shares. In 1951 the director invented a special type of "cable gland" for engineering purposes and obtained provisional patent protection for that invention. On May 4, 1951, he and the company entered into an agreement whereby he granted to the company a licence to manufacture and sell the invention. That agreement provided for the payment of a "royalty" of £7 10s. per cent. of the selling price of each patented article manufactured and sold by the company, and was to last for five years from January 1, 1951 (subject to certain provisions for earlier termination). The director obtained full patent protection for his invention some time in 1952. On December 31, 1954, the agreement of May 4, 1951, was cancelled as from March 1, 1953. Also on December 31, 1954, a fresh agreement was entered into between the director and the company whereby the director granted to the company a licence to manufacture and sell the patented article. The only differences between that agreement and the agreement of May 4, 1951, were that the word "commission" was used instead of royalty (the "commission" remaining £7 10s. of the selling price), and a slight alteration in the dates of payment of the "commission." That agreement was terminated in September, 1955. The sum of £4,072 was the gross sum paid by the company to the director for the period March 1, 1955, to the termination of the agreement in September, 1955, but for the purposes of the assessments under appeal it was apportioned on a time basis over the whole year to February 29, 1956. It was admitted on behalf of the Crown that the payments to the director were fixed at a reasonable commercial rate.

It was contended on behalf of the company that the payments to the director were not amounts applied for his benefit, within the meaning of section 36 (1) (c) of the Finance Act, 1947; that the decision in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Chappie Ltd.[2] dealt only with the question of loans, specifically mentioned in section 36, and had no application to genuine commercial transactions of a different kind, and that the decision in Inland Revenue Commisisoners v. Lactagol Ltd.[3] was to the effect that payments other than loans, made by a company on a genuine commercial basis, were not to be deemed to be distributions, within the meaning of section 36 (1) (c).

It was contended on behalf of the Crown that the sum of £4,072 paid to the director was an amount applied for his benefit within the meaning of section 36 (1) (c) of the Finance Act, 1947, and by virtue of section 36 (1) must, accordingly be deemed for the purpose of section 35 of the Act to be a distribution to him of that amount; and that Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Chappie Ltd.[4] and Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Latagol Ltd.[5] did not provide authority for the proposition that a payment was necessarily excluded from the provisions of section 36 (1) (c) of the Finance Act, 1947, by reason of its having been paid in the course of a commercial transaction.

The commissioners decided that the only question they had to decide was whether the payments made by the company to the director were to be deemed to be distributions, within the meaning of section 36 (1) (c); for if they were not distributions in that sense, they could not be net relevant distributions; and that the answer to that question depended on whether those payments had been applied for his benefit "otherwise" than as remuneration or loans.

In the view of the commissioners the decision in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Chappie Ltd.[6] dealt only with "loans" in the context in which that word appeared in section 36 (1) (c); they thought that Lord Evershed M.R., in that case, only came to the conclusion that loans at a commercial rate of interest were to be deemed to be applied for the borrower's benefit because loans were specifically dealt with in that subsection. They held that the effect of the decision in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Lactagol Ltd.[7] was that genuine commercial payments other than loans at a commercial rate of interest were not to be deemed to be distributions within the meaning of the subsection, and that the appeal, accordingly, succeeded.

The Crown appealed.

P. J. Brennan for the taxpayer.

The cases cited in argument are referred to in the judgment.

CROSS J. This case concerns the profits tax liability of the respondent company, H. Dunning & Co. (1946) Ltd., for two chargeable accounting periods, March 1, 1955, to October 31, 1955, and November 1, 1955, to February 29, 1956.

The question arises in this way. The company was incorporated in 1946 and carries on the business of light engineering. It is director-controlled, within the meaning of the profits tax legislation. One, William Hawke, has been a director of the company since its incorporation, though he is not a whole-time director, and he has been at all material times a member of the company holding one £1 share out of the 1,000 issued shares. In 1951 he invented a special type of "cable gland" for engineering purposes and obtained patent protection for this invention in 1952. On December 31, 1954, he entered into an agreement with the company whereby he granted to the company a licence for a period of years to manufacture and to sell the patented article, and the company covenanted during the continuance of the licence to pay him a commission of £7 10s. per cent. of the selling price of each patented article. provision for the termination of the agreement before the expiry of the period, and it was in fact terminated in September, 1955.

It is found in the case stated that that was a perfectly genuine commercial agreement under which the company got full consideration for the payments which they had to make to the director, Hawke. The total of the payments which were made under the agreement for the period from March 1, 1955, to its termination in September, 1955, was £4,072, and the whole question at issue is whether or not those payments were "distributions" by the company within the meaning of section 36 of the Finance Act, 1947. If they were distributions then (on the assumption which hitherto has been made that they would not be deductible for the purpose of ascertaining the gross relevant distribution for the purpose of section 35) the amount of profits tax payable by the company for the accounting periods in question would be larger than it would be if the payments were not distributions.

Section 36 (1) is in these terms: "Subject to the provisions "of the next succeeding subsection, wherever—(a) any amount "is distributed directly or indirectly by way of dividend or cash "bonus to any person; or (b) assets are distributed in kind to any "person; or (c) where the trade or business is carried on by a "body corporate the directors whereof have a controlling interest "therein" (which is the case here) "an amount is applied, "whether by way of remuneration, loans or otherwise, for the "benefit of any person, there shall be deemed for the purposes "of the last preceding section to be a distribution to that person "of that amount or, as the case may be, of an amount equal to "the value of those assets." Then there is a proviso: "Provided "that no sum applied in repaying a loan or in reducing the "share capital of the person carrying on the trade or business "shall be treated as a distribution." That proviso certainly seems to suggest that, if it were not there, a sum applied by the company in repaying a loan would be a distribution. I need not read subsection (2), but subsection (3) contains special provisions in regard to loans, to this effect: "Where—(a) a loan "has been treated as part of the gross relevant distributions to "proprietors for a chargeable accounting period; and (b) as a "result, the amount of tax payable for that period has been "increased," then, if the loan is repaid, the gross relevant distributions to the proprietors are to be treated as reduced by the amount corresponding to the increase caused by treating the loan as a distribution.

The question which I have to decide is whether these payments were amounts applied by the company for the benefit of the director "by way of remuneration, loans or otherwise." They were certainly not "remuneration," or "loans"; but do they come under the head "or otherwise"? They were, as I have said, payments made under a commercial agreement for full consideration given by the director to the company in the form of a grant to the company of a licence to exploit his patent. If the words had been simply "an amount is applied for the benefit of any per-"son," I should have thought it very doubtful whether they would have covered payments, whether of capital or income, under an ordinary commercial agreement. According to the ordinary use of the English language, a payment for which you have given full consideration is not an amount applied for your benefit by the payer. But, of course, the words are not simply "an amount is applied for the benefit of any person"; there are the additional words "whether by way of remuneration, loans or "otherwise." In Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Chappie Ltd.[1] the Court of Appeal had to consider the case of loans made by a company to one of its members, an associated company, on what were found to be ordinary commercial terms, and the court, affirming the decision of Danckwerts J. held that such a loan was a distribution within the meaning of this section.

It has been argued by Mr. Brennan that that decision turned simply on the special provisions contained in the section with regard to loans. The section, of course refers to loans expressly, and there is, in subsection (3), a provision for adjusting the matter if and when the loan is repaid. In the case of loans, therefore, it is particularly difficult to avoid the conclusion that they count as distributions even if they are made on commercial terms; but I do not regard the decision in the Chappie case[1] as throwing no light on the question which I have to consider. The members of the Court of Appeal, as I read their judgments, definitely rejected the idea that there had to be an element of bounty in a payment in order to bring it into the scope of the section. It is true that they were dealing with loans, but they were construing the section as a whole. If once you say that payments by way of loan or remuneration are distributions, even if made on commercial terms, it is very difficult to say that what falls under the heading of "or otherwise" as opposed to what falls under the heading "remuneration" or "loans" must contain an element of bounty.

If you read the subsection as widely as that, it follows, of course, that any payment made by a company, whether it be an income or a capital payment, and whether there is consideration for it or not, may be a distribution; if, for example, the company buys a motor-car from a member for a proper price, even that may be a distribution. But, I think that the members of the Court of Appeal in the Chappie case[2] were aware that that might be the result of their decision. That is shown by what was said by Jenkins L.J. to Mr. Tucker at the end of the case.[3] But, of course, it is true to say that the decision itself related only to loans.

The section was considered again a little later by Harman J. in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Lactagol Ltd.[4] There the company had made a lump sum payment to a director-member, one Adams, in consideration of a covenant that after his term of service with the company ceased he would not compete with the company. So for a lump sum payment the company got the benefit of a capital asset in the form of Adams' covenant. Harman J. was impressed, as anybody must be, with the absurdity of treating such a payment—a capital payment for a capital asset under a genuine commercial transaction—as being an amount applied for the benefit of the payee. He was not prepared to accept the view that in the Chappie case [5] the Court of Appeal had impliedly decided that all payments were distributions. He thought that a line must be drawn somewhere, and influenced, I think, by the fact that the Act taxes profits, he drew the line at payments of capital for capital assets. Whether or not it is logical to draw any line, or to draw it there, is not for me to say. If I were faced with a similar case to that which was before Harman J., I should, of course, follow his decision. But the case before me is not one of a payment of capital for a capital asset; but of recurring payments of income. I do not, therefore, think that decision of Harman J. covers this case, and I feel myself at liberty to reach the conclusion at which, but for his decision, I would have arrived without hesitation in view of the decision of the Court of Appeal in the Chappie case.[6]

I should have said that the commissioners decided this case in favour of the taxpayer on the ground that the Chappie case [6] dealt only with loans, and that this case was covered by the Lactagol case.[7] For the reasons I have tried to give, I think that their decision was wrong, and therefore I shall allow the appeal. There will be a declaration that the slum of £4,072 paid to William Hawke was an amount paid for his benefit within the meaning of section 30 (1) (c) of the Finance Act, 1947, and is deemed to be a distribution under that section.

Landlord and Tenant—Assignment—Judgment for possession—Sale of property—Assignment of property to company without benefit of judgment—Whether company entitled to enforce order for possession—County Court Rules, 1936 (S.R. & O., 1936, No. 626/*L.*17), Ord. 25, r. 6.

The owner and landlord of a dwelling-house obtained by consent on February 23, 1959, an order from the county court for possession of a flat on the premises occupied by the defendant. By an agreement of May 8, 1959, she agreed to sell the property subject to and with the benefit of the order for possession. That purchase was not completed, and the benefit of the agreement of May 8 was later sold to a sub-purchaser. On July 4, 1959, the landlord transferred the property to the sub-purchaser, who on the same day executed a deed of trust declaring that he held the property on trust for the plaintiff company and a deed transferring the property to the company. He did not transfer the benefit of the contract of May 8 to the company. The defendant refused to give up possession, and the plaintiff company sought to enforce the order for possession:—

Held, that there being no assignment to the company of the benefit of the order for possession, it did not pass to them as one of the appurtenances under the general words of conveyance:—

Goldthorpe v. Bain [1952] 2 Q.B. 455; [1952] 1 T.L.R. 1512; [1952] 2 All E.R. 23, C.A. explained.

Quaere, whether the order for possession was assignable.

Judgment of Judge Andrew reversed.

APPEAL from Judge Andrew.

The defendant, Louis Kenneth Field, appealed from a judgment dated January 18, 1960, at Marylebone County Court of Judge Andrew by which he declared (1) that a tenancy of an unfurnished first floor flat at 24, Inverness Terrace, Paddington [occupied by the defendant as a statutory tenant] had not been created in favour of the defendant; (2) that all necessary assignments had been made and that the plaintiffs, Chung Kwok Hotel Co. Ltd., were entitled to issue a warrant for possession. Only the second point was argued on the appeal.

The defendant was originally in occupation of the flat under a written agreement for a year, but had held over and thereby became a statutory tenant. In 1957 the then owner and landlord, Mrs. Silvester, brought an action for possession against the defendant on grounds connected with his written tenancy. The Rent Restrictions Act, 1957, applied to the tenant and in 1958 he was in fact served with six months' notice under the Act. The parties came to terms in the action and on February 23, 1959, an order was made by consent under which the defendant agreed to give up possession of the first floor flat to Mrs. Silvester on September 1, 1959; and she agreed to pay all his costs of the action and of a counterclaim on Scale 4, but she did not carry this into effect.

By a contract of sale dated May 8, 1959, which incorporated certain special conditions of sale and the Law Society's Conditions of Sale, Mrs. Silvester agreed to sell her interest in 24, Inverness Terrace to two purchasers. Special condition 5 provided that: "The property is sold subject to and with the "benefit of the existing tenancy of the first floor of the premises "in the unfurnished occupation of a Mr. Louis Kenneth Field "and subject to and with the benefit of an order made by the "county court dated February 23, 1959, ordering the said tenant "of the said first floor to give up possession thereof on September "1, 1959."

Those purchasers did not complete the sale, but by an agreement of June 5 1959, they agreed to sell the benefit of the contract of May 8 to one, Chan, who was stated to be purchasing the property with the intention of assigning it to the plaintiff company which was about to be incorporated.

By an agreement of June 15, 1959 (which was stated to be supplemental to the agreement of May 8), the two purchasers assigned to Chan the benefit of the agreement of May 8. On July 4, 1959, Mrs. Silvester executed a registered transfer of the property to Chan on the payment by him of the purchase price therefor. By documents executed subsequently on the same day, July 4, 1959, Chan executed: (1) a deed of trust of the property in favour of the plaintiff company (which was by now incorporated); and (2) a registered transfer of the premises to the company. He did not assign to the company the benefit of the agreement of May 8, 1959.

The defendant refused to give up possession of the first floor flat, and in county court proceedings brought by the plaintiff company, the judgment above referred to was given on January 18, 1960.

P. A. W. Merriton for the defendant.
Robin Dunn for the plaintiff company.

The following cases, in addition to those referred to in the judgment, were cited in argument: Williams v. Protheroe [1]; Ellis v. Torrington [2]; Kayley v. Hothersall. [3]

HARMAN L.J. delivered the first judgment in which he stated the facts and continued: Chan, being the inheritor of the benefit of the contract with Mrs. Silvester, probably does have a right against her to call upon her to do what was necessary to enforce her judgment; but very unfortunately he omitted to transfer that right to the plaintiff company, merely executing in their favour a common form registered transfer. Consequently, so far as I can see, the company has not the benefit of the covenant with Mrs. Silvester that it was so desirable they should have. It may be that they can call upon Chan to exercise his rights against her, but they have not ever purported to do so.

In August 1959 the time was drawing near when the defendant had agreed to vacate the property. He was not the sort of person who would propose to keep his word if he could get out of it, and he made an application of a very strange sort to the county court to vacate the judgment on the ground that Mrs. Silvester no longer had any interest in the property.

[3] [1925] 1 K.B. 607, C.A.

The county court judge had no hesitation in treating that as nonsense; and counsel for the defendant very candidly agrees that it was nonsense; but the attention of the judge was drawn by counsel to Ord. 25, r. 6 of the County Court Rules, 1936, which provides: "Where (a) any change has taken place after "judgment, by death, assignment, or otherwise, in the parties "entitled to enforce a judgment or order or in the parties liable "under a judgment or order . . . the party claiming to be "entitled to enforce the judgment or order may apply on affidavit "to the court for leave to issue the necessary process, and the "court may—(i) if satisfied that the party so applying is en-"titled to issue such process, make an order to that effect; "or (ii) if not so satisfied, order that any issue or question "necessary to determine the rights of the parties be tried in "an action."

Such an application as that, in the High Court anyhow, can be made in the first place ex parte, and of course if the judge or master to whom it is made is not satisfied he will then direct an issue to be tried. Something of that sort apparently happened here. When the issue came on the county court judge, having heard argument on the matter, decided it in favour of the company and his order, which is dated January 18, 1960, is in these terms: First, that "the new owners" (that is to say the company) "have not created a tenancy in favour of "the defendant"—that was a point that was argued below and not taken here so I need say no more about it—secondly, that "All necessary assignments have been made and the plaintiffs "are entitled to issue a warrant for possession."

When the judge said "All necessary assignments have been "made," he must, I suppose, be construing the legal documents because there is nothing oral in the way of an assignment, nor could there be in a matter of this sort. The judge did not give any reason: he simply held that it was quite enough for the company to show that they had had a registered transfer of the land and were the registered owners of it at the present date; and held the point taken (which it is true has no merits except the ingenuity of its inventor) to have been abandoned.

On appeal to this court two points are taken: first that an order for possession of this sort is not assignable at all: secondly, that, even if it is, there has been no assignment. I do not think that it is necessary to decide finally whether an order of this kind is assignable at law. I myself rather doubt it. There would be an obvious difficulty in this case in that the order itself contains an order for costs. Whether you can assign part of an order without the rest seems to me at least very doubtful. On the whole I should think that one could not; and I should be inclined to the view without deciding it that this order, or part of the order which deals with possession, is probably not at law assignable.

CHUNG KWOK HOTEL CO. LTD. v. FIELD.

Harman L.J.

But of course that is not the end of the matter at all. The order which I have read mentions the words "assignment." There is no doubt that many orders are assignable. Judgments for debt clearly are; though that example does not sufficiently explain the word "assignment" in the order. Another kind of assignment is that by operation of law, where the judgment creditor or the judgment holder dies or becomes bankrupt or of unsound mind: in those events the statutory assignee—that is to say the trustee in bankruptcy or the receiver in lunacy or the personal representative—will have devolved upon him without more the benefit of the judgment obtained by his predecessor.

The corresponding order in the Annual Practice, R.S.C., Ord. 42, r. 23, does not contain the word "assignment" at all: it simply says: "Where . . . any change has taken place by death "or otherwise in the parties entitled . . . to execution" then the party alleging himself to be entitled to issue execution "may "apply to the court for leave to issue execution accordingly." That may have a little significance. The question here, then, is whether there has been any assignment if the judgment, or that part of it which relates to possession, be assignable. It is said by Mr. Dunn that the benefit of such a judgment passes on a mere conveyance of the land—as if it were one of the appurtenances passing under the general words of a conveyance. That is not a view I can take at all.

Mr. Dunn cited in support of that proposition Goldthorpe v. Bain,[1] where Jenkins L.J. was dealing with a case of death, and where the bold argument was put up that a judgment for possession, anyhow in a statutory tenancy case, was a thing merely personal to the person who obtained it, and did not devolve on his or her personal representative. That view Jenkins L.J. had no difficulty in rejecting. He used words which, if they were taken without relation to the context in which they were used, might cover a case like the present. He said[2]: "In such a case, the "judgment, being one which concerns a proprietary interest of the "deceased landlord which would normally pass to the landlord's "personal representatives, those representatives, or a beneficiary "claiming through them by means of an assent, on proof to the "court of the grant of probate, and of the assent, if there is one, "would prima facie be entitled as of right to an order (under "Order 25, r. 6 of the County Court Rules) declaring them "entitled to enforce the order for possession." That is all he decided; and the fact that he talks about such an assignee being a successor in title does not mean that a mere assignment of the land inter vivos and without more will pass the benefit of an order of this sort. Therefore it seems to me that the difficulty that the plaintiffs are in is that they have not got an assignment of the benefit of this judgment.

[2] [1952] 2 Q.B. 455, 464.

The other case cited to us was Knight v. Clarke,[3] where the landlord had (as Mrs. Silvester has) parted with the whole interest in the property after the date when he obtained judgment. The headnote reads: "Where a landlord has recovered judgment in "an action against his tenant for the possession of premises "which had been held over after the expiration of the tenancy, "he will be allowed to issue the writ of possession notwith-"standing that his estate in the premises terminated after the "commencement of the action and before the trial, unless it be "unjust and futile to issue such writ. . . ." Therefore, the proper person to enforce this judgment was Mrs. Silvester. It is quite true that the defendant might have come forward and said that it would be futile to do this because she has lost all interest in the premises; but if she was supported by the present landlords, who now have the beneficial interest, I do not doubt at all that the writ would go in Mrs. Silvester's favour. Therefore they are not without remedy: they have merely taken the wrong way to achieve it.

In my judgment this point, although it is a technical point, succeeds, and the appeal must be allowed.

HODSON L.J. I agree, and for the same reasons.

ORMEROD L.J. I agree, for the same reasons.

Appeal allowed with costs.

ACKLAND & PRATTEN LTD. (IN LIQUIDATION) v. INLAND REVENUE COMRS.

£1 ordinary shares, of which 36,002 had been issued, on July 24, 1957, passed a special resolution that the capital be increased by £190,000 divided into 190,000 £1 ordinary shares, and that £198,011, part of the company's profit and loss appropriation account, be capitalised and applied in paying up in full at par 198,011 unissued £1 ordinary shares to be allotted to the existing shareholders in the proportion of eleven new shares for every two ordinary shares held. On October 21, 1957, these shares were allotted to the shareholders, thus increasing the nominal amount of the ordinary share capital to £234,013. On November 27, 1957, the company went into a voluntary liquidation, a reconstruction being considered desirable. By an agreement made with the new company on November 28, 1957, the company and the liquidator transferred to the new company almost all its assets, amounting to £161,517, of which £10,721 was reserved for taxation, so that there was available for distribution by the liquidator £150,796. 117,006 fully paid £1 ordinary shares were allotted by the new company in favour of the shareholders of the old company, who were substantially the same as those of the new company.

On October 14, 1957, inspectors of taxes were informed that the Commissioners of Inland Revenue were not seeking leave to appeal to the House of Lords in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Pollock & Peel Ltd. (In Liquidation) [1957] 1 W.L.R. 822; 37 T.C. 240; [1957] 2 All E.R. 483, C.A., and were instructed to apply the decision of the Court of Appeal in appropriate cases. Since the paid up capital of the old company, as increased by the capitalisation of undistributed profits and the allotment of paid up shares, exceeded £150,796, the result of that decision was that distribution of that sum by the liquidator would not be a gross relevant distribution for the purpose of section 35 (1) (c) of the Finance Act, 1947,[1] and there would

On August 15, 1958, the commissioners, being of the opinion that avoidance or reduction of liability to profits tax was the main purpose, or one of the main purposes, of the transactions made a direction under section 32 (1) of the Finance Act, 1951,[2] that the liability of the old company to profits tax for the chargeable accounting period ended November 28, 1957, should be computed as if, for the purposes of section 35 (1) (c) of the Finance Act, 1947, the total nominal value of the paid up ordinary share capital of the company were at all relevant times £36,002 and no more, so that any distribution in excess of that amount would attract profits tax. At the time of making the direction the commissioners had not determined an accounting period under section 20 (2) (b)[3] of the Finance Act, 1937. On appeal by the old company from the decision of the special commissoners dismissing an appeal against the direction:—

Held, (1) that in the absence of an explanation by the company that the liquidation was not contemplated at the time of the resolution of July 24, 1957, and that avoidance of profits tax liability was not in its mind until all the transactions were completed, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue were justified in finding that the conditions of section 32 (1) of the Act of 1951 were satisfied and that the main purpose, or one of the main purposes, of the transactions was the avoidance or reduction of liability (post, p. 1129).

(2) That it was, however, sufficient under section 32 (3) of the Act of 1951 if the main benefit which might have been expected to accrue from the transaction was the avoidance of tax liability, and if the commissioners were satisfied of that, then the avoidance of such liability was to be deemed to have been a main purpose, and that

"cash to the body corporate, society "or other body or redeemable prefer- "ence shares so issued."

S. 32: "(1) Where the Commis- "sioners are of opinion that the main "purpose or one of the main purposes "for which any transaction or trans- "actions was or were effected "(whether before or after the pass- "ing of this Act) was the avoidance "or reduction of liability to the pro- "fits tax, they may, if they think "fit, direct that such adjustments "shall be made as respects liability "to the profits tax as they consider "appropriate so as to counteract the "avoidance or reduction of liability "to the profits tax which would other- "wise be effected by the transaction "or transactions.

"(3) If it appears in the case of "any transaction or transactions, "being a transaction which involves, "or transactions one or more of "which involve—(a) the transfer or "acquisition of shares in or deben- "tures of a company; or (b) a "change or changes in the person or "persons carrying on a trade or "business or part of a trade or busi- "ness; or (c) a change or changes "in the directors of a company the "directors whereof have a controlling "interest therein, that, having regard "to the provisions of the law relating "to the profits tax other than this "section which were in force at the "time when the transaction or trans- "actions was or were effected, the "main benefit which might have "been expected to accrue from the "transaction or transactions in the "three years immediately following "the completion thereof was the "avoidance or reduction of liability "to the tax, the avoidance or reduc- "tion of liability to the profits tax "shall be deemed for the purposes "of this section to have been the "main purpose or one of the main "purposes of the transaction or trans- "actions.

"(4) Any direction of the Com- "missioners under this section shall "specify the transaction or trans- "actions giving rise to the direction "and the adjustments as respects "liability to the profits tax which "the Commissioners consider appro- "priate."'

[3] Finance Act, 1937, s. 20: "(2) "For the purpose of the national "defence contribution, the accounting "periods of a trade or business shall "be determined as follows: . . . "(b) in a case where the accounts "of the trade or business have been "made up as aforesaid but have "ceased to be so made up, the "accounting periods from the end of "the last period of twelve months for "which they were so made up shall "be such periods not exceeding "twelve months as the Commis- "sioners of Inland Revenue may "determine."

it was manifest that an independent, objective third party would think that it was a probability that the avoidance of tax was the main benefit to be expected; that the reference in section 32 (3) to the benefit in "the three years immediately following the com-"pletion of the transactions" meant that during the next three years, whether there had been a liquidation or not, there would in fact be some saving of tax, and that the subsection was, therefore, apt to cover a case such as the present where there had been a liquidation (post, pp. 1129, 1130).

Dictum of Lord Greene M.R. in Crown Bedding Ltd. and South Wales Flock Co. Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (1946) 34 T.C. 107, p. 120; [1946] 1 All E.R. 452, C.A. applied.

(3) That the commissioners in their direction had sufficiently specified "the adjustments as respects liability to the profits tax" within the meaning of section 32 (4) of the Act of 1951, which they considered appropriate, and the fact that the last chargeable accounting period under section 20 (2) (b) of the Act of 1937 had not been determined when the direction was made did not invalidate the direction since it clearly referred to whatever might prove to be the last chargeable accounting period (post, pp. 1130, 1131).

(4) That section 36 (4) (ii) of the Act of 1947 dealt with the liability of the new company, and that "already" referred not only to the time before liquidation but to the whole of the time before the question of the amount of any distribution charge on the new company fell to be considered, so that any distribution charge to which the old company became subject after liquidation would be taken into account in estimating the liability of the new company when it fell to be determined; and that there was, therefore, no justification for reading into the subsection a freeing of the old company from all liability to profits tax from the date of liquidation (post, pp. 1131, 1132). Accordingly, the appeal must be dismissed.

APPEAL from the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts.

A company, Ackland & Pratten Ltd., appealed to the special commissioners against a direction made on August 15, 1958, by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue ("the commissioners"), under section 32 of the Finance Act, 1951. The direction was as follows:

"We, the undersigned, being two of the Commissioners of "Inland Revenue, have had under consideration the following "transactions: (a) The special resolution passed by the members "of Ackland & Pratten Ltd. at an extraordinary general meeting "held on July 24, 1957, whereby it was resolved, inter alia, that "the sum of £198,011, being part of the amount standing to the "credit of the company's profit and loss appropriation account, "should be capitalised and applied in paying up in full at par "198,011 unissued ordinary shares of £1 each in the capital of "the company and that such shares so fully paid up be issued "and allotted to the existing shareholders of the company in "the proportion of eleven new shares for every two ordinary "shares already held by them. (b) The application of the said "capitalised sum and the allotment to the said shareholders of "198,011 shares in the manner directed by the said resolution "and the consequent increase of the nominal amount of the

"paid-up ordinary share capital of the company from £36,002 "to £234,013. (c) The special resolution passed at an extra-"ordinary general meeting held on November 27, 1957, whereby "it was resolved, inter alia, that the company be wound up "voluntarily. (d) The distribution to the said shareholders in "due course of liquidation of the company of certain assets of the "company. And being of the opinion that avoidance or reduction "of liability to the profits tax was, or as being the main benefit "which might have been expected to accrue from the transaction "in the three years immediately following the completion thereof "is deemed to have been, the main purpose or one of the main "purposes of the transaction, direct, by virtue of the powers "conferred upon us by section 32 (1) of the Finance Act, 1951, "that the liability to the profits tax of the company for the "chargeable accounting period ended November 28, 1957, shall "be computed as if, for the purposes of section 35 (1) (c) of the "Finance Act, 1947, the total nominal amount of the paid-up "ordinary share capital of the company was at all relevant times "£36,002 and no more."

The following were among the facts stated by the special commissioners: The company was incorporated in 1920 as a private company, and carried on business as stationers. Prior to July 24, 1957, its authorised capital was £60,000, divided into 10,000 £1 preference and 50,000 £1 ordinary shares. All the preference shares and 36,002 ordinary shares had been issued and were held by a small number of shareholders. In past years the company had retained a substantial part of its profits. Its liability to the profits tax had therefore been substantially reduced by reason of non-distribution relief (section 30 (2) of the Finance Act, 1947), but if those accumulated profits were to be distributed it would incur liability to distribution charge (section 30 (3) of the Finance Act, 1947).

On May 24, 1957, the Court of Appeal gave judgment in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Pollock & Peel Ltd. (In Liquidation).[4] The first paragraph of the headnote was as follows[5]: "Profits Tax—Capitalisation of profits followed by "liquidation and reconstruction—Distributions by liquidator—"Whether gross relevant distributions—Finance Act, 1947 (10 & "11 Geo. 6, c. 35), s. 35 (1); Finance Act, 1951 (14 & 15 Geo. 6, "c. 43), s. 31." The issues in question in that case were complicated, but for the purposes of the present appeal the effect of the decision might be shortly stated as follows: Only the excess value of assets distributed in a liquidation over the nominal amount of paid-up share capital is to be treated as a gross relevant distribution within the meaning of section 35 of the Finance Act, 1947.

On July 24, 1957, certain special resolutions were passed by the company, the only material ones being (a) that the share capital of the company be increased by £190,000 divided into 190,000 £1 ordinary shares, and (b) that £198,011 (being part of the amount standing to the credit of the company's profit and loss appropriation account) be capitalised and applied in paying up in full at par 198,011 unissued £1 ordinary shares, such fully paid-up shares to be allotted to the existing shareholders in the proportion of eleven new shares for every two ordinary shares already held by them. On October 14, 1957, instructions were issued to inspectors of taxes that the commissioners were not seeking leave to appeal to the House of Lords in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Pollock & Peel Ltd. (In Liquidation),[6] and that the decision of the Court of Appeal in that case should be applied in appropriate cases. On October 21, 1957, the unissued shares were duly issued and allotted to the shareholders. On November 27, 1957, the company went into voluntary liquidation, a reconstruction being considered desirable. The liquidator was authorised to agree to the registration of a new company and to enter into an agreement with the new company when incorporated. The new company was duly incorporated, the shareholders being substantially the same as those in the company, and the liquidator entered into an agreement with it on November 28, 1957. By that agreement the company and the liquidator transferred to the new company all its undertaking, assets and goodwill, with the exception of certain government securities and bank balances, the total value of which was £161,517 10s. 6d. Out of that sum there was reserved £10,721 15s. for taxation, so that there was left available for distribution by the liquidator £150,795 15s. 6d. A substantial part of the consideration for the transfer of the company's business was shares in the new company.

As appeared from a letter dated January 17, 1958, addressed by the company's accountants to the inspector of taxes, 117,006 fully-paid £1 ordinary shares were allotted by the new company in favour of the shareholders of the old company. The last paragraph of the letter was in the following terms: "The assets "remaining in the hands of the liquidator are government securi-"ties and the balance of the banking account. A part of the "securities has already been realised, and a distribution of 5s. in "the £ on the issued capital of £234,013 has already been made. "The remaining assets will not be sufficient to repay the increased "capital in full (excluding the share distribution) and we presume "that under the decision in Pollock & Peel[7] no distribution charge "will be payable." Those shares were allotted and distributed. The shareholders in the new company were substantially the same as were those in the old company.

Since the paid up share capital of the company as increased by the above-mentioned capitalisation of undistributed profits and the subsequent allotment of paid-up shares exceeded the above-mentioned sum of £150,795 15s. 6d., the effect of the decision in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Pollock & Peel Ltd. (In Liquidation) [7] was that distribution of that sum by the liquidator would not be a gross relevant distribution for the purposes of section 35 (1) (c) of the Finance Act, 1947, and there would be no liability to the profits tax in respect of such distribution.

On December 3, 1957, the company and the new company gave notice to the commissioners that they elected that section 36 (4) of the Finance Act, 1947, should apply to the reconstruction agreement—i.e., the agreement of November 28, 1957.

This notice had a two-fold effect, described by Lord Evershed M.R. in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Pollock & Peel Ltd. (In Liquidation), where he said [8]: "That, of course, throws you "back to the provisions of section 30, and particularly to subsec-"tion (3) of section 30. But the effect is that, in making your "calculations to see (among other things) what limit ought to be "placed on the distribution charge, the second company is treated "as though the differences from which the non-distribution relief "was calculated for the first company have been facts in the life "of the second company. The last few lines of the subsection, to "which some attention was directed in the argument, do not, "I think, assist to solve the present problem. For one thing the "last chargeable accounting period of the second company has "not arisen, and I cannot find in these last few lines, and in "particular in the reference to 'distribution of capital,' anything "which materially affects, when I come to it, the proper con-"struction of the phrase 'distribution of capital' in section 35. "But there is this significance to the present facts of section 36. "Election by the first and second Pollock & Peel companies was "made pursuant to subsection (4), and it seems to me inevitably "to follow that the distribution of the shares in Pollock & Peel "No. 2 to the persons who were in fact the shareholders of Pollock "& Peel No. 1 cannot be treated as distributions to those persons "at all for any relevant purposes, including, of course, the pur-"poses of the earlier subsection (1) of section 36 and also of "section 35."

At the time of the appeal hearing it was not possible to calculate the precise amount of the profits tax lost to the Revenue as the immediate result of the above-mentioned transactions, but a calculation supplied to the special commissioners on behalf of the Revenue showed it to be in the neighbourhood of £22,000, and this figure was not challenged on behalf of the company. On August 15, 1958, the commissioners made the direction, the subject of the appeal. Up to and including 1956 the company made up its accounts at December 31, annually. In 1957 it only made up accounts for the period January 1 to November 27 (the date of liquidation). The commissioners had not, however, before making the direction, determined an accounting period under section 20 (2) (b) of the Finance Act, 1937.

It was admitted on behalf of the commissioners that the onus of satisfying the special commissioners, that avoidance or reduction of liability to profits was the main purpose or one of the main purposes of the transactions in question, was on the commissioners.

No evidence was adduced on behalf of the company.

It was contended on behalf of the company: (1) That the direction was bad, for the following reasons: (a) Four heads were set out in the direction. There was no evidence that those heads were in any way linked. Each head, therefore, was separate and distinct. Capitalisation of undistributed profits, considered as a separate operation, could not give rise to avoidance or reduction of liability to the profits tax. (b) If the four heads in the direction were taken together, their combined effect in November, 1957, as the law then stood, would not have resulted in the avoidance or reduction of liability to the profits tax. (c) The direction did not contain a computation of the profits tax on the basis on which the direction stated that the tax should be computed. (d) The commissioners had not determined an accounting period, as they were required to do under section 20 (2) (b) of the Finance Act, 1937. Without such a determination there could not be a chargeable accounting period: a direction under section 32 of the Finance Act, 1951, must specify a chargeable accounting period. (e) The direction was premature, since until the liquidation of the company was complete, the amount of the distribution by the liquidator could not be known; nor could it be known by how much it would exceed the paid-up capital of the company. (f) The direction was premature for an additional reason. Under section 36 (4) of the Finance Act, 1947, the new company might in certain circumstances become liable to the profits tax by reference to the non-distribution relief enjoyed by the company. Until it was known whether or not this would happen, a direction under section 32 of the Finance Act, 1951, could not be issued. (2) That the transaction in the present case was not struck at by section 32 of the Finance Act, 1951, at all. Section 31 of the Act dealt with "the effect of capitalisation of "profits on rate of profits tax" (sidenote to the section) and was the section which dealt with the type of transactions in issue in the present case. If the transactions were covered by section 31—and they were—section 32 did not apply to them (3) That if the above contentions were not correct, the commissioners had failed to discharge the onus which was on them of proving that avoidance or reduction of liability to the profits tax was the main purpose or one of the main purposes of the transactions in question. (4) That the direction should be discharged.

It was contended on behalf of the Crown: (1) That the direction given by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue was competent. (2) That on the evidence adduced on behalf of the said commissioners, the only inference to be drawn was that the main purpose of the transactions in question was the avoidance or reduction of the company's liability to the profits tax. (3) Alternatively, (a) that, having regard to the provisions of law relating to the profits tax, other than section 32, which were in force at the time when the transactions in question were effected, the only inference to be drawn from the evidence adduced on behalf of the commissioners was that the main benefit which might have been expected to accrue from the transactions was the avoidance or reduction of the company's liability to the profits tax; (b) that therefore, avoidance or reduction of the company's liability to the profits tax must be deemed to have been the main purpose or one of the main purposes of the transactions in question. (4) That the direction should be confirmed.

The special commissioners held that the direction was competent and dismissed the appeal. The company appealed, the questions of law for the opinion of the High Court being: (a) whether the direction was competent; (b) if it was, whether the special commissioners were justified on the evidence in finding that avoidance or reduction of the company's liability to the profits tax was the main purpose, or one of the main purposes, of the transactions in question; (c) if they were wrong in so finding, whether they were justified on the evidence in finding that the main benefit, which might have been expected by a person surveying all the facts and knowing all the law relating to the profits tax at the time when the transactions in question were effected, was the avoidance or reduction of the company's liability to the profits tax; (d) whether they were justified in finding that the basis of computation set out in the direction was appropriate; and (e) whether direction for a period, which was not a chargeable accounting period, was valid.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 25. Cross J. read the following judgment: This case concerns the profits tax liability of the appellant company, Ackland & Pratten Ltd., for the chargeable accounting period January 1, 1957, to November 28, 1957, when the company went into voluntary liquidation. Profits tax was first imposed, under the name of "national defence contribution," by section 19 of the Finance Act, 1937, on the profits arising in each chargeable acounting period from any trade or business to which the section applied. [His Lordship read section 20 (2) (b) of the Act and continued:] The nature of the tax was drastically altered by the Finance Act, 1947, in that the rate of tax was made to depend on the amount of profits distributed to proprietors. [His Lordship read sections 1, 30 (2) (3) (4), 34, 35 (1), 36 (1) proviso and 36 (4) of the Finance Act, 1947, and sections 31 (1) (5), 32 (1) (3) of the Finance Act, 1951, and continued:] Then, finally, to complete this history, section 25 of the Finance Act, 1958, which operated from April 1, 1958, provided: " . . . the profits " tax shall be charged on the profits arising in any chargeable " accounting period from a trade or business to which section 19 " of the Finance Act, 1937, applies at the rate of ten per cent. on " the amount of those profits, subject to [certain provisions for " abatement], but without any relief for non-distribution or any " distribution charge for chargeable accounting periods ending " after the beginning of that month." So from that time onwards, the elaborate two-tier system introduced by the Act of 1947 came to an end. However, the transactions with which I am concerned took place before that Act was passed.

On May 24, 1957, the Court of Appeal gave judgment in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Pollock & Peel Ltd. (In Liquidation).[1] What had happened in that case, briefly, was this. In November, 1952, the company's issued capital was increased from 2,004 shares of £1 each to 30,060 shares of £1 each, in pursuance of a special resolution passed on November 6, 1952, in the following terms: " Capitalisation of profits: That it " is resolved that it is desirable to capitalise the sum of £28,056 " being part of the amount standing to the credit of a capital " reserve account and a profit and loss appropriation account and " that such sum be capitalised accordingly and used for the " purpose of paying up as fully paid bonus shares 28,056 ordinary " shares of £1 each and that such bonus shares be issued and " allotted to the existing shareholders of the company on the basis " of fourteen new bonus shares for each ordinary share now held."

On October 31, 1953—that is, nearly a year afterwards—the company went into voluntary liquidation. A new company subsequently took over the assets of its business, except a sum of cash, in consideration for shares in that company, the distribution of which to the members of the old respondent company did not, by virtue of an election by the two companies made under section 36 (4) of the Finance Act, 1947, which is one of those I have read, affect its liability to profits tax. After paying all the debts and the costs of the winding up, the liquidator was left with £15,030 in cash, which he distributed to the members of the company as a final step in the liquidation—and it is to be noted that, of course, that sum was less than the nominal amount of the share capital of the company as increased by the resolution passed in November, 1952. The amount of £15,030 was included in the gross relevant distributions in an assessment to profits tax made on the company for the last chargeable accounting period of its trade or business, ending on October 31, 1953, on the footing that section 31 of the Finance Act, 1951, the relevant parts of which I have read, applied.

On appeal to the special commissioners, the company contended, among other things, that section 31 of the Finance Act, 1951, did not override section 35 (1) of the Finance Act, 1947, limiting the amount of distributions made after the last chargeable accounting period which might be treated as gross relevant distributions to the excess over the nominal amount of the paid-up share capital. Of course, there was no excess in that case. Secondly, they contended that the sum in question was not applied in reducing share capital so as to give rise to a distribution under section 31. They said, in effect, that it was an abuse of language to say that money paid by a liquidator in a liquidation was a sum applied in reducing share capital.

The Court of Appeal, upholding the judgment of Upjohn J., held that those contentions were perfectly right. They held, first, that the payment was not a repayment or return of share capital so as to be a "sum applied in reducing capital" within section 31 of the Finance Act, 1951, and that it was a "distribution of "capital" within section 35 (1) of the Finance Act, 1947; and that, inasmuch as the amount distributed was less than the nominal amount of the share capital, there was no profits tax chargeable. It is to be noted that section 32 of the Finance Act, 1951, was not invoked by the Revenue in that case at all.

Now that being the legal position in the middle of 1957 as regards these matters, I must now come to the transactions which are in question in this case. [His Lordship stated the facts and continued:] It is to be noted, as Mr. Brennan pointed out, that there was no finding that the instructions issued to inspectors of taxes on October 14, 1957, which presumably were of a confidential nature, were communicated to the company.

Mr. Brennan, on behalf of the company, first argued that there was no evidence on which the special commissioners could properly come to the conclusion that this was a case within section 32 at all. He pointed out, first, that the resolution of July 24, 1957, would not by itself reduce the profits tax liability at all; and, similarly, that the resolution to wind up would, again, not by itself reduce the liability to profits tax. Given, of course, that the company was going to pass both resolutions, the resolution to increase the capital would necessarily have to precede the resolution to go into liquidation; but he argued that it was not proper to infer that both of them were part of a scheme, or should be linked together. He said that it might be, for all one knew, that in July the company resolved to increase its capital without any thought of subsequently going into liquidation, and then, in November, decided to go into liquidation for reasons that were quite unconnected with the previous resolution to increase its capital. He also urged that the state of the law was so obscure at the time that no reasonable man would in any case have any confidence in the view that this increase of capital and subsequent going into liquidation would reduce the profits tax liability of the company.

I cannot accept those contentions. Why the company passed those resolutions was a matter peculiarly within the knowledge of the directors. They chose to give no evidence at all. Much the most likely explanation, especially in view of the terms of the company's own accountants' letter of January 17, 1958, was that the transactions were connected and were part of a scheme. If, contrary to all probability, the liquidation was not contemplated in July, and tax relief was never in the mind of the parties at all until the whole matter was completed, then the directors could have said so; and if they did not say so, they ran the risk of the special commissioners drawing the obvious inference from their failure to do so.

Then, again, apart from section 32—if you put that aside—it seems to be that the chance of saving profits tax under the Pollock & Peel decision [2] was very good indeed. It is perfectly true that the decision of the Court of Appeal might have been upset by the House of Lords, and I am prepared to assume that the directors of the company were not aware at the time of the liquidation that there would not be an appeal; but, still, the Court of Appeal had upheld the decision of Upjohn J.,[3] and it seems to me that there was a very good chance at that time that profits tax would be avoided. Again, it was the view of the company's accountants, as one can see from the last paragraph of the letter they wrote in January, that it would be avoided. I think that the commissioners were fully justified in finding that the conditions of section 32 (1) were satisfied and that the main purpose, or one of the main purposes, for which these transactions were effected was the avoidance or reduction of liability to profits tax.

But, in any case, it was not in fact necessary for them to find this. It was sufficient if, under section 32 (3) (c), "the main bene-"fit which might have been expected to accrue from the trans-"action or transactions in the three years immediately following "the completion thereof was the avoidance or reduction of "liability to the tax." If they were satisfied of that, then the avoidance or reduction of liability to profits tax was to be deemed, for the purposes of the section, to have been the main purpose, or one of the main purposes, of the transaction or transactions.

These provisions in section 32 of the Finance Act, 1951, reproduce, I think, almost verbatim, similar provisions in the excess profits tax legislation, and it was pointed out by Lord Greene with reference to those provisions in Crown Bedding Co. Ltd.

CROSS J.

and South Wales Flock Co. Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners,[4] that the test to be applied in considering section 32 (3) is the objective test: would a reasonable man in fact expect that the main benefit which would accrue from these transactions would be the avoidance of tax? It seems to me to be manifest that that is what an independent, objective third party would think was the main benefit to be expected from it. It was not a certainty, but it was, to my mind, more than a possibility. It was, indeed, a probability.

Mr. Brennan argued that, whatever might be the position with regard to subsection (1), subsection (3) could not apply to this case because it contemplated a benefit to accrue "in the three "years immediately following the completion thereof." He argued that that was a reference to the tax which would have been payable in the next three years, and that, therefore, subsection (3) does not cover a case such as this, where the tax is chargeable in respect of a period before the liquidation of the company, and where there will be no further chargeable accounting periods in respect of which the tax could be charged. I do not think that that argument is sound. To my mind, the words mean only that, during the next three years, whether or not there has been a liquidation, there will in fact be some saving of tax. I therefore reject that argument. But, as I have pointed out, in any case I do not think subsection (3) very much matters, because, in my judgment, the commissioners were fully justified in holding that subsection (1) applied.

Mr. Brennan next argued that the direction was premature, and in that connection he referred to section 32 (4). That, as I have said, provides: "Any direction of the Commissioners . . . "shall specify the transaction or transactions giving rise to the "direction"—it did that—and shall specify (and these are the words on which Mr. Brennan relies) "the adjustments as respects "liability to the profits tax which the Commissioners consider "appropriate." Mr. Brennan argued that it was necessary for the commissioners to go into much more detail than they did in this case, and for them to indicate what precisely the liability to tax was going to be; and that, of course, they would not be able to do until the liquidation had been completed.

In my judgment, that submission is ill-founded. I think that all that is needed under section 32 (4) is an indication of the method which is to be followed in assessing the company to profits tax. The direction which they gave was that the profits tax for the chargeable accounting period ended November 28, 1957, was to be computed on a certain hypothesis; that is to say, as if, for the purposes of section 35, the total amount of the paid-up capital was the unincreased amount and not the increased amount. That, in my judgment, is an ample specification of "the adjustments "as respects liability to the profits tax which the commissioners "consider appropriate."

In this connection, Mr. Brennan also argued, as a further formal objection to the direction, that in fact the commissioners had not at that time determined what was the last chargeable accounting period of the company under section 20 (2) (b) of the Finance Act, 1937. The chargeable accounting periods of this company were annual periods, from January 1 to December 31, and the last chargeable accounting period would, of course, be from January 1, 1957, up to the date of liquidation. In point of fact, that last period has not yet been determined by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under section 20 (2) (b); but, again, in my judgment, I do not think that that fact in any way invalidates the direction. The direction was: " . . . that the liability " to the profits tax of the company for the chargeable accounting " period ended November 28, 1957, shall be computed as if," etc. In my judgment, those words simply mean " for whatever the " last chargeable accounting period of the company running up " the date of liquidation shall in fact prove eventually to be." I do not think that there can be any doubt in anyone's mind what at that time it would be.

Mr. Brennan next founded an argument on the wording of section 36 (4) of the Finance Act, 1947. Where an election is made under that section—as happened in this case, of course, and also in the Pollock & Peel case [5]—then the second way in which the provisions of the Act relating to profits tax are modified is this: that, in considering what distribution charge (if any) falls to be made on the second company, any distribution relief to which the first company became entitled is to be taken into account as if it had been given to the second company. Then, these are the words on which Mr. Brennan particularly relies: " . . . except so far as it has already operated to increase a " distribution charge on the first company." Mr. Brennan submits that the word " already " relates to the date of liquidation and that, therefore, the second company, as it were, irrevocably takes over all the potential liability to tax resulting from any unexhausted distribution relief on the books, so to say, of the first company at the date of liquidation; and it must follow from this, he says, that the first company, on liquidation, is freed from all further liability to tax in respect of such unexhausted distribution relief.

In my judgment, that argument, which is an ingenious one, rests on a misconstruction of the word " already." This part of section 36 (4) is not dealing with the liability of the first company at all, but simply with the liability of the second company; and the word " already," I think, refers not simply to the time before liquidation but to all the time before the question of the amount of any distribution charge on the second company falls to be considered. Consequently, any distribution charge to which the first company becomes subject after liquidation will be taken into account in estimating the liability of the second company, as and when that liability falls to be determined. I appreciate that difficulties might arise in applying this provision to a case where the question of the distribution charge to be paid by the second company arises before the liquidation of the first company is completed, and where there is still a possibility of a future charge on the first company in respect of a future possible distribution of some assets not taken over by the second company, but such circumstances would, I think, be very unlikely to occur, and any difficulty which might arise if they did occur is, to my mind, no sort of justification for reading into the subsection a freeing of the first company from all liability to profits tax as from the date of liquidation, which I do not think was in the mind of the legislature for one moment.

Ackland & Pratten Ltd. (In Liquidation) v. Inland Revenue Comrs.

Cross J.

Mr. Brennan finally advanced another argument, to which I should refer. It was, as I understand it, that as the Revenue authorities obviously thought that section 31 covered a case such as this until the Court of Appeal showed them that they were quite wrong, this case ought not to be treated as within section 32. For my part, I cannot follow that reasoning at all. The case, as I have tried to explain, appears to me precisely within section 32, and the fact that the Revenue authorities thought, quite wrongly, that such a case was within section 31, has, so far as I can see, nothing whatever to do with the matter.

I think I have dealt, or I have tried to deal, with all the arguments which were put before me. In the result, I think that the commissioners have discharged the onus which was on them, the Revenue authorities. I think the special commissioners came to a right conclusion, and the appeal must therefore be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

[Reported by Miss Philippa Price, Barrister-at-Law.]

A company which carried on the business of opencast coal mining entered into an agreement dated December 16, 1957, with a landowner, whereby certain land was let to the company for one year on payment of a royalty for every ton of coal won from the land, the company covenanting to restore the surface of the land on the completion of the opencast mining operations. The company further agreed to pay to the lessor £250 for the right to enter upon the land demised and a further sum of £250 as compensation for the diminution in value of the land and the destruction of land drains, etc. In 1958 the company made two further agreements with landowners in substantially the same terms. The payments for the right of entry and for diminution in value of the land provided for in all three agreements were a normal and recurrent incident in the trade of opencast coal mining as carried on by the company and others in the industry.

On an appeal by the company against assessments to profits tax on the ground that the whole of the payments made by them for the right of entry and for distribution of value pursuant to the agreements were revenue expenditure and fell to be allowed as deductions under section 137 of the Income Tax Act, 1952 [1]:—

Held, that no distinction could be drawn between the payments for the right of entry and the payments for diminution in value, and that, since the company in making the payments were not buying circulating capital, i.e., coal, but were acquiring rights which enabled them to obtain circulating capital, the whole of the payments were marked as being of a capital nature, and, notwithstanding that the transactions were transient and recurrent, fell to be disregarded in computing the profits or gains of the company for profits tax purposes.

Stow Bardolph Gravel Co. Ltd. v. Poole (1954) 35 T.C. 459 applied.

Knight v. Calder Grove Estates (1954) 35 T.C. 447 considered.

Case stated by the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts.

The appellant company, H. J. Rorke Ltd., appealed to the special commissioners against assessments to profits tax for the chargeable accounting periods, May 1, 1957, to March 31, 1958, and April 4, 1958, to April 30, 1958, in the sums of £2,550 and £200 respectively.

The grounds of the appeal were that in computing the amounts of the profits or gains of the company for the purposes of the assessments, certain disbursements made by the company, i.e., lump sum payments made by the company under the terms of three leases entered into between the company and two landowners, in the course of carrying on its business of opencast coal mining and quarrying, had not been allowed as expenses contrary to law.

The following were among the facts found by the commissioners: The company was incorporated on February 19, 1955.

[1] Income Tax Act, 1952, s. 137: "... in computing the amount of the "profits or gains to be charged under "Case I or Case II of Schedule D, no "sum shall be deducted in respect of "—(a) any disbursements or expenses "... exclusively laid out ... for the "purposes of the trade, profession or "vocation; ..."

H. J. Rorke Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs.

The memorandum and articles of association of the company contained, inter alia, the following objects: "(A) To purchase, take "on lease, or otherwise acquire (either with or without the surface) "for any estate or interest, any coal mines, iron mines, and other "mines, mining ground and minerals, and any mining rights, "grants, concessions and easements, and any lands or other property necessary or convenient for the advantageous possession "and use of the mines or works for the time being owned or worked "by the company or any interest therein and to search for, get, "bring to surface, make merchantable, and sell and dispose of "coal, ironstone and other ores, metals and minerals, and substances of the earth whatsoever. (B) To carry on business as "colliery and mine proprietors, mining engineers, metallurgists, "electricity manufacturers and suppliers, gas manufacturers and "suppliers, coal masters, iron masters, smelters, engineers, iron-"founders, patent fuel manufacturers, blast furnace proprietors, "steel makers, steel converters, metal and alloy makers, tinplate "makers, and contractors for and dealers in coal, coke, iron, or "ironwork in all the branches of such businesses and to carry on "the business of brick makers and farmers, to make, purchase, "hire, let out and sell railway and other plant, fittings, machinery, "rolling stock, stock in trade or any portions or parts of such "articles or things."

During the period relevant to the appeal, the company's trade or business was opencast coal mining, and it was one of the leading companies in Yorkshire carrying on such business. Opencast coal mining became generally practised as a trade in the United Kingdom from 1942 to 1943 onwards, and at the relevant time comprised about 100 operators. The trade required specialised machinery, and the company owned all its own plant and machinery, different plant being used at different stages in operations. In order to employ economically and fully the staff, machinery and equipment of the company it was necessary to have three or four sites actively producing coal at the same time. The method of operating employed by the company was as follows. In order to find a beneficial site they first obtained information locally from farmers and miners of the presence of a coal seam. On occasions they made payments of introductory commission to persons who informed them of coal deposits. They also studied the geological maps to see if they could be checked up with the local information. There was no reliable geological survey covering the whole of the United Kingdom. Only about one in ten of the sites which thus came to their knowledge as potential coal-bearing sites were eventually worked for coal. The sites which they used were all on agricultural land in Yorkshire. Having obtained information about a site and studied the geological survey, they approached the landowner concerned, usually a farmer, and endeavoured to enter into an agreement whereby in return for an immediate payment of £5 they were granted permission to prospect the site and an option to take a lease thereof if found suitable. Such an agreement having been made, not always in writing, the specialised staff went on to the land and bored it extensively. The boring machines were not large machines, and the operations were done by hand. The preparations were lengthy and it might take any time between one and six months between the time they got to know of a possible site and the time they actually decided to work it. As soon as they decided that a site was worth working they exercised their option and made an agreement for a lease with the landowner or farmer, such agreement being made either subject to the granting of the appropriate licence by the National Coal Board or after such had been obtained. Thereafter application was made to the local authority for planning permission. On obtaining the National Coal Board licence and the consent of the local authority, the company installed their plant and machinery on the site and removed and stacked up the topsoil and subsoils. A site normally produced coal within two to three weeks after being entered and, weather permitting, the whole operation was completed in about six to nine months. After extracting the coal they were obliged to replace the topsoil, but could not replace hedges, trees and walls, except at considerable expense, or the natural drainage. The result was a definite and permanent impairment to the site from an agricultural point of view.

The procedure leading to the winning of coal by opencast mining and the method of operating set out above was similar to that commonly and generally followed by other persons carrying on the trade or business of opencast coal mining.

On December 16, 1957, one Donald Parker, the lessor, entered into an agreement with the company whereby it was provided, inter alia: "1. The lessor being the owner of a plot of land con"taining four acres and five perches or thereabouts situate at "Netherton near Wakefield in the County of York . . . shall let
"the same to the lessee from the fifth day of November, 1957,
"TO HOLD the same unto the lessee for the term of one year
"paying therefor a royalty of One shilling and threepence per "ton for all coal recovered from the demised land and accepted
"by the Coal Sales Department of the National Coal Board or
"the sum of Three hundred and twelve pounds Ten shillings
"whichever is the greater such payment to be made by calendar
"monthly instalments. 2. It is the intention of the lessee to "obtain coal from the demised land by opencast coal workings
"(hereinafter called 'the said works') and the lessee shall within "three calendar months after completion of the said works restore
"the surface of the said land in a proper and efficient manner to "the satisfaction of the lessor . . . 3. The lessee shall upon the "signing hereof pay to the lessor (a) the sum of Two hundred and "fifty pounds for the right to enter upon the demised land for "the purpose of working and getting the said coal and (b) the "further sum of Two hundred and fifty pounds as compensation

"tion of the land drains therein as a result of the working and "getting of the said coal and of the adjoining land belonging to "the lessor used as a means of access to the demised land and "for the destruction of the roadway at present existing upon
"the demised land. 4. The lessee will within three calendar
"months from the completion of the said works re-sow the whole "of the demised land and replace the fencing disturbed by the "said works in a proper and efficient manner and to the satisfac"tion of the lessor and as a guarantee for the due performance of "the works in this clause set out the lessee will deposit with the "lessor the sum of Eighty pounds on the signing of this agree"ment AND on default of completion of the works in this clause "set out within the time and in the manner aforesaid or other"wise howsoever the lessor shall be at liberty to give notice to "the lessee of his intention personally to carry out the same and
"thereupon—(i) the lessor shall be entitled to retain the said sum
"of Eighty pounds on account of and towards the cost of such "works and (ii) the lessee shall be released from all liability in "connection therewith."

In or about 1958 the lessor entered into an oral agreement with the company with regard to another plot of land which was in substantially the same terms. It provided for a rental payment, and for lump sum payments of the same character as the first agreement—that is to say, a payment for the right to enter and a payment for the diminution in value, each to be made on the signing of the agreement.

On January 18, 1958, one George Norton entered into an agreement with the company which again was on the same lines as the first two agreements.

The provisions contained in the first Parker agreement, the second Parker agreement and the Norton agreement were drawn in similar terms to those commonly and normally found in agreements for leases entered into between the company and farmers, and between farmers and other persons carrying on the trade or business of opencast coal mining, particularly the provisions relating to the payment of a sum of money by the lessee to the lessor upon the signing of the agreement for the right to enter upon the land for the purpose of working and getting the coal, and the payment of a further sum estimated as compensation for the diminution in the value of the land and damage likely to be caused as a result of working and getting the coal. The payments so provided to be made were a normal and recurrent incident in the trade or business of opencast coal mining as carried on by the company and other persons in the industry.

[The case then set out the total amounts as to which the dispute arose: legal and advisory expenses in connection with the granting of the leases, exploitation rights, that is, payments for the right of entry on the land and payment for diminution in value, amounting in total to £2,105.]

It was contended on behalf of the company that in computing on income tax principles the profits or gains of the company for the year ended April 30, 1958, the whole of the expenses incurred by the company under the provisions of the lease agreements fell to be allowed as deductions under the provisions of section 137 of the Income Tax Act, 1952; that in computing for profits tax purposes the profits or gains of the company for the chargeable accounting periods relevant to the appeal, such expenses incurred by the company, as aforesaid, likewise fell to be treated as deductions; that the agreements set out above and the payments made thereunder by the company constituted an ordinary incident of carrying on an opencast coal mining business and were of a kind so extensively adopted as to constitute a custom of that trade; that, on the facts, the expenditure arising under those agreements was part of the ordinary expense of getting and mining the coal, was of a revenue nature, and resulted in no benefit of an enduring nature to the company; and that the appeal should be allowed and the assessments adjusted accordingly.

It was contended on behalf of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue that in computing on income tax principles the profits or gains of the company for the year ended April 30, 1958, the whole of the expenses set forth above, being expenses incurred under the provisions of the lease agreements, fell to be excluded under the provision of section 137 (f) of the Income Tax Act, 1952; accordingly, that in computing for profits tax purposes the profits or gains of the company for the chargeable accounting periods relevant to the appeal, the expenses incurred by the company, as aforesaid, fell to be disregarded; and that the appeal should be dismissed.

The special commissioners in this decision distinguished between the payments for the exploitation rights and the payments in respect of compensation for diminution in value. They held that the right of entry payments were capital payments and could not be allowed as deductions but that the payments for diminution in value were of a revenue nature and could be allowed. Having drawn that distinction they considered it appropriate to apportion the legal and advisory expenses in connection with the leases and held that half of them should be treated as capital and half of them as income expenditure.

The company appealed and the Crown cross-appealed.

R. Borneman Q.C. and P. W. I. Rees for the company.
F. N. Bucher Q.C. and Alan Orr for the Crown.

The cases cited in argument are referred to in the judgment.

Cross J. This case raises the familiar problem whether certain expenditure is to be regarded as expenditure on revenue account or capital expenditure. [His Lordship stated the facts and continued:] Unfortunately, the commissioners do not say in the case why they distinguished as they did between the two sorts of payments, and counsel have not been able to suggest to me any logical basis for drawing the distinction. I cannot see any reason for drawing it. If one of these sums is capital, I should have thought that it followed that the other was capital, and vice versa.

What is said now by Mr. Borneman on behalf of the company is that, having regard to the findings in the case as to the methods of operating and that the making of payments of this nature were normal and recurrent incidents of the trade, both payments should be treated as revenue payments. He referred me to Lord Dunedin's words in Vallambrosa Rubber Co. Ltd. v. Farmer.[1]: "but in a rough way I think it is not a bad criterion "of what is capital expenditure as against what is income expen-"diture to say that capital expenditure is a thing that is going "to be spent once and for all, and income expenditure is a thing "that is going to recur every year." These payments, he argued, were not going to be made once and for all. On the contrary, payments of the same nature were being made constantly, year in and year out. Then he referred me to another test suggested by Lord Cave L.C. in Atherton v. British Insulated and Helsby Cables Ltd.[2] After quoting the words of Lord Dunedin which I have just read, Lord Cave went on to say[3]: "But when an "expenditure is made, not only once and for all, but with a view "to bringing into existence an asset or an advantage for the "enduring benefit of a trade, I think that there is very good "reason (in the absence of special circumstances leading to an "opposite conclusion) for treating such an expenditure as properly "attributable not to revenue but to capital." If you apply that test here, said counsel, how can you say that an asset or advantage has been brought into existence for the enduring benefit of the trade? These leases were only for a year or, at the most, two years, and the work of extracting the coal only lasted for six to nine months. Then the soil was put back and the company went somewhere else. You cannot say that any asset or advantage had been brought into existence for the enduring benefit of the trade. From a common-sense point of view, he argued, whether you look at the transient character of the operations or whether you look at the constant recurrence of similar operations and the making of similar payments, these payments should be regarded as of a revenue nature.

Mr. Bucher, for the Crown, does not dispute that the payments in question were within the words of section 137 (a) of the Income Tax Act, 1952, "wholly and exclusively laid out or "expended for the purposes of the trade." But he says that notwithstanding the transient character of the operations and the constant recurrence of similar payments, they are nevertheless to be regarded as capital payments and so within section 137 (f). He says that here what was being acquired by these lump sum payments (or what these payments were helping to acquire) was not stock-in-trade but rights which would enable the company to obtain stock-in-trade—that is to say, coal. They were not payments for the purchase of coal but payments to put the company into the position to get coal. Lump sum payments of that character, he says, are necessarily of a capital nature, and the fact that the leases lasted only for a very short time, that the operations were transient, and that fresh leases were constantly being entered into and payments of this character constantly being made to farmers or landowners is nihil ad rem.

[1] (1910) 5 T.C. 529, 536.

The cases, the most recent of which is Stow Bardolph Gravel Co. Ltd. v. Poole,[4] undoubtedly draw a distinction between payments made to acquire stock-in-trade and payments made to acquire rights which will enable you to get stock-in-trade for yourself. In the Stow Bardolph case[4] the appellant taxpayers carried on the business of dealers in sand and gravel and, in order to supply themselves with sand and gravel, they entered into an agreement with a landowner, the Luddington Estates Ltd., under which the landowner was to sell and the company was to purchase the deposit of gravel and sand contained in and upon certain lands. The landowner was to allow the gravel company free access to the land with or without carts, lorries or vehicles for the purposes of removing the sand ballast, and there was a right for the gravel company to take machinery and haulage equipment onto the land for the purpose of excavating and carrying away the gravel and sand ballast. Then there was an option given for a period of five years to purchase additional deposits of gravel and sand ballast on adjoining land of the landowner, and finally a provision that no legal estate in the land should be created by virtue of the agreement. The agreement, that is to say, gave a licence to enter and a right to remove the sand or gravel—a profit à prendre. Harman J. decided the case in favour of the taxpayer on the ground that the agreement amounted substantially to an agreement for the purchase of stock-in-trade from the landowner. The Court of Appeal, however, reversed that decision on the ground that the agreement was not an agreement for the direct acquisition of circulating capital but an agreement giving rights under which the taxpayers could, if they chose to use them, obtain circulating capital, namely, gravel, for themselves. That case, which followed a number of earlier cases, illustrates the distinction for which Mr. Bucher argued. Jenkins L.J., in his judgment,[5] pointed out that it is not a distinction which would commend itself to all minds, but it is a distinction which is clearly drawn in the cases. The present case is really a stronger case from this point of view than the Stow Bardolph case,[6] because here there was a lease granting a legal interest in the land, not merely a lease and a profit à prendre. It is, however, to be observed that the Stow Bardolph case [6] did not raise the problems of transience and frequent recurrence of the operations which are raised here. There was nothing in the facts of that case as reported to show how long the particular operation was going to last or whether the taxpayer was at the same time conducting similar operations under which they had to make similar payments to other landowners. Mr. Borneman therefore says that as that aspect of the matter was not canvassed in the case at all, it does not assist Mr. Bucher very much.

The questions of transience and recurrence in connection with operations of this character were raised before Upjohn J. in Knight v. Calder Grove Estates.[7] The headnote there reads: "The respondents, who carried on in partnership the trade of "open-cast coal mining, purchased the freehold in ten acres of "land for £2,000. The conveyance included covenants under "which they undertook after getting the coal to reinstate the "land and the vendor undertook to repurchase the land for £500 "after mining operations were completed." It is to be observed that there was considerable similarity between that case and this. Although the traders purchased the land and did not simply lease it, the conveyance contained a provision for the repurchase of the land by the landowner at a much reduced price after the operation was finished and the land reinstated as far as it could be. The difference in price, £1,500, represented in part at least the diminution in value of the land brought about by the operation. The headnote goes on: "On appeal against assessments "to Income Tax under Case I of Schedule D for the years 1948–49 "and 1950–51, the respondents contended that the cost of the "land was a revenue charge in the ordinary course of business, "and that the price on resale was a receipt on revenue account." The General Commissioners accepted that contention, but the Crown appealed to the High Court, and Upjohn J. held that the payments must be regarded as capital payments and the receipt as a capital receipt. Mr. Mustoe, on behalf of the taxpayer, put forward two arguments which have some bearing on this case. There was a finding in the case that the respondents had purchased other land for the purpose of carrying on their opencast mining business. The case referred to two other conveyances, but they were conveyances which did not contain any provision for reconveyance by the purchasers to the vendor after the operations were concluded. In reliance on that paragraph in the case, Mr. Mustoe argued, as has been argued here, that it was a case of a recurring expenditure which ought to be treated as revenue expenditure. The judge, however, decided that he had not enough facts to enable him to deal with that aspect of the matter and that in all the circumstances it would not be right to send the case back for a further finding of fact. The most, therefore, that Mr. Borneman can say about that aspect of the case is that it did not strike Upjohn J. as hopeless to contend on suitable facts that the frequency of operations of this character might make the payments revenue payments rather than capital payments.

The judge then dealt with another argument of Mr. Mustoe's based on the transience of the operation, on the footing that there was no question of recurrence in the case at all. The relevant passage in the judgment is as follows [8]: "I come next to what "I may call Mr. Mustoe's main point. He submits that this "expenditure of £2,000, or, if you like, £1,500 net, was really "a purely transitory matter. The transaction should be looked "upon as one and the expenditure of £1,500 net should be "regarded as the expense of getting and winning the coal. It is "submitted that that was the view taken by the commissioners "and that it ought not to be disturbed. He points to, and relies "upon, the contrast put by Lord Cave L.C. in Atherton v. British "Insulated and Helsby Cables Ltd.[9]" Then the judge read the words from Lord Cave's speech which I have already read, and went on [10]: "Here it is said that there is no purchase with a "view to bringing into existence any asset for the enduring benefit "of the trade, but it is a purely transitory purchase in order that "coal may be won from that particular area and, when won, the "area will go back to its normal use of being used by Mr. "Thompson as farming land. I am quite unable to accept that "submission. The case seems to me a perfectly plain one. The "parties, being minded to get and win coal from this particular "area by open-cast methods, purchased the land. They could "have done it by some other means, but that is the means they "chose—that of purchasing the land. That adventure in the "nature of things is not likely to continue for more than two or "three years, and they prudently arranged for the sale of this "land when the adventure in relation to it comes to an end. No "one suggests that the purchase of this land is circulating capital "or stock-in-trade or anything of that sort. It is a purchase of "land for the adventure and so, on ordinary principles, the "transaction must be regarded as a capital expenditure, just as "when you buy land and put a factory on it, or buy land and "sink a shaft. In my judgment, the fact that the adventure is "not likely to continue for many years is quite irrelevant."

Mr. Borneman sought to distinguish that part of the judgment on the ground that there was a purchase (albeit coupled with an obligation to repurchase when the operation was concluded), whereas here there is not a purchase but a lease for a short period with these lump sum payments made on the signing of the lease. I cannot see that there is any distinction on this aspect of the matter between a purchase and a lease. If there had been only one transaction here, if this company had simply entered into one lease for the purpose of opencast mining, and had made these initial payments to get the lease, the fact that the whole operation was only to last a few months would, I think, have made no difference. The point would have been covered by the judgment of Upjohn J.,[11] with which I entirely agree.

That leaves the question of recurrence which Upjohn J. left open. Mr. Borneman has, of course, in his favour the finding of fact that the payments made were a normal and recurrent incident in the trade or business of opencast coal mining; and he says truly that the Crown has not been able to point to any case in which in face of a finding that the payments were a normal and recurrent incident in the trade or business in question, it has yet been held that they were capital payments. Logically, however, I cannot see that the recurrence of the payments makes any difference. If once you accept—as I must—the distinction between buying circulating capital and acquiring rights which enable you to get circulating capital, it seems to me that these payments are marked as being of a capital nature, and, if once you find that, the fact that the trader is conducting many transactions of a similar kind cannot really make any difference. In arriving at that conclusion, I get some help from the case of Eastmans Ltd. v. Shaw.[12] The facts were very different, but what Rowlatt J. said [13] does, I think, tend to support the view that I have taken. Again, if the mere recurrence of similar operations made a difference, a very large concern could apparently be in a better position than a small one, to argue that expenditure of the sort in question was revenue expenditure. In the result, therefore, I come to the conclusion that I must dismiss the appeal and allow the cross-appeal.

Appeal dismissed.
Cross-appeal allowed with costs.

Husband and Wife—Practice—Costs—Taxation—Application to review —Supreme Court Costs Rules, 1959 (S.I. 1959, No. 1958, Sch. 2), r. 35.

The President has given the following directions:

1. Every application in the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division under rule 35 of the Supreme Court Costs Rules, 1959, to review a registrar's decision in respect of the taxation of a bill of costs shall be made to a judge nominated by the President.

2. Every application shall be made by summons to be served within three days after issue, and returnable on a day to be appointed by the judge.

3. Every summons must contain full particulars of the item or items or the amount allowed in respect of which the application to review is made.

4. Each party shall within four days after service of the summons lodge with the chief clerk of the contentious department all documents produced in evidence by that party at the hearing before the registrar relating to the item or items or the amount allowed; and the chief clerk shall then deliver these documents and the summons, objections and answers made and given by the parties respectively at the review of the taxation of the bill of costs by the registrar to the judge.

5. When appointing a day for the hearing of the summons the judge may decide to exercise his power to appoint two or more assessors to sit with him at the hearing, and if the judge does so decide, the chief clerk of the contentious department shall give notice of the decision to each of the parties and will, in any case, give to each of them notice of the day appointed by the judge for the hearing of the summons.

6. If the judge decides to appoint assessors the party applying shall within four days after the receipt of notice thereof lodge with the chief clerk of the contentious department two or more copies, as the case may be, of the summons, objections and answers made and given by the parties respectively at the review of the taxation of the bill of costs by the registrar for the use of the assessors.

of the Companies (Winding Up) Rules, 1949.[1] Subsequently he notified the society that he did not intend to proceed further with the petition. The petitioner did not attend at the hearing of the petition, but the society appeared and asked for an order dismissing the petition with costs against the petitioner:—

Held that, in principle, the society had the right to an order for costs where the prayer in the petition was unsuccessful, whether on the ground of non-compliance with rule 33 or for any other reason; that the concluding sentence of rule 33 meant no more than that no order should be made in favour of a petitioner who had not complied with the rule and did not operate to protect a petitioner from an order for costs where the petition was unsuccessful, and that, therefore, the society was entitled to costs.

Petition.

On July 20, 1960, a petition was presented for the compulsory winding up of the Royal Mutual Benefit Building Society by Clifford John Edwards, a member of the society. The petitioner failed to comply with the requirements of rule 33 of the Companies (Winding Up) Rules, 1949, and on September 30, 1960, his solicitors wrote to the society informing it that he intended to take no further steps in connection with the petition and that he did not intend to attend on the date fixed for the hearing of the petition. The petition was heard on October 10, 1960, when the society asked for an order dismissing the petition with costs.

The petitioner did not appear and was not represented.

No cases were cited in argument.

Pennycuick J. This is a petition by one Clifford John Edwards, a member of the Royal Mutual Benefit Building Society, for the compulsory winding up of the society. The petitioner, for his own good reasons, has omitted to comply with the requirements of rule 33 of the Companies (Winding Up) Rules, 1949. [His Lordship read rule 33 and continued:] The ordinary practice where the petitioner fails to comply with the requirements of rule 33 is to strike out the petition. In the present case, however, the society has appeared by counsel and asks that, instead of it being struck out, the petition should be dismissed with costs against the petitioner.

It appears to me that the society is entitled to the order for which it asks. It is quite clear that the society has the right to be represented by counsel at the hearing of a petition for the winding up of the society. It seems to me, further, that, in principle, the society must have the right to an order for costs where the petition is unsuccessful, whether on the ground of non-compliance with the requirements of rule 33 or for any other reason.

The petitioner was not represented, but my attention was called to the words in rule 33: "No order shall be made on the "petition of any petitioner who has not . . . attended before the "Registrar . . . and satisfied him in manner required by this "Rule." It seems to me that those words mean no more than that no order shall be made in favour of a petitioner who has not complied with the requirements of the rule, and do not operate to protect a petitioner from an order for costs where for any reason his petition is unsuccessful.

I propose, therefore, to make the order asked for by the society, that is to say, an order dismissing this petition with costs.

Petition dismissed with costs.

Contempt of Court—Witnesses—Passing off action—Application to rectify Register of Trade Marks—Statement to persons engaged in the trade that defendant entitled to trade marks—Whether likely to deter possible witnesses from giving evidence—Whether contempt.

In 1955, an East German corporation brought an action against a West German corporation to restrain it from using certain names in connection with its business or goods and from passing off its business or goods as those of the East German corporation. In 1960, an English company, which marketed the goods of the East German corporation, began proceedings to have certain trade marks registered in the name of the West German corporation taken off the Register of Trade Marks.

In June, 1960, the solicitors to the West German corporation wrote two letters, each of which contained two statements: (1) that the East German corporation had no right to use a particular trade mark, and (2) that the West German corporation had that right, being the registered proprietor of the trade mark. Neither letter contained any reference to the fact that there were pending proceedings in which those statements were being challenged. Each letter was sent to a person connected with or engaged in the same trade as the East German and West German corporations.

On a motion in each of the proceedings for an injunction to restrain the West German corporation and its solicitors from making representations similar to those contained in the two letters, and generally from making any representations calculated to prejudice the fair trial of the proceedings or, alternatively, for an order that a writ of sequestration might be issued against the property of the West German corporation, and that the solicitors might be committed to prison for contempt of court in writing the letters:—

Held, that the letters and others like them could only be contempt of court if they were prejudicial to the current proceedings as being intended or likely to deter or discourage witnesses from giving evidence in favour of the plaintiff in the one proceedings and the applicant in the other proceedings; that a finding of contempt of court must be based on a solid view of the likelihood of such harm being done to the plaintiff and applicant respectively, and not upon fanciful notions of the susceptibility of the recipients of the letters; and that, on the facts of the particular case, the letters did not constitute contempt of court. Accordingly, the motions must be refused (post, pp. 1150, 1151, 1163).

MOTIONS.

Prior to the Second World War, Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung, a body corporate constituted in Germany in 1896, owned and operated two factories at Jena in what is now East Germany, one of which, the Carl Zeiss Optical Works, made optical instruments, and the other of which, the Schott Glass Works, made glass. The Stiftung was the registered proprietor of certain trade marks in the United Kingdom. During the Second World War, these trade marks became vested in the Custodian of Enemy Property for England.

In October, 1945, the factories and assets of the optical and glass businesses were sequestered by a Decree (No. 124) issued by the Soviet Military Administration in East Germany. After 1948, the optical works and the glass works were operated as separate and independent corporate entities called respectively VEB Carl Zeiss Jena and VEB Jenaer Glasswerk Schott & Gen., Jena. It was claimed by the applicants in the motions, Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung, a corporation with its registered office at Jena, and C. Z. Scientific Instruments Ltd., an English company which marketed the goods manufactured at the factories at Jena, that VEB Carl Zeiss Jena and VEB Jenaer Glasswerk Schott & Gen., Jena, used the trade marks under and in accordance with a written licence dated April 8, 1954, from Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung of Jena.

By a deed of assignment dated December 21, 1959, the Custodian of Enemy Property for England transferred the trade marks to a West German corporation, Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung of Heidenheim, Brenz, in West Germany, which claimed that it and not Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung of Jena was the original Stiftung.

On October 20, 1955, Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung of Jena issued a writ against Rayner & Keeler Ltd., Degenhardt & Co. Ltd., retailers of optical instruments, and Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung of Heidenheim claiming, as amended in 1960, an injunction to restrain the defendants from advertising, offering for sale or selling any optical instruments or any articles containing or consisting of glass under or by reference to the name of "Carl Zeiss," or any name containing "Zeiss," unless such goods were those of Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung of Jena, or an organisation associated with it, and generally from passing off any business or goods as and for those of Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung of Jena or an organisation associated with it; an injunction to restrain Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung of Heidenheim from using the name "Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung" or "Carl Zeiss," or any name containing "Zeiss" in relation to their business or goods; delivery up or destruction upon oath of all articles calculated to lead to passing off and an inquiry as to damages or an account of profit. The defendants issued a summons for an order that all further proceedings in the action be stayed, and that the action be dismissed on the ground that it was commenced and was being maintained without the authority of the plaintiff, Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung of Jena. This summons was still pending at the date of the hearing of the motions.

By an originating notice of motion dated January 20, 1960, the applicant, C. Z. Scientific Instruments Ltd., asked for an order that the trade marks be taken off the Register of Trade Marks in respect of all the goods in respect of which they were registered upon the grounds set out in and having regard to section 26 (1) (b) of the Trade Marks Act, 1938; and that the register might be rectified by expunging therefrom the entries of each of the trade marks as being entries wrongly remaining on the register having regard to sections 11, 15, 22 and 32 of the Act.

On June 15, 1960, Dehn & Lauderdale, the solicitors to Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung of Heidenheim, wrote a letter addressed to The Editor, The Optician, Columbia House, Aldwych, W.C.2, as follows: "Dear Sirs, It has been brought to our notice that you "have published in your issue of the 10th instant an advertise-"ment for Zeiss Binoculars on behalf of C. "marks of which our clients are the proprietors. We think it "right to warn you that our clients will take all legal steps "available to them to protect their rights in their registered trade "marks."

On June 29, 1960, Dehn & Lauderdale wrote a letter addressed to Dixons Camera Centre, 75, Park Street, Bristol, as follows: "Dear Sirs, It has been brought to our notice that you are "advertising for sale cameras with what are stated to have "'Tessar' lenses but which are manufactured by an East "German nationalised concern calling itself 'VEB Carl Zeiss "'Jena.' We must inform you that our clients, Carl Zeiss "Stiftung, a body corporate having its principal place of business "at Heidenheim a.d. No doubt you will "inform your other offices of the contents of this letter."

By two notices of motion dated July 5, 1960, one in the action and one in the originating motion, the respective applicants, Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung of Jena and C. Z. Scientific Instruments Ltd., asked for an order that Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung of Heidenheim and its solicitors, Frank Nathaniel Steiner and Harold Bruce Dehn, practising as Dehn & Lauderdale, be restrained until judgment in the respective proceedings or further order from representing either (a) that VEB Carl Zeiss Jena had no right to use trade marks containing the words "Carl Zeiss Jena," or (b) that Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung of Heidenheim was the registered proprietor of the trade marks without indicating that its rights to be so registered were being challenged, and generally from making any representation calculated to prejudice or impede the fair hearing of the proceedings or, alternatively, an order that a writ of sequestration against Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung of Heidenheim might be issued, and for an order that Frank Nathaniel Steiner and Harold Bruce Dehn be committed to Brixton Prison for contempt of court in writing or sending or causing it to be written and sent the letter dated June 15, 1960. The letter of June 29, 1960, was exhibited as evidence on the motions.

RUSSELL J. These are two motions alleging contempt of court in two different proceedings. One of them is a passing-off action and the other is an originating motion for expunging certain trade marks. The action started in 1955. The plaintiff in the action is called Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung, which asserts itself to be a legal entity in the East Zone of Germany; and the main defendant in the action bears exactly the same name, Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung, asserting itself to be a legal entity in West Germany. I will refer to them for convenience as respectively East Stiftung and West Stiftung.

The originating motion, which was launched in 1960, is a motion to expunge registered trade marks, including a mark "C. Z. Jena" and another mark "Tessar." All those marks are at present registered in the name of the West Stiftung.

[His Lordship stated the facts and read the letter of June 15, 1960, and continued:] The trade mark referred to in that letter is one of the trade marks in issue in the proceedings. It was at one time suggested that that was a letter which was written to the editor, The Optician, for publication, but, in my judgment, it is plain that it was not written for publication at all but was intended as a warning to the editor that proceedings might be taken against him or against his paper should they continue to insert the East Stiftung's advertisements under these trade marks in their publication. Whether or not such an action could lie against the proprietors of a trade publication of this kind it is quite unnecessary for me to determine; but it is clear that it was not really written for publication but as a warning letter to the proprietors of The Optician.

[His Lordship read the letter of June 29, 1960, and continued:] It is quite plain that the West Stiftung proposes, providing it is permissible, in appropriate cases where retailers are selling the products of the East Stiftung under any of these trade marks, to write such a warning letter to retailers, though there is no suggestion of any general campaign or circularisation of all retailers or of publicity in the press. It is said on behalf of the East Stiftung that letters such as these constitute contempt of court, and, on the basis of that, in each of the two proceedings the motion was launched asking for an order that the West Stiftung and their solicitors "be restrained until "judgment in these proceedings or further order from representing "either (a) that the East German nationalised concern V. E. B. "Carl Zeiss Jena have no right to use trade marks containing "the words 'Carl Zeiss Jena' or (b) that the said respondents "are the registered proprietors of the Trade Mark 335738 or "any of the other trade marks sought to be taken off the register "in the above-named proceedings without indicating that the "said respondents' rights to be so registered are being challenged, "and generally from making any representation calculated to "prejudice or impede the fair trial" of this action. Then the motion proceeds alternatively, to ask for a writ of sequestration against the property of the defendants, that is the West Stiftung, and for an order committing the two partners in the firm of solicitors to Brixton Prison for contempt. So far as actual relief is concerned, the battle has been confined to the question whether or not these letters and others which may be written similar to them constitute contempt of court. If so, it is said that there should be an injunction and no order was actually sought either to sequestrate or to commit.

It is to be observed that such letters contain two dogmatic statements (1) that the East German concern has no right to use the relevant trade mark and (2) that the West Stiftung has the right, being the registered proprietor of the trade mark; and there is no mention of any proceeding and no suggestion that there is any challenge in proceedings to the dogmatic statements made in the letters.

The respondents to the motion submit that those letters and others like them are not a contempt of court and that any further letters which they write like those will not be contempt of court. There is no evidence, as I have indicated, that there is ever any intention behind the respondents to the motion or their solicitors to do more than write such letters in particular cases. The letters were written by the solicitors pursuant to general instructions by the West Stiftung to take all such steps as they considered desirable to protect the trade marks of their clients, short of actually initiating proceedings without further reference to their clients.

It seems to me clear that these letters and other letters like these letters can only be contempt of court if they are prejudicial to the current proceedings as being intended or likely to deter or discourage witnesses from giving evidence in favour of the plaintiffs in the one proceedings or the applicants in the other proceedings. There are, of course, other general aspects of contempt by interference with legal proceedings, for example, attempting to influence a judge or jury, or where there is a campaign calculated to discourage litigation by intimidation or ridicule of a party and so forth; but none of these other aspects of contempt are, in my judgment, relevant to the present case.

There are no general rules by which any particular case may be judged as constituting contempt; each must plainly be considered separately and on its own facts. In this case I ask myself the question (and I ask it at the moment apart from authority) whether the letters complained of and similar letters hereafter to be written are likely to harm the plaintiff and the applicant respectively in the preparation and presentation of their cases by tending to discourage people from giving evidence on their behalf. I will accept for the purposes of my judgment that there are, or may be, issues in the proceedings upon which evidence of persons in the trade, such as the recipients of these letters, may be relevant.

I myself think that the answer to the question I have posed must, as a matter of common sense, be, "No." It is, of course, of the first importance in the administration of justice that parties to litigation should not be in any way hampered in the prosecution of their claims or the putting forward of their contentions; but I think that a finding of contempt of court must be based on a solid view of the likelihood of such interference and not upon fanciful notions of the susceptibility of the recipients of letters such as those; but, only incidentally, I do observe that in fact the recipients of these two letters did nothing except refer the question immediately to the East Stiftung, or, rather, I think, to C. Z. Scientific Instruments, Ltd.

Mr. Aldous, for the East Stiftung, submitted that it must be a contempt pending proceedings to assert dogmatically in letters to people who might be potential witnesses that one side was entitled to trade marks and that the other side were infringers and without rights, particularly without any reference at all to the fact that there were pending proceedings in which those dogmatic statements were being challenged. To pursue such a course of conduct, he argued, would tend to crystallise in the minds of the recipients a wrong and fanciful notion of what the position actually was, and thus would be inclined to assist the opposing side in putting forward the contrary view in proceedings.

For the respondents to the motion it was said that these letters were no more than warning letters addressed to alleged infringers which might or might not be followed by proceedings. It was said (and correctly) that they were not a broadcast circular, they contained no abuse of the other side, they were mere warning letters and as such are not a contempt of court. It is pointed out that it is impossible to write a warning letter in a case such as this without asserting on the one hand that one side is entitled and on the other hand that the other side has no right. It is also argued for the respondents that the addition to such a letter of some reference to pending proceedings cannot be required in order to save the letter from being contemptuous as being likely to discourage the recipient from giving evidence in those proceedings which are not mentioned at all. I must say that I for my part assent to those arguments.

CARL-ZEISS-STIFTUNG v. RAYNER & KEELER LTD.

Russell J.

My attention was drawn to a great many cases, to some of which I must refer, although I must bear in mind that, as has been said in some of them, each case must depend upon its particular facts. I will refer first to those upon which particular reliance was placed by the applicants in the motion.

Goulard and Gibbs v. Sir Coutts Lindsay & Co. Ltd.[1] is very shortly reported. There was an action by the plaintiffs against the defendants for infringement of certain patents, and the motion was brought in that action to restrain the plaintiffs from continuing to publish an advertisement which had appeared already in "The Times" and other newspapers signed by the plaintiffs' solicitors having reference to proceedings in the action, and their publishing or permitting to be published any advertisement alleging that the plaintiffs' patent had been or was being infringed by the defendants or either of them. This was the form of the advertisement signed by the plaintiffs' solicitors: "We are instructed by the directors of the National Company "to warn the public that in consequence of the continued infringement of their patents by the defendant company, and by "Mr. Ferranti, an action has been commenced in the High "Court of Justice, Chancery Division, against Sir C. Lindsay "and Co. (Limited), and Mr. Ferranti to restrain them from "further infringing the said patents, and that actions will be "commenced against all persons employing or using apparatus "which is not according to the letters patent without leave of "the patentees." I am bound to say that, on reading that, it looks as if a "not" has crept in, and that it should be "to restrain "them . . . from using apparatus which is according to the "letters patent without leave of the patentees."

Mr. Moulton, for the defendants in the action, contended that the advertisement was calculated to prejudice the public mind and to prevent a fair trial of the action. On the other hand reliance was apparently only placed upon the terms, which are not relevant to the present matter, of section 32 of the Patents, Designs and Trade Marks Act, 1883. There were some interlocutory observations from Kay J. who did not deliver any judgment. One was[2]: "You can warn as much as you like, "but can you advertise I have brought an action against A. B. "which is certain to succeed?" At a later stage he said[3]: "To "advertise a positive statement that the defendants had "infringed was wrong, and asked if the plaintiffs would under-"take not to go on advertising to that effect. He further stated "that he should not grant an injunction except to restrain this."

[1] (1887) 4 R.P.C. 189.
[2] Ibid. 190.
[3] Ibid.

Ultimately the undertaking was given; and, as I said, there was no formal judgment at all.

My only comment upon that case is to state that it differs from the present case in that it involved an advertisement in all the leading newspapers as distinguished from individual letters written warning individual people. Secondly I observe that Kay J. said[4]: "You can warn as much as you like, but can "you advertise I have brought an action against A.B. which is "certain to succeed?" I am bound to say that, if the judge meant to answer his own question in the affirmative, as I think he did, because he said that to advertise a positive statement that the defendants had infringed was wrong, it seems to me that in this very short case, which did not take the ordinary course, he was making a mistake, and I find it very difficult to reconcile that case with the other decisions.

The next case referred to by Mr. Aldous was Daw v. Eley.[5] I need not go much into the details of the facts except to state that, broadly speaking, there were patent proceedings pending, and the solicitor for one side, under a pseudonym, participated very actively in correspondence in the public press discussing and arguing fully the pros and cons of the infringement of a particular patent which was in issue in the proceedings and, if I may borrow a phrase which we shall find in subsequent cases about this sort of contempt, in every sense of the word discussing the merits in public. Lord Romilly M.R., having said that he thought that the conduct of the solicitor could not be defended, went on to say,[6] "The principle is quite established in all these "cases, that no person must do anything with a view to pervert "the sources of justice or the proper flow of justice; in fact they "ought not to make any publications, or to write anything, "which would induce the court, or which might possibly induce "the court, or the jury, the tribunal that will have to try the "matter, to come to any conclusion other than that which is to "be derived from the evidence in the cause between the parties; "and certainly they ought not to prejudice the minds of the "public beforehand by mentioning circumstances relating to the "case. Now, if that is done with the intention of perverting "the ends of justice there is no question that the court would "stop it, and very often the court will judge for itself what are "the fair inferences to be derived from the publications which "appear; but it must also go beyond this; it must stop the "publication where the evident result would be to affect the "administration of justice, though that might not have been "the intention of the person who did it."

Having dealt with the facts of the case and with matters that the solicitor had written in his letters and published in the papers, Lord Romilly M.R. went on[7]: "Can anybody doubt "that if I were persuaded that the whole of the statements in

"that letter were true, it would very seriously affect my opinion "as to the validity and the originality of Mr. Daw's patent? "Then it is to be observed that this is written, not by a mere "stranger, who might say that he really knew nothing at all "about the cause, but it is written by the solicitor of the gentle-"man who is opposed to Mr. Daw in this suit. Surely that is "a very strong feature in the case; he must wish that his client "should succeed; and I venture to say that there is no solicitor "who would not in the same position feel the same thing; and it is "impossible that a solicitor can safely act in a matter of this "description in writing an article in a paper which, if believed, "must have a beneficial effect upon his client, and afterwards "say 'I had no intention of that sort at all, however much I "'may wish for it.'" Then a little lower down he said [8]: "There is one distinct line drawn, which is this, that gentlemen "who are concerned for contending clients in this court, whether "solicitors or counsel, should abstain entirely from discussing "the merits of those questions in public print; if they do it at "all, they ought to put their names to their communications; "but to let the public suppose that it is merely done by a person "who takes a great interest in, and has great knowledge of the "subject, and discusses it from a public point of view, when, "if the fact were known, he is the solicitor of the defendant, "and has the strongest possible interest in his success, is, in my "opinion, highly reprehensible."

Let me say at once that in the present case there is no suggestion whatsoever that it was intended or indeed thought likely by Dehn & Lauderdale in any way to prejudice the minds of the recipients with a view to making it the more difficult for the East Stiftung to prepare and conduct their case.

It is perfectly correct to say that in Daw v. Eley [9] there was in the fullest sense a discussion of the merits of the case in public print, and that is a very different situation from that which obtains in the present case, where there are what I regard as mere warning letters not involving any discussion of facts as such addressed in the form of individual letters to individual members of the retail trade.

The next case referred to was J. & P. Coats v. Chadwick,[10] the decision in which did not find favour in the eyes of the Divisional Court in the later case of Reg. v. Payne [11]; in another case, another judge took the same view of the remarks which I have just referred to. The headnote in J. & P. Coats v. Chadwick [12] reads: "Pending an action for infringing a trade-mark the "plaintiffs are at liberty to warn the trade by circular; but to "introduce discussion of the merits of the action is a contempt."

The circular in that particular case, being a circular sent out to the retail dealers in the same cotton trade as the plaintiff was in this form: "We regret to have to draw your attention to the "fact that Messrs. James Chadwick & Brother (Limited) have "recently attempted to injure our trade by adopting a blue label "for 400 yards six cord which so closely resembles ours as to "produce the result of their goods being passed off as ours, "nor can there be any doubt that this is intended. . . . They "have now adopted the device of imitating ours in order more "readily to find purchasers for their thread. We are determined "to use every means in our power to put a stop to unfair competi-"tion of this sort, and have therefore commenced proceedings "against Messrs. Chadwick. We have also been compelled to "take proceedings against retail dealers selling goods manu-"factured by Messrs. Chadwick and bearing the blue label which "is an imitation of ours. We think it right to warn the trade "in general of the course we are pursuing, and, for your informa-"tion, we beg to give you at foot an extract from a recent "judgment given in the Chancery Division of the High Court "of Justice."

Chitty J. said [13]: "This circular has been widely distributed "by the plaintiffs among retail dealers in the sewing-cotton trade "and others. The special ground of complaint is that the class "of persons to whom the circular is addressed is the very class "to whom the defendants will have to look for evidence in "support of their defence, and that it is calculated to create a bias "against the defendants in the minds of those who receive it, "and to deter them from coming forward as witnesses for the "defendants. It appears to me that it is calculated to prejudice "the defendants in their defence, and that it thus falls under "the well-established head of contempt, by interfering with the "course of justice. It is a strong, one-sided statement by one "of the parties to the action on the merits of the case which "is pending before the court. It unhesitatingly imputes fraud "and dishonesty to the defendants. It charges them, not merely "with imitating the plaintiffs' goods, but with the deliberate "intention of imitating. The fact that Messrs. Coats hold a "high position in the trade, being, as their counsel stated, at the "very head of the trade, gives additional force to these state-"ments, and renders it the more probable that the traders, and "particularly the smaller retail traders, will be thereby affected "adversely to the defendants." Then he said [14]: "I grant the "injunction as asked, with costs, adding that I should not have "intervened if the circular had amounted to a mere warning to "the trade against infringement or imitation. The plaintiffs are "at liberty to warn the trade as much as they like, notwith-"standing the pendency of this action; but they are bound to "refrain during its pendency from public discussion on the merits "or demerits of the case."

It is to be observed that Chitty J. came to the conclusion that the circular was a contempt on the basis of all the facts which he mentioned in the passage which I have just read, including, in effect, accusations of deliberate and fraudulent attempts to steal the good-will of Messrs. Coats. But, in addition to the accusations, the facts of that case wholly distinguish it from the present case. I bear in mind very much the language used by the judge in the last passage of his judgment, in which he recognised—as indeed did Kay J. in the Goulard case [15]—that you are at liberty to warn the trade. If one considers the circulars in this case, I ask myself the question: How can you warn the trade, the retailers, not to sell the products of the Eastern Stiftung under these trade marks except in the course of a letter saying "We are entitled to the trade marks" mentioning also expressly that the other side are not entitled to the trade marks? To go beyond that might come into the field of discussion of the merits of the case; but I cannot bring myself to think that it is discussion of the merits of the case to assert that which one is bound to assert in the course of a warning letter, namely, that the writer is entitled to the trade marks and that the other people concerned are not.

The next case referred to was the Scottish case of St. Mungo Manufacturing Co. v. Hutchinson Main & Co. Ltd.[16] That was a case in which the defendants were the owners of a registered design for a golf ball, and they brought an action to restrain the St. Mungo Manufacturing Company from infringing it. During that litigation Hutchinson distributed a circular to retailers which said that the St. Mungo Company had applied a fraudulent or obvious imitation of their design to golf balls and that proceedings had been commenced against the St. Mungo Manufacturing Company, and warning retail dealers against selling such golf balls. The St. Mungo Manufacturing Company applied for an injunction to restrain Hutchinson from distributing those circulars, on the ground, first, that they constituted contempt of court, and secondly and alternatively (a ground which is not in point in these present proceedings) that the circular was unfair and misleading. It is to be observed that the circular there contained the phrase "a fraudulent or obvious imitation," and that phrase is a phrase taken from the then section 58 (b) of the Designs Act, 1883; but it is the fact that, although "fraudulent" in that section did not mean fraudulent in the fullest sense but in the sense of being a fraudulent copying, as suggested in the course of the hearing it is unlikely that such niceties were normally present to the mind of golf retailers in Scotland, and to them I should have thought that the word "fraudulent" would have meant that somebody was accusing the St. Mungo Manufacturing Company of being a fraudulent concern, and to that extent the circular was evasive in its nature and calculated to bring discredit upon the St. Mungo Manufacturing Company in relation to the pending proceedings.

Lord Salvesen, who tried the case, said [17]: "The decisions "relied on by the complainers, that the issue of the circular in "question constituted a contempt of court, seem to support their "proposition. In the earliest case on the subject (Henderson v. "Laing [18])"—a Scottish case—"a person who published and "circulated a statement tending to create an impression as to "the merits of the question which formed the subject of pending "actions unfavourable to his opponent, was found to have com-"mitted an improper and unwarrantable interference with the "proceedings of the court and was subjected in payment of the "expenses of a petition and complaint. In McLauchlan v. "Carson [19] it was held to be an interference with the administra-"tion of justice to publish a report of a statement, made at a "public meeting of road trustees by their agent, relative to a "case depending in court against them. The Lord President "(Hope) in sustaining the petition and complaint and finding "the respondents liable in expenses, said [20]: 'Reports of "'depending cases are at all times very dangerous and tend to "'interfere with the administration of justice. It may be "'perfectly lawful to report that an interesting point of law has "'arisen, and is depending in court but it is extremely improper "'to enter upon all the facts of the case.' No doubt there "was a specialty in that case that the newspaper, in which the "report appeared, was likely to be read by persons who might "be jurors or witnesses at the approaching trial, but the observa-"tions made were perfectly general. In the subsequent case of "Smith v. Mitchell,[21] although nothing had been done by the "respondent except to print in the form of a pamphlet a "memorial and queries previously submitted by him to counsel, "and calculated to produce an impression prejudicial to his "opponents, he was found liable in the expenses of a petition "and complaint to have the circulation interdicted although "the copies complained of had not been circulated by his "direction or authority. It thus appears that according to our "law any publication bearing upon the merits of a dispute sub "judice which prejudges the case or discounts the judgment before "it is issued is liable to be restrained. I think the circular "complained of is of this nature. It states as a fact that the "complainers had applied a fraudulent or obvious imitation of "a registered design belonging to the respondents to their "golf ball called the 'Colonel,' and it warned retail dealers that "if they sold 'Colonel' golf balls with this design they would "expose themselves to certain statutory penalties. The respon-"dents were practically therefore by means of this circular "endeavouring to obtain the same advantages as they would "have got if an interim interdict had been granted, and, if their "argument is sound, without exposing themselves to any "liability for damages."

In my view, having regard to the very general statement which I have read, the statement[22] "It thus appears that "according to our law any publication bearing upon the merits "of a dispute sub judice which prejudges the case or discounts "the judgment before it is issued is liable to be restrained," if the words "according to our law" are meant to include the law of this country, is far too wide. It seems to me, having regard to the later cases, quite plain at least that these letters could have been written in the form in which they are written with a reference to the fact that there were proceedings pending; but the phrase of Lord Salvesen would suggest quite clearly that, in his view, a letter with such an addition would, nevertheless, since it suggests dogmatically that there is infringement and so forth, be restrained as contempt of court. I observe also that he goes on to say that, if not restrained, the respondents in that case would have been getting for themselves the advantage of an interlocutory injunction without any cross-undertaking as to damages. With great respect, that appears to me not to be relevant on the question whether or not there was contempt. Then Lord Salvesen goes on to another general observation[23]: "I think "it is a wholesome rule that in all cases, that have been sub-"mitted to a legal tribunal for decision, the merits of the case "should not be tried or discussed in publications by interested "parties or by the newspapers; and that any breach of this rule "should be visited by the penalty that the court may deem "appropriate." Again, with respect, if the judge there was intending to include in that a letter of a character which we have in the present case, and to say that such a letter would constitute contempt, I would respectfully disagree with him; but, as has been pointed out, every case must be dealt with on its own facts, and there is always a danger, in my view, of taking from cases such as this general statements which are made in the course of a judgment by judges which are made really with the judicial eye, if I may put it in this way, only upon the particular facts of the particular case.

The next case to which I propose to refer is Gaskell & Chambers Ltd. v. Hudson, Dodsworth & Co.[24] In that case both sides were manufacturers of beer pumps and both sides had sent circulars out to brewers. The defendants' circulars, according to the report, allegedly criticised the plaintiffs' beer pumps, and the action was brought in respect of statements in those circulars. After the statement of claim had been delivered the defendants sent round to the brewers a circular letter in these terms: "Since "the commencement of this business our sales have shown con-"siderable increases week by week, and this unbounded success "seems to arouse the rabid jealously of" the plaintiffs "as "shown by the enclosed 'statement of claim' which we have "received from them. Please keep the enclosed copy for refer-"ence. Our reason for bringing this to your notice is because" the plaintiffs "commenced a similar action against us on July "18th last, which they wholly discontinued on November 30th, "and we refuse to be intimidated by these actions, and we intend "to contest this 'cock and bull' claim to the uttermost degree." A copy of the statement of claim was enclosed. It was held that that did not constitute contempt.

Mr. Aldous has pointed out that there had been a previous circular by the other side to which, in a sense, this was a counter-blast, and he also pointed out that it did include the statement of claim of the other side; but I think that there is considerable force in the submission on behalf of the respondents to this motion that that decision,[25] a decision of the Divisional Court, does reveal a more robust approach to the question of contempt than is perhaps disclosed in earlier decisions, and, to my mind, does suggest that the letters complained of in the present proceedings should not be treated as a contempt of court.

The next decision to which my attention was drawn is Haskell Golf Ball Co. v. Hutchinson.[26] In that case the Haskell Golf Ball Co. started an action against Robert Hutchinson for infringement of letters patent relating to golf balls. After the action had been commenced an advertisement was inserted by the plaintiffs in a paper known as the "Irish Golfer," with a large circulation, saying: "Important Notice. It has come to the notice of the "Haskell Golf Ball Company that golf balls known as the "'Springvale Eagle,' the 'Springvale Hawk' . . . are being "offered for sale in the United Kingdom in infringement of "letters patent belonging to the Haskell Company. This is to "give notice that actions have been commenced against the "manufacturers of or dealers in such balls claiming injunctions "to restrain such infringements and damages. And further "notice is given, that the Haskell Company will enforce its rights "against all persons buying or selling or otherwise dealing in or "using such infringing golf balls"; and that was signed by the solicitors to the Haskell Golf Ball Co.

Buckley J., in the course of his judgment, said[27]: "Then it "is said the advertisement ought to be stopped because it is an "interference with the course of justice, and in that sense a "contempt of court; that it is a proceeding that will embarrass "the court in coming to a fair decision in the action when it "comes on for trial. I confess that I have great difficulty in "understanding how that contention can be put forward seriously. "The contention as I understand it is this: that by this notice "the patentee says, 'You are infringing my patent; you are sell-"'ing an infringement of my patent; I have commenced an "'action to restrain the infringement of my patent,' and he is "thereby affirming that the decision in the action will be in his "favour. Would it have made any difference had he said 'offer-"'ing for sale that which I allege to be an infringement of my "'patent'? I think certainly not. The circular simply means "this: 'I say my patent is good, and I say you are infringing it; "'I have commenced an action in which I am going to main-"'tain the affirmative of that, in which, of course, I may be "'defeated, and I may be wrong.' In Fenner v. Wilson & Co. "(Barnsley) Ltd.[28] the language of the threat was this: 'The "'public are especially warned that users of' certain things 'are "'liable to damages and injunction in respect of such user'— "which is stronger language than this. That was a direct affirma-"tion that they were liable and that the decision would be in the "patentee's favour. Upon that Lindley L.J. said[29]: 'We think "'we ought to say that we could not possibly treat these advertise-"'ments as a contempt of court; it would be extravagant to treat "'them as anything of the sort.' That language is stronger than "this. The circular in this case, in my opinion, amounts to "nothing more than this; the patentee says, 'The patent is a good "'one. I am going to maintain that it is a good patent, and you "'are infringing it.' Of course, it would be competent for the "patentee to commence actions against all the persons dealing in "these alleged infringing articles. What he has done is some-"thing less than that. Instead of suing them all, he gives them "notice that they are doing that which, as he claims, is a wrong-"ful act. To use the language of Lindley L.J., it seems to me "that it is extravagant to treat anything of that kind as a matter "which calls for the interference of the court or one which will "interfere in any way with the course of justice."

That is a case which differs from the present case in two respects, one, that the advertisement was actually published in a newspaper (and, of course, the publications, if I may use the expression, in this case are on a far more restricted basis) and, secondly, that it did mention that actions had been commenced against the manufacturers; and Mr. Aldous distinguishes that case in particular by saying that it would have been different if the letters in the present case had drawn to the attention of the recipients the fact that there were proceedings pending and therefore, that some people were presumably challenging the validity of the statement already made.

I observe in passing that Haskell v. Hutchinson[30] was a case which seems to have been concerned not only with the same subject-matter, but with the same parties, or, at any rate, one of the same parties, as Lord Salvesen's case, St. Mungo v. Hutchinson.[31]

The next case to which I will refer is Mullard Radio Valve Co.

[28] (1893) 10 R.P.C. 283.
[29] Ibid. 283, 288.
[30] 20 T.L.R. 606; 21 R.P.C. 497.
[31] 25 R.P.C. 356.

Ltd. v. Rothermel Corpn. Ltd.,[32] a decision of Farwell J. That was a case in which Mullard Radio Valve Co. Ltd. was suing Rothermel Corporation Ltd. claiming an injuiction to restrain the infringement of certain letters patent. After the writ had been issued the plaintiffs inserted in a trade paper an advertisement in the following terms: "Warning. Our attention "has been called to the fact that Radio Valves are being "imported into and sold in Great Britain constituting an "infringement of Letters Patent No. 287,958. We have accordingly found it necessary for the protection of our rights and of "the radio industry in general, to issue writs against," and then four names and addresses, including the defendants, were given, "all of whom have been importing and selling infringing valves. "We feel it our duty to warn both suppliers and users of "infringing valves that they are rendering themselves liable to "legal proceedings, and our reason for issuing this notice is to "avoid, if possible, causing unnecessary annoyance and expense "to any such suppliers or users who have purchased valves, "without knowledge of the existence of the above patent."

In that case the conclusion was arrived at that it was not a contempt of court. It was argued that the circular, on its true construction, represented that the court had already decided the issues in the action in favour of the person who had inserted the warning. Farwell J. held, as a matter of construction, that it did not do that, although he deprived the respondents to the motion of their costs, because some people might well have so construed it. But it was because it did not represent that a case existed which had been decided in favour of the advertiser that the judge held that it was not contempt.

It was submitted by Mr. Aldous that the judge appeared to hold that it was not contempt because there was a mention of the proceedings, of the writ, and therefore the proper inference to be drawn was that they were not making an unqualified statement but a statement coupled with the qualification that somebody was in some proceedings challenging an otherwise dogmatic assertion of infringement. Farwell J. said[33]: "I have been "referred to various authorities on somewhat similar lines, and "I confess it seems to me this case is very near the line." I take him as meaning that the case was very near the line rather than to be referring to the question which he decided as a matter of construction, whether the advertisement was properly to be read as asserting that the decision of the court had been arrived at. "I have no doubt," he continues, "in my own mind that "it is most objectionable that a party to an action should insert "in a newspaper or elsewhere a public statement which could "fairly be taken as in any way prejudicing a case which has to "be determined. A plaintiff commences an action, and it is for "the court to determine whether he is right or not, and it is

"most undesirable in my view that there should be any public "statement which can be said in any sense to anticipate the "result of the pending proceedings. On the other hand, I think "it would be impossible to say that the plaintiff was guilty of "contempt of court if he stated that he was bringing an action "against some other person and that he had no doubt that he "would win his action. A mere statement of confidence in the "success of a pending action could not be said to be contempt "of court. In my judgment the whole question here really "depends on what is the true construction of this particular "document. Let me say at once that I think the document is "unfortunate in its terms"; and I interpose to say that that is the reason, as I understand it, why the judge did not give the respondents their costs. "I am not suggesting," he continues, "any bad faith against the plaintiffs or the plaintiffs' solicitors. "I am quite satisfied that they did not intend to do anything "which would be improper, but, on the other hand, I think the "language is unfortunate in that it is capable of being construed "as suggesting that the validity of the patent has already been "established, and a statement of that kind, if this amounts to "such a statement, would, to my mind, be most objectionable. "But, on the other hand, in my judgment, this document is "certainly capable of being read, and in its true meaning ought "to be read, as stating not that there has already been a deter-"mination in the courts as to the validity of the patent, but that "an action is pending in which the question of the validity is "going to be determined. If it ought to be read in that way, it "cannot in my judgment be treated as a contempt of court."

Applying the language of the judge in that case to this case, where there is in fact no mention at all of the writ, it seems to me that he was by no means directing his mind to a case where no mention whatever of any proceedings was made, and he concluded that if there was a mention of proceedings it would only be contempt on the true construction of the document which suggested that the proceedings had been determined in a particular way. I cannot think that any of the language used by the judge in that case [34] can be relied on in support of the submission that a letter such as the one now before me must be contempt unless there is a reference to the existence of proceedings, and I am bound to say that the general impression I get from that case is that the judge would have found little difficulty in deciding that the letters in the present case were not to be treated as contempt.

The final case to which I was referred which I will mention is Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co. Ltd. v. Clifton Rubber Co. Ltd.[35] That was a case in which Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co. Ltd. had begun an action against Clifton Rubber Co. Ltd. to restrain infringement of patent. The plaintiffs in the action issued a circular in these terms: "Notice. The Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co. Ltd. are "advised that the tyre now being sold under the name of the Wap-"share tyre is an infringement of the letters patent held by them. "An action has already been brought against the Clifton Rubber "Co. Ltd. in respect of their sale of such tyres, and the public are "warned that similar actions will be brought against any person "found manufacturing, selling, or using such tyres. Since the "above notice first appeared certain cycle dealers have been dis-"covered selling the said tyres and actions have accordingly been "brought against them." On the basis of that, proceedings were launched based on contempt to restrain the sending out of such circulars. There is no considered judgment of Joyce J., but he finally said [36]: "I do not see why the plaintiffs were not entitled "to say this. I think it has been well considered and well "settled by counsel, and I do not see why they should not say it."

I have listened, I hope, with the closest attention to the arguments which have been developed before me with the authorities in mind, and it is with those authorities in mind that I have come to the conclusion which I have already expressed, that these and similar letters are not to be regarded as contempt of court in relation to the proceedings now pending.

I was exhorted, very properly, by Mr. Aldous, that I must be astute to keep the stream of justice clear and pure; but, for my part, I cannot see in any such letter any likelihood of pollution.

It is at all times an extremely dangerous thing to refer in any judgment to a case which has not been referred to by counsel; but I am going to refer to one such case which I did look at during the adjournment and after I had announced my decision. I only refer to it because I think it right that I should do so, particularly having regard to the argument that Mr. Aldous presented to me as to the absence of any mention in the letters of the existence of proceedings. This case, Fenner v. Wilson & Co. (Barnsley) Ltd.,[37] was referred to in Haskell Golf Ball Co. v. Hutchinson,[38] which I have already cited.

It was a case in which the plaintiff began an action for infringement of patent against the defendants, and, pending proceedings, inserted the following circular in the "Manchester Courier" and "Manchester Guardian": "Lake's Patent No. 9855, A.D. 1886. "Japanned shuttles, bobbins, and spools. Notice is hereby given "that proceedings in Chancery will be commenced against all "parties manufacturing, selling, or using japanned shuttles, bob-"bins, or spools not manufactured by the owner of the said "letters patent or his licensees. The public are especially warned "that users of japanned shuttles, bobbins, and spools are liable "to damages and injunction in respect of such user. Sole "licensees in England: Wilson Bros. Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung v. Rayner & Keeler Ltd.

Russell J.

"St. James' Square, Manchester. Solicitor for H. N. Fenner-"New England Butt Company, Providence, Rhode Island, "U.S.A." On the basis of that, proceedings for an injunction to restrain continuance of such publications were launched.

Kekewich J. came to the conclusion that these matters did constitute contempt of court. In the course of his judgment he said[39]: "He," the plaintiff, "states in plain terms that he, and "those claiming through him, are the only persons entitled to "use this invention, and that strangers who use it are liable to "damages; and he also states that proceedings will be commenced "against those who infringe those rights, ignoring altogether the "fact that there is the action pending. These advertisements, "issued after the action commenced, do amount to a statement "by the plaintiff that the action must succeed; that the action "is a mere establishing of a title which really is beyond dispute. "That is really precisely what Kay J. puts in the case of Goulard "and Gibbs v. Lindsay & Co.[40] 'You can warn as much as you "'like,' he says, 'but can you advertise, "I have brought an "'"action against A.B. which is certain to succeed?"'"

But the matter went to the Court of Appeal. The only relevant passage is the one referred to in Haskell Golf Ball Co. v. Hutchinson[41] which I have already read (supra, p. 1160), where Lindley L.J. said[42]: "I shall say very little about it. "I am not going through the law of the case, which is in some "respects difficult. I shall content myself with saying that "having considered the case we think we ought to say that we "could not possibly treat these advertisements as a contempt of "court. It would be extravagant to treat them as anything of "the sort."

I mention that case because, having observed it and looked at it, I thought it would be convenient to add it to those to which I had already referred. I am bound to say that it does occur to me that it is a view expressed by the Court of Appeal contrary to the submissions of Mr. Aldous, that these matters are contemptuous in that they lack a reference to the existence of the present current proceedings.

In the result the motions in both cases will be refused.

Both motions dismissed with costs. The costs of the personal respondents to be taxed and paid at once.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

The applicants, Jennifer Ann Thompson and Edward Martin Amphlett Thompson, being beneficially interested under the trusts of the will, dated June 18, 1930, of Albert Edward Thompson, deceased, applied to the court to approve under section 1 of the Variation of Trusts Act, 1958, on behalf of the infant respondent, Cecilia Leila Thompson, and of all persons unborn or unascertained who might become entitled to an interest under the trusts affecting the residuary estate of the above-named testator, an arrangement extending the powers of investment conferred on the trustees for the time being of the will of the testator in respect of his residuary real and personal estate which were "to invest the "same in such securities as the trustees may for the time being "be authorised to invest upon or in the purchase or on mortgage "of real estate or ground rents situate in England or Wales." The estate included a number of ordinary stocks and shares of commercial and industrial companies (including private companies) which had been retained by the trustees since the death of the testator. Order dismissing summons generally (10s.).

(NOTE: Where any of the above orders marked with a 5s. fee are made on a summons bearing a 10s. stamp, no fee will be payable on the order.)

When a procedural order is made by a master, the solicitor entitled to the carriage of the order will prepare and lodge with the master's summons clerk two engrossments (original and duplicate) of the order as proposed to be passed and entered together with the summons and the evidence on which the order was made. The engrossments must be typed on foolscap paper or on printed copies of Form 2 of Appendix K of the Annual Practice. The summons clerk will give the solicitor an appointment to attend before the master's principal clerk to pass the order.

If on the appointment before him the principal clerk is satisfied that the proposed order gives effect to that made by the master, he will direct the solicitor having the carriage of the order to stamp one of the engrossments (if a fee is payable on the order). The principal clerk will then add his initials to both copies.

The summons on which the order was made will be numbered serially by the summons clerk and filed in chambers. The serial number of the summons will be inserted in the left hand margin of the original and duplicate order by the summons clerk. The summons clerk will then enter details of the order in an order book which he will maintain, setting out the following details:

(a) Title of cause or matter.
(b) Reference number of proceedings.
(c) Date of order.
(d) Date of initialling by principal clerk.
(e) Serial number of summons.
(f) Fee paid (if any).

The necessary statistical entries will also be recorded in the statistical register by the summons clerk.

The summons clerk will transmit any original affidavits lodged in support of the application on which the order was made to the Filing and Record Department of the Central Office.

The order will then be transmitted by the summons clerk to the entry clerk, who will enter the order in the same way as orders drawn up in the registrars' office.

The sealed duplicate order will normally be ready for collection from the entry seat on the day following the appointment before the principal clerk at which the order was passed.

Any party who desires to amend the order as entered shall, within four days after service upon him of the order, take an appointment before the principal clerk for this purpose, and shall serve notice of such appointment on the other parties. Without prejudice to the right of a party to adjourn to the master, the principal clerk may, if he thinks proper so to do, refer the question to the master for his decision.

* PRACTICE DIRECTION (MINUTES OF ORDER).

Practice—Chancery Division—Order, drawing up—Minutes of order drawn by counsel—Functions of registrar.

The following directions have been given by the judges of the Chancery Division:

1. Where minutes of order have been settled by counsel the registrar should not interfere in any way with the minutes unless it appears to him that they do not carry out the intention of the judge or are defective in form. If the registrar is not satisfied he should refer the minutes back to counsel through the solicitors with his proposed amendments. Should the registrar and counsel be unable to agree the minutes, the matter should be mentioned to the judge.

2. In the case of terms scheduled to a consent order these terms represent an arrangement between the parties, and the registrar is not concerned to approve them, although he may properly offer suggestions upon them if it appears to him that they may cause some difficulty.

Crime—Evidence—Depositions—Incriminating evidence by prosecution witness on deposition before committing magistrates—Contradictory evidence at trial—Witness treated as hostile—Refusal to admit truth of deposition — Whether jury entitled to rely on original statement.

When a witness is shown to have made previous statements inconsistent with the evidence given by that witness at the trial, the jury should not merely be directed that the evidence given at the trial should be regarded as unreliable; they should also be directed that the previous statements, whether sworn or unsworn, do not constitute evidence on which they can act.

Where, therefore, a witness, whose evidence on deposition before the committing magistrates incriminated the three accused, repudiated her statement at the trial and, although treated as a hostile witness by the prosecution, refused to admit that her deposition was true, and on a direction, in effect, that it was open to them to act upon the evidence contained in her deposition, the jury convicted:—

Held, that the direction to the jury was wrong; that as the evidence, apart from that of the hostile witness, only created a case of grave suspicion, the jury had probably acted on material on which in law they could not act, and therefore the court must quash the convictions.

APPEALS against conviction.

The appellants, Sydney Elmer Golder, Arthur Patrick Jones and George Anthony Porritt, were convicted on January 7, 1960, at West Suffolk Quarter Sessions (deputy chairman, Judge Southall) of breaking and entering a house at Newmarket in the early hours of the morning of April 19, 1959, and stealing a safe and its contents. Golder was also charged with receiving a gold watch, part of the stolen property. Before the committing magistrates a witness, Taylor, said that Golder had given her the gold watch on April 20. At the trial Taylor denied that Golder was the man who gave her the watch. She was treated as a hostile witness but refused to admit that her deposition was true. On a direction by the deputy chairman that the jury might consider whether they thought the witness's evidence on her deposition was the true version of her story, the jury convicted.

The appellants were granted leave to appeal against their convictions on July 19, 1960. The appeals came before the court on July 26, when they were adjourned for a court of five judges.

Robin Simpson for the appellants.

Cur. adv. vult.

LORD PARKER C.J. These three appellants were tried at West Suffolk Quarter Sessions on an indictment containing two counts. In the first count all three men were charged with burglary and larceny, and in the second count Golder was separately charged with receiving a gold watch, part of the property referred to in the first count. All three appellants were found guilty on the first count and leave to appeal against conviction was granted in July, 1960.

The relevant facts may be summarised as follows: In the early hours of April 19, 1960, a dwelling-house in Newmarket was broken into and a quantity of property was removed, including a safe and a gold watch. At 5.30 a.m. a Standard Vanguard driven by the appellant Porritt, with three passengers, one of whom was the appellant Jones, was stopped by the police near Ely, but after investigation was allowed to proceed. About two hours later the same car was seen by other police officers at Gayherne, still driven by Porritt, but on this occasion with only one passenger, alleged to be the appellant Golder. On the evening of April 19 the safe was discovered in a field near Newmarket where it had been broken open. Tyre marks were seen and careful measurements were taken by a police officer, who formed the opinion that they were made by the rear wheels of the vehicle. When the car driven by the appellant Porritt was examined some four days later the front tyres were seen to be of a size and type which would have left marks exactly corresponding with those found in the field, but the tyres on the rear wheels were of a different size and type. There was no evidence to show that the tyres on the rear wheels had been changed in the intervening four days. The appellants Porritt and Jones gave an explanation to the police, purporting to account for their movements on the night in question, but that explanation was, to say the least of it, unimpressive. The appellant Golder denied throughout that he was in the Newmarket area, alleging that he was in Manchester.

As counsel for the prosecution frankly admitted, the foregoing evidence was not enough to do more than create a case of grave suspicion, and accordingly he sought to rely on a witness, Taylor. Before the committing magistrates she swore that on April 20 the appellant Golder, whom she knew as Chuck, had brought her a gold watch which was, in fact, part of the property stolen in Newmarket early in April. At the trial she went back on her story and counsel for the prosecution obtained leave to treat her as adverse and cross-examined her. He did not, however, succeed in extracting from her an admission that her deposition was true, still less that it was the appellant Golder who handed her the gold watch.

In the course of his summing-up the deputy chairman dealt with the question of the watch and the conflicting testimony of Taylor in a way which plainly indicated to the jury that it was open to them to act upon the evidence contained in her deposition notwithstanding her repudiation of it. The whole of the deposition was in fact read to them when they returned for further direction. It is only necessary to refer to two passages in the summing-up: "The only evidence which you have that he "gave the gold watch to Mrs. Taylor is the evidence of Mrs. "Taylor herself, and she, you may think, is a stranger to truth. "You heard the evidence before the justices." Later, he said: "If you come to the conclusion that what she said before the "magistrates was accurate then of course it all starts to tie up."

In the judgment of this court the direction to the jury in regard to Mrs. Taylor's deposition was wrong in law and, as was intimated at the end of the hearing of the appeals, all three convictions must be quashed. A long line of authority has laid down the principle that while previous statements may be put to an adverse witness to destroy his credit and thus to render his evidence given at the trial negligible, they are not admissible evidence of the truth of the facts stated therein. It is unnecessary to refer to the cases in detail; the following extract from the judgment of this court in Rex v. Harris [1] is a sufficient statement of the principle: "It was permissible to cross-examine this "girl upon the assertions she had previously made, not for the "purpose of substituting those unsworn assertions for her sworn "testimony, but for the purpose of showing that her sworn "testimony, in the light of those unsworn assertions, could not be "regarded as being of importance. It is upon that matter that "confusion has sometimes arisen. It has undoubtedly some-"times been thought that where a witness is cross-examined upon "a previous unsworn statement and admits that the statement "was made, but says that the statement was untrue, that "unsworn statement may sometimes be treated as if it could be "accepted by the jury in preference to the sworn statement in "the witness box . . . That of course is all wrong, as has been "pointed out on various occasions by this court, and not least in "the case of White.[2]"

In both Harris[3] and White[4] the previous statement was unsworn and not made in the presence of the accused. It could not, therefore, on any view be evidence against him. The principle, however, is equally applicable to earlier statements made on oath as it is to unsworn statements: cf. Rex v. Birch.[5]

Our attention was, however, drawn to the decision of this court in Rex v. Russell,[6] and it was suggested that that case had laid down a qualification to the general principle above stated to the effect that if there was other evidence before the jury tending to show that the previous statement represented the truth they were entitled to rely upon it. This court can see no warrant for any such qualification, which indeed would mean that evidence which was clearly inadmissible would on proof of the other evidence thereupon become admissible. Indeed, as we understand it, the court in Russell[6] was not laying down any such proposition.

We were also referred to the unreported case of Reg. v. Frett & Rosa tried by Donovan J. at the Central Criminal Court in 1956. It was a razor-slashing case in which the victim, a man called Carter, and his wife had unhesitatingly picked out their assailants at an identification parade. At the trial, however, they said that they were not sure and that the defendants merely resembled their assailants. The judge left it to the jury to decide whether they could safely rely upon the original identification, and the jury convicted. That, however, was, as it seems to us, quite a different case from that now under consideration. In particular, it was unnecessary to treat the Carters as adverse witnesses and they were not so treated.

In the judgment of this court, when a witness is shown to have made previous statements inconsistent with the evidence given by that witness at the trial, the jury should not merely be directed that the evidence given at the trial should be regarded as unreliable; they should also be directed that the previous statements, whether sworn or unsworn, do not constitute evidence upon which they can act.

As already stated, the circumstances of the present case were such as to arouse grave suspicion but, having regard to the fact that the jury were invited to act, and in all probability did act, upon material on which in law they could not act, this court is left with no alternative but to quash the convictions.

Husband and Wife—Cruelty—Insanity—As defence—Knowledge that acts of cruelty "wrong"—Meaning of "wrong"—Evidence of knowledge—Onus of proof.

At the hearing of a defended suit for divorce the court found that a long course of cruel conduct from at least 1946 until August, 1956, alleged against the wife respondent, including unjustifiable nagging, assaults and other acts of violence, threats made by the wife with a view to obtaining her own ends, accusing the husband of practising black magic and ill-treating the children of the parties, was proved, and that the conduct had injured the husband's health. On behalf of the wife it was alleged that at all material times she suffered from such a defect of reason from disease of the mind as not to know the nature and quality of her acts or, alternatively, not to know that her said acts were wrong.

The wife had been under mental treatment for periods from November, 1954, and, in January, 1958, was certified and had been detained thereafter. All the medical witnesses agreed that she was suffering from paranoid schizophrenia, the onset of which probably dated from 1948, and that she knew the nature and quality of her acts. On the question whether the wife knew that her acts were wrong, the medical evidence was conflicting, three doctors being of the view that, as from various dates, the wife either did not know or probably did not know that her conduct was wrong, while the fourth doctor was of the opinion that, on the balance of probabilities, she was able to distinguish right from wrong.

The wife had, on one occasion in 1954, expressed regret for her past behaviour and promised to behave better in the future. She had had an abortion performed in 1946, and thereafter had been greatly troubled in her mind by what she had done, and had also condemned the conduct of a relative who had made illicit profits on the black market:—

Held, (1) that the word "wrong" in the second limb of the M'Naughten Rules meant not merely that which was punishable by law but included that which was culpable or blameworthy (post, p. 1177).

Dicta of Asquith L.J. in White v. White [1950] P. 39, 53; 65 T.L.R. 524; [1949] 2 All E.R. 339 applied.

(2) That, apart from the accusation of practising "black magic" which, if prompted by delusional ideas, could not be held to amount to cruelty, it was not possible on the whole of the evidence to say that at any given point of time the wife's behaviour must be regarded as having ceased to stem from her abnormal personality, her vicious temper, selfishness and determination to get her own way at whatever cost and, thereafter, must be regarded merely as a manifestation of schizophrenia, and that the probabilities lay in favour of the view that, at all material times, she did know that her conduct was morally unjustified. The husband was, therefore, entitled to a decree.

DEFENDED PETITION for divorce.

The facts, as they appeared from the evidence of the husband, which was accepted by the court, were as follows: The parties were married on January 10, 1937, at the synagogue in Rangoon, both of them then being 22 years of age. There were four children living, Flora, who was 22 years of age at the date of the hearing, Sally, born in December, 1943, Saul in May, 1951, and Esther in July, 1955. From 1937 to 1942 the parties lived in Rangoon. The marriage was an unhappy one from an early stage due to the wife's constant nagging, complaining and outbursts of temper. In 1942 the parties were evacuated to Bombay during the invasion of Burma, and they were there until the end of 1946 when they returned to Burma. In 1948 they went to Bombay again. Throughout this time the same conduct continued. In 1946, the wife went to a doctor who procured an abortion for her. Afterwards she informed the husband of this fact, saying that they could not afford another child. The husband was very upset about this, but she said it had nothing to do with him and was solely her concern.

From 1946 her behaviour became worse. There was constant nagging and complaints (frequently over money), constant abuse, and a number of assaults. The wife flew into a temper if the husband failed to comply with her wishes, however unreasonable those wishes might be. She constantly complained, threw various articles at him and hit him and scratched his face. She ill-treated the children, ignoring the husband's protests in that regard. On a number of occasions she accused the husband (and also his sister) of practising black magic on her and "using an "evil influence on her." The husband's health became affected. his nerves suffered, he suffered from loss of sleep and had to resort to drugs. He told her of this, but she said she did not care and if it did not suit him—well, he could go his own way.

In 1950 the family moved to Israel, where they lived in a camp occupying a canvas hut known as a sreef. On several occasions the wife threatened to burn the sreef down (and everyone in it) in order to compel the husband to do what she wanted.

At first he took these threats seriously. She resented the poor living conditions in Israel and one night woke him up in the middle of the night demanding that he should immediately go to the manager of the camp and make him, the manager, arrange for better accommodation for her. She threatened the husband with a knife which she had in her hand, and he ran out of the sreef. She followed him out, went to the manager's sreef, as she said to teach him a lesson, and aroused him, and when he told her to come to his office next day she cut a hole in his sreef. On another occasion, when the husband was in the adjoining sreef in the evening, she called to him to come immediately and, on his so doing, leapt at him scratching the side of his face with her nails.

In 1953–1954, in order to make the husband do what she wanted, she threatened to commit suicide on several occasions by swallowing acid or throwing herself in the river. On an occasion, when she was complaining of having to live in the sreef, she threw a meat chopping board at him, striking him on the head, as a result of which he was away from work for several days.

Early in 1954 a child Leah was born. In March this child died, being then some 2½ months old. The wife had prevented the husband from even seeing the child for two months prior to the child's death, and it was only after the death that he knew that the child had been ill. She then accused him of being responsible for the death, saying that he had given her no peace so that she could not look after the child properly. Later she accused him of having caused the child's death by black magic. On several occasions she woke him up at night by throwing things at him (such as shoes) and then demanded sexual intercourse, even threatening him with a knife if he did not comply with her demands. She also woke him up violently in order to discuss money matters, continuing to nag him for long periods.

In the summer of 1954 the husband felt that he could not carry on any longer like this and left the camp and went to Haifa, where he remained for two months. He told her why he was going and her reply was, "Do what you want, it doesn't concern "me. All I want is money." During the two months that he was away he visited her at the camp each week giving her half his salary. While he was living with her he says he had always handed over the whole. In August of 1954 she asked him to return to her, promising to try and behave better towards him and to make the children happier, she expressed sorrow for her past behaviour, and said things would be all right in the future. He returned to her, and for a short time things were better, but not for very long. She then started her course of nagging and grumbling again and things got worse. On November 16, 1954, when she was two months pregnant, she entered the Blumenthal Mental Hospital in Haifa, as a voluntary patient, remaining there

v.
SOFAER.

until December 22, 1954, when the husband took her away in consequence of her insistence that she wished to leave, though the physician advised against it. She said that she would continue as an out-patient and she was so treated. After her return home her temper got worse again, and after some weeks she became violent. In March, 1955, she threw a bottle at him, having earlier in the day accused him of planning to get her put back in the hospital. On July 19, 1955, the child Esther was born.

The wife was very dissatisfied with the conditions in which the parties were living in Israel and had often expressed the wish to go to England to join her own people and live there, a course with which the husband agreed. After the birth of Esther the wife abused the husband for the delay in making arrangements for their departure, for which she held him responsible, and, in the course of a violent temper because of this, she smashed a number of articles of furniture. She insisted on keeping the girls away from school, saying girls did not need education and ought to help her in the house, and this also led to several angry scenes when she lost her temper and in which she assaulted the girls.

On April 26, 1956, she was again admitted to the Blumenthal Hospital. On July 4, 1956, she was discharged, and the same day the family left for England, arriving on July 12, 1956. They went to the Jewish temporary shelter in Mansell Street. They did not live together there, the sexes were segregated, but they saw each other and her attitude towards the husband was unchanged. In August, 1956, the husband moved into furnished rooms.

By his petition he sought dissolution of the marriage on the ground of the wife's cruelty. The wife, by the Official Solicitor as her guardian ad litem, filed an answer denying that she was guilty of cruelty, and alleged that if she had committed any of the acts relied upon she was not responsible therefor in that, at all material times, she suffered from such a defect of reason from disease of the mind as not to know the nature and quality of her acts; or, alternatively, if she did know, as not to know that her said acts were wrong.

COLLINGWOOD J. referred to the facts, and holding that the evidence of the husband, which was corroborated both as to the facts alleged and as to the injury to his health, was to be accepted, continued: I find, therefore, that unless the medical evidence shows that the M'Naughten Rules are applicable, the husband has established conduct which amounts to cruelty in law.

This being so, the onus of showing that she is not legally responsible for her actions is upon the wife, who must discharge it by proving, upon a balance of probabilities, that she was labouring under such a defect of reason from disease of the mind as not to know the nature and quality of her acts; or, if she did know, that she did not know what she was doing was wrong. As to the first of these alternatives, "Did she know the nature "and quality of her acts?" there is no question. All the evidence is one way, that she did.

The next question, therefore, is, "Did she know that what "she was doing was wrong?" Although Rex v. Windle [1] was cited to me on behalf of the wife, I think that, having regard to the judgment of Asquith L.J. in White v. White [2] in which he quoted with approval from the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Hanbury v. Hanbury,[3] in this connection the word "wrong" is to be understood as meaning not merely punishable by law but including that which is culpable or blameworthy. As to the wife's present condition, there is no doubt whatever. On January 21, 1958, after having been charged with larceny from one of Woolworth's Stores, she was certified as insane and detained at Long Grove Mental Hospital, Epsom, where she has remained ever since. On January 21, 1959, she was discharged on the lapse of the reception order, but readmitted at once as a voluntary patient, and, on January 21, 1960, she was regraded as an informal patient. All the medical witnesses agree that she was suffering from paranoid schizophrenia.

As I have said, she was admitted to the Blumenthal Mental Hospital, Haifa, on November 16, 1954, and the medical report and case history from Dr. Bental, the specialist for mental diseases at that hospital, were produced in evidence on behalf of the wife. His medical report, dated November 22, 1958, is as follows: "Mrs. Ruby Sofaer is suffering from schizophrenia of a "paranoid type, which has developed gradually over a long time "with increasing severity. The date of onset of the illness cannot "be determined exactly, the only way to form an opinion is by "accepting the husband's statements. However, in view of the "progress of the illness one is justified in surmising that the "oddities in her behaviour were already the symptoms of her "illness. The statements of the husband regarding the bizarre "actions of the patient are perfectly credible since they are in "accordance with the symptomatology of paranoid schizophrenia "in general, and with the symptoms observed in the patient here "in particular. I arrive at the conclusion that Mrs. Sofaer is "suffering from schizophrenia of the paranoid type and that at "the present state of our psychiatric knowledge there is practic-"ally no hope for her recovery."

With that general report there was a case history. It is a very long document. I do not think it is necessary for present purposes to read the whole of it, but there are certain passages in it to which I think I should refer. In the course of this case history the doctor says: "The onset of the present illness was "insidious, it may be traced back to the death of her child in "April, 1954. At that time she began to be depressive. The "condition became worse when after the death of her child an "aunt came to visit with her and stayed for four months. The "aunt caused considerable disharmony between the patient and "her husband. Finally, the husband left his family for two "months, since he could not stand the nagging of his wife, when "she could not sleep at night. The patient was inclined to "believe in witchcraft, and this superstition was aggravated "under the influence of this aunt. Twelve days prior to her "admission to hospital, the patient became acutely ill. She "suddenly came down with severe anxiety with the idea that "she had been bewitched and the witch was coming for her. She "insisted that the aunt had bewitched her and had driven the "husband from the house." He then refers to her condition on admission. "The patient, who entered the hospital voluntarily "on November 16, 1954, was two months pregnant. She was "whiny, agitated, unkempt, refused to wash and use a comb. "The patient was afraid that something would happen to her "husband, begged fervently to permit the husband to visit her. "He came almost daily and brought sweets to her. However "when they were together, they had nothing to say to each "other." He then goes on to say she had the attitude of the paranoid, and a little lower down he speaks of her hearing voices and sounds without clearly understanding their meaning. She also said she felt her pregnancy was due to the witchcraft of her aunt, and that she was going to die of it. He concludes by saying: "In spite of all this, her husband gave in to her "persuasion and insisted on the patient's discharge," she having insisted herself for some time, and the patient was discharged from hospital on December 22, 1954, unimproved and against the advice of the physician. He then sets out the serious treatment which the patient had undergone, pointing out that it was limited owing to her pregnancy, and that the Largactil treatment had to be interrupted because of her premature departure from the hospital.

She was again admitted to this hospital on April 26, 1956, but for some four months prior to this admission she had been treated by a Dr. Valin, from whom two reports have been admitted. One of them, sent in December, 1957, from Haifa, reads as follows: "I have been for a short time in medical charge of the family "Sofaer and I will be glad to do my best to assist you in the "aforementioned case. Mrs. Sofaer was suffering from delusions "and obsessions, mainly that the perils to the state of Israel are "caused by lack of piousness of the population and because of "the sexual coolness of her husband towards her. Even during "her quiet period her household was sordidly neglected, her "husband had to care for her and the children. He was during "his stay in Israel a minor customs official, because of his wife's "condition he had to neglect his job and the financial and general "condition of the family was in a pitiful state. Mrs. Sofaer was "sometimes a raving maniac and I remember several occasions "when I had to administer injections of sedatives by force and "with the help of neighbours. She became finally absolutely "demented and violent and had to be admitted to a mental "hospital, where her condition improved after treatment with "shocks and Largactil. I remember that Mr. Sofaer did mention "several times that his wife used physical violence against him. "I can state that during the time of my observation Mrs. Sofaer "never appeared to me as a mentally sane person, at times, "however, she was a raving maniac and entirely irrational. As "far as I know Mr. Sofaer behaved well to his wife and did all "he could to help her."

Then there is a later report, dated January 9, 1958, which is quite short and in these terms: "Only today I was shown by "Dr. Wohlstein a copy of the petition. In addition to my last "letter I would like to state that I witnessed at several occasions "during my professional visits at the flat of Sofaer's, that Mrs. "Sofaer abused her husband in front of her children using the "vilest expressions. I consider all the other allegations of Mr. "Sofaer as likely to be true and I remember him as a soft and "always well behaving man. To judge, how far her character or "her mental deterioration can be made responsible for her "behaviour, I don't feel to be competent."

Dr. Bental's report regarding the wife's second period in the Blumenthal Hospital contains the following passages: he starts off by giving what he calls the interim history, which he says was obtained from the husband. The husband would not accept that in its entirety; he agreed that he did say that she dreamt of her late father and woke up in fear, but he said the information which followed—"She believed everybody was against her and that "people spoke and laughed about her"—was not obtained from him and must have been obtained from the patient herself. Dr. Bental says that after she left the hospital on the previous occasion "she still suffered from fear of death and although she "took good care of the house, she had no interests, did not go "out and never saw company in her home." He then refers to the birth of the child, which was on July 19, 1955, who was placed in an institution by a welfare worker and the patient did not see the child thereafter. He goes on to say, with regard to the patient, that she knew that her family were prepared to move to England, and she shouted in the irrational fear that they would force her to move to England without the child. She ate very little, occasionally refusing all food, slept very little, the last few nights not at all, and finally refused food entirely. "In "the hospital," he continued, "on admission patient appears "severely neglected. She states that she is very well and that "she came to the hospital only because God promised her that "she could see her youngest child here. Her conversation reveals "that she communicates constantly with God and she asks to see "her baby as God had promised her. She curses the nursing "staff, she shouts, runs to the male ward with the upper part "of her body bare. Patient is confused, at times she shows "pressure of speech and her talk is incoherent. She states that "the physician, together with neighbours and police, talked ill "about her. She asked one of the doctors, whether he was the "one who wanted to kill her and her baby. At times she is "negativistic, has to be fed, hides under her blankets and is out "of contact with her surroundings. She stubbornly refuses to "sign a form for emigration presented to her by her husband, "who needs to obtain her signature on it. She tears the paper "saying that in this house, where people want to poison her, she "is not going to sign anything. When her husband for a few "days is not permitted to visit the patient, she believes that he "has gone abroad and has deserted her. The patient is full of "paranoid ideas—'there is something in the air—a disaster is "'imminent, there was an earthquake because people wanted to "'kill her; she could not sign any papers because that would sign "'her death-warrant; if she were dead her husband and her "'daughter could live together as man and wife and that was "'why she could not sleep at night, in order to prevent this from "'happening.' She also stated that she had heard at night, "that she was the queen of Israel and Dr. Bental was the king "of Israel. Under treatment with Largactil the patient calmed "down, she is not neglecting herself any more, keeps herself and "her things clean and orderly, but her delusions persist and her "thought-processes are limited." Then again he states the treatment which she underwent in that hospital, which was similar to her treatment in her previous stay there.

In addition to this a questionnaire was submitted to Dr. Bental together with a supplementary one, consisting in all of 170 questions, inviting his opinion with regard to every one of the allegations in the petition, and the particulars thereof as to the wife's capacity to appreciate the nature and quality of her acts, and as to whether she would have known that her conduct was wrong. These answers, I think, may be summarised by saying that Dr. Bental thought that while in every case she knew what she was doing she did not know that what she was doing was wrong.

As to the wife's condition since her reception, Dr. Alan Munro, Physician Superintendent at Long Grove Hospital, said that there had been little change since January, 1958, though her condition had varied, she was suspicious and resentful, and held the belief that she was being persecuted, though she would not say by whom. There had been a number of violent outbursts. He expressed the opinion that the onset of her mental illness was about 1948, though he admitted that estimate was somewhat speculative. In coming to this conclusion he said he attached weight to the time when she expressed the belief that her husband was practising black magic on her as distinguished from her previous general belief in the efficacy of black magic. He considered that since that time she had suffered from disease of the mind and from defect of reason, though again he says this involved a considerable element of speculation. He accepted that she knew what she was doing, but thought it was more likely that in the majority of the incidents she did not know that what she was doing was wrong.

Dr. Denham, who became responsible for her in the hospital in April, 1958, expressed the opinion that she had been schizophrenic for at least 12 years, she had various delusions, he said, for example, that she was losing weight, whereas the contrary was the fact, that her body was diseased, that the food was unclean. He was satisfied that she had disease of the mind and a defect of reason, but he says he found it difficult to say from what date the defect started, though he thought it was probably 1948. He said her capacity to distinguish right from wrong had been severely distorted throughout the time that she had been under his care, certainly since the time she entered the hospital in Haifa in November, 1954, and quite likely, he said, before then. He also said that there was a possibility that from 1948 she did not appreciate that what she did was wrong. His reasons for saying that she could not distinguish right from wrong were (1) she suffered from delusions; and (2) that if she could so distinguish, one would look for some measure of restraint in her behaviour, that being a reasonable criterion of the capacity to distinguish, even in a mental patient.

Dr. Madgwick, psychiatrist, had her under his care from January, 1958, to April, 1958. He said on admission she had no idea that she had done wrong, and in his opinion she was not able to distinguish right from wrong. The reasons he gave for this opinion were (1) she is a schizophrenic; (2) that her mind is distorted to the extent that it was obvious that she could not so distinguish, this distortion being indicated by her delusions of persecution. From the medical history in Israel he thought that by 1954 the schizophrenia had become serious, and before that had been increasing in severity, and he thought it more than possible—but not certain—that at that time she did not know right from wrong.

Dr. Desmond Curran, the senior psychiatrist at St. George's Hospital, interviewed the wife on February 6, 1960, at Long Grove. He had been provided with the hospital records and also with the medical reports from Israel. He thought her, he said, reasonably co-operative, though apt to be evasive. She was well orientated and not mentally confused, and her memory was good. She expressed vague persecutionary ideas, she thought she might have been poisoned, and he said she was very apathetic. As to her husband's behaviour towards her, she said he had always been nice and she had no grounds for complaint. When asked how she behaved to him she replied, "I do not know."

Dr. Curran agreed with all the other doctors that she was suffering from paranoid schizophrenia, but he said that schizophrenics generally have an intellectual capacity of determining whether an act is something which you should or should not do, and that typically you do not get an impairment of consciousness, nor of intellectual capacity. He agreed that the evidence rather pointed to the onset of schizophrenia as dating from round about April, 1948, and that the schizophrenic illness was developing insidiously over the years. He could see no reason to think that she did not know, when she behaved as she did towards her husband, that she was behaving in a way that was unjustified, and that she ought not to have done it. It was, he said, an inquiry which was largely speculation. In his opinion the probability was that the second limb of the M'Naughten Rules did not apply here.

Certain parts of the evidence, it was urged on behalf of the husband, were quite inconsistent with an inability on the wife's part to distinguish right from wrong. The first of these was the fact that in August, 1954, after the husband had left her and gone to Haifa, she expressed regret for her past behaviour and promised to behave better in the future. Dr. Curran agreed that the only reasonable conclusion to draw from this was that she had the capacity to distinguish right from wrong. Dr. Munro, however, said that he attached little weight to this, saying that an expression of contrition merely indicated that her mental illness had taken a temporary turn for the better. Dr. Denham said that if the patient gives voice to an expression of regret it does follow that she then appreciates the difference between right and wrong, but this does not show any awareness of the impropriety of the act at the time when it took place. Dr. Madgwick said that it would amount merely to a general expression of regret, without reference to any specific acts, showing merely a vague awareness of deterioration in family relationship and an equally vague promise of reform. He then added this: "I do not think she was "able to appreciate what she was promising, as shown by the "fact that she did not keep her promise." I make no comment on that. With all respect to these views, I confess to finding a difficulty in ascribing an expression of regret to anything other than a realisation that there was something to regret, and, if language means anything, a promise of reform for the future connotes a realisation that what has been done in the past was wrong, and to assume that the expression of contrition is merely the reflection of the person's mind upon a temporary higher plane with respect to a former lower one is to indulge in speculation which I am neither inclined nor entitled to indulge.

In this connection, I would refer to a portion of the judgment of Hodson L.J. in the case of Palmer v. Palmer.[4] I need not read the headnote, but the circumstances attending were these: the commissioner at the trial dismissed the petition and in the course of his judgment said that he was satisfied that the husband did not realise what he was doing when he committed the acts of violence against his wife, and, further, that when he committed the acts, he did not think that they were wrong. In the course of his judgment Hodson L.J. said[5]: "The real point in this case "is whether, when he committed the acts, he (the husband) did "not know that they were wrong. That contention, which "succeeded before the commissioner, has been supported here, "and it is based, I think, entirely on the evidence of a very "experienced medical man, who is the medical superintendent "at the Knowle Hospital, where the husband has been for many "years. He was obviously familiar with the M'Naghten Rules, "and having been asked the question: 'Would he know that "'those acts were wrong,' he answered: 'No.' Upon that, Mr. "Horner was fully entitled to argue that there was evidence "before the court which would justify the court in saying that "the second branch of the M'Naghten Rules applied and, there-"fore, the husband had a good defence. The doctor, in answering "'No,' gave his reason for making that answer. The Lord Chief "Justice has already read the answer, which indicates that the "doctor was basing himself on the motive for the man acting in "the way in which he did, which was provided by the delusion "from which he suffered. The doctor reasoned from that, that "the husband did not know that the act was wrong. With all "respect to the doctor, I think that that reasoning is unsound. "One must, as Mr. Beldam put it, look at the matter as if the "wife had indeed been unfaithful, as the deluded man thought "she had, but the fact that that was the motive does not mean "that he did not know that what he was doing was wrong. In "fact, the contrary appears from the evidence, because, as was "pointed out in the cross-examination of the doctor, the relieving "officer had seen him in January of the same year, 1952, the "year he was certified, and he then expressed regret for the "assaults which he had committed upon his wife," and Hodson L.J. goes on to say, "which is, surely, the strongest possible "evidence that he knew that what he was doing was wrong. In "that state of the evidence, which was fairly recognised by the "doctor in cross-examination when Mr. Beldam put it to him, "I think that it is quite impossible to come to the conclusion "that this case is covered by either branch of the M'Naghten "Rules. Accordingly, the man being responsible for his acts, "and the cruelty being established against him, the wife is "entitled to a decree."

Another aspect of the wife's conduct which was inconsistent with an inability to distinguish right from wrong was her condemnation of the conduct of a relative who had been found to have been making illicit profits in the black market. This would seem to indicate a capacity to take an objective view of right and wrong, and this was the opinion of Dr. Curran. But here again Dr. Denham's view was that this merely showed that at times she evinced a better awareness than at others, and that her delusions would be centred in one field, so that anything outside that field might be appreciated in its proper perspective. Dr. Madgwick expressed much the same view. Another matter was her threats to commit suicide, to burn down the sreef, to stab the husband, none carried out but all made with a view to obtaining her own ends. Dr. Denham was not prepared to infer from that that she realised that what she threatened to do was wrong. There is also the evidence of Mrs. Soloman, the husband's sister, that the wife confided to her that she had been greatly troubled in her mind about the abortion which she had had performed in Bombay and she urged the witness not to have it done herself because it had troubled her so much.

It was suggested on behalf of the wife that Dr. Curran, having seen the patient on one occasion only and that for a comparatively short time, was not in a position to dispute the opinions of those who had had charge of her over some two years. If the question in issue was as to diagnosis or prognosis there would be considerable weight in this comment, but neither of these matters is in issue, both are common ground. The question is as to the state of mind of this wife years before she was admitted to Long Grove. I agree with the view of Dr. Curran that, on the material before the court, a determination would be nothing more than guesswork. No one is in a position to give a positive answer, and I unhesitatingly prefer the opinion of Dr. Curran that the probabilities lie in favour of the view that at the material times the wife did know that her conduct was morally unjustified.

There is one reservation which I think must be made, and that is in respect of her accusations against the husband of practising black magic towards her. Accepting that these accusations were prompted by delusional ideas, then I do not think that they can be held to amount to cruelty. But these accusations form but a small part of the whole and their exclusion does not affect the issue. Apart from this particular matter I do not think it is possible to say that at any given point of time her behaviour must be regarded as having ceased to stem from her abnormal personality (her vicious temper, selfishness and a determination to get her own way at whatever cost) and thereafter must be regarded merely as a manifestation of schizophrenia.

One other issue was raised on behalf of the wife, namely, condonation, though it is not pleaded. The evidence is that intercourse took place up to a date some two months prior to the wife entering the Blumenthal Hospital on November 16, 1954. Thereafter, there were no physical assaults apart from the throwing of a bottle at the husband. But condoned cruelty may be revived by acts which taken by themselves are insufficient to amount to legal cruelty, and, in my opinion, the conduct of the wife after her return from hospital was sufficient to revive the previous cruelty.

I find, therefore, that the wife has been guilty of cruelty and that she has not discharged the onus of proof that at the material time she did not know that her conduct was wrong. The husband is therefore entitled to a decree nisi.

* In re DONCASTER AND RETFORD CO-OPERATIVE SOCIETIES' AGREEMENT.

[1958 No. 18 (E. & W.).]

Restrictive Practice—Restriction—Whether contrary to public interest—Territorial and membership restrictions — Retail co-operative societies in contiguous areas—Boundary agreement delimiting trading areas of societies—Restriction on trading outside delimited area—Restriction on accepting members outside area—Avoidance of overlapping—Whether specific and substantial benefit—Whether benefits or advantages conferred on public by restrictions—Whether membership restriction registrable—Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956 (4 & 5 Eliz. 2, c. 68), ss. 6 (1) (b) (e), 21 (1) (b).

The Doncaster and Retford Co-operative Societies were two retail co-operative societies trading in contiguous areas. Each society maintained shops and provided regular delivery services for groceries in the towns, villages and rural districts which it regarded as falling within its trading area.

The societies sold goods at current market prices and divided their trading profits, after deductions for fixed interest on their loan and share capital, allocations for reserves, and contributions to charitable, educational and political objects, among their members in the form of a "dividend" proportionate to the amount of the members' respective purchases. The current rate of dividend paid by the Doncaster society was 1s. 3d., and by the Retford society 1s. 1d. Each society belonged to the "National Membership "Scheme," under which a member of one society buying goods from a different society received the same dividend on his purchases as that paid to members of the society from which he bought the goods.

Each society was required by its constitution to belong to the Co-operative Union, to abide by its rules, and to accept its decisions as confirmed by the Co-operative Congress. Under the rules of the Co-operative Union, any dispute between members, which could not be settled by agreement, had to be submitted to arbitration, and the award of the arbitrators had to be accepted as final and binding. The policy of the Co-operative Union was to avoid as far as possible territorial overlapping of services provided by individual societies.

By an agreement made in 1928, the two societies agreed not to trade in the areas outside their respective boundaries as delimited by the agreement, nor to accept members nor solicit customers outside their boundaries. In 1941, the agreement was varied by consent so as to alter the original boundaries. The agreement was terminable by reasonable notice.

The societies contended that the agreement compared specific and substantial benefits on the public under paragraph (b) of section 21 (1) of the Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956,[1] namely,

† DIPLOCK J., SIR STANFORD COOPER, MR. W. L. HEYWOOD, MR. W. WALLACE and MR. W. G. CAMPBELL.

[1] Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956, s. 6: "(1) . . . this Part of "this Act applies to any agreement "between two or more persons carrying on business within the United "Kingdom in the production or "supply of goods, . . . being an "agreement under which restrictions "are accepted by two or more parties "in respect of the following matters, the avoidance of overlapping of services and the invasion of each other's areas with competing shops, which would cause thereby a reduction in profits and dividends. Alternatively, they contended that the removal of the agreement would deprive the sparsely populated areas of the services they now enjoyed, and that it would deny members the benefit of conducting their purchasing organisation as they wished or as they reasonably wished:—

Held, (1) that, on the evidence, the possibility of overlapping of services or the establishment of competing shops was remote, and such slight overlapping as might occur; if the agreement were abrogated, would not have any appreciable effect upon the pattern of the trade of the two societies, the dividend paid by them or the services available to the generality of their members; and that, therefore, any benefit derived from the agreement could not be substantial (post, p. 1192).

(2) That the restriction on the acceptance of members outside the defined areas was not a registrable restriction within the Act of 1956, because, under the national membership scheme, a member of one society buying goods from the other society was entitled to the same dividend in respect of those purchases as if he were a member, and, therefore, the restriction did not affect the conditions on which or subject to which the goods were sold (post, p. 1194).

Accordingly, there would be a declaration that the restrictions, other than the restriction on the acceptance of members, were contrary to the public interest.

REFERENCE.

On December 5, 1958, the Registrar of Restrictive Trading Agreements, pursuant to section 20 (a) of the Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956, referred to the court an agreement subsisting between the Doncaster Co-operative Society Ltd. and the Retford Co-operative Society Ltd., numbered 2025 on the register of agreements.

The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment of the court: The respondents, the Doncaster Co-operative Society Ltd. and the Retford Co-operative Society Ltd., are retail co-operative societies registered under the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1893, which trade in contiguous areas. Each society has a departmental store in its eponymous town and branch shops in the surrounding urban districts and villages, each operates mobile shops and provides regular delivery services for milk, bakery products and groceries which extend to those rural districts, which it regards as falling within its trading area. The goods which each society sells are comparable in kind and quality, being in the main obtained from the same source, the Co-operative

S. 21: "(1) For the purposes of "any proceedings before the Court . . . Wholesale Society Ltd., of which each society is a member. Each carries on business in the way which is usual with co-operative societies. Membership, subject to a restriction which is referred to below, is in practice open to all persons who wish to purchase goods from the society, and who are prepared to take out at least one share of £1 in the capital of the society. They are admitted to membership on payment of 1s. and can subscribe the balance of the price of their share out of future "dividends." Goods are sold by the society at current market prices, and the balance of the trading profits, after payment of fixed interest at a low rate on share and loan capital, allocation for reserves, and contributions to charitable, educational and political objects, is divided half-yearly among the members in the form of a "dividend" proportionate to the amount of their respective purchases during the previous half-year. The current rate of dividend paid by the Doncaster society is 1s. 3d., and by the Retford society 1s. 1d.

The rules of each society require it to be a member of the Co-operative Union Ltd. As such it is bound to abide by the rules of the Union, to conform to its aims, and to accept the decisions of the central executive of the Union as confirmed by the Co-operative Congress. Rule 10 of the Co-operative Union rules includes the following provision: "Any disagreement that "may arise as to overlapping or any other matter which cannot "be settled in consultation between the parties shall, in failure "of conciliation, be submitted to persons appointed by the Co-"operative Union Limited as arbitrators and their decision shall "be final and binding on all parties."

Each of the societies is also a party to the "National Member-"ship Scheme," under which a member of one co-operative society purchasing goods from a co-operative society, of which he is not a member, is credited with a dividend at the rate paid to its own members by the society from whom the purchase is made. Thus, a member of the Retford society purchasing goods at a shop of the Doncaster society receives in due course the dividend on those purchases at the same rate as if he had been a member of the Doncaster society.

The Doncaster society has a membership of about 60,000, the Retford society of about 10,000. These figures indicate that at least one person in the majority of households in the area served by each society is a member of that society, but the figures of turnover suggest that the majority of households, in which there is a member, buy only a modest proportion of their requirements from the society, and obtain the remainder from private traders who compete with the co-operative societies. All but a trivial proportion of the sales of each society are to its own members.

Both Doncaster and Retford are natural shopping centres for the villages and country areas which surround them. Other co-operative societies centred on other towns operate similarly in the areas surrounding those served by the two societies The two societies' respective areas adjoin in a sparsely populated rural district lying between Bawtry in the north and Retford in the south, in which there are three fair-sized villages: Ranskill and Mattersey and Mattersey Thorpe.

In 1928, as a result of an unfounded rumour that the Doncaster society proposed to open a shop at Ranskill where the Retford society was already operating a delivery service, the two societies entered into an agreement delimiting the boundaries of their respective trading operations. By that agreement, dated September 14, 1928, the Doncaster society undertook that it would not at any time thereafter, without the previous consent in writing of the Retford society, (a) accept any members residing at any point to the south of the agreed line; (b) canvass or solicit any customers or deal in or supply any goods to the south of the agreed line; or (c) open any shop south of or within half a mile to the north of the agreed line. The Retford society entered into corresponding covenants with respect to the area north of and within half a mile to the south of the agreed line. The agreement was not expressed to be for any fixed period and can be terminated by either party at any time upon reasonable notice, which, it is conceded, would be six or perhaps twelve months.

In 1941, mainly for technical reasons connected with food rationing, the original line of demarcation was varied by agreement so as to transfer to the Retford area the villages of Mattersey Thorpe and Mattersey, in the former of which the Retford society opened a shop with the consent of the Doncaster society, although this was within half a mile of the amended line of demarcation. In the same year, again with the consent of the Doncaster society, the Retford society opened a shop at Ranskill within a quarter-mile to the south of the agreed line. The Doncaster society's consent was given on terms that it should have a similar right to open a shop in the future at a point within one-quarter mile to the north of the demarcation line.

The societies sought to justify the restrictions under paragraph (b) of section 21 (1) of the Act of 1956.

DONCASTER AND RETFORD CO-OPERATIVE SOCIETIES' AGREEMENT, In re.

October 31. DIPLOCK J. read the following judgment of the court, which stated the facts as set out above, and continued: The restrictions contained in the agreement of September 14, 1928, as amended in 1941 (which we will call "the boundary "agreement"), have been referred by the registrar to this court under section 20 of the Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956. These are the only restrictions with which the court has to deal upon this reference. We emphasise this fact, because it became apparent at an early stage in the hearing that the evidence proposed to be adduced by the societies was directed to a much wider question, namely, whether the general policy adopted by retail co-operative societies in relation to territorial overlapping services provided by such societies was a desirable policy, and, in particular, whether it was contrary to the Act of 1956.

The general policy adopted by retail co-operative societies, which are members of the Co-operative Union, as both the Doncaster and Retford societies are required to be by their constitution, is determined by the Co-operative Congress. For over 60 years this policy has been to avoid so far as possible territorial overlapping of services provided by individual co-operative societies, and this policy has been and still is frequently enforced in disputes between members by means of the conciliation and arbitration procedure provided for in rule 10 of the Co-operative Union. Whether the provisions for the enforcement of this policy constitute an agreement to which Part I of the Act of 1956 applies is a matter which quite properly has not been argued before us, and upon which we express no view. What is clear, however, is that the passing of the Act of 1956 of itself has no effect upon the validity of the policy or its enforcement through the conciliation and arbitral procedure of the Co-operative Union. That question could arise only when the relevant provisions had been registered (if, indeed, they are registrable at all), and had been referred by the registrar to the court, and had been the subject of a declaration by the court.

Nevertheless, the existence of this general policy and the procedure for its enforcement is a relevant factor in the present case. There may be differing views among co-operatives as to whether the general policy of avoiding overlapping between the services provided by neighbouring retail co-operative societies is best secured by a written boundary agreement such as that which is before the court, or by tacit understandings, which are common between neighbouring societies as to the territory in which they are respectively entitled to trade and to deliver goods. There may, indeed, be particular cases where overlapping may be thought to be desirable, or a lesser evil than rigid boundaries by individual societies, or by the Co-operative Union itself; but as respects societies such as Doncaster and Retford, where the boundary line of the trading areas is a sparsely inhabited rural district, we see no prospect that the general policy of the Co-operative Union in favour of avoiding overlapping of services provided by individual retail societies will change in the foreseeable future. If the boundary agreement ceased to exist, substantially the same result would be achieved as respects the trading operations of the two societies, so long as they remained members of the Co-operative Union by the application and enforcement of the Union's general policy on overlapping, even if there were any economic or other inducement to either society to venture into the area in which the other has heretofore habitually traded.

The societies concede that the territorial restrictions contained in the boundary agreement on the opening of shops and the delivery of goods are restrictions within section 6 (1) (e) of the Act of 1956 in respect of the areas or places in which goods are to be supplied. Even if considered to be harmless, they are, nevertheless, therefore, deemed to be contrary to the public interest, unless the societies can satisfy the court that one or other of the circumstances set out in paragraphs (a) to (g) of section 21 (1) of the Act of 1956 exists. The societies rely upon paragraph (b), and contend that the removal of these restrictions would deny to the public, as purchasers of the goods sold by the societies, specific and substantial benefits or advantages enjoyed or likely to be enjoyed by them as such by virtue of the restrictions. We will assume in the societies' favour that they are entitled, as they contend, to select as the relevant goods for the purpose of this paragraph the goods sold by them. As the great proportion of these goods are sold to their own members, they further contend that it is sufficient for them to show that the removal of the territorial restrictions contained in the boundary agreement would deny to the members of the two societies as purchasers of such goods specific and substantial benefits or advantages, since the members of the two societies constitute nearly all the public who are purchasers of the goods sold by the societies. We will again assume in the societies' favour, without, however, deciding it, that this argument is sound.

As originally pleaded, the societies' case appeared to be that the removal of the territorial restrictions would result in the invasion of each society's area by the other society in the form of the establishment of competing shops and overlapping of sales and delivery services, that these would be uneconomic, that the trading profits of each society would be reduced, that the dividends paid to members in respect of their purchases would fall, and that the "real price" of the goods (viz., the retail price paid less the dividend returned) would, accordingly, be greater and that the members as purchasers would be denied the substantial and specific advantage of the lower "real prices" which they at present pay.

This case was not made out by the evidence. Independently of the general policy of the Co-operative Union, any suggestion that in the absence of a boundary agreement the Retford society would establish shops in the area now served by the Doncaster society, or that the Doncaster society would establish shops in the area now served by the Retford society seems to us in existing circumstances to be quite unrealistic. Furthermore, if, in the future, the circumstances were to change and either society were disposed to act so foolishly, the boundary agreement, which is terminable by either party on reasonable notice, could only deter them from doing so for such period, say, six months or a year, as would be necessary to bring the agreement to an end. In the absence of the boundary agreement there would exist, no doubt, the possibility of some overlapping of delivery services in the fringe areas, but the sparse population in these areas renders these services among the least profitable of those undertaken by the societies and makes it, in our view, highly unlikely that either society would desire to extend or would make anything more than very minor adjustments in its present delivery area at their common boundary. Such slight overlapping as might occur could have but a minimal effect upon the trading expenses of the society and, consequently, upon the amount of the dividend paid to the members in general on their purchases. Even, therefore, if the two societies were not members of the Co-operative Union and thus compelled, quite apart from the boundary agreement, to refer any disputes as to overlapping to arbitration under rule 10 of the Co-operative Union's rules, we do not think that the abrogation of the boundary agreement would have any appreciable effect upon the pattern of the trade of the two societies, the "dividend" paid by either of them, or the services available to the generality of their members. A fortiori is this the case so long as the two societies remain (as we have no doubt they will) members of the Co-operative Union, and that Union continues to adopt, and to enforce through its conciliation and arbitral procedure, its long-established policy of avoiding so far as possible overlapping in the services provided by individual retail co-operative societies.

By an amendment, the societies put forward an alternative contention that, in the absence of the territorial restrictions contained in the boundary agreement, the societies would be unlikely to continue to provide in the sparsely populated area in the vicinity of the boundary line the services by way of village shops, mobile shops, and delivery services, which they now provide for members who reside in that sparsely populated area, since those services are relatively unprofitable and tend to reduce the dividend payable to members in general. The evidence wholly fails to satisfy us that the abrogation of the boundary agreement would have any such effect on the services provided by these societies in the area in question; but even if it did, the only persons who would be denied any benefits or advantages by the withdrawal of such services would be but a very small proportion of the total membership of the two societies—a proportion far too small to be regarded as the "public" as purchasers of the goods sold by the two societies. Indeed, if there were any factual basis for the contention, which we do not think there is, it would follow that the majority of members of the two societies were being denied the benefit or advantage of a larger "dividend" by reason of the existence of the territorial restrictions.

Finally, as a tabula in naufragio, it was argued on behalf of the societies, although not pleaded, that even if they have failed to establish any likelihood that if the boundary agreement were abrogated there would, in fact, be any appreciable overlapping or any reduction in the services provided in the vicinity of the boundary line, nevertheless the members would, by the abrogation of the boundary agreement, be denied the benefits or advantages (1) of conducting their purchasing organisation (a) as they wish to, or (b) as they reasonably wish to, and (2) of avoiding the risk, even though it be a slight one, of overlapping, and the consequential increase in the real price of the goods purchased by members of the societies.

As regards the first alleged benefit or advantage, it does not seem to us that the right of the two societies to enter into a boundary agreement containing territorial restrictions upon the areas in which they supply goods is one which is enjoyed by the members of the societies as "purchasers" of the goods which the societies sell; but even if it were, the right to enter into an agreement which, in our view, has no appreciable effect upon the pattern of trading of the two societies, or upon the "real "price" of the goods they sell, if such can be a benefit or advantage at all, is not a substantial benefit.

As regards the second alleged benefit or advantage, it is sufficient to say that the benefit or advantage of being able to take unnecessary steps to avoid what is, so far as the foreseeable future is concerned, a non-existent risk cannot be substantial. Furthermore, if circumstances were to change, and the risk were to become a real one, the boundary agreement, which is terminable upon reasonable notice by either party, would not prevent overlapping.

It follows that the societies have failed to satisfy us that the removal of the territorial restrictions contained in the boundary agreement on the opening of shops and the delivery of goods would deny to the public as purchasers, consumers, or users of any goods, any specific and substantial benefits or advantages enjoyed or likely to be enjoyed by them as such, whether by virtue of the restrictions themselves or of any arrangements or operations resulting therefrom. Consequently, the restrictions must be deemed to be contrary to the public interest. The question whether their existence involves any detriment to the public or anyone else does not arise, and we express no view about it.

There remains to be considered the restrictions upon the societies accepting members to the south and north of the boundary line respectively.

1960
DONCASTER AND RETFORD CO-OPERATIVE SOCIETIES' AGREEMENT, In re.

It does not seem to us that these restrictions fall within section 6 (1) of the Act of 1956 at all. There is nothing in the boundary agreement which prevents members of one society purchasing goods from the other society, and, as both societies are members of the National Membership Scheme, a member of one society purchasing goods from the other society receives the same "dividend" in respect of those purchases as if he were a member of the society from which he purchased the goods. The only disadvantages which he suffers are that he has no voice in the management or right to invest in the share capital of the society of which he is not a member, but this has nothing to do with the terms or conditions on or subject to which the goods are to be supplied. This particular restriction is not, in our view, registrable under Part I of the Act of 1956 and we make no declaration with respect to it.

Declaration accordingly.

* PRACTICE DIRECTION (REVIEW OF TAXATION).

Costs—Taxation—Application to review—Chancery Division—Supreme Court Costs Rules, 1959 (S.I. 1959, No. 1958, Sch. 2), s. 35.

The following directions have been given by the judges of the Chancery Division:

1. An application in the Chancery Division for review of taxation of costs shall be heard by one of the judges taking the non-witness list.

2. The application shall be made by ordinary summons in the proceedings in which the taxation has been ordered, and shall identify the item or items of the bill and the amount allowed in respect of which the application for review is made and shall be served on the parties affected.

3. The summons shall be issued in the chambers of the judge and will be returnable before the appropriate Chancery master in the first instance.

4. After the issue of the summons the party applying shall forthwith give notice thereof to the appropriate taxing master, and on receipt of such notice the taxing master shall cause to be lodged in chambers the bill of costs and the objections and answers made and given by the parties respectively on the review of the taxation of the bill of costs by the taxing master.

5. Each party shall, within four days after service of the summons, lodge with the master all documents produced in evidence by that party at the hearing before the taxing master relating to the item or items or the amount or amounts under review.

6. When the summons is heard by the master, he will ensure that the application is in order and that all the relevant documents have been lodged, and will then adjourn the summons to the judge in chambers for directions. If the judge thinks fit to exercise the power conferred upon him by section 98 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, to appoint assessors, a day shall be fixed by him for the hearing of the summons. If not, the summons shall take its ordinary place in the non-witness list.

7. If the judge decides to appoint assessors, the party applying shall within seven days of the judge's directions being given, lodge with the master two or more copies, as the case may be, of the summons, objections and answers mentioned in paragraph 4 for the use of the assessors, and the master shall forthwith advise the assessor or assessors who have been nominated to serve.

8. The party applying shall give notice to the parties affected of the date for the hearing forthwith after this has been fixed by the judge.

9. When each of the assessors has signified his acceptance of his appointment, the master shall send to each of them the notice of his appointment and the date fixed for the hearing of the summons, and a copy of the documents mentioned in paragraph 7.

*PRACTICE DIRECTION (POWERS OF MASTERS).

Oct. 26.

Practice—Chancery Division—Master—Powers—Amendment of R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 15.

The following is published by permission of the judges of the Chancery Division for the information of the profession and supersedes their memorandum on this subject dated March 30, 1955.[1]

Under rule 15 of R.S.C., Ord. 55, which came into force in 1955 by virtue of Statutory Instrument 1954, No. 1728 (L.25), the masters of the Chancery Division have all the powers of a judge in chambers except such as the judges of the Division may direct, or as are prescribed by rule to be dealt with by a judge in person.

PRACTICE DIRECTION (POWERS OF MASTERS).

The judges of the Division do not propose at present to give any directions under that rule limiting the powers thereby conferred upon masters but issue the following memorandum for their guidance in exercising their powers.

1. Before the present rule came into force the masters were, by virtue of the former rules 15, 15A and 35A of Order 55, unable to make the following orders:
   (a) for service out of the jurisdiction;
   (b) for appointment of a new trustee (except a judicial trustee);
   (c) vesting property or appointing a person to convey land or to make or join in making a transfer of stock or a share in a ship;
   (d) for general administration (except in a creditor's action where there was evidence of insolvency) or for execution of a trust;
   (e) for accounts and inquiries concerning the property of a deceased person;
   (f) to bind persons on whom service of a notice of judgment or order for accounts and inquiries had been dispensed with.
2. In cases falling within paragraph 1, the masters should not make orders:
   (a) for service out of the jurisdiction except in clear cases;
   (b) for the appointment of a trustee or trustees except
      (i) a judicial trustee;
      (ii) in the case of incapacity;
      (iii) where all the former trustees are dead;
      (iv) where there is no power to appoint additional trustees except in the court (e.g., where a trust corporation is a trustee) and such trustees are required;
      (v) by approving the appointment of new trustees in an administration action; or
      (vi) where the fund is small, i.e., not substantially in excess of £500;
   (c) vesting property or directing or authorising some person to assign or convey except
      (i) consequent upon an appointment of new trustees, whether in or out of court;
      (ii) where the transaction giving rise to the application has been previously approved or directed by a judge;
      (iii) where the master has ordered a sale of property or specific performance of a contract; or
      (iv) where a corporation has been dissolved and its property has vested in the Crown and a successor to or purchaser from the corporation is entitled and the Crown does not claim the property as bona vacantia;

(d) for the administration of an estate or execution of trusts in a beneficiary's action;

(e) for inquiries relating the next-of-kin of a deceased person, including special inquiries for particular persons and their issue, except in clear cases.

3. The power of the masters as deputies for the judge in chambers to make orders in matters other than those falling within paragraph 1 has long been limited by well-settled practice. That practice is, except as hereinafter mentioned, to be maintained. For example, a master should not sanction any compromise, arrangement or transaction.

4. Masters may make summary orders for specific performance under Order 14A by consent or if the following conditions are satisfied:

(i) the agreement sued upon is a formal written contract; and

(ii) the defendant is in default of appearance or does not appear at the hearing or there is clearly no defence.

5. Before the adoption of the present rule 2 of Order 55 it was necessary in certain cases for applications for payment or transfer of funds out of court to be made by petition. Other applications might be made by summons and on such applications masters might in proper cases make the appropriate order, regardless of the amount of the fund and nothing in this memorandum shall be taken to restrict their former powers. In cases where a petition would have been necessary under the previous rules, masters may make orders where the value of the fund, or the share or part thereof the subject of the application, does not significantly exceed £2,000 at the date of the issue of the summons.

6. In future, masters may make orders giving general liberty to wards of court to go out of the jurisdiction on condition that on each occasion

(i) the written consent of all persons concerned, or their solicitors, is obtained; and

(ii) the order provides that proper undertakings for the ward's return shall be lodged with the master.

7. Cases involving difficulties or complications should be referred by the master to the judge, as heretofore, and before exercising his extended powers a master should consider in every case whether it is one in which it would be more appropriate that the judge should make the order.

Chief Master,
Chancery Division.

Contract—Illegality—Landlord and tenant—Agreement—User requiring planning permission—Undertaking by tenant during negotiations for letting to apply for permission—Planning permission refused—Whether agreement to let before permission obtained void for illegality—Town and Country Planning Act, 1947 (10 & 11 Geo. 6, c. 51), ss. 12 (1), 23 (1), 24 (3).

In March, 1959, the plaintiff, the lessor of leasehold premises, agreed with the defendant to let to her a ground floor room at £10 a week for the purposes of a club. Both parties knew that such user was a "development" within section 12 of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947,[1] for which planning permission was required, and during the negotiations for the letting the defendant undertook to apply for such permission to the local planning authority. The defendant entered into possession, made certain alterations, and opened the premises as a club in April, 1959. She applied for planning permission, which was refused, and that refusal was upheld by the Minister on appeal.

The defendant paid the agreed rent for 16 weeks until July and remained in possession of the premises until October, but refused to pay rent from July to October. On the plaintiff's claim for £140 for rent from July to October, the county court judge gave judgment in his favour. On appeal by the defendant:—

Held, dismissing the appeal, that the agreement between the parties, which involved a user of land, for which development permission was required under the Act of 1947 and had not previously been obtained, was not in the circumstances an illegal contract, and, accordingly, the plaintiff was entitled to rent. The letting by the plaintiff of the premises for use as a club, on the understanding that planning permission would be applied for by the defendant, was a letting for a legal purpose.

Dictum of Lord Goddard C.J. in Attorney-General v. Smith [1958] 2 Q.B. 173, 180–181; [1958] 3 W.L.R. 81; [1958] 2 All E.R. 557 considered.

APPEAL from Judge Andrew, sitting at Marylebone County Court.

The plaintiff, John Henry Benjamin Best, was the lessor of the dwelling-house, 64, West End Lane, Hampstead. He was approached early in 1959 by one Thomas on behalf of the defendant, Mrs. Eileen Glenville, with a view to arranging for a letting of a room on the ground floor for the purpose of a bridge club. It was hoped that intoxicating liquors could be supplied at appropriate times.

Some negotiation went on between Thomas and the plaintiff and at least one conversation took place between the plaintiff and Thomas and the defendant; and it was arranged that the room should be let to the defendant for the sum of £10 a week for the purpose of a bridge club.

On March 25, 1959, the defendant attended at the plaintiff's office and produced a draft underlease, which had been drafted by her solicitors, and produced it for the plaintiff's approval. The lease was one for a period of 10 years from May 4, 1959, at a rent of £10 per week inclusive or rates, and by paragraph 2 (2) the lessee covenanted with the lessor "To use the demised "premises for the purposes of a club for which purposes the "premises are let."

The plaintiff was unable at that time to approve or sign the lease because it was necessary for him to obtain the permission of his head lessor for the premises to be let for this particular purpose. He wrote to the head lessor for that permission, which was eventually refused, but the plaintiff was allowed to let the premises to the defendant for the purpose of a club, on the understanding that if the head lessor objected to the way in which the premises were being used he would give some reasonable notice to the plaintiff that the matter must be brought to an end.

On March 23, 1959, the defendant went into possession of the premises. She paid the sum of £40, either as the first month's rent in advance or as a deposit. She did a certain amount of alteration, and the room was opened as a club on April 13.

Both the plaintiff and the defendant knew during the negotiations that the use of these premises as a club was a development of the property within the meaning of section 12 of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, and that accordingly the consent of the local planning authority was required. The evidence of the plaintiff and of Thomas, which was accepted by the county court judge, was that the matter was discussed during the negotiations, and certainly at the final meeting, and that it was understood that the defendant would apply for the necessary planning permission and also comply with any necessary formalities under the Licensing Acts.

The defendant applied for planning permission which was refused; and her appeal to the Minister from that refusal was dismissed after an inquiry and a report to the Minister.

The defendant, who had paid the rent for a period of 16 weeks until July 3, thereupon refused to pay any further rent, although she remained in possession until October.

The plaintiff brought proceedings in the county court claiming the sum of £140 in respect of rent for the period from July to October.

On February 11, 1960, the county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiff on his claim, holding that a letting of premises for a use contrary to, and for which permission had not been obtained or granted as required by, the provisions of the Act of 1947 did not render the letting of the premises illegal. The defendant appealed.

S. N. Bernstein for the defendant.
Leolin Price for the plaintiff.

The following case, in addition to that referred to in the judgment, was cited in argument: Edler v. Auerbach.[2]

ORMEROD L.J. stated the facts set out above, said that Mr. Bernstein for the defendant had relied to some extent on the clause in the draft lease which was before the court and by which the lessee covenanted "to use the demised premises for the "purposes of a club for which purposes the premises are let," and said that after the appeal against the refusal of planning permission the local authority could at any time have served on the defendant an enforcement order, and that if she did not comply with that enforcement notice she would have been liable to a penalty under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947. His Lordship continued:

The contention of Mr. Bernstein on this appeal is that the plaintiff is not entitled to the rent of these premises for the period from July until October because the agreement by the plaintiff to let these premises to the defendant was an illegal contract and therefore a contract which could not be enforced in the courts.

It is necessary to refer to the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, and the first section to be considered is section 12 (1) which provides: "Subject to the provisions of this section and to "the following provisions of this Act, permission shall be required

[2] [1950] 1 K.B. 359; 65 T.L.R. 645; [1949] 2 All E.R. 692.

"under this Part of this Act in respect of any development of "land which is carried out after the appointed day."

There is no doubt—it is not in dispute between the parties—that this particular user of these premises was a development which was carried out after the appointed day, and that therefore section 12 (1) applied.

Section 23 (1) provides: "If it appears to the local planning "authority that any development of land has been carried out "after the appointed day without the grant of permission required "in that behalf under this Part of this Act, or that any condi-"tions subject to which such permission was granted in respect "of any development have not been complied with, then, "subject to any directions given by the Minister, the local "planning authority may within four years of such development "being carried out, if they consider it expedient so to do having "regard to the provisions of the development plan and to any "other material considerations, serve on the owner and occupier "of the land a notice under this section."

In other words, an enforcement notice could be served by the local authority on the person they considered to be contravening the regulations and using the premises for purposes other than that permitted under the Act; but discretion was in the local authority to do it if they considered it to be expedient, and it is to be noted that if an enforcement notice is not served within four years then apparently the enforcement notice cannot be served at all and the user of the land can continue even though it is a development and therefore a contravention of section 12 (1).

Section 24 (3) provides: "Where, by virtue of an enforcement "notice, any use of land is required to be discontinued, or any "conditions are required to be complied with in respect of any "use of land or in respect of the carrying out of any operations "thereon, then if any person, without the grant of permission "in that behalf under this Part of this Act, uses the land or "causes or permits the land to be used, or carries out or causes "or permits to be carried out those operations, in contravention "of the notice, he shall be guilty of an offence and liable on "summary conviction to a fine not exceeding £50," and so on.

Thus the scheme of the Act appears to be that the local authority may, in a proper case, serve an enforcement notice if in the view of the local authority there has been a development and therefore a contravention of the Act; and if that enforcement notice is not complied with by the occupier of the land then he will be liable to a penalty. But unless an enforcement notice has been served there is no liability for a penalty.

Mr. Bernstein says that when the agreement for this letting was negotiated—and, of course, it was never more than a letting, because the lease was never signed—both parties knew perfectly well that the premises were to be used for the purpose of a club. Further than that, both parties realised at the time when the negotiations were taking place that this user as a club would be a development within section 12 (1), and therefore something which required planning permission. Mr. Bernstein then argues that the premises were let to the defendant so that they could be used immediately as a club, and in those circumstances what was contemplated by the parties at the time when this agreement was made was an illegal user of the premises; therefore the contract was illegal in itself and cannot be enforced in a court of law. That, I think, puts fairly the argument which Mr. Bernstein has addressed to us with very considerable persuasiveness.

He has cited, as authority for his proposition, a passage from the judgment of Lord Goddard C.J. in Attorney-General v. Smith,[1] which was a case concerning land used for the purpose of a caravan site. It was agreed that the use of land for the purpose of caravan sites was a development within the meaning of the Act, and the question was whether and at what time the penalty was incurred. Lord Goddard C.J., after stating what the question was, said[2]: "The machinery of the Act is this. Section 12 (1) "provides that 'Subject to the provisions of this section and to "'the following provisions of this Act, permission shall be "'required under this Part of this Act in respect of any develop-"'ment of land which is carried out after the appointed day.' "The sense of that section is obvious: it is that development of "land carried out without permission is unlawful—it is contrary "to the Act. But is does not follow, because it is contrary to "the Act, that a penalty is incurred at once."

What Mr. Bernstein is saying, in effect, is that Lord Goddard is holding that a contravention of the Act is illegal in the sense that it is unlawful because it is contrary to the Act, and in those circumstances a contract based on such a contravention must be unenforceable. I cannot accept that contention. The facts here, as found by the county court judge, are that the plaintiff let these premises to the defendant, admittedly so that they could be used as a club and admittedly knowing that planning permission was required. The judge found on both the evidence of the plaintiff and of the defendant's own witness, Thomas, that she knew about obtaining planning permission and intended to see to it herself. It was also found by the judge that the proper inference to draw from the evidence of the plaintiff was that he would not have let the premises had he known they were going to be used without planning permission.

In those circumstances I find it very hard to see what there is illegal in the contract so far as the plaintiff is concerned. He let the premises for a perfectly proper purpose, that is, for their use as a club, which is something he was entitled to do. There was no duty on him to obtain planning permission. It was unnecessary, in the circumstances, for him to say, as it was suggested he should have said: "These premises are let only on "the understanding that if they are for the use of a club there "must be planning permission," because that was something which had already come to the knowledge of the defendant, and was something which she was prepared to deal with by applying for planning permission. In those circumstances why should this be an illegal agreement? If neither party took the trouble to take any steps to obtain planning permission, or if each party knew that no steps were to be taken, it might well be the case, if proved, that there was something unlawful in this agreement. But that is not this case and I can see no reason why the plaintiff should be held to have entered into an illegal agreement.

Lord Goddard, in Attorney-General v. Smith,[3] is not saying in terms, as I read his judgment, that development of land carried out without permission is illegal in the sense that any agreement relating to that land which has that development in view would be illegal. He is saying it is unlawful because it is contrary to the Act. Mr. Bernstein has, quite rightly, pointed out that the fact that no penalty may be inflicted is not necessarily the criterion as to whether a contract is illegal or legal; but it seems to me he is reading too much into the passage which he has cited from Lord Goddard's judgment.

Be that as it may, I am quite satisfied that this contract was entered into by the plaintiff for a perfectly proper and perfectly legal purpose. Further, I think it appears clear from the evidence that it was the intention of the parties that that purpose should be carried out in a legal way and in accordance with the terms of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947. The fact that permission was not granted—which was something which apparently was not in the contemplation of the parties at the time of the negotiations—makes no difference to the question whether the agreement was a legal one or not.

WILLMER L.J. I have reached the same conclusion, and for the same reasons.

UPJOHN L.J. I agree. I also desire to add this. Mr. Bernstein's argument I think necessarily involves the view that an agreement between two parties which involves a user of land for which development permission is required is necessarily illegal if such permission is not previously obtained. I am quite unable to accept so broad a proposition.

I agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed, with costs.

* DREWERY AND DREWERY v. WARE-LANE.

Agency — Estate agent — Commission — "Prospective purchaser" — Meaning—Contract by vendor to pay commission if and when prospective purchaser signs estate agents' purchaser's agreement and vendor signs vendor's agreement—Agreements signed by prospective purchaser and vendor—Prospective purchaser unable to purchase without mortgage—Termination of negotiations for sale by vendor—Whether estate agents entitled to commission.

On January 3, 1959, a firm of estate agents, who had been instructed by the owner of a leasehold house to sell the property, informed him of an offer by one S. to purchase the property. He agreed to accept the offer and thereupon read and signed two documents on printed forms prepared by the estate agents.

The first document, described as the "letter of authority," provided by clause 4: "I agree to pay you commission at the rate "laid down by the various professional institutes . . . if and when "(a) a prospective purchaser signs your 'purchaser's agreement' "and (b) I sign your 'vendor's agreement' . . ."

The second document signed by the owner was the estate agents' "vendor's agreement." On the same day S. signed their "pur-"chaser's agreement."

S., who was unable to purchase without a mortgage, delayed applying for a mortgage pending the outcome of negotiations to acquire the freehold of the premises. On January 12, 1959, the owner informed the agents that as no progress had been made with the sale to S. he had disposed of the property to another person.

On the estate agents' claim for their commission under the contract:—

Held, that on the true construction of clause 4 of the letter of authority, which constituted the contract between the parties, the commission was payable, since conditions (a) and (b) had been fulfilled and the contract was in clear and unequivocal terms. A "prospective purchaser," as distinct from a purchaser, did not necessarily connote a person "ready," "willing" and financially "able" to purchase, but was a person who had the question of purchase in bona fide prospect and was prepared to make an offer, though he might never advance to the stage of becoming a purchaser. As on the evidence S. was a "prospective purchaser" the commission became payable on the signing of the relevant agreements.

Dicta in Luxor (Eastbourne) Ltd. v. Cooper [1941] A.C. 108; 57 T.L.R. 213; [1941] 1 All E.R. 33, H.L. considered.

APPEAL from Judge Wingate Saul sitting at Dartford County Court.

The defendant, Dennis Arthur Ware-Lane, was in 1958 the owner of a leasehold house, 81, Ridgeway West, Sidcup. There were still seventy-eight years of the lease to run and there was a ground rent on the premises of £6 10s. per annum. In December 1958 the owner decided to sell the house and gave instructions, on December 10, to the plaintiffs, Drewery and Drewery, a firm of estate agents. The price which he told them to ask for the premises was £2,250.

The estate agents got into communication with one Sinho who at some time between December 10 and 21 offered £2,100 for the premises. The offer was communicated to the owner, who refused to accept it.

Further negotiations took place between the estate agents and Sinho, with the result that a further offer was made and on January 3, 1959, a meeting took place at the offices of the estate agents, when one Lowman, the manager of the firm's Sidcup office, had a conversation with the owner. Lowman, as the county court judge found, told the owner that Sinho was prepared to pay £2,160 for the premises and the owner indicated that he was willing to accept that offer. In consequence, two documents were signed then and there by the owner in the office of the estate agents. The first document was called a letter of authority which the court found constituted the contract between the estate agents and the owner with regard to the sale of the house. In addition, the owner signed a document called the vendor's agreement whereby he agreed to sell the house to Sinho at the price of £2,160, subject to contract. In addition, on the same day there was signed by Sinho a purchaser's agreement whereby he agreed to purchase the premises for the sum of £2,160, again subject to contract.

The letter of authority signed by the owner and addressed to the estate agents, was a printed form, headed: "Re 81, Ridge-"way West, Sidcup, Kent." The first paragraph read: "I "instruct and authorise you to offer the above property for sale "at the price of £2,250." The second and third paragraphs in the printed document were crossed out, and the fourth was as follows: "I agree to pay you commission at the rate laid down "by the various professional institutes, viz., 5 per cent. on the "first £500; 2½ per cent. on the next £4,500, and 1½ per cent. "on the remainder of the purchase price if and when (a) a "prospective purchaser signs your 'purchaser's agreement' and "(b) I sign your 'vendor's agreement' (receipt of a copy of a "form of each of the above agreements is hereby acknowledged)."

The agreements having been signed on January 3, 1959, some discussion arose between the parties about the purchase of the freehold of the premises. The owner was at that time under the impression that it could be purchased for £170. The purchaser understood that the owner of the freehold was asking for a larger sum. The purchaser was not able to complete the purchase unless he had a mortgage on the premises, and he held up the question of applying for a mortgage until he had been able to buy the freehold or had ended the negotiations in connection with his attempt to buy the freehold.

On January 12, nine days after the vendor's and purchaser's agreements had been signed, the owner wrote to the estate agents, telling them that as no further progress had been made with the sale of the property to Sinho, and as no further instructions had been received from Sinho's solicitors, he felt that it was in his own interest to make other arrangements, and he had accordingly disposed of the property to another person. Sinho was willing to go on with the purchase and would have gone on with it had the matter not been put an end to on January 12 by the letter from the owner. A short time later Sinho bought another house for a sum rather more than that which he was prepared to pay for the leasehold house.

The estate agents brought an action in the county court claiming their commission. By their particulars of claim they stated that they had found a purchaser Sinho who was ready, willing and able to purchase the house for £2,160, subject to contract and that by the agreement in writing, namely, the letter of authority, the owner had agreed that, they having received the offer from Sinho, they were entitled to commission as agreed, but that the owner, in breach of the agreement, had notified them on January 12 that he had accepted another offer.

By his defence the owner denied inter alia that Sinho was at the material time ready, willing or able to purchase the house for any sum.

The county court judge, on January 25, 1960, gave judgment for the estate agents for the sum claimed, £66 10s. In his judgment he said: "It is to be noted that in clause 4 (a) the "word 'purchaser' is qualified by the epithet 'prospective.' It "seems to me that a 'prospective purchaser' is essentially "different from a purchaser. [He] is one who has purchase "in prospect or contemplation and he may never advance to the "stage of becoming a purchaser. . . . I conclude that the "plaintiffs have succeeded in devising a form of contract which "enables them to avoid the pitfalls created by the cases to "which I have referred and entitles them to their commission "in the events which have happened. If a person is astute "enough to find a loophole in the law, he is entitled to profit by "his own or his legal advisers' ingenuity; but I feel that persons "who in the future are contemplating employing the plaintiffs "to sell their property for them would be well advised to take "legal advice before signing documents which the plaintiffs put "before them."

The owner appealed.

ORMEROD L.J. stated the facts set out above and said that the case turned on the construction of the letter of authority which constituted the agreement between the estate agents and the owner with regard to the sale of this house. His Lordship continued:

The effect of that agreement is that the vendor contracts to pay to the plaintiffs the estate agents' commission based on the purchase price at the rates which are set out in that letter, if two things happen: first, if a prospective purchaser signs the plaintiffs' purchaser's agreement, that is to say, the purchaser's agreement which has been drawn up in a form settled by the plaintiffs, and, secondly, if the vendor signs the plaintiffs' vendor's agreement—and that, it was submitted in this case by the plaintiffs, is exactly what had happened. The vendor had signed the vendor's agreement, and the prospective purchaser, on the same day, had signed a purchaser's agreement in the form prescribed by the plaintiffs, the agreement which was referred to in each case in the letter of authority, and in those circumstances the commission at the prescribed rate was payable on the sum of £2,160, which was the purchase price set out in the two agreements. [His Lordship stated the facts as to negotiations for the purchase of the freehold by Sinho, and the circumstances in which the owner broke off negotiations and continued:]

The estate agents have contended, and they still contend, that in those circumstances the commission became payable: the conditions laid down in the letter of authority had been complied with and the owner was liable to pay the sum of £66 10s. to the estate agents for commission.

The matter came before the county court judge, and I think there is little in the evidence which is controversial which requires me to deal at any length with it. But the facts were quite plain, I think, that Sinho wished to purchase this property and offered the sum of £2,160 for it, and he was willing to go on with the purchase and would have gone on with it had the matter not been put an end to on January 12 by the letter from the owner.

The short issue in the case is this: The estate agents, on the one hand, say that the conditions in the letter of authority have been complied with and that as soon as the two agreements were signed by the vendor and the prospective purchaser respectively the commission became payable, and there is no reason why the commission should not be paid. The owner, on the other hand, says that that cannot be right, that that cannot be the proper construction of the letter of authority because there was nothing to satisfy the court that Sinho was, in fact, a prospective purchaser in the sense that he was a man who was ready, able and willing to complete the contract if, in fact, a contract was entered into, and, therefore, the whole of this case depends on the construction of the relevant paragraph of the letter of authority.

We are not helped very much in this case by the previous decisions on estate agents' agreements. The county court judge came to the conclusion, having given the matter very careful consideration, and having considered the authorities which were cited to him, that this was a case where, in clear and unequivocal terms, it was laid down in the contract that commission was payable when events had happened which, in fact, did happen in this case, and that, in those circumstances, he could do no other than give judgment for the estate agents.

C. A.

Ormerod L.J.

The passage, of course, which the county court judge no doubt had clearly in mind, and which has been cited to us in this case, is from the speech of Lord Russell of Killowen, in Luxor (Eastbourne) Ltd. v. Cooper[1]: "It is possible that an owner may be "willing to bind himself to pay a commission for the mere "introduction of one who offers to purchase at the specified or "minimum price; but such a construction of the contract would "in my opinion require clear and unequivocal language." The submission of Mr. Boreham really comes to this, that in this case the language is not clear and unequivocal, that it is capable of more than one construction, and, in those circumstances, cannot be regarded as an agreement which entitles the estate agents to their commission before an actual purchase has taken place. Mr. Boreham bases his argument on the fact that the words in the condition in paragraph 4 (a) of the letter of authority are that "a prospective purchaser signs your 'purchaser's agree-"'ment'"; and he submits that "prospective purchaser" must mean something more than that a person "signs your 'pur-"'chaser's agreement'"; it must mean, as submitted by Mr. Boreham, a man who is ready to purchase, who is willing to purchase, subject to contract, and who has the necessary financial means to carry the purchase into effect.

As far as I know, there is no authority on what is meant by "a prospective purchaser." Had the word "prospective" not been put in there it might very well be that, in view of the authorities, the estate agents might have been in some difficulty. But it appears to me that the word "prospective" does not connote necessarily either the term "ready" or "willing" or "able"; it means a man who has the question of buying this property in prospect or in contemplation and is prepared to make an offer with regard to it. This, of course, does, I think, mean that it must be a bona fide prospect and that, in the ordinary way, it would be accepted that such an offer, made in those circumstances, would be bona fide, and it would be for the defendant to prove, if he sought to set it up, that the offer was not a bona fide offer.

I think that the county court judge put the matter clearly in his judgment when he said: "Returning to the letter of authority, "it is to be noted that in clause 4 (a) the word 'purchaser' is "qualified by the epithet 'prospective.' In Dennis Reed Ltd. v.

"Goody,[2] it was held that the word 'purchaser,' when used "without any qualifying adjective, connotes one who completes "the purchase, but Hodson J. said[3] 'the word may be qualified "'by other words used in connection with it.' It seems to me "that a 'prospective purchaser' is essentially different from 'a "'purchaser.' A 'prospective purchaser' is one who has pur-"chase in prospect or contemplation, and he may never advance "to the stage of becoming a purchaser." That, I think, sets out clearly the position of a prospective purchaser.

In this case the evidence is not disputed that Sinho made an offer to purchase this property for £2,160; he signed an agreement to purchase for that sum, subject to contract; he stated in evidence that he was prepared to go on and would have gone on had the owner not put an end to negotiations by his letter of January 12, and, indeed, he showed that he wished to be a purchaser of a house because the evidence is that a very short time later he bought another house for a sum rather more than the sum that he was prepared to pay for this house. It seems to me, in those circumstances, and having regard to that evidence, that it would be extremely difficult to describe this man as anything other than a prospective purchaser and, if in fact he is a prospective purchaser, I find it difficult to see how any different construction can be put on this paragraph of the letter of authority. The evidence was that the defendant, before he signed the letter of authority, read it, that he read also the vendor's agreement, and he knew, therefore, that he was agreeing to sell the property for £2,160, subject to contract. The evidence of Lowman was that the owner also saw and read the agreement which was later in the day signed by the purchaser. That was not accepted by the county court judge, but it is clear that he had the opportunity of reading it had he so wished to do.

The question in this case is a short one; it is purely a question of construction of clause 4 of the letter of authority and, as I see it, the clause does not admit of anything other than that if two things happen—that is, if the vendor signs the vendor's agreement as put forward to him by the estate agents, and if a prospective purchaser signs their purchaser's agreement—the commission is payable. That, I think, happened in this case, and, in those circumstances, it appears to me that the appeal must be dismissed.

It may very well be that it is undesirable that agreements of this kind should be signed by prospective vendors, and it may be wise for a prospective vendor to examine with very great care an agreement which he signs in these circumstances. That is not a matter for this court. We have to consider the agreement which

Capital or Income — Administration or trust — Debentures — Scheme of arrangement—Statement by company that principal secured and interest accrued should be satisfied by payment of cash and securities —Whether binding as between tenant for life and remainderman— Whether payment apportionable.

By his will, a testator, who died on December 28, 1907, empowered his trustees to allow any part of his estate to remain in its then state of investment. At the date of his death the testator's estate included £11,400 first mortgage debentures of a company.

In 1933 the court approved a scheme of arrangement entered into between the company and the holders of its first mortgage debentures whereby the half-yearly instalments of interest on the debentures falling for payment during the period January 1, 1933, to a prescribed date not earlier than December 31, 1933, nor later than December 31, 1935, were to be paid only to the extent thereby provided and all instalments of interest, if not paid at the due date, were to carry interest at 6 per cent. per annum from that date until the date of payment, and interest on interest was to be payable and should be secured in the same way as the interest. By a series of further schemes of arrangement the period of postponement of interest was extended to December 31, 1955. By another scheme of arrangement, "the 1955 scheme," entered into in that month and approved by the court on February 21, 1956, it was provided that against delivery of the debentures, including all unpaid interest coupons, the company should procure the allotment and payment to the holders by a company formed in Canada for the purpose of taking over the assets of the company, of U.S.$100 of the 6 per cent. debenture stock of the Canadian company, U.S.$70 5 per cent. convertible debenture stock of that company and £40 sterling in respect of each £100 of the debentures held by them. It was further provided by clause 5 that on the scheme becoming operative all the obligations of the company in respect of interest accrued on the debentures and interest accrued on the interest secured and not paid on the due dates should be cancelled and thereafter cease to accrue, and that the principal secured by the debentures should be satisfied by the allotments and payments by the Canadian company.

From time to time the testator's trustees sold part of his holding, and immediately before the 1955 scheme came into operation only £4,300 of the debentures remained unsold. Pursuant to the order approving the 1955 scheme, £1,720 cash, U.S.$4,300 6 per cent. debenture stock and U.S.$3,010 5 per cent. convertible debenture stock of the Canadian company were paid to the trustee of the will, the stock together totalling an amount equivalent to £2,580, the total amount paid thus amounting to £4,300, and the £1,720 cash bearing approximately the same proportion to £4,300 as the interest and interest on interest bore to the principal, namely, 40 per cent. The amounts due to the trustee at this date were £4,300 in respect of principal, £1,526 less tax for unpaid instalments and £1,733 less tax for interest accrued on interest.

On a summons by the trustee to determine whether the whole of the cash and securities received by him should be treated as capital, or whether some, and if so what, part should be treated as income:—

Held that, although binding as between the company and its debenture holders, clause 5 of the 1955 scheme, which was obviously inserted with tax considerations in mind and would operate unfairly as between tenant for life and remainderman, did not exclude the general equitable principle of apportionment between income and capital and that that principle was not precluded by the omission of a proviso in the scheme that the nature of the payments was not to be conclusive where the debenture holder was a trustee; and that, therefore, a fraction of the cash and securities bearing the same proportion to the whole as the amount of the arrears of interest on the debentures and of the unpaid interest on interest not paid on the due date bore to the total sum must be treated as income and the rest as capital.

Adjourned summons.

By his will the testator, Robert Morris, who died on December 28, 1907, conferred on his trustees "power to allow any part "of my said estate to remain in its then state of investment." At the date of his death his estate included £11,400 first mortgage debentures of the Peruvian Corporation Ltd. ("the company"), a company incorporated in this country. In 1932 the company, which had been for many years in financial difficulties, put forward a scheme of arrangement between itself and the holders of its first mortgage debentures which scheme was approved by the court on February 24, 1933. The scheme provided that the half-yearly instalments of interest on the debentures falling for payment between January 1, 1933, and a date not earlier than

1960

MORRIS'S WILL TRUSTS, In re.

December 31, 1933, nor later than December 31, 1935, to be prescribed by the committee thereby constituted, should be paid only to the extent thereby provided, and that all instalments of interest, if not paid on the due date, should carry interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from that date until the date of payment. Such interest on interest was to be paid with and upon and subject to the same terms and conditions and to stand secured in the same manner as the instalment of interest in respect of which it was payable, and was to be treated as forming part of the instalment for all purposes.

The company subsequently put forward seven further schemes of arrangement between itself and the holders of its debentures, each of which was approved by orders of the court. Each of those schemes extended the period of postponement of interest provided for by the 1933 scheme, and the last, dated December 17, 1952, extended the period to December 31, 1955. On June 30, 1955, the sums owing on the security of the debentures were: for principal, £3,946,900; for interest, £1,361,681; and for interest on interest, £1,434,965.

In December, 1955, the company put forward a final scheme of arrangement between itself, the holders of its first mortgage debentures, the holders of its preference stock and the holders of its ordinary stock ("the 1955 scheme"). The 1955 scheme provided, inter alia, by clause 6 (b) that against delivery of the debentures, including all unpaid interest coupons, the company should procure the allotment and payment to the holders thereof by the Peruvian Transport Corporation Ltd., which had been formed in Canada for the purpose in effect of taking over the assets of the company ("the Canadian company"), of (a) U.S. $100 of the 6 per cent. debenture stock of the Canadian Company, (b) U.S.$70 5 per cent. convertible debenture stock of the Canadian company, and (c) £40 sterling in respect of each £100 of the debentures held by them respectively.

It was further provided by clause 5 that upon the scheme becoming operative (i) all the obligations of the company in respect of interest accrued on the debentures and interest accrued on the interest thereby secured and not paid on the due dates should be cancelled and that such interest should cease to accrue thereafter; and (ii) that the principal moneys secured by the debentures should be satisfied by the allotments and payments by the Canadian company.

The 1955 scheme was approved by an order of the court under section 206 of the Companies Act, 1948, made on February 21, 1956.

The testator's trustees had retained the debentures under the power in the will, but parts of the holding had been sold from time to time and immediately before the 1955 scheme came into operation only £4,300 of the debentures remained unsold. Pursuant to the order of the court approving the 1955 scheme, £1,720 cash,

U.S.$4,300 6 per cent. debenture stock and U.S.$3,010 5 per cent. convertible stock of the Canadian company were paid to the Public Trustee, then the sole trustee of the will. There was in fact then due to the trustee £4,300 in respect of principal, £1,526 10s. less tax in respect of unpaid instalments of interest for the period April 1, 1950, to March 1, 1956, and £1,733 0s. 8d. less tax, in respect of interest accrued on interest not paid on the due date. It appeared from an explanatory statement in connection with the 1955 scheme, circulated by the company under section 207 of the Companies Act, 1948, that the aggregate value of the two holdings of debenture stock in the Canadian company allotted to the trustee was equivalent to approximately £2,580. If the £1,720 cash received by the trustee were added to this sum, the total of £4,300 was the same as the nominal amount of the debentures held by the trustee. Further, the sum of £1,720 bore approximately the same proportion to the total sum of £4,300 as the interest and interest on interest due under the debentures bore to the principal sum then due, namely, approximately 40 per cent.

The trustee took out a summons to determine (1) whether the whole of the cash and securities received by him under the 1955 scheme in respect of the £4,300 first mortgage debentures should be treated as capital, or (2) whether some part should be treated as income, and if so, whether such part should be (i) a fraction bearing the same proportion to the whole as the amount of the arrears of interest on the debentures when the scheme was approved bore to the total sum of principal, interest and interest on interest then secured, or (ii) a fraction bearing the same proportion to the whole as the amount of such arrears of interest on the debentures and of the unpaid interest on such interest not paid on the due date bore to the said total sum, or (iii) a fraction bearing the same proportion to the whole as the amount of such arrears of interest bore to the aggregate sum of principal and interest (but not interest on interest) then secured, or (iv) a fraction bearing the same proportion to the whole as the amount of such arrears of interest and the unpaid interest on such interest not paid on the due date bore to the aggregate sum of principal and interest (but not interest on interest) then secured.

It was common ground between the parties that no provision in the will threw any light on the question.

CROSS J. read the following judgment which stated the facts as set out above and continued: Where trust funds are properly invested on a mortgage and the interest falls into arrear, if the security realises less than the principal and arrears of interest, the proceeds are normally divisible between income and capital in shares bearing the same proportion to each other as the arrears of interest and the principal. (See In re Atkinson.[1])

Where the mortgage makes no provision for payment of interest on arrears of interest, those interested in income cannot claim against those interested in capital to have the sum payable to them increased by allowing any interest on interest in the calculations. (See In re Moore.[2])

But in this case the 1933 scheme provided that interest on interest should be payable and should be secured in the same manner as the interest in respect of which it became payable. If, therefore, the 1955 scheme had simply provided that the debenture stock and cash to be received from the Canadian company should be accepted in full satisfaction of everything owing by the company under its debentures in respect either of principal or interest or interest on interest, there would, I think, have been no doubt that the debenture stock and cash received by the Public Trustee would have been apportioned between capital and income in the proportions which the sum owing to him for principal bore to the sums due to him for interest and interest on interest.

The 1955 scheme, however, expressly provided that all the obligations of the English company in respect of arrears of interest and of interest on interest should be cancelled, and that the debenture stock and cash provided by the Canadian company should be accepted in satisfaction of the principal owing under the debentures.

The reason for the insertion of this provision was no doubt a wish to avoid payment of income tax on any part of what was to be provided by the Canadian company; but the question which I have to decide is whether this express term of the scheme precludes the application of the general principle of apportionment between income and capital established by In re Atkinson.[3]

It was suggested in argument that some help in the solution of this question could be derived from the cases dealing with capital profits distributed by limited companies. In such cases the company often states in a circular letter to the shareholders that the payment which they are to receive is a distribution of capital (see, e.g., In re Bates[4]), and sometimes a provision to that effect is contained in the articles (see, e.g., In re Harrison's Will Trusts[5]), but it is now well settled that the court will pay no attention to such statements when considering whether the payment is income or capital under the relevant trust instrument. Counsel for those interested in income in this case suggested that in the same way I ought to pay no attention to the provisions in clause 5 of the 1955 scheme. But I think that counsel for those interested in capital was right in saying that there is really no analogy between the two cases.

The reason why the court takes no notice of statements made by the company as to the nature of the payment to be received from it by the shareholders is that a limited company which is not in liquidation has no power to make any payment to its shareholders by way of return of capital otherwise than by way of a reduction of capital sanctioned by the court. Any other payment, even though made out of capital profits and not liable to income tax, must necessarily be a dividend. No statement by the company or provision in the articles can alter the legal position. (See Hill v. Permanent Trustee Company of New South Wales.[6]) But there is nothing to prevent a mortgagee agreeing to accept a sum paid by the mortgagor, at all events if it does not exceed the amount owing in respect of principal, in discharge of the principal and to treat the arrears of interest as cancelled.

Clause 5 of the 1955 scheme is undoubtedly binding as between the company and its debenture holders. The question is whether, being so binding, it excludes the application of the principle in In re Atkinson[7] between the beneficiaries under trust instruments where the debenture holders are trustees.

Before leaving the capital profits cases, I would observe that it has been suggested in some of them that the court may have jurisdiction to apportion some part of the dividend to capital in cases where the trustees in question have committed a breach of trust. (See In re Rudd.[8]) If, for example, the trust shareholding is large enough to control the situation, it could be argued that it was the duty of the trustees, in order to hold an even hand between capital and income, to see to it that the company, instead of distributing the whole of the capital profit by way of dividend, capitalised part of it and issued bonus shares which would be capital under the settlement. If they failed in their duty, the court, it might be said, should put the matter right.

Here, however, there can be no case for exercising any jurisdiction founded on breach of trust. The trust holding was far too small to have influenced the voting at the meetings of debenture holders which approved the scheme by the requisite majorities. The most that the Public Trustee could have done would have been to have asked the judge who approved the scheme for some modification of its terms in the interests of his income beneficiaries, and no argument based on his failure to take this course has been developed before me.

In those circumstances, counsel for those interested in capital submitted that the express terms of the scheme govern the position and exclude any apportionment. In support of this submission he referred me to In re Pennington.[9] The estate of the testator, who died on July 13, 1910, included debentures in several companies which were secured by trust deeds, of which the Law Guarantee Trust and Accident Society Ltd. were trustees, and the society had guaranteed payment of both capital and interest by the mortgagor companies. The trust deeds, all of which were in the same form, contained in clause 7 a power to the society to sell and convert the mortgaged property on the security becoming enforceable, and provided by clause 12 [10] "that "the society were to hold the moneys to arise from any sale or "conversion under the primary trust for conversion upon trust, "in the first place, to pay or retain all moneys owing to them "for remuneration, premiums, and other expenses therein men-"tioned, and to apply the residue first in or towards payment "to the debenture holders pari passu in proportion to the amounts "due to them respectively, and without any preference or priority "whatever of all arrears of interest remaining unpaid on the "debentures; secondly in or towards payment to the debenture "holders in like manner of all principal money due on the "debentures, whether the same should or should not then be "payable according to the tenour of the debentures; and, thirdly, "to pay the surplus, if any, to the company."

All the companies made default in payment of principal and all but one made default in payment of interest. On December 14, 1909, an order was made for the winding up of the society under the supervision of the court, and on July 28, 1910, a scheme of arrangement in the winding up of the society was made under section 120 of the Companies Act, 1908 (which was the predecessor of section 206 of the 1948 Act), which was sanctioned by the court.

The effect of the scheme, so far as it affected the rights of the debenture holders against the society, was substantially (1) to postpone payment of principal until December 31, 1918; (2) to postpone payment of the full contractual interest until the same date and even then to place it behind the payment of principal; but (3) to provide meanwhile for the payment, or where the companies concerned had paid some interest, for the making up of interest at 3 per cent. on the principal moneys secured by the debentures, credit being given for any interest so paid when the full contractual interest became payable.

The trustees of the testator's will received various payments from time to time from the liquidator of the society, partly out of the proceeds of sale of properties belonging to the various companies which were charged by the debentures and which the liquidators had sold as trustees for the debenture holders, and partly out of the assets of the society in respect of the 3 per cent. interest payable under the scheme down to December 31, 1918.

The trustees of the testator's will took out a summons asking how these various sums should be dealt with as between income and capital. At the date when the case came before the court, it was expected that the amount which would eventually be received, whether from the proceeds of the sale of the securities or by way of dividend in the liquidation of the society, would be insufficient to pay in full the total of the principal and interest secured by the debentures. Joyce J.[11] held that, in those circumstances, all the moneys received after the date of default by the company concerned, whether from proceeds of sale of the property charged or out of the assets of the society, ought to be apportioned under the principle laid down in In re Atkinson,[12] but the Court of Appeal[13] held that while the proceeds of sale of the properties charged were apportionable between income and capital, the 3 per cent. interim interest payable under the scheme was payable to the tenant for life. The argument, so far as concerned the proceeds of sale of the properties charged, turned on the effect of clause 12 of the debenture trust deeds under which such proceeds were stated to be applicable in the first place towards payment of interest. This provision was obviously inserted in the interests of the mortgagees. If on a partial realisation of a security the moneys received are not applied in discharge of arrears of interest before anything goes towards the reduction of principal, the mortgagor gains by having part of an interest-bearing debt extinguished while a debt not bearing interest remains unpaid. But such a clause ceases to have any real meaning when the mortgagor is insolvent and the proceeds of the whole security prove insufficient to discharge both principal and arrears of interest. Then it does not matter to the mortgagee how the money available is dealt with, and it would be unreasonable to hold that such a clause forced the mortgagee to apply the proceeds in payment of arrears of interest before anything went in reduction of principal even though that might lead to the payment of more tax than would otherwise be payable.

It is not, therefore, surprising that the Court of Appeal upheld the decision of Joyce J. that such a clause could not affect the rights of the mortgagees or the respective rights of the tenant for life and remaindermen under settlements made by the mortgagees when there was a deficiency. The same view of such a clause had already been taken by the court in Smith v. Law Guarantee and Trust Society Limited,[14] to which I shall refer later.

But why did the Court of Appeal, having decided that the proceeds of sale of the securities were divisible between capital and income under the principles of In re Atkinson[15] notwithstanding clause 12 of the trust deeds, go on to hold that the sums paid by the society by way of interest under the scheme sanctioned by the court were not so divisible, but went exclusively to the tenant for life? Counsel for those interested in capital in this case submitted that it was because the court treated the wording of the scheme as conclusive not only between mortgagor and mortgagee, but between those claiming under the mortgagees, and as necessarily excluding the application of the principle generally applicable between capital and income in a case of deficiency. There are certainly some expressions in the judgment of Cozens-Hardy M.R.[16] which lend colour to this view, but taking the judgment as a whole, I think that the court treated the case as a very special one and did not intend to lay down any rule applicable to all schemes sanctioned by the court as such.

It will be remembered that the scheme in In re Pennington[17] postponed the time for final realisation of the securities and distribution of the society's assets for a number of years after default had been made, and further provided that when distributed, they would be applied first in payment of capital. Capital would, therefore, gain if the delay in realisation enabled better prices to be obtained or intermediate profits to be accumulated, and so it was only fair that some intermediate interest should be payable to compensate income for the delay. Swinfen Eady L.J. pointed out[18] that the terms of this complicated scheme were themselves fair as between capital and income, and that, therefore, there was no reason for depriving the life tenants of some part of the interest payable under it by applying the rule in In re Atkinson.[19]

In the scheme before me, on the other hand, the provision cancelling all arrears of interest would, if conclusive, operate most unfairly as between capital and income. It was obviously inserted with tax considerations in mind and without any thought of the position as between tenant for life and the remaindermen under settlements made by debenture holders. In those circumstances, I see no reason why I should hold that the terms of this scheme exclude the rule in In re Atkinson,[19] and I find support for this conclusion in the decision of the Court of Appeal in Smith v. Law Guarantee and Trust Society Ltd.,[20] which I have already mentioned.

There a debenture trust deed executed by a company contained a clause to the same effect as clause 12 of the trust deeds in the Pennington case,[21] namely, that the trustees should apply the proceeds of realisation of the securities first towards payment of arrears of interest and afterwards towards payment of principal. The company having made default and a debenture holders' action having been brought, it appeared when the order on further consideration was made that the securities would prove insufficient to pay principal and arrears of interest in full. Thereafter, various orders were made from time to time directing payments to the debenture holders on account generally of what was due for principal and interest. When the time came for the proceeds of the final realisation to be paid over, the Crown claimed, in reliance on the clause in the trust deed, that all the payments made ought to be attributed to interest, in the first place, and that the tax payable on that footing should be paid. The Court of Appeal, after holding that the clause in question did not apply after it had become clear that there was not enough to pay both principal and interest, directed that as it was clearly for the benefit of the debenture holders for tax reasons that the payments made on account generally should be appropriated to capital, they should be so appropriated; but as the court had had its attention directed to the possibility that some debenture holders might be trustees, the order expressly stated that it was without prejudice to the question whether the payment or any parts thereof ought in the hands of the recipients to be treated as principal or interest.

If an order of the court directing that payments to be made to debenture holders are to be appropriated to capital need not be conclusive as between tenant for life and remaindermen where the debenture holder is a trustee, there can be no reason why a scheme sanctioned by the court under section 206, which contains a similar provision, should necessarily exclude the rule in In re Atkinson.[22] It is true that the scheme in this case does not contain any proviso such as that which appeared in the order of the court in the Law Guarantee case,[23] but I have no doubt that the court would have inserted such a provision on the authority of that case if its attention had been called to the point, and I am not prepared to hold that the omission of such a proviso precludes the application of a well-established rule of equity which will do justice between the parties.

Counsel for those interested in capital submitted that if I went behind the 1955 scheme by applying the rule in In re Atkinson,[24] I ought also to neglect the provisions of the 1933 scheme securing payment of interest upon interest and that the apportionment ought to be on the basis that arrears of interest on interest are left out of account; but I am not striking anything out of the 1955 scheme, I am simply holding that clause 5, while binding as between mortgagor and mortgagee, does not affect the position as between tenant for life and remaindermen. I think, therefore, that the apportionment must be made having regard to the provisions of the 1933 scheme as to interest on interest.

I will, therefore, make a declaration in the terms of paragraph 2 (ii) of the originating summons. I would add that this decision is entirely without prejudice to the question whether or not tax will be payable on the part of the sum received by the Public Trustee which is attributable to income. The Crown is not a party to this summons and I have heard no argument on this aspect of the matter.

Declaration accordingly.

Landlord and Tenant—Business premises (security of tenure)—Notice of opposition to new tenancy—Form—Application for new tenancy on terms proposed by tenants—Failure of landlord to state in his notice of opposition whether or not he objected to proposed new terms—No agreement in writing as to terms of new tenancy—Landlord appearing with evidence as to valuation at hearing—Duty of court to determine on evidence reasonability of new terms as to duration and rent—Whether parties' documents on application for new tenancy to be treated as pleadings—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954 (2 & 3 Eliz. 2, c. 56), ss. 29 (1), 33, 34.

The tenants of business premises let on a weekly tenancy at £1 a week applied under the provisions of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954,[1] for a new tenancy, setting out in their originating summons

[1] Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954, s. 29: "(1) Subject to the provisions "of this Act, on an application . . . "for a new tenancy the court shall "make an order for the grant of a "tenancy comprising such property, "at such rent and on such other "terms, as are hereinafter provided."

S. 33: "Where on an application "under this Part of this Act the "court makes an order for the grant "of a new tenancy, the new tenancy "shall be such tenancy as may be "agreed between the landlord and "the tenant, or, in default of such an "agreement, shall be such a tenancy "as may be determined by the court "to be reasonable in all the circum-"stances, being, if it is a tenancy for "a term of years certain, a tenancy their proposed terms, namely, a 10-year tenancy at £52 a year. The landlord put in an answer on the lines of Form 336, as prescribed by Order 40, rule 8 (2) of the County Court Rules, 1936, as amended, stating that he opposed the grant of a new tenancy because of the tenants' persistent delay in paying the rent; but he left blank paragraph (2) of Form 336, which gives to a landlord the alternative of objecting or not objecting to the applicant's proposed terms for a new tenancy.

When the application came on for hearing in the county court the landlord had available evidence as to valuation in order to oppose the terms proposed by the tenants; but the county court judge declined to allow that evidence to be called, holding that he was bound by what he described as the "pleadings" as they stood, and that he had no discretion to consider terms other than those proposed by the tenants. No leave to amend the answer was sought on behalf of the landlord; and the judge granted a new tenancy on the terms proposed by the tenants. On the landlord's appeal against that part of the decision, he was given leave to amend his answer to comply with the rules by stating that he objected to the proposed terms:—

Held, that the judge was wrong in holding that he was bound to grant the new tenancy on the terms proposed by the tenants, for in the absence of an agreement in writing as to the new tenancy between landlord and tenant, it was the duty of the judge, under sections 29 (1), 33 and 34 of the Act of 1954 to decide, in the exercise of his judicial discretion, whether the terms proposed were reasonable in all the circumstances. That discretion could only be exercised on proper evidence as to valuation, and must be so exercised even in the absence of a party: a fortiori where the landlord was present and desirous of adducing such evidence. No agreement such as was required by the Act could be inferred merely from the landlord's failure to state whether or not he objected to the proposed terms; nor were the documents of the parties prepared pursuant to the Act of 1954 correctly described as pleadings by which the parties and the court were thereafter bound. The matter should be remitted to the county court in order that the judge might determine on evidence the terms on which the new tenancy should be granted.

APPEAL from Judge Trevor Morgan, sitting at Ammanford County Court.

In 1959, the landlord of business premises at Castle Garage, Ammanford, gave notice under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954, to determine the tenancy of land which was let to tenants, David Rees Morgan and Thomas Lewis Morgan, on a weekly tenancy at a rent of £1. The tenants thereupon applied for a new tenancy in accordance with the Act, the terms proposed by them and set out in their originating summons being for a 10-year tenancy at a rent of £52 a year.

"for a term not exceeding fourteen "years, and shall begin on the com- "ing to an end of the current "tenancy."

S. 34: "The rent payable under a "tenancy granted by order of the "court under this Part of this Act "shall be such as may be agreed be- "tween the landlord and the tenant "or as, in default of such agree- "ment, may be determined by the "court to be that at which, having "regard to the terms of the tenancy "(other than those relating to rent), "the holding might reasonably be "expected to be let in the open "market by a willing lessor. . . ."

MORGAN
v.
JONES.

The landlord put in an answer on the lines of the form prescribed by Order 40, rule 8 (2) of the County Court Rules, 1936, as amended—Form 336. He stated that he opposed the grant of a new tenancy in view of the tenants' persistent delay in paying rent. He did not incorporate in his answer anything under paragraph (2) of Form 336, which is in the following terms: If a new tenancy is granted "I do not object to its being granted on "the terms proposed by the applicant or I object to its being "granted on the following terms proposed by the applicant, "namely:—"

When the application came before the county court judge on January 22, 1960, the landlord had available in court, evidence as to valuation which he desired to call in order to oppose the terms proposed by the tenants. Counsel for the tenants submitted that on the "pleadings" as they stood the only matter to be decided by the court was whether or not a new tenancy should be granted, in view of the alleged persistent delay of the tenants in paying the rent, that if the landlord failed to establish that ground of objection, a new tenancy must be granted on the terms set out in the tenants' originating application, and that no question as to valuation arose or could arise. No application was made on behalf of the landlord to amend his answer to object to the proposed terms.

The county court judge thereupon ruled that the landlord was bound by his answer and could not be permitted to call evidence as to the reasonability of the proposed terms, and that, accordingly, if a new tenancy were granted it must be on the terms proposed by the tenants. In his judgment on February 5, 1960, the judge considered the question whether a new tenancy should be granted, and decided that the tenants were entitled to a new tenancy on their proposed terms—10 years at £52 a year. He concluded his judgment as follows: "It therefore follows that the "applicants are entitled to the grant of a new tenancy, and as "the only terms proposed on the pleadings are those contained "in the applicants' originating application I am bound to grant "them a new tenancy on those terms. I think it right to add, "however, that if I had a discretion I doubt if I should have "granted it for so long a term without the option of a break or "at so low a figure for the rent."

The landlord appealed on the ground that the judge had misdirected himself in law in holding that because the landlord had not in his answer specifically opposed the terms of the proposed new tenancy he could not be allowed to call evidence either as to the duration or as to the rent. During the hearing of the appeal an application to amend the answer was granted.

David Sullivan (who did not appear in the county court) for the landlord.

Breuan Rees for the tenants.

ORMEROD L.J. I will ask Upjohn L.J. to deliver the first judgment.

UPJOHN L.J. stated the facts set out above and continued: The matter came before the county court judge on January 22, 1960, when Mr. Breuan Rees, for the applicants, took the point that, on the pleadings as they stood, the only matter to be decided was whether or not a new tenancy should be granted.

The judge dealt with the matter at the beginning of his judgment in this way: "Mr. Breuan Rees took the point that on the "formal pleadings as they stood when the case came on for "hearing, the only matter to be decided was whether or not a "new tenancy ought to be granted in view of the alleged "persistent delay in paying the rent, and that if the respondents "failed to establish that ground then a new tenancy must be "granted on the terms set out in the application and that no "question of valuation arose.

"In answer to this point Mr. Devonald James argued that "even though it had not been specifically stated in the reply that "the landlords opposed the terms of the proposed new tenancy, "they were still entitled to call evidence at the proper time to "establish that the proposed terms were not fair or reasonable, and "that the tenancy was worth far more than the applicants "proposed. He argued that as it had been pleaded that the "landlords opposed any grant of a new tenancy such opposition "implied a right to oppose and question the terms proposed by "the applicants. No application was made for leave to amend "the landlords' answer. I ruled that the case must proceed "on the pleadings as they stood, and that although evidence as to "valuation was available it could not be called. It followed "that apart from any submission on the construction of section 23 "the only point for argument and decision was the question of the "alleged persistent delay in the payment of rent."

The judge then went on to deal with the question of whether or not a new tenancy should be granted. He came to the conclusion that a new tenancy should be granted, and there is no appeal from that part of his decision. Nor is this court concerned with section 23.

He concluded his judgment in these terms: "It therefore "follows that the applicants are entitled to the grant of a new "tenancy and as the only terms proposed on the pleadings are "those contained in the applicants' original application, I am "bound to grant the applicants a new tenancy on the terms "which are set out in their application. I think it right to add, "however, that if I had a discretion in the matter I doubt if I "should have granted it for so long a term without the option of "a break or at so low a figure for the rent."

The judge therefore came to the conclusion that the pleadings, as he called them, being in the state they were, he had no right to try the question whether or not the terms proposed by the applicants were or were not reasonable. The question as to whether he was right in that must depend, of course, on the terms of the Act giving the court jurisdiction to grant new tenancies.

MORGAN v. JONES.
Upjohn L.J.

The relevant sections are sections 29 (1), 33 and 34 of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954. [His Lordship read those sections and continued:] That is the task of the judge, and it seems to me clear that, that being his duty, he can only determine whether the terms of the tenancy are reasonable in all the circumstances, or whether the rent is one which might reasonably be expected to be obtained by a willing lessor, if he hears evidence on that matter. In my judgment, mere proposals put forward by applicants for a new tenancy are quite insufficient to enable the judge, on those proposals alone, to come to any conclusion on the matter at all. There must be evidence before him to support the reasonableness of those proposals.

If a landlord using Form 336 likes to state in his answer that he does not object to a tenancy being granted on the terms proposed by the applicant, that, coming from the landlord himself, is the best possible evidence that the terms proposed by the tenant are in fact reasonable. But in the absence of agreement, or in the absence of such a statement, it seems to me that the judge must exercise his judicial discretion, and that can only be exercised on evidence. It is, in my judgment, wrong to regard the documents required in these applications as pleadings in the strict sense. If the respondent does not put in an answer or appear, the judge is still bound to exercise his discretion under the Act, which he can only do on evidence; he cannot regard the matter as concluded by the tenant's proposals.

It is clear in this case that there was no evidence of any sort and, indeed, in fairness to the judge, he himself expressly pointed out that he was not exercising any judicial discretion in the matter, and he seems to have thought that in some respects the terms proposed might be considered indeed to be unreasonable.

Mr. Breuan Rees, however, sought to submit that there was in fact, on the true inference to be drawn from the facts of this case, an agreement which would satisfy the provisions of sections 33 and 34 of the Act. Now, an agreement, to satisfy those provisions, must be an agreement in writing: that is plain from section 69 (2) of the Act. Mr. Breuan Rees submits that the true inference to be drawn from the fact that the landlord in this case did not state in his answer whether he did object or whether he did not object to the grant of a tenancy in the terms proposed must lead to the inference that he did agree to the terms proposed. Speaking for myself, I am quite unable to accept that submission. Paragraph 2 of Form 336 is optional in its terms and, if the landlord—although in breach, no doubt, of his duty under the rules—fails to state one way or the other whether he does or does not object to the terms proposed, it does not seem to me that this court can draw any inference from that omission on the part of the landlord. In this case the submission becomes quite unreal when in fact counsel appeared before the judge and said that he did desire to oppose the terms proposed by the applicant.

In my judgment, therefore, on this short point, the judgment of the judge on this part of the case cannot be supported, and it must be remitted to him to consider the terms proposed by the applicants and to determine whether they are reasonable in all the circumstances, and whether the rent is one which could be reasonably expected to be obtained by a willing lessor and, if they are not, on the evidence, then it is his duty to grant a new tenancy on such terms as will accord with sections 33 and 34.

Mr. Sullivan, for the landlord, has asked during the course of argument that he formally be allowed to amend his answer so as to bring him into a compliance with the rules: that must be granted and, indeed, it was not strenuously opposed by Mr. Breuan Rees. Accordingly, the matter must go back to the judge, the answer being amended to permit the point to be raised, and then he will determine the whole matter on the evidence which will, no doubt, be adduced before him by both parties.

With regard to costs, the position is this. In the court below the matter was determined against the landlord solely on the question of a new tenancy, and the county court judge, exercising his discretion, ordered the landlord to pay the costs in that court and, as that part of his judgment is not sought to be disturbed, that order as to costs must stand.

In this court the matter is a little more difficult. On the one hand the judge was led into error by a submission made on behalf of the tenants that the matter was concluded on the pleadings. To that extent it seems that the tenants ought not to have any costs of this appeal. On the other hand the landlord was plainly in breach of the rules in failing to state whether or not he objected to the terms of the proposed tenancy. Secondly, counsel then appearing for the landlord failed to ask for leave to amend his answer when he found the judge was taking the view that the pleadings concluded the matter. That was a most unfortunate omission for, as Mr. Rees admitted, he could hardly have resisted such an amendment, subject possibly to an adjournment. In all the circumstances of this case the proper order, in my judgment, would be that there should be no order as to costs of this appeal.

ORMEROD L.J. I agree and, although we are differing from the judge on this part of the case, there is nothing I wish to add. In my view the case should be sent back for determination by the county court judge on the lines indicated by my brother.

Costs—Taxation—Application to review—Queen's Bench Division—Supreme Court Costs Rules, 1959 (S.I. 1959, No. 1958, Sch. 2), r. 35.

The following directions for applications for the review of a taxing officer's certificate under rule 35 of the Supreme Court Costs Rules, 1959, is given by the Lord Chief Justice:

1. Every application in the Queen's Bench Division under rule 35 of the Supreme Court Costs Rules, 1959, to review a taxing officer's decision in respect of the taxation of a bill of costs shall be made to a judge nominated by the Lord Chief Justice each term.

2. Every application shall be made by summons to be served within three days after issue and returnable on a day to be appointed by the judge.

3. Every summons must contain full particulars of the item or items or the amount allowed in respect of which the application to review is made.

4. After the issue of the summons the party applying shall forthwith give notice thereof to the taxing officer and on receipt of such notice the taxing officer shall lodge with the chief clerk of the Summons and Order Department of the Central Office the bill of costs, and the objections and answers made and given by the parties respectively at the review of the taxation of the bill of costs by the taxing officer.

5. Each party shall within four days after service of the summons lodge with the chief clerk of the Summons and Order Department the documents produced in evidence by that party at the hearing before the taxing officer relating to the item or items or the amount allowed under review; and the chief clerk shall then deliver these documents and the summons, objections and answers mentioned in paragraph 4 to the judge.

6. When appointing a day for the hearing of the summons the judge may decide to exercise his power to appoint two or more assessors to sit with him at the hearing, and if the judge does so decide, the chief clerk of the Summons and Order Department shall give notice of the decision to each of the parties and will, in any case, give to each of them notice of the day appointed by the judge for the hearing of the summons.

7. If the judge decides to appoint assessors the party applying shall within four days after the receipt of notice thereof lodge with the chief clerk of the Summons and Order Department two or more copies, as the case may be, of the summons, objections and answers mentioned in paragraph 4 for the use of the assessors.

8. When each of the assessors has signified his acceptance of his appointment the chief clerk of the Summons and Order Department shall send to each of them the notice of his appointment including the day appointed for the hearing of the summons, and a copy of the documents mentioned in paragraph 7.

By an Inclosure Act of 1801, and an award made under it, certain corn rents were vested in the rector of Scremby and his successors, now, by virtue of the Tithe Act, 1925, and the Church Commissioners Measure, 1947, the Church Commissioners. The Act provided that the amount of the rents, inter alia, should be determined by reference to the "average price of good marketable "wheat in the County of Lincoln during the term of 21 years "ending at Michaelmas, 1799," which price was ascertained by the award to be 5 7/10ths shillings per Winchester bushel. The Act further provided that the amount of the rents payable should be varied at intervals of 21 years as declared by an order of quarter sessions if from the report of three arbitrators it appeared that the "average price" of a Winchester bushel of good marketable wheat in the County of Lincoln for the 21 years then last past was more or less by threepence than the average price set out in the award.

SCREMBY CORN RENTS, In re.

The corn rents payable were last varied in July, 1896, when the average price was found to be 4s. 3½d. On March 5, 1959, on the application of the Church Commissioners, quarter sessions appointed three arbitrators to inquire into and ascertain the average price of a Winchester bushel of good marketable wheat for the last 21 years. The arbitrators found that such average price was 10s. 1d., and that, in addition to the sum received from the purchaser, the grower received deficiency payments under the Cereals (Deficiency of Payments) Order, 1955,[1] which for the 21 years ending March 5, 1959, averaged 11d. a Winchester bushel, and they awarded the average price for the 21 years to be 11s. Quarter sessions were of the opinion that the deficiency payments should not be included in the average price, and ordered that the rents be increased in the proportion that 10s. 1d. bears to 5 7/10ths shillings. On a case stated by quarter sessions in which the question for the opinion of the court was whether the deficiency payments ought to have been included as part of the average price and which set out alternative orders, the decision of quarter sessions was upheld.

The commissioners appealed.

Held, that the meaning of the word "price" in the Act of 1801 was unambiguous and denoted what a grower or seller could obtain for his wheat when he sold it independent of any additional benefit or subsidy; accordingly, the deficiency payments should not be included in the average price.

Decision of Divisional Court [1960] 1 W.L.R. 648; [1960] 2 All E.R. 650 affirmed.

APPEAL from the Divisional Court[2] (Lord Parker C.J., Byrne and Donovan JJ.).

On hearing, on July 2 and September 15, 1959, an application by the appellants, the Church Commissioners for England, for an order and declaration that the Scremby Corn Rents, yearly corn rents payable to the Church Commissioners by virtue of an award made pursuant to Act of Parliament, be increased in the proportion that 11s. bears to 5 7/10ths shillings, the General Quarter Sessions for the County of Lincoln, Parts of Lindsey, refused to make the order and declaration, but ordered and declared that the Scremby Corn Rents payable be increased in the proportion that 10s. 1d. bears to 5 7/10ths shillings, subject to the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice on the case stated by them.

[1] Cereals (Deficiency Payments) Order, 1955, art. 3: "In respect of "each year and in respect of . . . "millable wheat . . . the Ministers "shall—(a) in the light of their "conclusions from a review held "under section 2 of the Agriculture "Act, 1947, and with the approval of "the Treasury, specify a standard "price; and (b) determine, in such "manner as appears to them proper "in the respective circumstances, an "average realised price. . . ."

Art. 4 (1): "If in the case of "any year the average realised price "of millable wheat . . . is less than "the standard price thereof . . . the "appropriate Minister may, if he "thinks fit, and subject to such conditions as he may from time to time "with the approval of the Treasury "prescribe, make a payment of an "amount equal to the difference in "respect of every hundredweight of "millable wheat . . . which is shown "to his satisfaction to have been "dispatched or delivered during that "year to, or in accordance with the "instructions of, a purchaser thereof."

By an Act of Parliament passed in 1801 (41 Geo. 3, c. cxxiv), entitled "An Act for dividing, allotting and inclosing the open "common fields, meadows, pastures and other commonable "lands and waste grounds within the parish of Scremby in the "County of Lincoln," and by virtue of the award made under that Act, the Scremby corn rents were vested in the rector of Scremby and his successors for the time being, and by virtue of the provisions of the Tithe Act, 1925, and the Church Commissioners Measure, 1947, were now vested in the Church Commissioners. By the Act of 1801 it was provided that tithes were to be abolished and the "corn rents" were to be payable instead.

It was provided by the Act of 1801 that the amount of the Scremby Corn Rents should, inter alia, be ascertained by reference to the average price of good marketable wheat in the County of Lincoln during the term of 21 years ending at Michaelmas, 1799, and by the award such price was so ascertained to be 5 7/10ths shillings per Winchester bushel. It was further provided by the Act that the amount of Scremby corn rent payable by virtue of such award should be varied at intervals of 21 years as declared by an order of the court at the appropriate general quarter sessions of the peace if from the report of three arbitrators or referees appointed by the court pursuant to the Act, it appeared that the average price of a Winchester bushel of good marketable wheat in the County of Lincoln for the 21 years then last past was more or less by threepence than the average price thereof set out in the award. The Scremby corn rents payable by virtue of the award were previously last varied by an order and declaration of quarter sessions made on July 3, 1896, when the average price of a Winchester bushel of good marketable wheat in the County of Lincoln for the 21 years then last past was found to be 4s. 3½d.

On an application, made on March 5, 1959, to quarter sessions, and on proof that notice had duly been given as required by the Act in the "London Gazette" and in a newspaper usually circulated in the County of Lincoln of the intention to make the application, an order was made appointing three arbitrators or referees to inquire into and ascertain in accordance with the provision of the Act the average price of a Winchester bushel of good marketable wheat in the County of Lincoln for the 21 years then last past. In their report [attached to and forming part of the case] the arbitrators found: "1. The "average price of a Winchester bushel of good marketable wheat "in the County of Lincoln during the 21 years ended on March "5, 1959 (excluding payments referred to in the next succeeding "paragraph) to be the sum of 10s. 1d. 2. That in addition to "the sum that the grower receives from the purchaser, the "grower receives deficiency payments under the Cereals De-"ficiency Payments Scheme, and that in the 21 years ended "March 5, 1959, these deficiency payments averaged 11d. per

"Winchester bushel," and they awarded and determined "that "the average price of a Winchester bushel of good marketable "wheat in the County of Lincoln for the 21 years now last "past . . . to be the sum of 11s."

It was contended on behalf of the Church Commissioners before quarter sessions that the report of the arbitrators was binding on the court, and the court was bound to accept their purported award and determination, and that, on the true construction of the Act of 1801, the payments made to the growers of wheat under or by virtue of the Cereals (Deficiency Payments) Order were properly included by the arbitrators when ascertaining the average price of a Winchester bushel of good marketable wheat in the County of Lincoln during the 21 years ending on March 5, 1959. The first part of these contentions was abandoned before the Divisional Court.

Quarter sessions were of the opinion that they were bound to examine the report of the arbitrators and to decide any questions of law which arose on its face; that the deficiency payments did not form part of the price in that (1) they were made at the discretion of the Minister; (2) they bore no direct relation to the price of wheat in the County of Lincoln; (3) they were a subsidy or bonus; (4) by virtue of regulation 5 (4) of the order the Minister could withhold deficiency payments, and (5) the word "price" in the Act referred to the price at which wheat was in fact sold in the County of Lincoln during the 21 year period, namely, the average realised price and not the standard price fixed by the Minister. They therefore ordered and declared that the Scremby corn rents be increased in the proportion that 10s. 1d. bears to 5 7/10ths shillings.

On the hearing on May 27, 1960, of the case stated by quarter sessions, the Divisional Court dismissed the Church Commissioners' appeal.

G. D. Squibb, Q.C., Edwin Jowitt and Desmond Fennell for the Church Commissioners.

LORD MORRIS OF BORTH-Y-GEST. This is an appeal from the judgment of the Divisional Court on a case stated by the General Quarter Sessions of the Peace for the County of Lincoln, Parts of Lindsey. The appeal is brought by the Church Commissioners in circumstances which I will recount.

In the Divisional Court, Lord Parker C.J., in giving judgment, dealt with the question whether quarter sessions in a case of this kind were entitled to state a case. He said [1]: ". . . I have come "to the conclusion on the whole that they were [entitled] and "that Parliament, by giving the duty to the court of quarter "sessions, showed clearly that they were giving the decision not "to an administrative tribunal but to a court, and a court which

[1] [1960] 1 W.L.R. 648, 652.

"then, as was well known, had powers of consulting the judges. "Accordingly, I assume for the purposes of this judgment that "quarter sessions had power to state the case which they have "done."

The case was stated in reference to an application made by the Church Commissioners concerning certain rents payable to the Church Commissioners as the result of an award which was made pursuant to an Act of Parliament of 1801. One of the principal questions that arises for our decision is as to the meaning of the word "price" in the relevant part of the provisions of that Act.

[His Lordship stated the facts and continued:] It is not submitted by Mr. Squibb who has appeared for the Church Commissioners that the report of the arbitrators was binding upon the court of quarter sessions in the sense that they merely had to adopt the figure of 11s.: for the Act, provides that if by the report it appears that the average price of a bushel of wheat was more or less than the average price set forth in the award by the value of three pence "the said respective "yearly tithe rents shall be increased or diminished as shall be "declared by the order of the court." It was for the court to accept the facts as found, but then to do what was correct according to law.

The point that arises for our decision is whether on the report of the arbitrators there should be a variation on the basis that the price of wheat was 10s. 1d. or on the basis that it was 11s. The effect of the variation would be to increase the corn rents payable and the corn rents would have to be increased either in the proportion that 10s. 1d. bears to 5 7/10ths shillings or in the proportion that 11s. bears to 5 7/10ths shillings. It will be seen, therefore, that ultimately this case has to be decided by considering what is the meaning, in its context, of the word "price" in reference to the price of wheat.

The report referred to the deficiency payments under the Cereals Deficiency Payments Scheme. That was a scheme made pursuant to statute, the effect of which may be deduced by considering the Cereals (Deficiency Payments) Order, 1955. It is to be observed that these deficiency payments were not paid throughout the period of 21 years prior to March 5, 1959. But we have been told that the average sum of 11d. mentioned in the arbitrators' report is the average covering a period of 21 years taking the actual payments that have been made during the last few years during which alone there have been such payments.

Under article 2 (1) of the order to which I have referred millable wheat is defined as "wheat which is sweet and in fair "merchantable condition. . . ." Mr. Squibb has said that "millable wheat" can be regarded as being the same as "good "merchantable wheat," which is the phrase used in the Act. The order refers to a "registered grower," and the registered grower "in relation to any cereals means the person for the time

C. A.
1960
SCREMBY CORN RENTS, In re.
Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest.

"being registered by the appropriate Minister in such manner "and subject to such conditions as that Minister may from time "to time prescribe as the grower of those cereals for the purposes "of this order." The order goes on to lay down the procedure for ascertaining standard prices and average realised prices for cereals and then to prescribe certain payments which may be made in respect of wheat or rye and further certain payments which may be made in respect of oats, barley or mixed cereals. We are concerned here with wheat.

Article 3 of the order provides: "In respect of each year and "in respect of each of the following cereals, that is to say, "millable wheat, millable rye, oats and barley, the Ministers "shall (a) in the light of their conclusions from a review held "under section two of the Agriculture Act, 1947, and with the "approval of the Treasury, specify a standard price; and (b) "determine, in such manner as appears to them proper in the "respective circumstances, an average realised price, being in "each case a price per hundredweight." There is a proviso to which we have been referred, but I do not think it necessary to read its terms. So a standard price is specified and there is a determination of what is called the "average realised price." Then, in regard to possible payments, article 4 (1) of the order provides: "If in the case of any year the average realised price "of millable wheat or, as the case may be, millable rye is less "than the standard price thereof, the appropriate Minister may, "if he thinks fit, and subject to such conditions as he may from "time to time with the approval of the Treasury prescribe, make "a payment of an amount equal to the difference in respect of "every hundredweight of millable wheat or, as the case may be, "millable rye which is shown to his satisfaction to have been "dispatched or delivered during that year to, or in accordance "with the instructions of, a purchaser thereof." Under article 6 the payments are to be made to the registered grower of the cereals in question or "if the appropriate Minister is satisfied "that the interest of the registered grower in that payment has "passed to some other person to that other person."

The position, therefore, in the present case is that there was originally an award by the commissioners as prescribed by the Act; that in 1896 there was an ascertainment of the average price of wheat in Lincolnshire; and that now, pursuant to the report of the arbitrators, it has been found, first, that the average price of a Winchester bushel of marketable wheat in the County of Lincoln during the relevant period was 10s. 1d. and further it has been found that in addition to any sum that the grower receives from the purchasers the grower receives a deficiency payment under the Cereals Deficiency Payments Scheme. The Church Commissioners, therefore, say that the corn rents should now be varied by reference to the figure of 11s. and not the figure of 10s. 1d. The corn rents should be varied, they say, to the extent of the proportion that 11s. rather than 10s. 1d. bears to the previously ascertained figure of 5 7/10ths shillings.

In the case stated by quarter sessions, the court declared that the Scremby corn rents should be increased in the proportion that 10s. 1d. bears to 5 7/10ths shillings.

The question stated for the opinion of the court was whether that order and declaration was right or whether the sum of 11d. received by the grower ought to have been added to the 10s. 1d. The Divisional Court agreed with the findings of the court of quarter sessions and dismissed the appeal. Appeal is now brought to this court.

I will read again what seem to me to be the material words of the Act of 1801 which we have to consider. Three persons named or appointed by the justices are arbitrators or referees "for inquiring into and ascertaining by or from or by means of "the 'London Gazette' or by such other ways or means as they "shall think equitable or proper, the average price of a Win-"chester bushel of good marketable wheat within the said "County of Lincoln for the 21 years then last past." That they must report. It is to be observed that the price they must ascertain is the price of wheat within the County of Lincoln. The deficiency payments under the Cereals Deficiency Payments Order are based upon what the Minister specifies to be "a "standard price," which I understand means a standard price for the whole country, and what the Minister determines (also for the whole country) to be an average realised price. The scheme, therefore, seems to provide some benefit or subsidy for the grower.

Mr. Squibb, in the course of his argument, submitted in the first place that the Act of 1801 must be construed as it would have been construed when the statute was passed, and, so far as he needed any authority for that proposition, he found it in Sharp v. Wakefield,[2] in which case Lord Esher M.R. said[3]: "We have to construe several Acts, the first of which is the "Licensing Act, 1828, under which the case is stated. The "justices stated the grounds on which they went, and the court "of quarter sessions upheld their decision. The question asked "is, whether the justices or the court of quarter sessions had "jurisdiction in respect of either of the objections, because if "they had jurisdiction as to one of them that is sufficient to "support their decision. Now what is the rule of construction "to be applied? It is that the words of a statute must be "construed as they would have been the day after the statute "was passed, unless some subsequent statute has declared that "some other construction is to be adopted or has altered the "previous statute." There has been no further statute, but Mr. Squibb submits that in the circumstances brought about by the provisions of recent legislation there is now an ambiguity in the meaning of the word "price." He submits that the word "price" could now either mean the amount paid by a purchaser or could mean the amount received by the grower. He submits that the latter view should be adopted and that the amount received by the grower in this case was 11s. It has to be pointed out, however, that the subsidy given by the order of 1955 is a subsidy based upon the ascertained standard price and the ascertained average realised price. If a particular grower has done very well himself and got more than the average realised price, he still may get the same amount of subsidy as would be received by others who have obtained less advantageous prices.

Mr. Squibb went on to submit that, in deciding between those two contentions, it should be borne in mind that the Act of 1801 was abolishing tithes, and he submitted that in the case of tithes which were personal tithes there was legislative support for the view that they were based upon clear gains from personal work after all charges had been deducted.

I find myself in agreement with the Divisional Court and I am quite unable to accept the submissions so clearly put forward by Mr. Squibb. In the first place, it does not seem to me that there is any ambiguity, and I do not feel able to agree with Mr. Squibb when he submits that some ambiguity has now developed. The words, as it seems to me, are quite clear. I think that what Parliament was doing was to arrange for future possible revisions of the corn rents based upon alterations in the price of wheat, namely, the price of a Winchester bushel of good marketable wheat in the County of Lincoln. It seems to me that the word "price" was a word which denoted what a grower or seller would obtain for his wheat when he sold it. I cannot think that if by some later legislation he was to get from some other source than from his purchaser some additional benefit, that such benefit could properly be comprehended within the word "price." I think, furthermore, that there is nothing in this Act which suggests that the corn rents were to be related to net profits made by owners of land. There is no such notion introduced by the words in question.

I think, therefore, that the word "price" simply denotes what a grower of good marketable wheat would, on its sale within the County of Lincoln, realise for his wheat. There is, I think, no ambiguity, and, therefore, in agreement with the court of quarter sessions, and with the Divisional Court, I think that the figure upon which to proceed should be that of 10s. 1d. and not 11s. For these reasons, I think the appeal fails.

PEARCE L.J. I agree. This Act was intended, as a matter of convenience, to change the payment of tithes from payment in kind to payment in money, and to tie the amount of the tithes to the market price of wheat. It is conceded that, at the time of the passing of the Act, the words "average price of good "marketable wheat in the County of Lincoln" could only mean the price under a contract between buyer and seller. But it is contended that the introduction of the Cereals Deficiency Payments Scheme has produced an ambiguity since now the seller may, if he fulfils the necessary requirements, receive a subsidy (unrelated to the price of wheat in the County of Lincoln) in respect of each contract of sale, and may thereby receive something additional to the price in the contract of sale. Price, it is said, may now mean the contract price augmented by the subsidy. But in my view no such ambiguity has been introduced into the words of the Act or into their application. It is still possible to ascertain the average price of good marketable wheat. That price is independent of the subsidy. The fact that the subsidy will probably follow the sale does not alter the price at which the wheat was in fact sold or make the subsidy part of that price. Whether Parliament in 1801, had it foreseen subsidies, would have provided that the amount of the subsidy should be added to the market price is uncertain. It is always open to Parliament to do so now if it thinks fit. But it has not taken that course, and we must follow the clear words of the Act as they stand.

PILCHER J. I agree, for the same reasons which have been given by my Lords.

A wife by her petition prayed for divorce on the ground of cruelty and by a supplemental petition alleged adultery. The husband by his original answer cross-prayed for divorce on the ground of cruelty, and while alleging desertion did not seek a divorce on that ground as three years had not then expired since his wife admittedly left him. At the date, however, of his answer to the supplemental petition the three years had been completed, and he prayed for divorce on that ground "by way of cross-petition" in that answer. Dicta in Blacker v. Blacker [1960] 2 W.L.R. 800, 807; [1960] 2 All E.R. 291, C.A. applied.

DEFENDED PETITION for divorce.

The wife by her petition dated December 11, 1958, prayed for a decree of divorce on the grounds of her husband's alleged cruelty. The husband by his answer dated February 23, 1959, denied the alleged cruelty, and prayed for a decree of divorce in the exercise of the court's discretion on the ground of the wife's alleged cruelty. He further alleged that she had deserted him on November 2, 1956, although unable in view of the time factor to seek relief on that ground. Both asked for custody and costs, and the wife further prayed for ancillary relief. A formal reply denying the cruelty alleged by the husband was filed in March 1959.

On September 15, 1959, the wife filed a supplemental petition alleging specific adultery in June, July and August, 1959, with a woman whose surname and identity were unknown to her. By his supplemental answer thereto dated December 10, 1959, the husband admitted adultery from September 1958 but made no admission in relation to the specific allegations of adultery. He added to his answer the words: "And by way of cross-"petition the [husband] says: That the [wife] has deserted the "[husband] without cause for a period of three years immediately "preceding the presentation of this answer [sic]," and set out particulars of desertion since November 2, 1956, when the wife had left him. By her reply dated January 6, 1960, to the answer and cross-petition the wife admitted that she had left the husband on the date alleged but pleaded just cause.

At the hearing counsel for the husband applied, in view of the decision of the Court of Appeal in Blacker v. Blacker[1] to strike out the prayer of his answer and supplemental answer except insofar as they merely asked for the prayer of the petition to be rejected with the usual consequences as to costs. He also asked for leave to file forthwith a new petition in which the husband would repeat his former allegations of cruelty and desertion with a prayer in substantially the same form as that in the original pleadings. He further asked that the two suits should then be forthwith consolidated.

KARMINSKI J.: I have no doubts as to the course I ought to pursue here. The present application to amend the respondent husband's pleadings comes as a result of the supplemental answer being filed on his behalf on December 14, 1959, at a time when practitioners were probably following two decisions of my own, namely, Swiszczowski v. Swiszczowski and Jewasinski[1] and Thatcher v. Thatcher and Gill (Wheeler intervening).[2] These decisions were held by the Court of Appeal in April of this year to have been wrongly decided. See Blacker v. Blacker.[3]

The difficulty, however, in this case is this: the draftsman who settled the supplemental answer in December, 1959, was misled by my now admitted errors, and alleged desertion in that answer. The answer to the supplemental petition in December, 1959, alleged by way of cross-petition desertion for three years immediately preceding the presentation of that answer, namely, December 9, 1959. [His Lordship referred to the terms of the application on behalf of the husband and continued:] Mr. Ormerod founds his application on the decision of Blacker v. Blacker,[3] and in particular on some observations of Willmer L.J.[4] in which he said that the objection taken in Blacker v. Blacker[3] possibly would not have been taken if in that case the commissioner had been invited first to dispose of the prayer and cross-prayer for relief in the original petition and answer, before leave was asked to amend the answer, by adding a cross-petition, and the reply by adding an answer to cross-petition. Willmer L.J. suggested that had that course been followed and the parties then asked leave to institute their fresh proceedings by adding a cross-petition and an answer thereto, it might be that the commissioner could properly have acceded to the request, and with the consent of the parties could then have given the necessary directions for abridgement of time, dispensing with the registrar's certificate, and so forth, so as to enable him to dispose of the issue of desertion while he was yet seised of the case, and thus avoid the necessity for the parties to incur the additional costs of a fresh trial before another judge.

Mr. Collard said that in this case it would not be right to follow that line, although he at once agreed that I have power, having regard to the decision of Blacker v. Blacker,[3] to make the order suggested by Mr. Ormrod. Mr. Collard rightly emphasised the fact that all three lord justices in Blacker v. Blacker[3] had warned of the danger of the form used in the pleading of this case as being merely a device to expedite the hearing of a suit. I am very conscious that such a danger may arise in certain cases, but I do not think that it has, or is likely to arise here. This suit was originally started in December 1958: the supplemental petition was filed in 1959: the respondent's answer is dated December 9, 1959, and the petitioner replied to it on January 6, 1960. There was apparently indeed some delay in getting the renewal of the registrar's certificate, and this was not obtained until June 1960.

In the result, therefore, it seems to me that so far as any improper acceleration of the trial of this suit having been obtained, on the contrary it has slipped back rather a long way in the queue of cases awaiting trial. While I pay full attention to the danger of improper acceleration, I do not think that it is a matter which arises in this case.

Mr. Collard also said an application of this kind could have been made some months ago, and that I think is, up to a point, a justifiable criticism. The Law Reports dealing with Blacker v. Blacker [3] were published on May 6, 1960, but it does not seem to have occurred in this case to either side to get the pleadings into order until today. It was open, of course, to Mr. Ormrod to make an application at the registry to correct the position some months ago. Equally it was open to Mr. Collard to move to strike out the offending parts of Mr. Ormrod's pleadings if he thought it desirable. It may be, perhaps, because the matter was not appreciated until recently, that nothing was done and the application was made today at the beginning of the trial.

I cannot help feeling in matters of this kind that it is always desirable to make the necessary application to correct or to strike out pleadings at the earliest possible moment. I have to deal with the situation as it is before me today and I think that I must accede, in the exercise of the discretion which I have in this matter, to the application of Mr. Ormrod. I shall make the order accordingly, and I also make an order consolidating the two cases, the wife's case to be the leading case.

Applications granted.

[NOTE: Leave to amend the answers, to file and serve the cross-petition in court, to abridge time for appearance thereto until after the adjournment, to dispense with the registrar's certificate, and to consolidate were given. The wife no longer pursued her prayer for divorce, and the husband was granted a decree nisi on the ground of desertion in the exercise of the court's discretion, and the wife's petition dismissed, that afternoon. There was no order as to costs except as to legal aid taxation.]

Bastardy — Corroboration — Opportunity — Evidence given in support of complainant's evidence — Mere evidence of opportunity — No evidence given by defendant—Whether defendant's silence can amount to corroboration—Whether statute satisfied—Affiliation Proceedings Act, 1957 (5 & 6 Eliz. 2, c. 55), s. 4 (2).

Upon the hearing of a complaint under section 1 of the Affiliation Proceedings Act, 1957,[1] the complainant, to whom a bastard child had been born on December 26, 1958, gave evidence that she had had intercourse with the defendant in March, 1958, and alleged that he was the father of the child. She admitted having had intercourse with the defendant's brother the previous February. Her mother testified to meetings which had taken place between the complainant and the defendant in January and February prior to the birth of the child. The defendant did not give evidence but his brother testified to having had intercourse with the complainant on a number of occasions prior to and during March, 1958. The justices disbelieved the brother's evidence. They were of opinion that the evidence of the mother was sufficient corroboration of the complainant's evidence and that the defendant's silence was a corroborative factor. They accordingly adjudged the defendant the putative father of the child and made a maintenance order against him.

On appeal, on the ground that there was no corroboration as required by section 4 (2) of the Act of 1957:—

Held, (1) that the evidence of the mother as to the vague association between the complainant and the defendant in January and February, 1958, was mere evidence of opportunity which could not alone amount to corroboration.

Moore v. Hewitt [1947] K.B. 831; 63 T.L.R. 476; [1947] 2 All E.R. 270, D.C. and Harvey v. Anning (1902) 87 L.T. 687, D.C. distinguished.

(2) That a defendant in such a case was fully entitled not to go into the witness-box, and, as there was no corroboration at all, the fact that the defendant did not give evidence could not of itself afford corroboration. Moreover, there was nothing in the defendant's conduct which could amount to corroboration and, accordingly, the appeal would be allowed.

Mash v. Darley [1914] 3 K.B. 1226; 30 T.L.R. 585, C.A. considered.

CASE STATED by Brentford justices.

On October 27, 1959, a complaint was preferred by Gwendoline May Smith against the defendant, Colin Cracknell, alleging that

[1] Affiliation Proceedings Act, 1957, s. 1: "A single woman who . . . has "been delivered of an illegitimate "child, may apply by complaint to a "justice of the peace for a summons "to be served on the man alleged by "her to be the father of the child."

S. 4: "(1) On the hearing of a "complaint under section 1 of this Act "the court shall hear the evidence of "the mother . . . and such other evi-"dence as she may produce, and shall "also hear any evidence tendered by "or on behalf of the defendant. "(2) If the evidence of the mother is "corroborated in some material par-"ticular by other evidence to the "court's satisfaction, the court may "adjudge the defendant to be the "putative father of the child . . ."

CRACKNELL
v.
SMITH.

he was the father of a bastard male child of which she had been delivered at Parkstone, Dorset, on December 26, 1958.

The justices heard the complaint on December 8, 1959, and found that the child had been born on December 26, 1958, and that the defendant was the father.

Before the justices the complainant testified that she had met the defendant in December, 1957; that thereafter she went out with him frequently in the evenings and had had sexual intercourse with him on four occasions in January and February, 1958, and on a further occasion in March, 1958, and that no contraceptives were used. She had an abnormal period in March and no period at all in April, 1958. On two occasions in April, 1958, she told the defendant that she believed she was pregnant but he would not believe her. Early in May she went for a walk with him to discuss the question of maintenance for the child. After the birth of the child she wrote to the defendant about the child but received no reply from him. In January she took the child to the defendant's house and asked him what he was going to do about it but he merely said that she had been out with somebody else the Friday before. The complainant admitted that she had had sexual intercourse with the defendant's brother, Byron Cracknell, on two occasions, the latter being on February 14, 1958, but that at the end of that month her period had been normal. She said that she had not had sexual intercourse with any man apart from the defendant and Byron Cracknell except on one occasion with another man some 12 months before she met the defendant. She further stated that she had not had sexual intercourse with Byron Cracknell in March, 1958, or subsequently; that she had been out with him only twice and had never told him that she had had sexual intercourse with another brother, Tony Cracknell. She identified the defendant and also identified one Neville Dean as being the man she knew as Byron Cracknell.

The complainant's mother testified that the defendant had on three occasions visited her house where the complainant also lived about January and February, 1958, and that he had seen the complainant there; that at that time the complainant and the defendant went out together from time to time, and that sometimes the complainant would go to meet the defendant at the corner of the street.

The defendant gave no evidence.

Neville Dean testified that he was the defendant's brother and used to be known as Byron Cracknell; that he had first met the complainant in May, 1958, or earlier, but not at Christmas, 1957, and had had sexual intercourse with her about eight or nine times in the course of one month; that the complainant had told him that she had been out with Tony Cracknell (a brother of his and of the defendant) on numerous occasions and had had sexual intercourse with him. He later said that he had first had sexual intercourse with the complainant in March, 1958, and not in December, 1957, and February, 1958, and that the complainant had never told him that she had had sexual intercourse with the defendant or that she was pregnant. He also said that he did not know how old the complainant's child was or when it was born, and that it was nothing to do with him.

It was contended on behalf of the defendant (a) that the evidence of the complainant had not been corroborated in a material particular as required by section 4 (2) of the Affiliation Proceedings Act, 1957; (b) that the evidence of the witness Neville Dean (otherwise Byron Cracknell) that he had had intercourse with the complainant in March, 1958, should be accepted, and that he might therefore be the father of the child, and (c) that the complainant's case was not proved.

It was contended on behalf of the complainant (a) that the evidence of the complainant's mother was sufficient corroboration, and (b) that the silence of the defendant was a corroborative factor.

The justices were of the opinion that the complainant's evidence had been sufficiently corroborated; that her evidence was to be preferred to that of Neville Dean; and that the defendant was the father of the child. They accordingly adjudged the defendant to be the putative father of the child and made an order against him for the payment of £1 5s. a week for the maintenance of the child until it attained the age of 16.

The defendant appealed, on the ground that neither the evidence of the complainant's mother nor the silence of the defendant could be corroboration as required by the Act.

Michael Sherrard for the defendant.
Quentin T. Edwards for the complainant.

The cases cited in argument are referred to in the judgment.

LORD PARKER C.J. stated the facts, referred to the evidence of the complainant and her mother, and continued: The defendant gave no evidence and he, in fact, called as a witness his brother Byron. It is enough to say that Byron's evidence was thoroughly unsatisfactory. He spoke to frequent sexual intercourse with the complainant, and particularly to intercourse in March, 1958, but he was clearly a very unsatisfactory witness and, as I understand it, the justices thought that he was a liar and that his evidence was of no account. The question immediately arises, in those circumstances, whether there was any sufficient corroboration within the statute. Two matters were said to amount to corroboration, first, that the mother's evidence was sufficient corroboration; secondly, that the silence of the defendant was said to be a corroborative factor, the silence referred to being that he had not gone into the witness-box. The justices found that the complainant's evidence was sufficiently corroborated without saying by what. For my part, I am perfectly satisfied that the evidence of the mother was not sufficient corroboration or, perhaps more accurately, any corroboration, because the weight to be attached to the evidence is a matter for the justices. Quite apart from the fact that she was only speaking in regard to January and February, 1958, and not in regard to March, it is quite clear that her evidence was as to mere opportunity. Mere evidence of opportunity and nothing more can be no corroboration. There are, of course, cases, of which Moore v. Hewitt [1] is an example, and also Harvey v. Anning,[2] in both of which there was something more than mere opportunity. In both cases, unlike the present case, there was evidence that the complainant was not being intimate with or associating with anybody else. Secondly, in Harvey v. Anning [2] there was, as an additional factor, the great difference in the social position of the parties, and in both cases there was real evidence of courtship and association together, and not the very vague association spoken to by the mother in the present case.

CRACKNELL v. SMITH.

Lord Parker C.J.

It is then said, and this has been put forward as the main ground in this court, that the failure of the defendant to go into the witness-box, coupled with the fact that he called as a witness his brother who, as it turned out, was thought to be a liar, was of itself corroboration. For my part, I am perfectly clear that a defendant to a complaint of this sort is fully entitled not to go into the witness-box. Of course, if there is evidence against him, and some corroborative evidence, it may be that the justices are entitled to take into consideration the fact that he gave no evidence in considering the weight to be attached to the corroboration. But here, if I am right, there was no corroboration at all, and, in those circumstances, I am quite clear that the failure of the defendant to go into the witness-box cannot of itself afford corroboration; nor, in my view, does the fact that he called his brother to give untrue evidence that this girl had been carrying on with him, the brother, and, indeed, with yet another brother at the material time. I do not think that that, again, can possibly amount to corroboration.

The court was referred to Mash v. Darley.[3] It is enough to say that the facts there were very different. That case has always been looked upon rather as the high-water mark of what can amount to corroboration and, for my part, I am quite satisfied that in the present case nothing in the way of the conduct of the defendant, whether or not it be strictly evidence within the statute, not being spoken to by anybody in the witness-box, could Arbitration — Arbitrator — Misconduct — Waiver — Two arbitrators appointed under rules of trade association—Disagreement—Appointment of umpire—Status of arbitrators before umpire—Extent of authority.

A dispute arose between the buyers and sellers following a breach of condition in a contract for the sale of rapeseed cake expellers which incorporated the arbitration clause contained in the Rules and Regulations of the London Cattle Food Trade Association (Incorporated). In accordance with those rules the buyers and the sellers each appointed an arbitrator but the arbitrators failed to agree and duly appointed an umpire before whom each appeared to present the case of the party appointing him. In presenting the case for the sellers, the sellers' arbitrator read an opinion of counsel which had been obtained by the sellers and which related to the question for decision by the umpire. The buyers' arbitrator did not object and, when asked by the umpire whether he wished to obtain counsel's opinion on behalf of the buyers, said he did not wish to do so. At the end of the hearing each arbitrator handed in his file of documents to the umpire without the other arbitrator seeing them, that of the sellers' arbitrator containing the opinion of counsel which he had read. The umpire later made his award in favour of the sellers. On a motion by the buyers to set aside the award on the ground of misconduct by the umpire:—

Held, (1) that in a commercial arbitration of this kind, once the arbitrators had disagreed they were functus officio as arbitrators, and if they attended before the umpire they did so as advocates for the parties who had appointed them, for, unless they attended in that capacity, they had no right to discuss the matter with the umpire at all; that it was a necessary implication that a person appointed to act as advocate for a party must have all the necessary powers to agree to the form of procedure followed, and it could not be outside the implied authority of an arbitrator acting as advocate to waive or agree to any irregularity in procedure which occurred.

(2) That whether or not there was any impropriety or irregularity in the reading by the sellers' arbitrator of the opinion of counsel obtained by the sellers, it was an impropriety or irregularity which could be, and plainly had been, waived by the buyers' arbitrator in his capacity as advocate of the buyers. Moreover, any irregularity which occurred by reason of the files of documents being handed in to the umpire had clearly been waived as both arbitrators had consented to that course being followed. Accordingly, the motion failed.

MOTION to set aside umpire's award.

The applicants, Wessanen's Koninklijke Fabrikien N.V., were the buyers and the respondents, Isaac Modiano Brother and Sons Ltd., the sellers of certain rapeseed cake expellers to be shipped from Pakistan to Rotterdam under a contract in writing dated November 25, 1959. The contract was in the ordinary form of the London Cattle Food Association (Incorporated) and it included an arbitration clause which provided: "Any dispute on this "contract to be settled by arbitration in London in accordance "with the rules and regulations of the London Cattle Food Trade "Association (Inc.), which are indorsed hereon and are deemed to "form part of this contract." By rule 1 of those Rules and Regulations "Any dispute arising out of a contract embodying "these rules shall be referred to arbitration in London, each party "appointing one arbitrator who shall be a member of the Associa-"tion, and not interested in the transaction, and such arbitrators "shall have the power, if and when they disagree, to appoint an "umpire, who shall be a member of the Association, whose "decision is to be final. . . ."

The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment.

A dispute arose between the buyers and the sellers as to the right of the buyers to reject the goods for an admitted breach of condition. Each of the parties appointed an arbitrator under the provisions of the arbitration clause, and the buyers and the sellers respectively provided their arbitrator with documents relating to the dispute. The two arbitrators did not in fact meet but had a conversation over the telephone. They disagreed and appointed an umpire and arranged with him for a hearing at the umpire's office at some date in June, 1960. All three were, as the arbitration rules required, members of the London Cattle Food Trade Association (Inc.), and the sellers' arbitrator and the umpire were men of great experience in London Cattle Food Trade Association arbitration. The buyers' arbitrator was probably also a man of experience although the extent of his experience did not appear from his affidavit.

At the hearing before the umpire, the buyers' arbitrator presented the arguments in favour of the buyers. For that purpose he outlined the facts, which were not in dispute, and addressed to the umpire his arguments as to the effect of the law upon those facts. When he had finished, the sellers' arbitrator put forward his conflicting arguments, in the course of which he referred to an opinion of counsel which had been obtained by the sellers, a copy of which had been furnished to him. He read out to the umpire all the paragraphs of the opinion which dealt with the particular point he was advocating. It was apparent from his notes that he stressed the importance of the opinion (the author of which he incorrectly described as "a Queen's counsel") and suggested to the umpire that the opinion strongly confirmed, and was indeed conclusive in favour of, the contentions which he was advancing. That was done without protest by the buyers' arbitrator. At the end of the sellers' arbitrator's contentions, the umpire asked the buyers' arbitrator whether he wished to reply or whether he desired to obtain and submit a legal opinion such as the sellers' arbitrator had done. The buyers' arbitrator said he did not. Both arbitrators then handed to the umpire, without any objection from one or the other, their files of documents, which it was now known contained the relevant correspondence in the case of both arbitrators and in the case of the sellers' arbitrator, the copy of counsel's opinion from which he had read and also his own notes from which he had advanced his argument.

The umpire awarded in favour of the sellers. The buyers moved to set aside the award on the ground that the umpire had misconducted himself by receiving in evidence (a) the file of correspondence and other documents held by each respective arbitrator without the other arbitrator in each case seeing the contents of such file; and (b) counsel's written opinion obtained by the sellers and by taking it away for consideration together with the file of the sellers' arbitrator and without seeing the case on which such opinion was obtained.

WESSANEN'S KONINKLIJKE FABRIKIEN v. ISAAC MODIANO BROTHER & SONS LTD.

DIPLOCK J. This is a motion to set aside an award made in a commercial arbitration because of the misconduct of the umpire. It was made plain at the outset by Mr. Goodenday on behalf of the applicants that the misconduct which he alleges is technical misconduct and involves no reflection on the probity of the umpire. [His Lordship stated the facts and continued:] In the notice of motion it was contended that the umpire had misconducted himself in three respects: first, that he had not held a proper judicial investigation of the matter in dispute in the presence of the parties; secondly, that he had received as evidence the files of correspondence held by each arbitrator without the other arbitrator seeing the contents of the file; and, thirdly, that he took away counsel's written opinion without seeing the case on which such opinion was obtained. The first two grounds have not been persisted in in the argument before me.

It is, I think, plain and fully time that the court should take judicial notice of the fact that, in commercial arbitrations of this kind, under the rules of the London Cattle Food Trade Association, where arbitrators are appointed who, upon disagreeing, appoint an umpire whose decision is final, the arbitrators, once they have disagreed and have agreed upon an umpire, are functus officio as arbitrators and act at the hearing before the umpire as advocates for their respective appointors. That is a practice which two of the witnesses in the affidavits say has been going on for 25 years. A glance at the cases decided in these courts 30 and 40 years ago shows that the practice has been going on since the beginning of this century. It is also clear that the practice, when arbitrators have been appointed in this way, is that the parties themselves are represented at the hearing before the umpire by the arbitrators and by no one else unless they express a desire to be otherwise represented.

As regards the second ground, namely, the reception of the file of correspondence held by the respective arbitrators without the other arbitrator seeing the contents of the file, that again has not been proceeded with before me. It is plain that the two arbitrators trusted one another and that this was done by each with the consent of the other. Now that the files have been seen, since they are exhibited to the affidavits, it is obvious that the trust which each had in the other was justified. But, even if it had not been, I apprehend that the consent of each of the arbitrators to that course being adopted would waive any irregularity in the procedure which was involved.

Mr. Goodenday has really limited his argument here to the contention that the reading of counsels' opinion, with or without the case, was an irregularity, that the handing of it in to the umpire was a further irregularity (but, I apprehend, of the same kind), and that it was an irregularity which the buyers' arbitrator had no authority to waive. Mr. Goodenday, I think, concedes (as he must) that if his arbitrator had authority to waive the irregularity, then he cannot succeed in setting the award aside, for it is clear law that a party to an arbitration can waive an irregularity.

It therefore becomes necessary for me to consider what is the extent of the authority of an arbitrator when appearing before the umpire in a commercial arbitration of this kind. There is no authority directly on the point, but it seems to me that the position is fairly clear. Once the arbitrators have disagreed and appointed an umpire they are functus officio as arbitrators. If they attend, as they do, the hearing before the umpire, it is as advocates for the parties who appointed them, for unless they attend in that capacity as representatives of the parties, they have no right to discuss the matter with the umpire at all. And as advocates for the parties they present the evidence and conduct the argument, as in this case the buyers' arbitrator presented the evidence and conducted the argument for the buyers, and the sellers' arbitrator presented the evidence and conducted the argument for the sellers.

It seems to me a necessary implication that a person appointed, as the arbitrators are at this stage of the proceeding, to act as advocate for the parties, must have all the necessary powers to agree to the form of the procedure; to admit, for instance, facts, and to agree to the method of proof of fact. And it does not seem to me that it can possibly be said to be outside the implied authority of an arbitrator acting in those circumstances to waive or agree to any irregularity in procedure which occurs.

Therefore, whether or not it was improper, strictly speaking, for the sellers' arbitrator to read the opinion of counsel without making it plain that he was adopting it as part of his argument, it seems to me that it was such an impropriety or irregularity as could be waived by the advocate of the other side, and was plainly waived by the buyers' arbitrator.

This decision makes it unnecessary for me to consider whether the course adopted by the sellers' arbitrator was an improper course or not. He says in his affidavit that he read the opinion as a convenient way of putting his argument in support of the sellers' contention that the rejection was invalid. I doubt very much whether that course would have amounted to an irregularity, even if it had not been waived. It has, however, been waived and the question does not arise.

In my view there was no misconduct, however technical, on the part of the umpire in following a procedure in which, even if irregular, the irregularity was waived by the representative on each side, who, in my view, had implied authority from the parties so to waive those irregularities.

The motion accordingly fails.

Motion dismissed with costs.

Company—Exempt private company—Settlement of sum of money by principal shareholder—Settlor's shares in company subsequently brought into settlement by purchase with part of settled sum—Whether "will or family settlement disposing of the shares . . ."—Companies Act, 1948 (11 & 12 Geo. 6, c. 38), ss. 127, 129 (1), (2) (a); Sch. 7, para. 3 (1) (b); para. 3 (2) (b).

On March 19, 1951, the principal shareholder in a private company executed two settlements whereby, in the case of each settlement, £200 was settled on trusts for certain members of his family. On the same day the company resolved that £50,000, being part of its undivided profits, should be capitalised and applied in paying up in full 10,000 first preference shares, 10,000 second preference shares and 30,000 "B" ordinary shares, which should, on March 19, 1951, be distributed among the ordinary shareholders in the proportion of one first preference share and three "B" ordinary shares for each ordinary share. The settlor thereby became entitled to a large number of shares, and, on the same day, immediately after the passing of the resolution, he allotted to the trustees of the first settlement 10,000 second preference shares and to the trustees of the second settlement 30,000 "B" ordinary shares, in consideration, in each case, of the sum of £150 to be paid to him out of the settled sum of £200, so that the shares were held on the trusts of the settlements together, in each case, with the remaining balance of £50.

On a summons by the company to determine, in effect, whether on the assumption that the settlements were "family" settlements within paragraph 3 (2) (b) of Schedule 7 to the Companies Act, 1948, each was a settlement "disposing of the shares" within paragraph 3 (1) (b) of the Schedule or whether, as a result of the transactions the company had lost its status as an exempt private company under section 129 [1] of the Act:—

[1] Companies Act, 1948, s. 129: "(1) A private company shall be "excepted from the requirements "imposed by section 127 of this Act "if, but only if—(a) the conditions "mentioned in the next following "subsection are satisfied at the date "of the return and have been satis-"fied at all times since the commence-"ment of this Act. . . . (2) The "said conditions are—(a) that the "conditions contained in the Seventh "Schedule to this Act are satisfied "as to the persons interested in the "company's shares and debentures. ". . . ."

Sch. 7: "1. The basic conditions "as to the shares or debentures of "the company whose exemption is in "question are—(a) that no body cor-"porate is the holder of any of the "shares or debentures. . . . (b) that "no person other than the holder has "any interest in any of the shares "or debentures. . . . 3.—(1) The "basic conditions shall be subject "to exceptions for— . . . (b) any "shares or debentures held by trus-"tees on the trusts of a will or "family settlement disposing of the "shares or debentures. . . . (2) for "the purposes of this paragraph— . . . "(b) the expression 'family settle-"'ment' means a settlement made "either—(i) in consideration or con-"templation of an intended marriage "of the settlors' issue or . . . (ii) "otherwise in favour of any of the "following persons, that is to say the "settlor, his parents and grand-

Held, that, on their true construction, the words "the trusts "of a will or family settlement disposing of the shares" in paragraph 3 (1) (b) of Schedule 7 to the Companies Act, 1948, meant the trusts of a will or settlement where the shares formed part of the estate of the testator or were settled by the settlement, and did not include the case where shares came to form part of the will fund or settlement by a change of investment; the settlements, therefore, were not settlements disposing of the shares within paragraph 3 (1) (b) and, accordingly, the conditions for exemption were not satisfied, and the company had lost its status as an exempt private company.

Seddon v. Lord Advocate [1954] A.C. 257; [1954] 1 All E.R. 255, H.L. applied.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

On March 19, 1951, a settlor, Prenn, the principal shareholder in a private company, the Truvox Engineering Co. Ltd., the plaintiff in the present summons, settled £200 on trust for his sisters and his issue, and the issue and spouses of any of them, who were described as the "specified class." Clause 1 of the settlement provided that the trustees should from and after the date of the settlement stand possessed of the £200 on trust "to invest or to apply the same in any of the investments "or for any of the purposes hereinafter authorised with power "at any time and from time to time to vary any such investments "or purposes for others of a like nature." Clause 2 provided: "The trustees shall stand possessed of the said cash and the in-"vestments and the property for the time being representing the "same (all of which are hereinafter collectively referred to as "the 'trust fund') on the following trusts. . . ." Then followed a number of trusts in favour of the members of the specified class. Clause 6 contained an investment clause in the widest possible terms enabling the trustees to invest the trust fund as they liked as though they were absolutely entitled thereto beneficially.

On the same day, March 19, 1951, the plaintiff company resolved that a sum of £50,000 being part of its undivided profits should be capitalised and applied in paying up in full 10,000 first preference shares, 10,000 second preference shares and 30,000 "B" ordinary shares, and that the shares should be distributed among the ordinary shareholders on March 19, 1951, in the proportion of one first preference share and three "B" ordinary shares for each ordinary share. Under that resolution the settlor became entitled on that day to have a large number of these preference and ordinary shares allotted to him. On the same day, immediately after the passing of the resolution, the settlor allotted to the trustees of the settlement 10,000 second preference shares in consideration of the sum of £150 to be paid by the trustees to him out of the sum of £200, so that, 10,000 second preference shares became held on the trusts of the settlement together with the balance of £50.

"parents and any other individual "who at the date of the settlement is "a member of the company or, in the "case of a settlement of debentures, a "member or debenture holder of the "company, and the wife or husband "and issue, and the wife or husband "of any of the issue, of the settlor, "his parents, or any such other indi-"vidual, and persons taking in the "event of a failure of the issue or "any class of the issue of any person "taking under the settlement. . . ."

On the same day, March 19, 1951, the settlor also executed a second settlement of £200 on similar trusts for his wife, sisters and issue and the spouses (other than the settlor) of any of them, to the trustees of which, who were the same as the trustees of the first settlement, there were allotted 30,000 "B" ordinary shares in the company in consideration for £150 paid out of the settled sum of £200.

On July 8, 1960, the company took out this summons, to which the Board of Trade was defendant, asking, inter alia, (1) whether, assuming that both settlements were "family settlements" within the definition in paragraph 3 (2) (b) of Schedule 7 to the Companies Act, 1948, each of them was a family settlement "disposing of the shares in the company" at the date of the summons subject to the trusts thereof respectively within paragraph 3 (1) (b) of that Schedule, notwithstanding that those shares were not expressly settled by the settlements or either of them (a) by virtue of the fact that the shares were for the time being subject to the trusts of those settlements and each of them; (b) by virtue of the fact that the settlor by implication settled those shares in that the shares were in the case of each settlement within the definition of the trust fund the trusts whereof were declared by the settlor.

E. Blanshard Stamp for the Board of Trade.

The case cited in argument is referred to in the judgment.

CROSS J. stated the facts substantially as set out above and continued: The question raised by this summons, is whether the result of that transaction was to cause the company to lose its status as an exempt private company. Under section 127 of the Companies Act, 1948, there are various requirements with which companies, generally speaking, have to comply: for example, they have to make a return of their balance sheets and so on. Section 129 (1) of the Act provides: "A "private company shall be excepted from the requirements "imposed by section 127 of this Act if, but only if—(a) the "conditions mentioned in the next following subsection are "satisfied at the date of the return and have been satisfied at "all times since the commencement of this Act . . . ," and subsection (2) provides "the said conditions are—(a) that the condi- "tions contained in the Seventh Schedule to this Act are satisfied "as to the persons interested in the company's shares and deben- "tures. . . ."

Paragraph 1 of the Seventh Schedule provides: "The basic

"conditions as to the shares or debentures of the company whose "exemption is in question are—(a) that no body corporate is the "holder of any of the shares or debentures." Nothing turns on that in this case. "(b) that no person other than the holder has "any interest in any of the shares or debentures. . . ." If that paragraph stood alone, of course, the existence of any trust holding would prevent a company being an exempt private company, but one finds in paragraph 3 what are described as "exceptions for cases of death and for family settlements." Paragraph 3 (1) provides: "The basic conditions shall be subject to "exceptions for (a) any shares or debentures forming part of the "estate of a deceased holder thereof, so long as administration "of his estate has not been completed . . ."; so when a holder of shares dies, so long as his executors are administering the estate, although they are not beneficially entitled to the shares, the exemption is not lost. I am not, however, concerned with that sub-paragraph in this case. I am concerned with the next sub-paragraph (b) "any shares or debentures held by "trustees on the trusts of a will or family settlement disposing "of the shares or debentures . . ." Those are the words which I have to construe in this case "a will or family settlement dis-"posing of the shares or debentures."

To complete the picture I should refer to two other passages in the Seventh Schedule which have been relied on in the argument. Paragraph 3 (2) reads: "For the purposes "of this paragraph—(a) shares or debentures held by trustees on "trusts arising on an intestacy shall, if the shares or debentures "or an interest therein formed part of the intestate's estate at "the time of his death, be treated as if the trusts arose under a "will disposing of the shares or debentures." and (b): "The "expression 'family settlement' means a settlement made "either (i) in consideration or contemplation of an intended "marriage of the settlor"—that does not arise here—or: "(ii) "otherwise in favour of any of the following persons, that "is to say the settlor, his parents and grandparents, and "any other individual who at the date of the settlement "is a member of the company or, in the case of a settle-"ment of debentures, a member or debenture holder of the "company, and the wife or husband and issue, and the wife "or husband of any of the issue, of the settlor, his parents, or "any such other individual, and persons taking in the event of a "failure of the issue or any class of the issue of any person "taking under the settlement. . . ." It is to be observed that, although there is no limitation as to the nature of the beneficiaries under the trusts of a will, the beneficiaries under a family settlement must be members of a comparatively limited class of persons closely connected with the settlor.

The problem which arises is whether the words "the "trusts of a will or family settlement disposing of the "shares" mean that the shares must have been owned by the settlor at the date of the settlement and settled by him, or whether the words are satisfied by a settlement such as this which was not a settlement of the shares but was a settlement of cash where the shares come to form part of the trust fund subsequently as a result of a purchase by the trustees.

Counsel for the company admitted that the fact that in this case the £150 was applied in the purchase of the shares on the same day as the settlement was executed is irrelevant. If his argument is right, the result would be just the same if the shares had been bought many years after the execution of the settlement on the occasion of some change of investment.

It is argued on behalf of the company that if the words in question are construed as referring only to shares originally settled by the settlement, inconveniences may arise which the legislature can hardly be thought to have contemplated. It is pointed out, for example, that if a settlor settled some shares in a private company by a family settlement, and then subsequently the company made a bonus issue of further shares, it might be argued, if the Board of Trade is right, that those bonus shares were not shares disposed of by the settlement, and that, therefore, the exemption would be lost. Whether or not in that particular case it would be possible to say that the bonus shares should be treated as included in the original shares it is not for me to say. But granted that on the Board of Trade's construction there may be cases which would lead to inconvenience I am clearly of opinion that as a matter of construction of paragraph 3 (1) (b) the Board of Trade is right. To begin with, if the company's construction is right, the words "disposing of the shares" add nothing to the words "shares held on the trusts of a will or family settlement." They might just as well have been left out. Then I think that the words "the trusts of a will or family settlement "disposing "of the shares" refer naturally to the trusts of a will or settlement where the shares formed part of the estate of the testator or were settled by the settlement and do not, prima facie, include cases where the shares came to form part of the will fund or the settlement fund by a change of investment.

Finally, I think that other parts of this Schedule contain evidence supporting that construction. First, for paragraph 3 (2) (a) to apply, the shares in question have to form part of the intestate's estate at the time of his death. It is only in that case that the trusts are to be treated as if they arose under a will disposing of the shares. It clear that if an administrator, where there were trusts arising under an intestacy, acquired shares in a private company by an investment of trust money, they would not fall within the paragraph and the exemption of the company would then be lost. So far as I can see, there is no reason for drawing a distinction between the case of an intestacy and the case of a will. So, in my judgment, that paragraph supports the view that I have formed as to the meaning of the words "dispos-"ing of the shares." The matter seems to me to be made even plainer by the definition of "a family settlement." If the intention was that the trustees of a settlement made by a settlor who did not own the shares at the time when he made the settlement could acquire shares in a private company under a wide investment clause, without causing the company to lose its exemption, I cannot see any reason why the settlement should have to be a settlement made on the family of the settlor. On the other hand, if the requirement is, as the Board of Trade argues, that the settlor must own the shares at the time when he makes the settlement, then it is natural that this settlement should have to be a settlement on his immediate family as opposed to a settlement on other persons.

I should add that I am confirmed in the view I take as to the meaning of the words "disposing of the shares or debentures" by the decision of the House of Lords in Sneddon v. Lord Advoate,[1] to which counsel for the Board of Trade called my attention. The words there construed were the words "any property taken under a disposition made by the deceased" in section 38 (2) (a) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881. In that case there had been a settlement of a sum in cash, and the cash had been applied in the purchase of investments. The question was whether the investments which constituted the trust fund when the settlor died could be said to be property taken under the settlement. The House of Lords said not, but that the property taken under the settlement was simply the sum of cash. Although the words are different, I think that that case does support the conclusion at which I have arrived.

I will declare that neither settlement is a settlement within the definition in paragraph 3 (1) (b) of Schedule 7 disposing of the shares, and that the company is, accordingly, disentitled to the status of an exempt private company. The company will pay the costs.

Declaration and order accordingly.

APPEAL (No. 32 of 1959) from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Cyprus dated January 14, 1959, allowing an appeal from a judgment of the District Court of Paphos dated June 27, 1958.

Ismail Katri Bey (hereinafter referred to as "the deceased") died domiciled in Cyprus in 1954. He was survived by his wife, two daughters and two sons and predeceased by another son, Nevzat Ismail. During his lifetime Nevzat Ismail had received from the deceased £1,650 worth of movable and immovable property by way of advancement or under marriage contract. Two of Nevzat Ismail's children, Ismail Nevzat Ismail Eff and Zahite Nevzat Ismail Eff, and his wife, Zalihe Veli, survived the deceased.

Ismail Nevzat Ismail Eff and Zahite Nevzat Ismail Eff, the appellants before the Board, suing by their mother as next friend, brought an action against their grandmother, uncles and aunts aforesaid, claiming relief in connection with the deceased's estate under the Cyprus Wills and Succession Law. The defendants counterclaimed that the plaintiffs must bring into hotchpot, in calculating their share in the statutory portion and undisposed portion (if any) of the estate, the sum of £1,650 advanced to Nevzat Ismail. At the trial before the District Court of Paphos it was agreed between the parties that the question whether the plaintiffs were liable to bring the £1,650 into hotchpot was the only issue remaining between the parties. The District Court (Zenon P.D.C. and Attalides D.J.) gave judgment for the plaintiffs with costs of both parties to be paid out of the estate of the deceased. The defendants appealed to the Supreme Court (Zekia and Zannetides JJ.) who allowed the appeal with costs of the appeal but directed that the order for costs in the District Court should stand. Pursuant to leave granted by the Supreme Court the plaintiffs appealed to the Judicial Committee.

The following cases, which were not referred to in the judgment, were cited in argument: In re Natt [2]; Proud v. Turner [3]; Lloyd v. Tench [4]; In re Young [5]; In re Morton. [6]

July 27. The following judgment of their Lordships was read by Lord Keith of Avonholm. [His Lordship stated the facts, read sections 44 (a), 46, 49 and 51, and the relevant part of the First Schedule of the Cyprus Wills and Succession Law, 1942, and continued:] In their Lordships' view the Supreme Court has reached the right conclusion. The question is void of authority and turns wholly upon a construction of the relevant sections. "Share" in one context may mean a fraction or proportion of a whole. In another context it may mean the amount taken as a share, or the portion. The two meanings may be found in section 44. Under (a) "share" indicates the fraction to which a widow is entitled. In the proviso, however, the word "share" would seem to refer more naturally to the amount taken as the widow's portion. In section 46 and the First Schedule "share" would seem naturally to refer to the proportion to which the beneficiaries are entitled. For present purposes sections 49 and 51 are the more material sections. Their Lordships would read "share" in section 49 as referring to the amount taken under the statutory distribution, so that a child (or children) of a person who has died in the lifetime of the deceased is entitled only to the amount that his father would have taken if he had survived the deceased. If matters had stood there, no difficulty would arise, for the child's portion would merely be calculated on the fractional basis which applied to his father. But section 51 comes into play. Under that section a child of the deceased who survived his parent would have to bring into account "in reckon-"ing his share" any property received from the deceased in the matters specified. "Share" here clearly refers to the amount taken as a share and not to any fraction which may form the basis of calculation. It is contended, however, for the appellants that they take not as representing their father but in their own right, and that it is only sums that they receive from the deceased that have to be brought into account in computing their share. As they received no property from the deceased they are entitled to the fraction of the estate to which their father was entitled without any deduction. This contention has great force and attractiveness if section 51 is construed in isolation. But in their Lordships' view that is not the proper approach. The sections must be read as a whole. It is not possible to know what the appellants' father would have taken as a share without assuming that he had survived his father and applying the rule laid down by section 51. Under section 49 the appellants are entitled "only "to the share which their parent would have taken if he had survived the deceased." As has already been said "share" cannot be read here as meaning merely a fractional part. Therefore the appellants must bring into account what their father received from the deceased.

This is substantially the view taken by the Supreme Court, and in their Lordships' view they were right. It is supported also by the fact that in section 44 (a) a child of the deceased is treated as represented by his descendants.

In the course of the argument some references were made to English law, but in their Lordships' view English law has no application to this case.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

than the covenant to pay, and the power of sale had not arisen, the plaintiff would not require payment of the principal sum until December 5, 1965, and charged a certain dwelling-house by way of legal mortgage with the payment of the money due under the mortgage. The defendant by the same deed assigned to the plaintiff a policy of assurance securing the payment to him of the sum of £500 in August, 1965, covenanting that he would punctually pay all premiums for keeping the policy on foot. In 1958, negotiations took place with a view to the purchase of the property by the plaintiff from the defendant who, thinking he was going to sell the property to the plaintiff, stopped paying the premiums on the policy. The negotiations broke down and, in March, 1960, the plaintiff issued a summons under R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A,[1] for possession of the property. On May 26, 1960, the defendant went to see the plaintiff and asked him to sign a letter agreeing to the reinstatement of the policy, and, on the following day, the plaintiff wrote to the defendant saying that he had consulted his solicitor and they agreed that he ought to agree to the defendant paying the overdue premiums on the policy, and that he had signed the letter which the defendant had asked him to sign. The defendant thereupon paid the arrears of the premiums. In June, 1960, the defendant's solicitors wrote to the plaintiff's solicitors asking them to confirm that no further action was being taken in the proceedings, to which the plaintiff's solicitors replied that the proceedings would certainly go on. At the date of the hearing the defendant was no longer living at the property:—

Held, (1) that, on the construction of the legal charge, the mortgagee's power of sale was exercisable at the date of the issue of the summons and that, since the defendant had not established that what was said by the plaintiff at the interview on May 26, or in the subsequent letter, was intended to affect the legal relationships between the parties, or that the plaintiff had so conducted himself that he could not be heard to say that he did not intend to affect those legal relationships, the plaintiff was not estopped from saying that the power of sale was still exercisable.

Dictum of Denning L.J. in Combe v. Combe [1951] 2 K.B. 215, 220; [1951] 1 T.L.R. 811; [1951] 1 All E.R. 767, C.A. applied.

(2) That, since the defendant had done nothing towards making any arrangements to pay off the mortgage during the four months since June, 1960, and he was not living in the property, it was not a case in which the court should exercise any discretion in his favour; and that, therefore, the plaintiff was entitled to an order for possession within 28 days.

Quaere whether the the power of the court, in its discretion, to adjourn a mortgagee's summons for possession under R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A, does not extend to the case of a mortgage which is not payable by instalments.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

On December 5, 1955, the plaintiff, Jonathan Frederick Braithwaite, sold a cottage known as No. 4, The Avenue, Spittalbrook, Hoddesdon, Hertfordshire, one of four adjoining cottages, to the defendant, Arthur Lewis Winwood, for £650. On the same day the defendant executed a legal charge on the property in favour of the plaintiff for the sum of £500 without interest. Clause 1 of the legal charge provided: "In consideration of £500 now "paid by the mortgagee to the mortgagor (the receipt whereof the "mortgagor hereby acknowledges) the mortgagor hereby cove-"nants with the mortgagee that he will pay to the mortgagee "on the 5th day of March next the sum of £500 without interest "provided always and it is hereby agreed and declared that if the "mortgagor shall duly and punctually observe and perform all "the covenants by him (other than the covenant for payment "of the principal sum) and the agreement and provisions herein "contained and if the power of sale applicable hereto shall not "have arisen the mortgagee will not call in or require payment "of the principal sum before the 5th day of December 1965." By clause 2 the defendant charged the property by way of legal mortgage with the payment of the principal sum and all other moneys payable under the legal charge. By clause 3 the defendant assigned to the plaintiff a policy of assurance with the Royal Liver Friendly Society securing the payment to him of £500 at the end of 10 years from August 26, 1955, at an annual premium therein mentioned. Clause 4 contained the usual proviso for redemption, and clauses 5 and 6 various covenants by the defendant including, in clause 6 (iv), a covenant that the defendant would during the continuance of the legal charge punctually pay all premiums for keeping the policy on foot. The mortgage did not contain an attornment clause.

In 1958 the local authority served notices of their intention to obtain a clearance order with regard to the property and the three other adjoining cottages owned by the plaintiff. Thereupon the plaintiff began negotiations with the defendant with a view to repurchasing the property so that he could redevelop it together with the other three cottages if they were all pulled down. In July, 1959, the defendant left the property and went to live elsewhere. Further, thinking that he was going to resell the property to the plaintiff, he stopped paying the premiums necessary to maintain the policy, with the result that the society converted it into a fully paid policy of £184 10s. The negotiations for the resale of the property broke down and, on March 16, 1960, the plaintiff issued an originating summons under R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A, asking for an order that the defendant deliver possession of the property to the plaintiff, and pay the plaintiff the sum of £500 due to him under the covenant. In his affidavit in support of the summons the plaintiff alleged that his power of sale had arisen and become exercisable by reason of the defendant's breach of the covenant to pay the premiums. In his affidavit in answer the defendant explained why he had not paid the premiums, and said that the amount due to the society together with interest up to May 9, 1960, was £52 8s. 4d., which sum he had in hand and was ready and willing to pay. He also said that he wished to be allowed to pay the arrears to the society and to retain possession of the property.

On May 17, 1960, when the summons came before the master, the plaintiff did not ask for an order for payment but only for an order for possession. The master made an order for possession within 28 days of service of the order but, subsequently, at the request of the defendant, he adjourned the summons to the judge.

On May 26, 1960, the defendant went to see the plaintiff and asked him to sign a letter to the society by which the plaintiff was to agree to the defendant reinstating the policy. The plaintiff consulted his solicitors and, on May 27, 1960, wrote to the defendant "referring to your call at my house last night, "I have now had a word with my friend Mr. Stanley [his "solicitor] and he and I both agree that on grounds of justice I "ought to agree to your paying the overdue premium on your "insurance assigned to me with the Royal Liver Society, and I "have accordingly signed the form and sent it along in the "envelope which you handed to me." The defendant, having received that letter, paid to the society the arrears of premiums needed to reinstate the policy and, on June 15, 1960, his solicitors wrote to the plaintiff's solicitors: "We write to confirm that £67, "being the amount required for premiums up to date by the "Royal Liver Friendly Society, has been dispatched to the "society and we have asked that they confirm this payment to "you. Please then be kind enough to confirm to us that no "further action is being taken against Mr. Winwood on the "proceedings instituted against him." The plaintiff's solicitors replied on June 16: "We thank you for your letter of June 15 "contents of which are noted. We must make it clear to you "that the present proceedings will certainly go on. There has "been a grave breach of covenant by Mr. Winwood and our "client is entitled to possession and will press the judge for an "order to that effect. You will appreciate that the master has "already made an order for possession but Mr. Winwood objected "to this and asked for the case to go to the judge. That being "so the judge must hear the case which has been adjourned to "him and is likely to come up for hearing quite soon."

On October 13, 1960, the summons came before the judge; the defendant appeared in person and the summons was adjourned to enable him to be legally represented. At the date of the hearing the clearance order in respect of the property had not yet been confirmed.

Nathaniel Micklem for the plaintiff.
J. Maurice Price for the defendant.

No cases other than those referred to in the judgment were cited in argument.

CROSS J. stated the facts and continued: Both parties asked me to decide, not simply the question whether or not the plaintiff ought to have possession of the property, but also the entirely separate question whether the plaintiff is now entitled to exercise the power of sale. I agreed to do this, and for this purpose I allowed both parties to give oral evidence supplementing their affidavit evidence and each was cross-examined by counsel for the other.

On the question of whether or not the power of sale is exercisable, it is first necessary to decide what is the meaning of clause 1 of the legal charge. The Law of Property Act, 1925, draws a distinction between the arising of the statutory power of sale and its exercise. Section 101 (1) of the Act provides that where the mortgage is made by deed, as this mortgage was, a mortgagee shall, by virtue of the Act, have the following powers: "(1) a power, when the mortgage money has become due, to "sell." Under an ordinary mortgage, the mortgage money becomes due six months after the date of the mortgage, and the power of sale arises then; but section 103 of the Act provides that the mortgagee shall not exercise the power of sale, although it has arisen, unless and until either (i) notice requiring payment of the mortgage money has been served and default has been made for three months in the payment of the principal, (ii) some interest payable under the mortgage has been in arrear and unpaid for two months, or (iii) there has been a breach of some provision contained in the mortgage deed.

It is difficult to apply the distinction between the arising and the exercise of the power of sale to clause 1 of this deed. To say that the power of sale arose on March 5, 1956, makes nonsense of the proviso, because the proviso is that the mortgagee will not call in the principal money until December 5, 1965, if the covenants be punctually observed and if the power of sale shall not have arisen. I think that this clause really draws no distinction between the arising of the power of sale and the moment when it becomes exercisable. What, in effect, the mortgagee is saying is: "If you comply with all the covenants, I will not call in the "money until December 5, 1965, but on your default the power "of sale shall at once arise and become exercisable." Any other construction would make nonsense of the clause.

Braithwaite v. Winwood.

Cross J.

On that footing, the power of sale was exercisable at the date of the issue of the summons, because at that time there was a subsisting breach of covenant, namely the failure of the defendant to keep up the premiums, which had not been in any way contributed to by the plaintiff. The question is whether the subsequent events estop the plaintiff from saying that the power of sale is still exercisable.

Counsel for the defendant relied in this connection on the principle of equitable estoppel which is conveniently stated by Denning L.J. in Combe v. Combe.[1] The material words are these: "where one party has, by his words or conduct, made "to the other a promise or assurance which was intended to "affect the legal relations between them and to be acted on "accordingly, then, once the other party has taken him at his "word and acted on it, the one who gave the promise or assur-"ance cannot afterwards be allowed to revert to the previous "legal relations as if no such promise or assurance had been "made by him, but he must accept their legal relations subject "to the qualification which he himself has so introduced, even "though it is not supported in point of law by any consideration "but only by his word."

What is said is that at the interview on May 26, and by his letter of May 27, the plaintiff in effect promised the defendant that if the defendant paid up the arrears, he, the plaintiff, would not rely on the defendant's having allowed the policy to lapse as a default which enabled him to exercise the power of sale. The evidence as to what passed at the interview on May 26 is not very satisfactory. The defendant said that the question of his retaining possesion was discussed at the interview and that he took it, after receiving the letter, that the plaintiff was withdrawing the proceedings. The plaintiff, on the other hand, said that he did not remember the defendant asking to be allowed to remain in possession, that, if he had been asked to dscontinue the action, he would certainly have refused, and that he thought that the defendant had no justification for taking the letter as meaning that the proceedings would be dropped. It is unfortunate that the plaintiff did not state in the letter what was clearly stated by his solicitors on June 16, after the policy had been reinstated, that his consent to its reinstatement had nothing to do with the discontinuing of the proceedings and did not imply that he was going to discontinue them. However, it must be for the defendant to establish the equitable estoppel and, on the evidence, I cannot hold that what was said by the plaintiff at the interview or in the letter was intended to effect the legal relations of the parties or that the plaintiff so conducted himself that he cannot be heard to say that he did not intend to affect the legal relations of the parties. After all, his consent was needed to the reinstatement of the policy in any case because he was the legal owner of it, and he may well have thought the defendant wished to reinstate the policy quite apart from any effect that it might have on the proceedings. On that footing, I need not consider whether what the defendant did, namely, paying up the premiums, would or would not be a sufficient acting on the plaintiff's assurance or promise to found the estoppel, supposing that I had thought that there was a promise or assurance by the plaintiff.

I now have to turn to the question whether the plaintiff ought to have an order for possession, which is a totally different matter. The position before the Judicature Acts, 1873 and 1875, was quite clear; under the ordinary mortgage where the legal estate in fee simple was given to the mortgagee, the mortgagee could at once take possession if he wished to do so, and the Court of Chancery would never grant an injunction restraining him from doing so. Of course, the Court of Chancery had its own weapon which it used against a mortgagee who did take possession. He would have to account strictly for his receipts in any redemption proceedings; but equity never intervened by injunction to prevent the mortgagee exercising his legal right to take possession. After the Judicature Acts, the two jurisdictions were fused, but the mortgagee's right to obtain an order for possession was a right which was enforced in the Queen's Bench Division and not in the Chancery Division. In 1936, by R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A, claims for payment and for possession under mortgages were transferred to the Chancery Division, and the mortgagee was deprived of the right to sign judgment for possession in default of the defendant's appearance which hitherto he had had in Queen's Bench Division proceedings. Since 1936, now that the matter has been transferred to this Division, the plaintiff has to prove his case before he can get an order for possession, even though the defendant does not appear. In 1936 certain practice directions [2] now appearing in the note to Order 55, r. 5A, in the Annual Practice, were issued for the guidance of masters in these cases. I only need read a short passage from them. Under the heading, "Relief Claimed," there are these words [3]: "When possession "is sought and the defendant is in arrear with any instalments "due under the mortgage or charge and the master is of opinion "that the defendant ought to be given an opportunity to pay off "the arrears, the master may adjourn the summons on such "terms as he thinks fit, and if the defendant is in default of "appearance direct the plaintiff's solicitor to communicate such "terms to the defendant by letter."

In Hinckley and South Leicestershire Permanent Benefit Building Society v. Freeman [4] the question was raised whether this part of the practice direction was valid. It was argued that, although the plaintiff now had to prove his case and could not sign judgment in default of appearance, nevertheless when once he had proved his case, the court had no power to refuse an order for immediate possession in order to give the mortgagor time to make arrangements to have the mortgage transferred to someone else or otherwise to put his affairs in order. That argument was rejected by Farwell J. in the Hinckley case,[5] and Upjohn J. approved that decision in the later case of Robertson v. Cilia.[6] Having had the Hinckley case[7] cited to him, he said[8]: "No doubt I "have power to adjourn this matter for a reasonable period to "give the mortgagor an opportunity of making some offer accept- "able to the mortgagee and if necessary trying to find means of "discharging the loan altogether. That was the whole object "of the alteration in 1936; namely, to prevent a mortgagee "turning a mortgagor out of possession almost literally overnight "without giving him an opportunity to meet and try to satisfy his "creditor."

Both those cases were cases of building society mortgages repayable by instalments to which the part of the practice direction to which I have referred expressly relates. In the subsequent case of Four-Maids Ltd. v. Dudley Marshall (Properties) Ltd.,[9] Harman J. expressed the view that what was said in those cases did not apply to ordinary mortgages where the money lent was not repayable by instalments; that, in such cases, the court had no discretion, and that once the mortgagee proved his case the order for possession must go. Though I hesitate very much to differ from him, I cannot see the logic of the distinction. I can well understand it being held, as was argued in the Hinckley case,[10] that the function of the court in these cases is limited to seeing that the plaintiff proves his case and that the mortgagee cannot be deprived of a legal right by a rule of court or a practice direction. But, if once one accepts as Harman J. does, that the court has power to give time, even when the mortgagee has proved his case, I cannot see why that power should be only exercisable in the case of mortgages repayable by instalments, although I appreciate there may be much more occasion for exercising it in the case of a mortgage of the house in which the mortgagor is living than in the case of mortgages of other property.

Assuming, however, that I have a discretion in this matter, I do not think that I ought to exercise it in the defendant's favour. It was, no doubt, understandable that he should have stopped paying the premiums in 1959 because he thought that he was going to sell his house back to the mortgagor. Again, when the negotiations broke down, he was at once anxious to reinstate the policy and until he got the plaintiff's solicitors' letter of June 16, 1960, it was not unreasonable for him to think that once he reinstated it he would be safe. Therefore, if this case had come before me at the end of June, I might have been disposed to give the defendant a period of time to see whether he could not arrange to have the mortgage transferred; but for the last four months the defendant has done absolutely nothing. He has just let the matter drift on, and he is not in fact living on the property. All he says is that if the clearance order is not confirmed and the property remains standing, he would like to go back and live there; and if the property is demolished he would rather sell the site himself than allow it to be sold by the plaintiff together with the sites of the other three houses.

In these circumstances, I do not think that he is entitled to any more indulgence than he has already had. Therefore, I propose to make an order for possession now. Logically, I suppose it might be said that I ought to make it operative at once, but I shall make it operative in the usual way, 28 days after service.

Declaration that the power of sale under the mortgage was exercisable. Order for possession within 28 days of service of the order.

[COURT OF APPEAL.]

* NATIONAL PIG PROGENY TESTING BOARD v. GREENALL (VALUATION OFFICER).

[LVC/1861/1958.]

C. A.
1960

Lord Evershed M.R., Harman and Donovan L.JJ.

Rating—Agricultural building—Pig progeny testing research station—Surrounding land arable meadow or pasture—Buildings—Whether occupied together with and used solely in connection with agricultural operations on the land—"Agricultural land"—"Agricultural "buildings" — "Thereon" — Meanings — Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928 (18 & 19 Geo. 5, c. 44), s. 2 (2).

By section 2 (2) of the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, "agricultural land" is defined as meaning "land used "as arable meadow or pasture ground only . . ." and "agricultural "buildings" to mean buildings "occupied together with agricul-"tural land . . . used solely in connection with agricultural "operations thereon."

The respondent board was concerned with the improvement of pigs and carried on business at litter testing stations, where young pigs were reared within doors under carefully-controlled conditions and various tests were carried out on them. One of these stations comprised, in addition to the buildings, nearly 7 acres of land which had been acquired in an uncultivated state. The land was ploughed and harrowed twice but its future use had not been decided upon at the material time. The Lands Tribunal, reversing the decision of the local valuation court, held that the land and the buildings were an "agricultural hereditament" and should be derated. The valuation officer appealed. It was conceded that the buildings were occupied with the land:—

Held, (1) that the land was "agricultural land" as defined in section 2 (2) of the Act of 1928.

(2) That the buildings were used for the agricultural operation of raising pigs but that at the material time when the proposal to rate was made, there was no connection between that use and any agricultural operations on the land, and that, accordingly, the buildings were not "agricultural buildings" and the hereditament was not exempt as an "agricultural hereditament."

(3) That the expression "thereon" in section 2 (2) meant "on "the land" and not "on the holding."

Thompson v. Milk Marketing Board [1952] 2 Q.B. 817; [1952] 2 T.L.R. 231; [1952] 2 All E.R. 344, C.A. and Perrins v. Draper [1953] 1 W.L.R. 1178; [1953] 2 All E.R. 863, C.A. followed.

Decision of Lands Tribunal reversed.

Appeal from the Lands Tribunal (Mr. Erskine Simes Q.C.) on a case stated.

The National Pig Progeny Testing Board appealed from a decision of a local valuation court for the West Riding of Yorkshire (North) given on September 24, 1958, confirming the assessment of a hereditament described as "Litter testing "station," Station Road, Hambleton, with a gross value of £3,300, net annual value of £2,747 and rateable value of £2,198. The ground of the appeal was that the hereditament was an agricultural hereditament and was entitled to exemption from rating pursuant to section 67 of the Local Government Act, 1929. It was agreed that if the contention was unsound the values determined by the court were correct.

At the hearing before the Lands Tribunal the following facts were proved or admitted: The cost of the building was £110,000. The normal cost of commercial piggeries was £22 per pig. The hereditament was formerly a litter testing station which was acquired by the board and it was due to this fact that the land was greater in area than that at the board's other stations. The feeding stuffs for the pigs which were standard mixtures arrived at the hereditament in sacks, and the same standard mixtures were used also at the other stations. The board would not operate the station but for the data which they obtained in relation to pigs reared there. The board were awaiting the report of a working party before deciding as to which of the proposed uses the land should be put. The final decision rested with the board.

The board were a company registered under the Companies Act and their objects as set out in the Memorandum of Association so far as material to this case were: "(i) To promote, under-"take and encourage education, research and experiments and "the collection and recording of information with the aim of "improving the production of pigs and in particular to carry on "the progeny testing of pigs at progeny testing stations in Great "Britain. (ii) In so far as is necessary for or incidental to the "achievement of the objects aforesaid but not further or other-"wise: (a) To acquire, transport, insure, breed, feed, keep, kill "and sell or otherwise dispose of pigs."

The hereditament comprised an area of 9 acres of which ·83 of an acre was covered by buildings, 1·37 acres used for roads, car park, sewage disposal plant and middens leaving 6·80 acres, which when the board took possession in August, 1957, was "a wilder-"ness of weeds covered with builder's rubble." By the date of the proposal in March, 1958, this area had been twice ploughed and harrowed, but its future use had not definitely been decided. There were two proposed uses, (i) to grow corn from which about 25 per cent. of the straw required in the buildings might have been obtained and grain equal to about 5 per cent. of the food used in those buildings though the grain would have been sold and would not necessarily have come back as part of the food so used, or (ii) to lay down to grass so as to provide facilities for raising and feeding pigs in the open as an alternative method of testing to that used in the buildings. In fact the future use had even then not been definitely determined and an attempted grass ley had proved unsuccessful owing to weather conditions in that year (1959).

The main building had a total area of 34,254 square feet and provided accommodation for 400 pigs, each of which was housed in a separate pen. The building was provided with central heating and air conditioning to ensure uniform conditions throughout. . . . The board had a headquarters office at Letchworth and five outstations of which the appeal hereditament was one. A breeder wishing to have the progeny of a particular boar tested communicated with the headquarters and four pigs of a litter not more than nine weeks old and weighing not more than 45 lb. were, through the headquarters, sold to the board at the current market price less a testing fee of £5 and delivered to the most convenient outstation. At this station they were kept each in a separate pen and fed until they reached a weight of 200 lb. when they were sold to a bacon factory for slaughter. During their stay in the station records were kept of the food consumed daily and their weight each week and any diseases or ailments from which they suffered. The carcasses were also measured and particulars taken at the factory by one of the staff employed at the station and all the records were sent to headquarters for compilation and reports were sent to the breeders from these headquarters to which also payments were made by the factory. . . . The purpose was to feed and raise the pigs as they would be fed and raised on an ordinary commercial pig farm save that each pig was kept in a separate pen and conditions were provided to ensure uniformity so as to ensure proper comparisons. Weighing also took place more frequently than on a commercial pig farm.

C. A.
NATIONAL PIG PROGENY TESTING BOARD v. GREENALL.

As a consequence of this keeping in separate pens, the buildings were considerably larger than would be necessary for keeping 400 pigs on a commercial pig farm where there would normally be about ten pigs to a pen, and a larger staff had to be employed. At this station there were a manager, four pigmen and a station clerk, while in a commercial piggery one and half men would normally be sufficient to look after 400 pigs.

It was admitted in cross-examination that with the present system of testing, land other than that on which the buildings stood was not necessary and in fact the other outstations all occupied much smaller areas than the one in question, the sites varying from three and a half to six acres, and any land not occupied by buildings was grassed down and not used in connection with the station but as amenity land only. The buildings at each station were identical.

It was submitted on behalf of the board that the raising of pigs was an agricultural purpose and it mattered not that the object of raising them was to provide a service to breeders and counsel referred to Thompson v. Milk Marketing Board.[1] He distinguished the decision of the Lands Valuation Appeal Court in relation to the outstation at Bridge of Allan on the ground that the court were there bound by the finding of fact that the primary purpose of the station was "to give information and advice to "breeders of pigs with the intention of improving the quality of "bacon" and contended that, in considering whether the buildings were agricultural, one should look at what was done and not at the object with which it was done. He further contended that it mattered not if the buildings were ancillary to the land or the land ancillary to the buildings, or if the land was necessary only as a screen or amenity to the buildings and he referred to Hallam v. James.[2] He also referred to Perrins v. Draper[3] and Hardie v. Hastie.[4]

Mr. Raymond Phillips on behalf of the valuation officer contended that there could be no agricultural building unless there was "agricultural land" within the definition in section 2 (2) of the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928,[5] and that on the facts in the present case it was impossible to say that the land was "used" as "arable or pasture" at the date of the proposal. Alternatively, he contended that even if the land was agricultural, its user in connection with the testing carried on in the buildings was de minimis. He contended that the buildings could not be said to be used solely in connection with any agricultural operations on the land and that the purposes for which the buildings themselves were used were not agricultural since the object of their user was testing.

Mr. Erskine Simes Q.C. said: "I have come to the decision "that the land was 'agricultural land' within the Act. It seems "to me quite ridiculous to suggest that because at a certain date "land, which has been in bad condition and obviously requires "considerable cultivation before it can produce, is still undergoing "such cultivation is not being used as arable or pasture. No "one would doubt that a field lying fallow was still agricultural "land within the statute even though for the time being it was "not being used to grow arable crops or pasture. Nor do I think "that because, at a particular point of time, the cultivator has "not finally made up his mind as to the purpose for which he "will use the land, that fact can deprive it of its character as "agricultural land, if his intention is to use it for growing crops "or providing pasture, and I am satisfied by the evidence that "it was the intention of the board to use it for one or other of "these purposes. It seems to me, therefore, that the first part "of the definition of an 'agricultural building' is satisfied and "that these are 'buildings occupied together with agricultural "'land.'

"I find more difficulty when I have to consider whether they "are 'used solely in connection with agricultural operations "'thereon.' In the first place I am faced by the decision of the "lands valuation court of Scotland in the case of a precisely "similar station that is not 'used for agricultural purposes only.' "I am not of course bound by that decision which rested upon "the definition of agricultural land and buildings in Scotland "which differs from that which I construe and the court in that "case was bound by the findings of fact that the primary purpose of the station was to give information and advice to "breeders. I differ with respect from the decision of the Scottish "court for it seems to me that in considering the use of a building "one must look at what is done in the building and it is, I "think, clear from the evidence before me that this building is "used for the raising of pigs. It is true that during the course "of this raising records are kept with greater particularity than "on a commercial station and that the pigs are kept in conditions "which differ from those on a commercial farm but the building "is used solely for the keeping and rearing of pigs which seems "to me clearly an agricultural purpose. The collation of records "and the drawing of inferences therefrom, the preparation of "reports and the sending of such reports to breeders is not done "on the premises but at the headquarters at Letchworth which "is also responsible for buying the pigs and receiving the price of "the carcasses from the factory.

National Pig Progeny Testing Board v. Greenall.

"I am satisfied by the evidence that at the date of the proposal the land was under cultivation with the intention of using it for a purpose connected with the operations carried on in the buildings.

"In these circumstances it seems to me that having regard to the decision of the Court of Appeal in Thompson v. Milk Marketing Board[6] as applied by this tribunal in Hallam v. James[7] the hereditament is an agricultural hereditament and, therefore, entitled to derating.

"The appeal will, therefore, be allowed, a direction given that the hereditament be deleted from the valuation list for the Selby rural district rating area and the valuation officer will pay to the board their costs to be agreed, or in default of agreement taxed by the registrar of the Lands Tribunal on the High Court scale."

The valuation officer appealed.

Anthony Cripps Q.C. and Raymond Phillips for the appellant valuation officer.

Lionel A. Blundell Q.C. and J. T. Plume for the respondent board.

In addition to the cases referred to in the judgment the following were cited in argument: Smith v. Richmond[8]; Parry v. Anglesey Assessment Committee[9]; Hallam v. James[10]; Hardie v. Hastie[11]; Newcastle City Council v. Royal Newcastle Hospital.[12]

Cur adv. vult.

October 19. Lord Evershed M.R. The judgment which Harman L.J. is about to deliver is the judgment of the court.

Harman L.J. stated the facts and continued: The valuation officer's proposal was to rate both buildings and land at a gross value of some £3,000 and a rateable value of £2,198. That proposal was accepted by the local valuation court in September, 1958, but an appeal to the Lands Tribunal heard in January, 1960, was successful and the land and buildings were held entitled to be derated as an agricultural hereditament. The valuation officer appeals to this court.

The answer depends upon the true construction of section 2 (2) of the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928. Under section 67 of the Local Government Act, 1929, agricultural land or agricultural buildings are entitled to exemption from rates. To identify these one must turn to the Act of 1928, which is in these terms: Section 2 (2): "In this Act the following expressions "have the meanings hereby respectively assigned to them: "'Agricultural land' means any land used as arable meadow or "pasture ground only, land used for a plantation or a wood . . . "'Agricultural buildings' means buildings (other than dwelling-"houses) occupied together with agricultural land or being or "forming part of a market garden, and in either case used solely "in connection with agricultural operations thereon."

It seems to us clear that on this section "agricultural land" is distinct from "agricultural buildings," though either is an "agricultural hereditament." The respondent in order to succeed must, therefore, show that his land is "agricultural land" and that his buildings are "agricultural buildings." The only words appropriate to the former are "land used as arable meadow or "pasture ground only." We agree with the president of the tribunal that this land passes this test. A decision had been made to put it to an agricultural use. It has been ploughed and harrowed, operations essential to that end, and the fact that at the moment of the proposal in March, 1958, the owners had not decided to which agricultural use it should be put does not seem to us fatal to their submission.

That the buildings should rank as agricultural buildings they must pass two tests: first, they must be "occupied together with "agricultural land" and, secondly, must be "used solely in "connection with agricultural operations thereon." It is conceded that these buildings are occupied together with the land which we have held to be agricultural land. They, therefore, pass the first test. The use to which the buildings are put is clear. It is the raising of pigs. True these are not raised in the normal commercial way and the object is not to make a profit by the sale of the carcasses but to collect statistical information for the help of farmers. Nevertheless it seems to us clear that this is an "agricultural operation." The crucial point is whether this use is connected solely with agricultural operations on the land. In our judgment the respondent's case breaks down at this point. The use of the buildings in March, 1958, appears to us to have had no connection at all with any agricultural operations on the land. Those operations had not got beyond the stage of ploughing and it was quite uncertain what the future might bring. It was argued that if it was decided to grow corn the straw produced would provide the necessary connection, while if grass were laid down the future experiments in open air pig rearing would do the like. This may be left to be argued when it happens. The relevant date was the date of the proposal, namely, March, 1958, and at that time and indeed when the case was stated in January, 1960, the question was still undecided. The intention found to exist to use the land for one of these purposes is not the same thing as its user for them or one of them. We cannot agree that the use of the buildings had at the relevant time any connection with the use of the land. The appeal, therefore, succeeds.

NATIONAL PIG PROGENY TESTING BOARD v. GREENALL.

As to the cases cited to us, Thompson v. Milk Marketing Board [1] was quite different. The land there was at the relevant date being used for purposes very much connected with the use of the buildings. Both in that case and the later case Perrins v. Draper,[2] the Court of Appeal held that the word "thereon" at the end of the section meant "on the land," and not as Mr. Blundell would have us believe "on the holding." In our judgment we are bound to follow those expressions of opinion.

Appeal allowed with costs in the court and before the Lands Tribunal. Costs before the tribunal on the High Court scale.

Ordered that the hereditament should stand entered in the valuation list with a gross value of £3,300, a net annual value of £2,747 and a rateable value of £2,198.

Leave to appeal refused.

Company—Winding up—Appeal from liquidator—Rejection of proof by liquidator—Power of appellate court.
Conflict of Laws — Foreign judgment — Immovables — Mineral action involving mining rights—Action to enforce.

The proof of debt of a foreign applicant was rejected by the liquidator of a British company in voluntary liquidation. The proof claimed that the applicant was a creditor of the company in respect, inter alia, of his contingent claim pending in Yugoslavia for the review of the decision of the Supreme Court of Serbia in 1955 reversing a judgment which he had obtained against the company in the county court of Belgrade in 1954 or, alternatively, of his claim to be indemnified for his loss caused by the company's wrongful exploitation, prior to December, 1946, of mining rights vested in him in Yugoslavia.

Roxburgh J. upheld the liquidator's rejection of the proof on the ground, inter alia, that the Belgrade judgment was in personam, and that the company had never submitted to the jurisdiction of the Yugoslav court.

The applicant appealed:—

Held, (1) that as, for the reasons set out below, the judge had been wrong in law in excluding the applicant's proof, the matter had still to be determined by the Companies Court, and that it was not possible to dispose of it finally upon appeal.

applicant, Radomir N. Pachitch (Pasic), a resident of Switzerland and apparently a Serb by birth, for an order that a decision of the respondent, the liquidator of Trepca Mines Ltd., a British mining company in voluntary liquidation, rejecting a claim by the applicant to be a creditor of the company for £2,616,486, be reversed and the proof ordered to be admitted in full. The proof alleged that the company "was at the date "of the commencement of the winding up [June 3, 1957], and "still is, justly and truly indebted to the applicant in the sum "of approximately £2,500,000, with interest at 4 per cent., "(1) in execution of the judgment of the county court of Bel-"grade of February 10, 1954, or alternatively, (2) being the "value of the creditor's contingent claim now pending in the "county court of Belgrade and the Supreme Court of Serbia "for a review of the decision of the Supreme Court which reversed "the judgment of February 10, 1954; or alternatively (3) being "the value of the said creditor's claim to the ownership of all "mining rights vested in his father, Nikola Pachitch (Pasic), on "his said father's death on December 10, 1926, and exploited "by the company until December 5, 1946, when the mining "rights were nationalised by the Federal Republic of Yugo-"slavia; or alternatively (4) being the value of the above-named "creditor's claim to be indemnified for his loss as a result of the "wrongful exploitation of the mining rights by the company "and their nationalisation as aforesaid; or alternatively (5) "being the value of the above-named creditor's claim that the "company should account to him for the profit wrongfully made "by them by the exploitation of the mining rights as aforesaid."

On appeal to the registrar following the rejection of the proof by the liquidator the matter was not finally concluded. The registrar adjourned the matter to the judge of the Companies Court after counsel who then appeared for the applicant had put forward the contention that the applicant was entitled to rely upon the judgment of the Belgrade court.

On October 20, 1959, Roxburgh J. upheld the decision of the liquidator, holding that the Belgrade judgment was in personam and that the applicant's claim was barred by the Limitation Act, 1939. The applicant, who did not speak English, appeared before Roxburgh J. in person. The applicant appealed.

HODSON L.J. This is an appeal from an interlocutory judgment of Roxburgh J.[1] given on October 21, 1959, whereby he rejected an application by the applicant to reverse the decision of the liquidator of Trepca Mines Ltd. rejecting the proof of debt of the applicant for the sum of approximately £2,500,000. This court is asked to set aside the judge's order and to admit the proof either in whole or in part, or to remit the case to a judge of the Companies Court in order that the question at issue between the parties may be decided, it being contended in this court that the judge in two respects made an error in law in rejecting the applicant's proof so that he was deflected from the task which was before him of himself assessing the claim.

I think it is convenient in this connection to refer to a recent decision of Buckley J., In re Kentwoood Constructions Ltd.,[2] where, there having been a petition to wind up the company and the claimants, a firm of chartered accountants, having been employed to investigate the company's affairs, the claimants lodged a proof of debt in the winding up for £525 for professional services: the liquidator rejected the proof, and the claimants issued a summons asking that the decision of the liquidator might be reversed and that the proof be ordered to be admitted in full. The judge, in considering the matter before him, had to consider whether it was open to him to receive evidence as to the amount of the claim and whether he could (as the rules provide) accept the claim not wholly but in part. He said[3]: "It was argued on behalf of the liquidator that the "question before the registrar was simply whether the liquidator "was right or wrong, on the evidence available to him at the "date when he rejected the proof, in rejecting the proof. I do "not think that is really the function of the court on an appeal "from a rejection of a proof. When application is made to the "court to reverse a decision of a liquidator in rejecting a proof, "evidence is filed which is very commonly much fuller than "the evidence available to the liquidator at the time when he "decides to reject the proof; and the court is bound to decide "the rights of the claimant in the light of the evidence which "is before the court, and not merely to express a view as to "whether the liquidator was right or wrong in rejecting the "proof when he rejected it." The judge concluded by saying[4]: "It is not merely the function of the court to say that a decision "is right or wrong; it may vary it in any way it thinks necessary in the light of the evidence before the court. The court "must approach the question de novo and determine to what "extent the claimants ought to be allowed to rank as a proving "creditor."

I refer to that case as showing that the position as I see it is this, that, if (as the applicant contends) the judge was wrong in law in the two points which he took, which excluded the applicant's proof, the matter still must be determined by the court, that is to say by the judge of the Companies Court, and that really it is not possible to dispose of the matter finally upon this appeal.

The only other matter to which I need refer by way of preface is this. The applicant himself, although he had been represented by counsel before the registrar, appeared before the judge in person. He did not speak English: he conducted the proceedings through an interpreter. The proceedings were conducted in English so far as the court was concerned as the court was listening to the English language through the mouth of the interpreter. But the difficulties of the judge were no doubt enhanced by the fact that, in a difficult matter, questions of law were left to be decided by him without any assistance from trained lawyers acting on behalf of a man who had not command of the English language.

[His Lordship then stated the facts as to the proof and continued:] Although the proof has been rejected on the ground that the judgment of February 10, 1954, was no longer in existence—because, indeed, it has been reversed by a judgment of an appellate court dated September 5, 1955—the judge dealt with the matter in a different way, because he held that the judgment was not effective, being a judgment in personam, and was governed by the principle of Emanuel v. Symon.[5] The principle enunciated in that case is to be found I think most conveniently stated in the judgment of Buckley L.J.[6]: "In "actions in personam there are five cases in which the courts of "this country will enforce a foreign judgment: (1) Where the "defendant is a subject of the foreign country in which the judgment has been obtained; (2) where he was resident in the "foreign country when the action began; (3) where the defendant in the character of plaintiff has selected the forum in "which he is afterwards sued; (4) where he has voluntarily "appeared; and (5) where he has contracted to submit himself "to the forum in which the judgment was obtained." Buckley L.J. continued: "The principle upon which this court proceeds "in enforcing foreign judgments is stated by Blackburn J. in

"Schibsby v. Westenholz[7] in these words: 'We think that for "'the reasons there'—i.e., in the case of Godard v. Gray[8]— "'given, the true principle on which the judgments of foreign "'tribunals are enforced in England is that stated by Parke B. "'in Russell v. Smyth,[9] and again repeated by him in Williams "'v. Jones,[10] that the judgment of a court of competent juris- "'diction over the defendant imposes a duty or obligation on "'the defendant to pay the sum for which judgment is given, "'which the courts of this country are bound to enforce; and "'consequently that anything which negatives that duty, or "'forms a legal excuse for not performing it, is a defence to "'the action.'"

In the events which happened in the present case, the defendant never having submitted to the jurisdiction of the Yugoslav court, if the rule in Emanuel v. Symon[11] applies (as the judge thought) there could be no basis for this claim to succeed on the footing of a foreign judgment. But the difficulty about applying that decision in itself is this: that this is not simply a judgment in personam, it is a judgment in a mixed action which involves mining rights. The claim was a claim corresponding to a claim in this country for conversion of the concentrates which were extracted from the land, in pursuance of a claim made by the applicant to the mining rights, which are (as indeed has been conceded in argument in this court) immovable; and for the purposes of what is conveniently called the rule in British South Africa Co. v. Companhia De Moçambique[12] the position is this: this court will not entertain actions in respect of immovables which are situate in a foreign country. I think it is sufficient to read the headnote of that case.[13] "The Supreme "Court of Judicature has no jurisdiction to entertain an action "to recover damages for a trespass to land situate abroad; the "rules of procedure under the Judicature Acts with regard to "local venue (Ord. 36, r. 1) did not confer any new jurisdic- "tion." Accordingly, so far as the mining rights themselves are concerned, quite apart from the claim for conversion, the only competent court is the court of Yugoslavia; so that the judge's way of disposing of the judgment is not, I think, a satisfactory or proper answer to the applicant's claim in the present case.

It is quite true that that does not solve the problem, but it leaves open the question whether the applicant can, in any proceedings in this country, claim for conversion, relying upon a judgment of the courts of his own country in so far as that judgment deals with a right to immovable property. It is true that the judgment of the court in his favour for £2,500,000 was reversed by the Court of Appeal; but proceedings were taken by him after that in order to restore his earlier judgment. On the same day as the commencement of the winding up, on June 3, 1957, some proceedings were taken which failed, I think, in the subsequent month of July. He again, as we are informed, put in train proceedings which he is entitled to take in his own country, for the purpose of upsetting the judgment of the court which reversed the judgment in his favour, on the ground that he has found fresh evidence. It is quite true that this may be a very slender basis for the valuation of what would be a purely contingent claim; but the value of that contingency has never in fact been assessed at all. The position was that lawyers on both sides gave their attention (in the form of affidavits) to the prospects of success or otherwise of the proceedings which are now said to be on foot; and orders were made that those gentlemen should attend for the purposes of cross-examination before the judge. We were told that the lawyers who represented the applicant at any rate did in fact present themselves, but that no assessment of the contingency was ever made because of the course taken by the judge in, as it were, brushing aside the judgment altogether.

The point was taken late in argument in this case that in any event the judgment of the Yugoslav Court of Appeal in 1955, which reversed the judgment of 1954, ought not to be regarded in this country as of any validity because its decision was against public policy. It is said that the applicant had obtained a final judgment and that what happened was not an appeal in the ordinary sense of the word at all but that a third party, namely, a representative of the State, whose title corresponds roughly to that of the prosecutor or Procurator-General in this country, intervened and, after argument as a third party, obtained a reversal of the decision. No authority has been adduced to us on this topic, but it is said that for that reason one ought not in this country to pay regard to a judgment which reverses a final judgment when the reversing judgment has been obtained in that way. Secondly, it is said that on perusal of the judgment it shows that political considerations entered into the reasoning of the court which are foreign to our ideas of the administration of justice and therefore it is against public policy that the judgment should be recognised.

I am unable to accept the second argument. It was not pursued at great length; and it was admittedly (as counsel said) a matter very largely of first impression. But on reading the judgment of 1955, so far as I can tell it was a judgment which was based on legal grounds and not so tainted with political considerations as to make it absurd from our point of view to regard it as a judgment in the juristic or legal sense.

So far as the first point is concerned, it does not seem to me that the mere fact that the system of law of another country allows a judgment to be overturned by the intervention of a legal official, call him the Procurator-General or what you will, makes the judgment disentitled to respect as a judgment. So the position is, as I see it, that there is a contingency to be valued.

Mr. Scarman, on behalf of the liquidator, says that the argument based on British South Africa Co. v. Companhia De Moçambique,[14] if accepted, really destroys the other part of the claim. The other part of the claim (I leave out paragraph (3); and paragraphs (4) and (5) are really the same) relates to "the value of "the . . . creditor's claim to be indemnified for his loss as a "result of the wrongful exploitation of the mining rights by the "company and their nationalisation as aforesaid"—that is, during the period between his father's death in December, 1926, and December 5, 1946. I do not think it does destroy it. I think it destroys the claim only to this extent, that it is impossible for the claimant to rely on the judgment as a judgment in personam. This disposes of his claim under paragraphs (1) and (2); but if he succeeds in obtaining a judgment in Yugoslavia he can rely upon it as a judgment settling the right to the immovable property which must form the basis of any claim for conversion or the like which he may make, founded upon that declaration of his right to the mining rights.

The judge dealt with the claim with which I am now dealing in this way: The liquidator had disposed of the whole of this claim from the father's death because he said it was barred by the Limitation Act, 1939. It was pointed out, however, that the company were operating in the country between 1938 and 1941, when they were turned out by the Germans, and there could not be any possibility of their converting any of the concentrates before 1938 unless in some way they inherited the liability of their predecessor in title, some other company, before 1938: nor could they have converted any of these concentrates after 1941, when the Germans came into the country. But there still remains the period of three years, and the question then arises whether a claim relating to that period is barred by the Limitation Act, 1939.

The judge took the view that the claim as formulated was really based on the judgment, and the alternative claim was a claim from December 10, 1926, and no other date, and he was not at first prepared to entertain a claim from 1938 unless such a claim were formulated before him. In that state of affairs, he asked the applicant whether he was anxious or willing to amend, to which he received a negative reply, and thereupon he said: "There is no claim from 1938: the only claim is from 1926, and that claim is barred."

[His Lordship referred to the Limitation (Enemies and War Prisoners) Act, 1945, and said that Roxburgh J. was in error in the way in which he dealt with the limitation point, because although the claim from 1938 to 1941 would, in the ordinary course of events, be barred, it could be saved by the provisions of the Act of 1945. His Lordship continued:] So far as the legal points are concerned, it seems to me that the applicant succeeds in this court in showing that his claims have not been assessed, for reasons which were not in themselves good reasons, and that they still must be assessed by the court. It is quite true that it is open to the court to assess those claims at a nil figure. It is a course which is very seldom taken, in cases of winding up: the authorities show that, and the rule indeed indicates that.

I do not propose to pursue that matter further, because the judge who will have to handle this matter will be well aware of his duties, and, indeed, it is open to him to direct that the claim be not entertained unless an action is brought. There is no need for the contingency to be valued upon the facts as they appear today. But that is a matter for him. It seems to me that the matter must be assessed; and in that connection consideration will necessarily have to be given to the evidence which has been put before the court as to what the prospects are in Yugoslavia in relation to the action in connection with the immovables. It was argued on behalf of the liquidator that there was in fact nothing to be assessed, that there was no judgment at the time of the commencement of the winding up, namely in 1957, because at that time the judgment of 1954 had been reversed and, therefore, there was no basis for the claim. That argument I think fails, having regard to the fact that although the value of claims has to be assessed at the date of the commencement of the winding up, what happens subsequently to that date must necessarily be relevant in order to find out what the real value of that claim may be. That, I think, appears from the judgment in In re English Assurance Co., Holdich's Case.[15] Lord Romilly M.R., referring to the opinion which had been expressed by Lord Cairns, said[16]: "No doubt the day of the winding-up order is the time at which "the value of the policy or annuity is to be calculated; but sub-"sequently facts may be given in evidence for the purpose of "showing what the real value was at that time, such as the "sudden death of the annuitant or of the assured, in the one "case a benefit to the company, in the other to the estate of the "assured." The principle which is referred to in that case, and subsequently in In re Northern Counties of England Fire Insurance Co., MacFarlane's Claim,[17] seems to me to show that it is not a complete answer to this claim to say that there was nothing in existence at the date of winding up, that there was no judgment and nothing upon which the claimant could found. In my judgment, therefore, the matter must be sent back for further consideration.

There was a further argument addressed to this court which derives from the decision in a matrimonial case, Travers v. Holley,[18] where it was held in a divorce suit that where the courts of New South Wales and the English courts claimed the same jurisdiction, it would be contrary to principle and inconsistent with comity if the courts of this country refused to recognise a jurisdiction which mutatis mutandis they claimed for themselves. Arguing from that, reliance was placed upon a dictum of Denning L.J. in In re Dulles' Settlement (No. 2).[19] Denning L.J., dealing with the same or a kindred point, but obiter, in considering the operation of R.S.C., Ord. 11 (which deals with service out of the jurisdiction), said[20]: "The plaintiff [in Harris v. Taylor[21]] sued "the defendant in the Isle of Man for a tort committed there. "The defendant was not in the island, but the Manx court gave "leave to serve him out of the jurisdiction of that court, on the "ground that the cause of action was founded on a tort com-"mitted within their jurisdiction. The defendant entered a "conditional appearance in the Manx court and took the point "that the cause of action had not arisen within the Manx juris-"diction. That point depended on the facts of the case, and it "was decided against him; whence it followed that he was "properly served out of the Manx jurisdiction in accordance with "the rules of the Manx court. Those rules correspond with the "English rules for service out of the jurisdiction contained in "Order 11; and I do not doubt that our courts would recognise a "judgment properly obtained in the Manx courts for a tort "committed there, whether the defendant voluntarily submitted "to the jurisdiction or not; just as we would expect the Manx "courts in a converse case to recognise a judgment obtained in "our courts against a resident in the Isle of Man, on his being "properly served out of our jurisdiction for a tort committed "here."

An argument was addressed to this court, based upon the view of Denning L.J. as to what would be fair in such a case as this, having in mind the provisions of our own Order 11, rule 1 of which reads: "Except in the case of a writ to which rule 1A of "this Order applies, service out of the jurisdiction of a writ of "summons or notice of a writ of summons may be allowed by "the court or a judge whenever . . . (b) Any act, deed, will, con-"tract, obligation, or liability affecting land or hereditaments "situate within the jurisdiction, is sought to be construed, "rectified, set aside, or enforced in the action . . . (ee) The action "is founded on a tort committed within the jurisdiction." It is argued, relying on the observations of Denning L.J., that in effect we should in this case ignore the position as it has always been understood in this country since not only Emanuel v. Symon[22] but other cases which have been decided, and give effect to the judgment of the Yugoslav court in toto, whether it is an action in personam or not. I find myself unable to take that step. The decision in Travers v. Holley[23] was a decision limited to a judgment in rem in a matter affecting matrimonial status, and it has not been followed, so far as I am aware, in any case except a matrimonial case. Moreover, it is quite clear from the legislature's recognition of the rule in the Foreign Judgments (Reciprocal Enforcement) Act, 1933, that the classification of actions which was referred to by Buckley L.J. in Emanuel v. Symon[24] has been recognised in this country. Having regard to the Act of 1933, it would be a step which I for one am not prepared to take, to say that the Travers v. Holley[25] point really affects the whole of this question of jurisdiction as to the enforcement of a foreign judgment, and that Emanuel v. Symon[26] ought to be treated as a case which need not be regarded as binding upon this point because the court there had not addressed itself thereto.

The appeal should be allowed, for the reasons given earlier in my judgment.

Ormerod L.J. I agree, and for the same reasons.

Harman L.J. I also agree. The proof claims one astronomical sum under five heads. It seems to me that the first head is excluded by the fact that there is no judgment subsisting—there neither was at the date of the winding up nor is there now any judgment subsisting in the applicant's favour.

As to (2), the contingency is the chance that he may, by procuring a reversal of the Supreme Court's decision against him in 1955, once more become possessor, so to speak, of a judgment in his favour. Even so, for the reasons given by my Lord, that would not as such be enforceable in this country: therefore (2) goes.

As to (3), that appears to be based on the value of the applicant's ownership of these mining rights in 1926, if he did own them at that time, upon which he founds his cause of action. That claim has long since been barred: therefore (3) goes.

But (4) and (5)—which are equivalent the one to the other—may under certain circumstances have some value, and Roxburgh J. did not consider that question because of his mistaken view about the Limitation Act, 1939, and the curious effects of the Act of 1945.

That the appellant's rights to damages are of anything but the most shadowy nature, I am not persuaded. Even supposing him to establish in his own country (which, of course, is the first prerequisite) that he has some title or had some title to these mining rights, there may yet be many answers to his claim in this country for damages for conversion; and in assessing, or trying to assess, the validity of this contingent claim there is a mort of considerations which have not been canvassed in this court but which would provide a defence or reduce the claim to little or to nothing. All that we must leave open because we are not in a position to assess it, nor is it our function so to do; but it will remain for the tribunal of fact to come to a conclusion upon it. Of course the longer the matter goes on without any decision in Yugoslavia in the applicant's favour the more shadowy his claim becomes. I agree, however, that, having regard to the grounds upon which the judge dismissed the claim—which were really in the nature of preliminary points and which are not valid—the appeal must be allowed.

Company—Winding up—Petition—Judgment creditor's petition for compulsory winding up—Opposition by majority of creditors—No evidence supporting opposition—Company insolvent and without assets—Whether opposition of majority conclusive—Discretion of court—Companies Act, 1948 (11 & 12 Geo. 6, c. 38), s. 346.

A petition presented by an unsatisfied judgment creditor for the compulsory winding up of a company was opposed by two out of three creditors. No evidence was filed as to the grounds of opposition. The petitioner showed that the company was insolvent and had no assets with which to pay debts:—

Held, that under section 346 of the Companies Act, 1948,[1] the court had a discretion to decide whether it was just and equitable to order that a company should be wound up and, although the wishes of the majority of the creditors was a relevant consideration, opposition to a winding up by the majority was not conclusive. The exercise of the discretion in favour of a winding-up order was not confined to cases where the petitioning creditor showed that the opposition was founded on irrelevant or improper motives or that the company's business was being conducted fraudulently.

£100. The objects of the company, as stated in its memorandum of association, was to carry on business as general merchants. In April, 1960, A.E.I. Hotpoint Ltd., having issued a writ claiming £584 9s. for goods delivered between October and December, 1959, obtained judgment under R.S.C., Ord. 14, for the sum claimed with costs (a total sum of £603 9s.). On May 5, 1960, execution was issued but the effects were claimed by one F. C. Hopkinson (who bore the same name as one of the two signatories to the memorandum of association). In June, A.E.I. Hotpoint Ltd. presented a petition to have the company wound up by the court but at the hearing two creditors, R. S. Stokvis & Zonen N.V. of Rotterdam, Holland, and Robeck Distributors (London) who had both given notice to the petitioner that they would support the petition, opposed it The amounts of the debts of these two creditors as stated in their notices were £988 14s. 2d. (this being a judgment debt) and £2,129 13s. respectively.

Buckley J. dismissed the petition and the petitioner appealed.

J. R. Bickford Smith for the petitioning creditor.
Ralph Instone for the opposing creditors.

In addition to the case referred to in the judgment of Lord Evershed M.R. the following cases were cited in argument: In re Great Western (Forest of Dean) Coal Consumers' Co.[2]; In re Clandown Colliery Co.[3]

Lord Evershed M.R. This petition was presented by a judgment creditor, A.E.I. Hotpoint Ltd., for the winding up of Vuma Ltd. When the matter came before Buckley J. it emerged that the only other two creditors who are known to exist but who had hitherto supported the petitioning creditor had changed their minds and opposed the making of the order. It is right to say that the amounts owing to the two opposing creditors, which is something to which by section 346 the court should have regard, were considerably more than the amount owing to the petitioning creditor. It is said by Mr. Instone for the opposing creditors that if the majority of the creditors oppose the making of an order, that is the end of the matter unless some special circumstances are shown; and he suggested that the special circumstances which should be shown were that the opposing creditors were acting from some irrelevant or improper motive or that there was some fraud established in the conduct of the company's business. I cannot accept the statement which Mr. Instone makes that his general proposition is the view of everybody in the companies court. The language of the statute, so far as relevant in section 346, is that "The court may, as to

"all matters relating to the winding up of a company, have "regard to the wishes of the creditors . . . as proved to it by any "sufficient evidence," etc. In Palmer's Company Law, 20th ed. (1959), p. 700, it is stated thus: "A petitioning creditor "who cannot get paid a sum presently payable has, as against "the company, a right, ex debito justitiae, to a winding-up order; "even though the assets are overcharged by debentures. This "right to a winding-up order is, however, qualified by another "rule, viz., that the court will regard the wishes of the majority "in value of the creditors, and if, for some good reason, they "object to a winding-up order, the court in its discretion may "refuse the order." It is manifest, if that is a correct statement, that it is very far removed from the proposition submitted by Mr. Instone. In the last edition of Buckley, 13th ed. (1957), p. 450, on the Companies Act the matter is put more as Mr. Instone has stated it: "This right of the creditor, however, is not "his individual right but his representative right as one of a "class. If a majority of the class, viz., the creditors of like "degree, take a different view, the court, in the absence at all "events of special circumstances making an order 'just and "'equitable,' gives effect to such right as the majority desire "to exercise." The cases cited are the same as those referred to in Palmer,[1] and of the cases cited we have been particularly referred to the one in the Court of Appeal recently of In re B. Karsberg Ltd.,[2] and to that I will return in a moment.

[His Lordship stated the facts and went on:] It appears from the evidence before us that the company has no assets whatever, and no attempt has been made on the respondents' side to show that it has any assets or any prospects of successful business. The only other thing that ought to be added is this. It seems that the reason why the opposing creditors took the view they did was that they received through the solicitors representing the company an offer of payment by instalments, and we are told (and of course I accept it) that between the dismissal of the petition and today that offer has been implemented, that is to say, Mr. Bickford Smith for the petitioning creditor says he received in fact a cheque from a firm of solicitors which has been cashed. I have no doubt that the opposing creditors have formed the view in their own, quite natural, material interests that if the petition is dismissed they will get something, and perhaps in due time everything, from whomsoever is providing the money, whereas if the company is wound up they will find an absence of anything available for anybody. That is of course a good explanation of why they oppose the petition. But again I cannot accept Mr. Instone's proposition that if that perfectly relevant view is taken by the opposing creditors the court has no function to perform. The court may, and will, regard the fact that perhaps that is the best chance of the creditors being paid. Against that I confess I am impressed by the circumstance that on the only evidence before us this company has no assets at all. We know nothing about what it has done and it appears to have no prospects whatever, so far as the evidence goes, of having any assets. I would not have thought that, if special circumstances must be shown, that was other than a special circumstance which the court ought to consider in deciding whether this company ought to carry on business.

I need only say a sentence or two about the Karsberg case.[3] That was a case in which the company in question was in voluntary liquidation. Of the fifty-six creditors, fifty-one at least opposed, and their view was that the voluntary liquidation was the best thing for everybody concerned and that in the voluntary liquidation the necessary inquiries and control would be made and exercised. It was pointed out by this court that where a company went into voluntary liquidation a compulsory order would not be made if there were satisfactory grounds, at any rate, shown for continuing the voluntary liquidation and particularly if the vast majority of the creditors thought that was the best thing to do. I cannot see upon the facts and on what Romer L.J. said in that case that it follows that in this case there is nothing more to be said once it is established that two out of the three creditors, who admittedly are owed more than the petitioning creditor, prefer and express their preference for no order and no winding up. Here is a judgment creditor. Any assets which would be or could be found would be subject to execution at once, and, as I say, if special circumstances have to be shown I would have thought on the evidence that enough has been shown. With great respect to Buckley J. I do not think it was right simply to treat the fact of the majority opposition as conclusive. I am persuaded on the material in this case that the court in the exercise of its discretion ought to order a winding up, and I would, accordingly, allow the appeal.

Harman L.J. I agree. In the circumstances disclosed in the petition it was at least incumbent upon those who opposed it to say why they opposed it and to explain to the court what it was that induced them, a company in Ireland and another one in Rotterdam, to leave this hopelessly insolvent and assetless company encumbering the ground. They did not do that, but they persuaded the judge that all he had to do was to count heads. With every respect to him, I do not think that is right. The position shown was one which gave grounds for the gravest suspicion as to the company's trading and as to its position in the commercial community. It was not enough, I think, for two people who had supported the petition simply to walk into court and say: "We now oppose" without putting in an affidavit. Neither the opposing creditors nor the company chose to file any evidence at all, and in my view it is not the law, and never has been, that under those circumstances a judgment creditor is not entitled to his remedy. I observe that in the passage in Buckley, which alone gives some colour to the respondents' case, the creditors are spoken of as "creditors of "like degree." I am not sure I understand what that means. Of the three creditors here one has a judgment on which it has tried to effect execution, the second has a judgment and the third none, and it may be that has something to do with what the textbook says. It does seem to me that a creditor who has pursued his remedy to judgment and has proceeded to execution and finds no assets at the company's place of business other than assets claimed by some third party is at least entitled to put the opposition upon their oath as to why they oppose his otherwise just demands. I would, therefore, allow the appeal.

Appeal allowed: petitioning creditor's costs of the appeal to be paid by the opposing creditors.

Crime — Conspiracy — Complicated charge — "Rolled-up" charge — Undesirability.

The appellants, together with five other persons, were charged on an indictment containing, inter alia, a count alleging conspiracy that, on certain days over a period of 11 years, the accused conspired together to defraud the creditors of a large number of companies, the names of which were set out in the count. Some of the alleged conspirators had had nothing to do with the affairs of some of the companies. The judge, in directing the jury on the need for unanimity in arriving at their verdicts, said: "Sometimes in "the past judges used to tell the juries that they have to be unani-"mous, but I always say—and it is true—you all have to agree "before you can find anybody guilty, and there is no reason I know "of why any judge should worry about that, from my experience, "because whereas in lots of your own affairs, on committees, you do "not always agree, nevertheless those of you who have experience of "board meetings may find that again and again agreement is

The appellants were found guilty of conspiracy. On appeal:—

Held, allowing the appeals, (1) that each member of the jury should return a verdict according to the evidence, and any suggestion that a member should adopt a view which was contrary to that which he really held merely to achieve unanimity would amount to a misdirection; that in the present case a juryman listening to the summing-up might be left with the impression that the necessity for unanimity when reaching a decision had been in some measure relaxed, and since this was not so, the jury had been misdirected.

Appeals against conviction and sentence.

The appellants, Edward Charles Davey and Owen Morris Davey, were charged with five other persons before Judge Maude Q.C., at the Central Criminal Court on an indictment which contained nineteen counts, of which count 1 contained a charge of conspiracy, counts 2, 3, 4 and 5 were charges of causing other persons to execute valuable securities by false pretences, counts 6 and 16 contained charges of circulating false statements with regard to the affairs of certain companies with which the accused were connected, counts 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 14, 15, 17 and 19 were charges of fraudulent conversion, and count 18 was a charge of causing a cheque to be delivered by virtue of a forged instrument. The first appellant was charged upon counts 1, 2, 7, 11 and 16, and the second appellant on all the counts contained in the indictment. Count 1 of the indictment charged all seven prisoners "that on divers days between June 6, 1947, "and June 30, 1958, you conspired together and with persons "unknown to cheat and defraud the creditors and the share-"holders of certain limited liability companies, that is to "say . . ."

Both the appellants were convicted. The first appellant was convicted on the charge of conspiracy only; the second appellant was also convicted on the count of conspiracy and also on eleven other counts contained in the indictment. The first appellant was sentenced to 15 months' imprisonment, and the second appellant was sentenced to a total of seven years' imprisonment.

Both the appellants appealed against their convictions and sentences, inter alia, on the ground that the judge misdirected the jury (the form of the direction is set out in the judgment) and on the ground that the charge of conspiracy was bad in that it charged seven persons with conspiring together to defraud the shareholders and creditors of a large number of companies, and some of the persons charged in the count had had nothing to do with some of the companies.

PILCHER J. The appellants, who are father and son, appeal by leave of this court given in July, 1960, against their convictions and sentences which were as follows: Owen Morris Davey was convicted before the commissioner, Judge Maude, at the Old Bailey in January, 1960, on count 1 of an indictment which contained nineteen counts. Count 1 was a charge of conspiracy to defraud in terms which I will refer to briefly presently; he was also convicted upon eleven other counts, three being in respect of false pretences, five in respect of fraudulent conversion, one for causing a cheque to be delivered by virtue of a forged instrument and two for circulating false statements in regard to the affairs of certain companies with which he was connected. He was sentenced by the judge to two years, two years, two years and one year consecutively, making a total sentence of seven years.

His son, Edward Charles Davey, was convicted on count 1 only, namely, the conspiracy charge, and was sentenced to fifteen months' imprisonment on that count.

Count 1, which was the conspiracy charge, as finally and formally amended, alleged a conspiracy between the two appellants and five other persons that, on divers days between June 6, 1947, and June 30, 1958, they conspired to cheat and defraud the creditors of some fourteen companies, the names of some of which were altered from time to time over the years. Besides the two appellants, a man named White was found guilty on this count and was sentenced to a term of imprisonment of nine months which he has now served, as he did not present any appeal either against his conviction or his sentence.

The case which the commissioner had to try was a long and very troublesome one, involving consideration by the jury of complicated facts extending over a long period. The hearing extended in all for more than two months, and the judge's summing-up extended over four days. Having been granted leave to appeal, Owen Morris Davey presented certain grounds of appeal which were as follows:

"(1) The learned judge misdirected the jury in that he stated "or implied that there was no need or no longer need for the "jury to be unanimous in their verdict.

"(2) The learned judge failed to direct the jury upon the "evidence relevant to count 1.

"(3) Count 1 of the indictment was bad in law in that "separate conspiracies were therein charged as one conspiracy.

"(4) The inclusion of the charge of conspiracy in the indict-"ment was unfair to the accused in that it inordinately "prolonged the trial and impeded the defence with prejudicial "evidence that would otherwise have been inadmissible."

It will be seen that grounds (1) and (4) are comprehensive and, if established, would entitle this court to allow the appeal of both appellants on all counts. Grounds (2) and (3) are directed specifically to the conspiracy charge, ground (2) alleging misdirection by the judge, and ground (3) alleging that the count as framed was bad in law.

It is clear from a perusal of the summing-up and such of the evidence as we have seen, which has not been a great deal, that the case for the prosecution was that Owen Morris Davey was the prime mover in the conspiracy to defraud which lasted over a long period. He was a man who all his life had been interested in the shopfitting and building trades, and from time to time he dealt with all the various persons who were charged with him as co-conspirators under count 1. The case for the prosecution was that he was a completely unscrupulous man who, with the assistance of others who joined him from time to time in the conspiracy, some for longer periods and some for shorter periods, over a period of eleven years in all, had enriched himself, and to a lesser extent his family, by a number of extremely ingenious frauds involving the use, sometimes contemporaneously and sometimes successively, of over a dozen different limited liability companies, and some registered businesses, whereby the creditors and the shareholders of these companies and businesses had been defrauded. His son, Edward Charles Davey, had been working with him from the start of his business career and had originally begun to work with his father as a young man. He was, I think, a draughtsman and acted as secretary to a number of companies, and he was one of the persons charged as a conspirator with his father on the ground that he had been privy to most, if not all, of the offences of which his father was found guilty, and in respect of which his father was said to have conspired.

That is the background of this case, and the first ground of appeal, as I have said, was that the judge misdirected the jury on the question of unanimity. Having dealt generally with what I may call the preliminaries, he said to the jury:

"Sometimes in the past judges used to tell the juries that they "have to be unanimous, but I always say—and it is true—"you all have to agree before you can find anybody guilty, "and there is no reason I know of why any judge should worry "about that, from my experience, because whereas in lots of "your own affairs, on committees, you do not always agree, "nevertheless those of you who have experience of board meet-"ings may find that again and again agreement is reached and "no vote is taken, and hardly ever is a vote taken at a board "meeting, and juries seriously realising what they are doing "are united by a passion for the right verdict, a passion for "stern or real justice, if you like, and the result I should think "is that in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred there is not a "disagreement at all, but solidarity and sense."

Before I deal with that particular passage I may be allowed, on behalf of the court, to make one or two preliminary observations. It seems to us that the ordinary juror who reads the newspapers is probably aware that before a verdict of guilty or not guilty can be reached every member of the jury has to agree with his fellow jurors upon the verdict which is the verdict of the jury as a whole. Each individual juror, when empanelled and sworn, takes a personal oath to render a true verdict according to the evidence. It sometimes happens that a judge assumes that the members of the jury are aware of this fundamental necessity and omits to mention in his summing-up that the verdict of the jury on the issue of guilt or innocence must be unanimous. More often, during the summing-up, having dealt with the question of the burden of proof, he simply reminds the jury that their verdict must be unanimous and that each of them must be satisfied upon the evidence whether guilt has been established or not. On occasion juries, having deliberated for some time, ask for further guidance on some particular point upon which they have difficulty in arriving at a unanimous conclusion, whereupon the jury having returned to the jury-box, the judge gives them such further guidance on the particular point raised as he can, and also deals with the necessity for unanimity in appropriate words.

We have given very careful consideration to the passage which I have read from the summing-up of the judge on the necessity for unanimity. I am sorry to say we find it ill-expressed, in some respects contradictory and extremely difficult to understand. We think that the ordinary juryman, listening attentively, would also find it so and might be left with the impression that, whereas in the past judges had told juries, and told them correctly, that their verdict must be unanimous, the necessity for there to be unanimity of view had now been in some measure relaxed and was no longer of such importance as it used to be in the past. The jurors might also have thought that they were now entitled to regard themselves more as being in the position of committee men or members of a board of directors who, after discussing a particular point on which contradictory views were held, might eventually achieve unanimity in this fashion, namely, that the juror or jurors who held a view contrary to that held by the majority, or held a view upon which he was unable to form a concluded opinion, was entitled, as is a member of a committee or a member of a board of directors, to sink his own view without amending it or calling for a vote, and to agree with the majority of his colleagues although he himself was still in a state of uncertainty. We need hardly add that this course is not permissible to a juror who has taken a personal oath to render a true verdict according to the evidence. There must, of course, be discussion when the jury retire to consider their verdict. A juror may retire to the jury room after a summing-up in a state of doubt or indeed at that moment may hold a view which does not accord with what turns out to be the view of his colleagues. During the discussion his doubts may be resolved or he may be satisfied that the view which he originally held was wrong, in which case unanimity is achieved. A director or a member of a committee may continue to hold his own view, but may sink it in deference to a contrary view held by his colleagues and allow the majority decision to go through. He may also abstain from recording a vote if a vote is taken, in which case unanimity is not achieved.

We should like to refer to two cases which have been cited to us. The first is Rex v. Mills,[1] where the jury, having deliberated for some time, returned for guidance and the recorder at the Central Criminal Court dealt with the question of unanimity in this fashion. He said, repeating the words used by Finlay J. in Rex v. Klein,[2] "... It is of the utmost importance that a "jury should come to a conclusion one way or the other at the "end of a trial, because it is burdensome upon all concerned, "including the accused, because it only means this, that unless "you do, the matter has got to be tried all over again; there-"fore you see the importance and necessity of coming to a "conclusion one way or the other. Now this very eminent "judge said this: That where you have got one or two, a small "minority, in the jury who are thinking perhaps differently from "the others, it is quite consistent with their oaths as jurymen "that they should, after hearing what the others have got to "say, come to the conclusion that they themselves might be "wrong, and it would be consistent with the discharge of their "duty and with their oaths under those circumstances, if they "thought they were wrong, to accept the view of the majority "and come to the conclusion that the majority might be right, "and in that way you come to a conclusion in which you all "agree by the exchange of view, and perhaps a man in the "minority might say: 'Well, I may be wrong.' That is quite "consistent with the discharge of your duty."

[2] C.C.C., February 9, 1932.

On appeal it was contended that that direction by the recorder was incorrect in substance because he had used the words that the jury themselves "might be wrong," and although he had also used the words "if they thought they were "wrong," nonetheless the use of the word "might" vitiated the summing-up of this particular point. Lord Hewart C.J., having dealt first with the point that had been made on behalf of the appellant that the observations of the recorder constituted a misdirection because he had said: "I cannot release you until you have come to a conclusion," and that might amount to putting pressure on the jury, whereas, of course, he could have released them even though they disagreed, said [3]: "The difficulty is, what may have been the effect on the "minds of the jury of the words: 'Where you have got "'one or two, a small minority, in the jury who are think-"'ing, perhaps differently from the others . . .'" Then he read the passage which I have read and continued: "That "would be true only if the minority had been honestly and "sincerely led to come to a view different from the view they "had hitherto held.

"The criticism which has been directed against that passage "is that it may conceivably have led the jury or some members "of the jury to coquette with the notion that, for the sake of "mere conformity or convenience, it would be consistent with "their oaths to make it appear that they accepted a view which, "in fact, they did not accept. Such a conclusion as that would "be quite subversive. A loose acquiescence by a minority in the "view of the majority for the sake of conformity would not merely "be most undesirable, but flagrantly wrong. It is fundamental "that a jury should agree, and by 'agree' is meant honestly "agree, not make a colourable appearance of agreeing." Then he dealt with the other points in that case, including the recorder's final words: "I cannot release you until you have come to a "conclusion." Then he ended up with these words [4]: "There "can be no doubt what the learned recorder intended to convey "to the jury in this case, but he used one or two perilous "phrases which may conceivably have caused some members "of the jury to incline their minds to a wrong view."

That is the first of the cases to which we wish to refer, because it does set out the principle which should govern the question of unanimity where that arises.

The second case is Rex v. Walhein.[5] That again was a case where the recorder at the Central Criminal Court was called upon to assist the jury, who had returned saying they had found difficulty in arriving at a unanimous verdict, and the recorder then addressed them as follows [5]: "You are a "body of twelve men. Each of you has taken an oath to "return a true verdict according to the evidence, but, of course, "you have a duty not only as individuals, but collectively. No "one must be false to that oath, but in order to return a collec- "tive verdict, the verdict of you all, there must necessarily be "argument, and a certain amount of give and take and adjust- "ment of views within the scope of the oath you have taken, "and it makes for great public inconvenience and expense if "jurors cannot agree owing to the unwillingness of one of their "number to listen to the arguments of the rest. Having said "that, I can say no more. If you disagree in your verdict in "relation to one or other of these men, you must say so." In dealing with that matter Lord Goddard C.J. said[6]: "In our "opinion, that was a perfectly satisfactory direction. Jurors "often have to be reminded that the case may be one in which "some of them may start by taking one view and then, finding "that the others are against them, may talk the matter over, "subordinate their views to those of the majority and concur "in the verdict. That is the only way in which juries can "arrive at verdicts."

If the word "subordinate" means sink their own views and adopt a view which is contrary to the view they really hold in order to achieve unanimity, it seems to me that passage from Lord Goddard's judgment runs contrary to previous decided cases, and in particular is in conflict with what was said in Rex v. Mills.[7] We can hardly feel that it would be permissible to attribute that view of the word in view of the decision in Mills, and of the fact that Mills was clearly referred to and was distinguished. Therefore, we think that the words "subordinate their views" must mean come to a different conclusion after proper discussion, and not sink their views in order to achieve unanimity.

The other case to which we were referred was Reg. v. Creasey,[8] which, in our view, does not really take the matter any further, and I only mention it as we were referred to it. It appears to us to support the principle laid down in Rex v. Mills.[9] Those are the only cases to which we would refer.

We have formed a clear view on the matter and it appears to us to be in conformity with the decided cases. If the jury are to be directed on the question of unanimity the direction must be clear. Taking the view which we do, that the judge's direction on this point was confusing and by implication inaccurate, we think it is not only "conceivable," which was the adjective used in Rex v. Mills, but more than possible that the jury, after a very long trial, may have remembered the homely analogy in regard to members of a committee and members of a board of directors suggested to them by the judge in his summing-up, and have arrived at their verdict without a true appreciation of what their duty was as members of a jury, and may have regarded themselves more as being in the position of members of a committee or a board of directors. If they did form that view, or if they may have formed that view, that, of course, would entirely vitiate the whole trial.

It is not suggested here that if the first ground of appeal with which we have been dealing is entitled to succeed, this is a case in which we could properly apply the proviso to section 4 of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907. That means that that point is sufficient to deal with this appeal, but we should like to say a word on count 1, which is dealt with specifically in the third ground of appeal. It is said that count 1 was bad in law, in that separate conspiracies were therein charged as one conspiracy. We could say a good deal on this particular point, but we are quite satisfied that count 1 as it appears in the indictment before us is bad, in that it charges seven persons that on divers days over a period of 11 years they conspired together to cheat and defraud the creditors of a large number of companies, and bad for this reason, that some of the seven conspirators had nothing to do with the affairs of some of the companies, and the first two companies which are mentioned, I think, were wound up in May and November of 1953, and certainly some of the alleged conspirators did not come into the picture until after that date. It is what one might call a "rolled-up" charge of conspiracy. It may well be that it would have been possible to allege a number of separate conspiracies between certain of the seven persons named, one of whom almost certainly would always have been Owen Morris Davey, and may refer in each of the conspiracies to the particular companies which were relevant to that conspiracy. On the other hand, it might have been possible to alter the words of the count, keeping some at any rate of the conspirators in it, if not all, and charge them with conspiring together to float companies with the object of defrauding the creditors of those companies when they were floated. But it seems to us to be quite impossible, and a bad count, to charge all the seven persons there named over a period of 11 years with conspiring to cheat and defraud the creditors of companies, some of which they had never heard of and some of which were not in existence at the time.

We need only mention the two cases of Rex v. West [10] and Reg. v. Dawson.[11] It seems to us that it is perfectly clear from the decisions in both those cases, and perhaps particularly in Reg. v. Dawson,[11] that a charge of conspiracy of this kind should not be "rolled up" in the fashion that this charge was. We only mention that matter because if the conspiracy charge was bad, it may well be that it introduced evidence upon the specific charges against the appellants which otherwise would not have been admissible, and although the ground upon which we think these two appeals against conviction should be allowed is the first ground, namely, the misdirection of the learned judge on the question of unanimity, we feel the conspiracy charge is also fatal to count 1 and possibly also, if further argument had been addressed to us, might have vitiated the convictions on the other charges.

That being so, these two appeals against conviction will be allowed and the convictions quashed.

* In re ANGUS' WILL TRUSTS.
HALL AND ANOTHER v. ANGUS AND OTHERS.

[1960 A. No. 733.]

Will—Construction—Implied gift—Gift of moiety of residue remaining after "my wife has received her jus relictae"—Wife not entitled to jus relictae—Whether implied gift of residue to wife.

By his will, a testator, a Scotsman dying domiciled in England, gave and bequeathed "the moiety of my property that remains "after my wife shall have received her jus relictae" to his trustees on trust to pay certain moneys towards the erection of a memorial and upkeep of his parents' grave and "to pay my wife the interest "on the residue of the property so long as she shall live and at the "death of my wife or if she shall have died before me then I "bequeath the said property in equal shares" to his brothers, sisters, nephews and nieces then living. Under Scottish law the jus relictae was a legal provision accruing to the widow of one dying domiciled in Scotland amounting, where there were no children of the marriage surviving, to one half of the movable property. The testator died in 1957, and his widow died in 1959. There were no children of the marriage, and the whole of the estate was comprised of personal and movable property.

On a summons to determine whether on the true construction of the will the gift of the "moiety" which should remain after the testator's wife should have received the jus relictae extended to the whole of the testator's property or to only one half of it, and whether, if it extended to only half, there was an implied gift of the other half to the widow:—

Held, (1) that it was inconsistent with the terms of the will as shown by the testator's assumption that his wife was entitled to jus relictae, to suppose that he was indicating an intention to make a gift of any property at his disposal except the life interest in the property settled on trust, and there was not, therefore, an implied gift of any part of the estate to the wife.

[Reported by Philippa Price, Barrister-at-Law.]

Adams v. Adams (1842) 1 Hare 537 and Hall v. Leitch (1870) L.R. 9 Eq. 376 considered.

(2) That since the testator believed that his wife was entitled to the jus relictae, that was to one half of his property, and that, therefore, only half of his property remained at his disposal, the word "moiety" in his will meant "one equal half part," so that what was given to the trustees was one half of the testator's property. Accordingly, during the lifetime of the widow, there was an intestacy as to the income of one half of the estate, but on her death it passed to the class entitled under the gift over who then became beneficially entitled to the whole of the residuary estate.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

By his will dated October 16, 1940, and which appeared to be drawn by the testator himself, the testator, John Angus, who was by birth a Scotsman, provided as follows: "I give and "bequeath the moiety of my property that remains after my "wife shall have received her jus relictae unto my trustees "upon trust to pay the sum of £40 for the erection of a suitable "memorial and to hold the sum of £50 for the upkeep of my "parents' grave . . . and to pay my wife the interest on the "residue of the property so long as she shall live and at the "death of my wife, or if she shall have died before me then I "bequeath the said property in equal shares between all such "of my brothers and sisters nephews and nieces who shall be "living at that time."

According to the evidence of a Scottish lawyer, "By the "law of Scotland, jus relictae was a legal provision accruing "to the widow of a person dying domiciled in Scotland out of "his movable or personal succession, wherever situated. It is "in the nature of a debt attaching to the free succession [after "payment of debts and administration expenses] amounting to ". . . one half [of the free succession] where there are no "surviving children." There were no children of the marriage. The testator died on October 14, 1957, domiciled in England, and his widow died on May 31, 1959. The whole of the estate was comprised of personal property.

The plaintiffs, the personal representatives of the widow, took out an originating summons to determine (i) whether on the true construction of the will, the gift of the moiety which should remain after the testator's wife should have received the jus relictae extended to the whole of his property or to only one half of it or whether it failed for uncertainty or otherwise; (ii) whether if that gift of a moiety extended to only one half of the estate, there was on the true construction of the will, a gift by implication or otherwise to the testator's widow of the other half of the estate or whether it was undisposed of.

Peter Giffard for the plaintiffs.

George Hesketh for the defendants, the members of the class of the testator's brothers and sisters, nephews and nieces, who were living at the death of the widow.

Angus' Will Trusts, In re.

The cases cited in argument are referred to in the judgment.

Buckley J. In this case I have to determine a question of construction of the will of a testator named John Angus, who was by birth a Scot, and was born in Scotland, but it is common ground that he died domiciled in England. The only party who would be concerned to say the contrary would be the plaintiffs representing the testator's widow and they do not so contend. [His Lordship stated the facts and continued:] Mr. Giffard, for the representatives of the widow, has submitted that the property which was settled on the trusts under the will consists only of one half of the testator's residuary estate, and that there is an implied gift to the widow of an absolute interest in the other half. On the other hand, Mr. Hesketh, who appears for representative defendants, contends, in the first place, that the gift of the "moiety of my property that remains after my wife "shall have received her jus relictae" means, in the circumstances of this case, the whole of the testator's residuary estate. Alternatively, he says, if it only means one half, then there is an intestacy as to the income of one half of the residuary estate during the life of the testator's widow but after her death the whole of the residuary estate is given to the class of beneficiaries whom his clients represent. Mr. Giffard in support of his argument says, not unnaturally, that when the testator gives the moiety of his property it is impossible to suppose that he meant to give the whole, however mistaken he may have been about his power to dispose of more than half. He says all that is given to the trustees is one moiety of the testator's property, and that is given to the trustees to be held upon the trusts set out in the will. He says that the testator has indicated that he intended that his wife should take the other half of his estate absolutely. He has referred me to two authorities in that connection, one of which he admits to be against him, and the other in his favour. The first is Adams v. Adams,[1] in which the testator, after directing the payment of his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses "devised and bequeathed all and every "his (the testator's) real and personal estate" upon trust to his children subject to the dower and thirds at common law of his wife, and his will contained a direction to apply the rents and profits after deducting the dower and thirds of his wife to the maintenance of his children. In that case it was held that there was no gift by implication to the wife who was not in fact entitled to any dower. Wigram V.-C. pointed out in his judgment[2] that there were two different types of cases. On the one hand, there was the case where the testator's testamentary document contained a recital that he had given property by his testamentary disposition to someone when in fact he had omitted to do so, and in such case the court could ascertain from the recitals the intention of the testator to make the recited gift, although he had not properly expressed that intention positively in his testamentary disposition. On the other hand, there was the case in which the testator declared wrongly that somebody was entitled to certain property which in fact belonged to the testator: where that was the case, Wigram V.-C. said, such a declaration could not be relied on as evidence of an intention by the testator to make a gift of that property to the person in question. It is pointed out in Jarman on Wills, 8th ed. (1951), p. 629, that such a declaration does not amount to a gift if the testator evidently conceived that the person referred to possessed a title independent of the testator's own title, and that it would be wrong, in those circumstances, to suppose that he intended to make a disposition in favour of the other person.

The other case referred to by Mr. Giffard was Hall v. Leitch,[3] where the testator, who was entitled to a policy of insurance of £500 on the joint lives of himself and his wife, bequeathed all his personal estate "save and except the sum of £500 payable "at my death under a policy of insurance, to my wife, and to "which she is absolutely entitled under the said policy." He devised all his residue with that exception to trustees on trust for his wife for life and for his children after her death. The question arose whether there was an implied gift to the widow of the £500 payable under the policy. Malins V.-C. stopped counsel who appeared for the widow, and evidently formed a view on first impression in favour of the widow's claim. Counsel for the parties who argued to the contrary did not refer to any authorities, nor apparently to the passage to which I have referred in Jarman on Wills. Malins V.-C. came to the conclusion that the widow was entitled by implication to the £500. That case certainly is much more favourable to the view put forward by Mr. Giffard in the present case than is Adams v. Adams,[4] but the reasoning in Adams v. Adams[4] appears to me to be unanswerable. That reasoning was not, I think, brought to the attention of Malins V.-C. in Hall v. Leitch.[5] If Hall v. Leitch[5] were otherwise an authority binding on me, and I had to choose between Adams v. Adams[6] and Hall v. Leitch,[7] I should prefer the former. However, the present case is not precisely the same as Hall v. Leitch,[7] and I think it is sufficient for me to say that I do not feel bound in the present case to follow the decision of Malins V.-C. It seems to me clear that this testator conceived that he had no power to deprive his wife of whatever she might be entitled to out of the estate by way of jus relictae under Scottish law. That would be a liability of his estate which would have to be met before his testamentary disposition would operate in Scotland. In the way in which he has framed his dispositions, it seems to me that he is recognising that that would be the position if his wife were entitled to jus relictae, and he is also assuming that she would be entitled to jus relictae. It seems to be inconsistent with what the testator himself said in his will to suppose that he is by these words indicating an intention to make a gift of any property which was at his disposal except in so far as he gave her a life interest in his property which was settled on trust. So, I come to the conclusion, first of all, that there is no implied gift such as Mr. Giffard has contended for of any part of the estate to the wife.

I pass to the next question which is whether it is possible to spell out of this will a gift of the whole of the residue to the trustees upon the trusts set out in the will. In support of this argument Mr. Hesketh quoted from Stroud's Judicial Dictionary, 3rd ed., p. 1811, the meaning of the word "moiety," where a decision of Chatterton V.-C. is referred to in Morrow v. M'Conville [8] in which passage it is said: "'although the proper "'meaning of the word "moiety" is a half part, it is here, in my "'opinion, used by the testator, who seems to have been an ill-"'educated person, in the sense of an equal part or share. I am "'not aware of any judicial opinion having been expressed on the "'meaning of this or a similar word; in the Imperial Dictionary "'. . . I find one of its meanings given as a part or share as distin-"'guished from a half part.'" Mr. Hesketh says, therefore, that "a moiety" need not necessarily mean a half, and he also remarks that careful draftsmen, if they want to use the word "moiety," usually say one equal moiety, suggesting perhaps that one could have a moiety which was not an equal moiety. The meanings given for "moiety" in the Shorter Oxford Dictionary (1944), vol. 1, p. 1270, are first "a half and, especially, in legal or quasi-legal "use; secondly, loosely one of two (or more) parts into which "something is divided." Then there are several meanings set out which I do not think are appropriate to the present case. An example of the loose meaning of the word which is given is "The southern and greater moiety of this island: Fuller." No doubt in the appropriate context one can come to the conclusion that the word "moiety" does not mean an equal half part. If the testator's widow was entitled to jus relictae, she would have been entitled to a half share and the property bequeathed by the will would have been one half of the testator's property which was left for him to dispose of. I do not find anything here which enables me to put on the word "moiety" anything other than what I think is its primary meaning of "equal half part." Therefore, in my judgment what is given to the trustees is a half of his property. The testator then goes on to express his reason for giving that half, that is, that he thinks his wife will have the other half by right of jus relictae. He gives one half to his trustees, and they are to make certain payments out of that in connection with the memorial and grave. Then he directs the trustees to pay to his wife the interest on the residue of the property, which must mean what remains of the half, so long as she shall live. Down to that point, I think that it is clear that the testator is dealing with only one half of the estate. But then he goes on "and at the death of my wife or if she shall have died before "me." Pausing there, if she died before him she could have been entitled to nothing by way of jus relictae. Then he says: "I "bequeath the said property in equal shares" to the class of beneficiaries to which he has referred. What does he mean there by "the said property?" He is dealing in this will with two possibilities, one being the event of his wife surviving him and dying after his death, and one of her predeceasing him. In either of those events he gives "the said property." Reading back I think that "the said property" must be the property of which he has given a moiety before—by the opening words of the clause "the moiety of my property that remains after my wife shall have "received her jus relictae": "The said property" relating back to "my property," I think that he gives in this clause everything which he was competent to dispose of at the time of his death. He gives it in equal shares between all his brothers and sisters, nephews and nieces. So far as the moiety given to the trustees is concerned, this will operate as a trust in favour of the brothers and sisters, nephews and nieces. But, so far as there is no earlier gift, there must be a direct gift of anything not already disposed of to the brothers and sisters. The result is, in my judgment, that during the lifetime of the wife there was an intestacy as to the income of one half of his estate, but at her death the brothers and sisters and nephews and nieces who were living at her death became beneficially entitled to the whole of the residuary estate.

Declaration accordingly.

The plaintiffs claimed damages against the defendants to whom they had entrusted goods for transmission. The original claim was erroneously particularised in the sum of £205 10s. 4d., but at the hearing that sum was amended to £198 1s. 7d. By their prayer the plaintiffs claimed damages "limited to £400." The defendants denied liability, but issued a third party notice against sub-contractors to whom they had entrusted the carriage of the goods, and claimed an indemnity against liability in respect of the plaintiffs' claim. The third party in turn claimed against a fourth party and the fourth party against a fifth party.

The county court judge heard all those matters together and gave judgment for the plaintiffs against the defendants for £195 1s. 7d. with costs, and judgment for the defendants against the third party for that sum; and he made further orders as to costs which in effect made the third party liable for the costs of all the other parties.

The third party sought to appeal from certain of the judge's findings of fact in favour of the defendants. The defendants were the only respondents to that appeal. On the hearing of the preliminary question whether the third party had a right of appeal on a question of fact under section 109 of the County Courts Act, 1959 [1]:—

Held, that the court had jurisdiction to entertain an appeal on a question of fact as between the parties before it, for the defendants' claim for an indemnity against the third party was an action separate and distinct from that between the plaintiffs and the defendants, and was one in which the sum claimed must necessarily exceed £200, since an indemnity must include not only the plaintiffs' claim for £198 but also the costs which the defendants might have to pay by reason of the fault of the third party. Nor did it matter that the claim for the indemnity was brought by the convenient method of third party proceedings and not in a separate action, for the effect of Order 12, rule 3 (2), of the County Court Rules, 1936,[2] was to give the defendants and the third party the same rights to relief as they would have had if the defendants' claim had been made in a separate action.

Accordingly, it was unnecessary for the court to decide what were the effects in law on the right of appeal on a question of fact Leslie v. Liverpool Corporation [1960] 1 W.L.R. 1; [1959] 3 All E.R. 898, C.A. considered.

APPEAL from Judge Wingate Saul, sitting at Dartford County Court.

The plaintiffs, William Mallinson & Sons (Mfg.) Ltd., claimed damages from the defendants, Key Transport Company Ltd., in the county court. By their particulars of claim they stated that the defendants as common carriers had agreed with them to carry 26 plywood veneered mahogany panels safely from Crayford, Kent, to Shipley, Yorkshire, but that the goods were damaged during transit. The claim as originally presented particularised the damage at a total of £205 10s. 4d.; and by their prayer the plaintiffs claimed damages "limited to £400." Between the issue of those particulars and the hearing in the county court, the plaintiffs realised that they had made an error in their calculation of the sum of £205 10s. 4d., and accordingly applied for and were given leave during the hearing to amend that figure to £198 1s. 7d. No leave was sought to amend the prayer.

The defendants, who had entrusted the goods in question to sub-contractors, S. Hughes (Hirers) Ltd., admitted that they were common carriers but did not admit the damage. They then issued a third party notice against the sub-contractors in which they said that the third party were common carriers and set out the circumstances which gave rise to their claim and they claimed an indemnity from the third party against liability in respect of the plaintiffs' claim. The third party, who had carried the goods from Crayford to Hull and had then entrusted them to Coastal Transport Ltd., did not admit any of the allegations made against them, and issued a fourth party notice against Coastal Transport Ltd., that notice being in exactly the same form as the third party notice. Coastal Transport Ltd., who had not carried the goods at all but had entrusted them to Henry Long (Manningham) Ltd., also denied liability and issued a fifth party notice against Henry Long (Manningham) Ltd. in similar terms to the third party and fourth party notices claiming an indemnity, the defence to which was rather more elaborate than the other defences in respects not relevant to the present report.

When all those issues came on together in the county court, the judge gave judgment on April 6, 1960, for the plaintiffs for £195 1s. 7d. with costs against the defendants, and judgment for the defendants against the third party for the same sum and the taxed costs on scale 4 which the defendants would have to pay to the plaintiffs; and he ordered that the defendants should recover against the third parties their own costs in the proceedings. He also gave judgment for the fifth party against the fourth party with costs and for the fourth party against the third party for costs, and the taxed costs which the fourth party would have to pay to the fifth party.

The third party sought to appeal from that judgment on two grounds; the first ground was that the county judge was in error in his finding of fact that the third party was instructed by the defendants that the goods were not to be transhipped in the course of their journey to Shipley; and the second ground related to the pleadings. The details of the grounds of appeal are not relevant to this report, but a preliminary point arose as to whether, in the circumstances of this case, the third party had a right of appeal on a question of fact under section 109 of the County Courts Act, 1959, in view of the fact that though the claim as originally delivered asked for damages exceeding the sum of £200, there had been an amendment of those particulars which reduced the amount to less than £200. The only respondents to the appeal were the defendants, Key Transport Company Ltd.

The Court of Appeal heard argument on that issue as a preliminary point and then proceeded to hear the appeal on the questions of fact and dismissed the appeal.

The case is reported only on the preliminary point as to jurisdiction.

R. N. Titheridge for the third party.
John Gower for the defendants.

The following cases, in addition to that referred to in the judgments, were referred to during the argument: North v. Holroyd [3]; Mason v. Burningham.[4]

Ormerod L.J. stated the facts which, so far as they are relevant to the preliminary question, are set out above. His Lordship continued: The first point which had to be considered by this court was whether in the circumstances the third party had any right of appeal on a question of fact. Mr. Titheridge argued that as in the first place the claim was for a larger sum than £200, it carried with it a right of appeal on questions of fact, and the mere fact that there had been an amendment later did not deprive the third party of that right.

There is no doubt that in the ordinary course of events there is no appeal from a judgment of a county court judge on questions of fact, but by section 109 of the County Courts Act, 1959, there may be an appeal on questions of fact in certain circumstances. [His Lordship read section 109 (2) and continued:] As I understand the argument which was put here, it was said that this claim did exceed £200, and, in those circumstances, there was a right to maintain this appeal. Mr. Titheridge based his argument on a recent decision of this court in Leslie v. Liverpool Corporation,[1] where certain views were expressed by Lord Evershed M.R. on this matter. That was a claim for damages for personal injuries in which the prayer stated that the damages were limited to a sum of £400. It was agreed by both parties that the damages could not amount to a larger sum than £100, and in those circumstances there could not be a claim for damages exceeding £200 and, therefore, there could be no appeal on a question of fact. It was held that although a claim for damages limited to £400 was not necessarily a claim in excess of £200, yet, having regard to the nature of the claim, the court would treat the plaintiff as having claimed more than £200 when the action started and, therefore, as being entitled to appeal on questions of fact.

[3] (1868) L.R. 3 Exch.Cas. 69.

It is unnecessary, having regard to the view I have formed, to deal with that case at any length. But Mr. Titheridge bases his submissions very largely on the fact that it was a case where a sum in excess of £200 was claimed when the action was started. But there was no amendment in that case, and although it is not necessary to decide the question, my view as at present advised would be that if the pleadings were amended at some stage to put the claim at not more than £100, there would be no right of appeal on a question of fact. But in the present case there is the further complication that the prayer was limited to damages to the amount of £400. Whether that would be sufficient in the circumstances of this case to say that the claim was one for over the sum of £200 is a matter on which obviously there might be considerable argument, because the parties here have agreed that the sum of £198 1s. 7d., which is less than the £200, is the sum which is claimed in respect of every head of damage which is particularised, and there is nothing in the claim to indicate that there would be any liability for general damages in addition to that. However, that is not the question which we have to consider. We are not considering the right of the defendants to appeal against the judgment which has been given in favour of the plaintiffs against them. We are considering the appeal of the third party against the defendants. That is an entirely separate matter, and the question we have to consider is whether, in the circumstances, the claim of the defendants against the third party is a claim which is in excess of the sum of £200. The third party notice is a claim by the defendants to be indemnified by the third party against any liability that the defendants may have to the plaintiffs, and that admittedly would include any costs which the defendants may have to pay to the plaintiffs, and the costs which the defendants may have to incur or will have incurred in defending the action. Those are all the matters which are or may be the subject of the indemnity claimed by the defendants against the third party. The amount of damage which the defendants have claimed against the third party is the sum of £198 1s. 7d. That is the amount which the plaintiffs have claimed against the defendants. But the claim of the defendants for indemnity is not for that sum only but is also for the costs which they may have to pay by reason of the fault of the third party. In my view, that means that the claim by the defendants against the third party is a claim exceeding the sum of £200. It is well to bear in mind Order 12, rule 3 (2) of the County Court Rules, 1936, which is the same as the High Court Rule on the subject. That provides: "As between the defendant by "whom the third-party notice has been given and the third party, "the judge may grant to either party any relief or remedy which "might properly have been granted if the claim against the third "party had been made in a separate action, and may give such "judgment for either party against the other as may be just." The joinder of the third party is a convenient method, which is frequently adopted, of dealing with all matters between the parties. In this case the judge decided, no doubt at the request of the parties, that the whole of the matter should be dealt with at the same time. Nonetheless, the claim by the defendants against the third party is a separate claim, and it is in respect of that claim that the judge has made certain findings of fact which are impugned in this court today. My view is that, for the reasons which I have given, it is open to the third party to appeal on those findings of fact, and it is the duty of this court to consider the submissions which have been made. [His Lordship then proceeded to deal with the main issues in the appeal.]

Willmer L.J. I will deal first with the preliminary point which has been raised here, namely, whether this is a case where the debt, demand or damage claimed exceeded £200 so as to admit of an appeal on fact alone. I should be disposed to say that, as between the plaintiffs and the defendants, the claim was for one exceeding £200, bearing in mind the general terms of the prayer in the particulars of claim, namely, a claim for damages limited to £400. It is perfectly true that in the body of the particulars of claim, as amended, the plaintiffs' loss is particularised as £198 1s. 7d. But there is nothing in the particulars of claim to show that a claim for general damages over and above the particularised loss was excluded, and I venture to think that, had counsel asked for, and had the judge awarded, general damages over and above the particularised loss, it could not have been said that such a claim was not open on the pleadings. It is to be remarked that even the conventional figure of 40s. for nominal damages would just have brought the claim over the vital £200 mark. On this point, I confess I do not find very much help in the authorities which were cited to us, but at least I do not think that the view I have expressed is inconsistent with what was said by Lord Evershed M.R. in Leslie v. Liverpool Corporation,[2] to which my Lord has referred.

It is, however, for the reasons already given by my Lord, unnecessary to reach any final conclusion on this point, for what we are concerned with in the present case is the defendants' claim over against the third party. As to this I entertain no doubt that this must be regarded as a claim for a sum exceeding £200. If that were not so, it would follow that the order which the judge in fact made, and which my Lord has already read, would have been an order made without any jurisdiction. It was conceded by Mr. Gower that if, instead of bringing the third party into this case, the defendants had chosen to launch a separate action claiming an indemnity against the plaintiffs' claim and costs, then in such separate action there would undoubtedly have been a right of appeal on fact. Can it make any difference that the claim has in fact been put forward by way of third party proceedings instead of by way of a separate action? The answer to that, I think, is to be found in the provisions of Order 12, rule 3 (2). The effect of that, as I understand it, is to provide that, as between themselves, the defendants and the third party have the same rights and liabilities as they would have if the claim were put forward in a separate action.

It was urged on us by Mr. Gower that such a decision might possibly lead to some absurd results; and he instanced the result which might arise in cases of this sort, where the plaintiff's claim against the defendant might be below £200, so that there would be no appeal on fact, and yet the defendants' claim against the third party (by reason of the addition of the claim for indemnity against costs) would exceed £200, so that there would be a right of appeal on fact. It was suggested it would be anomalous that the defendant should have a right of appeal as against the third party or vice versa, and yet be denied a right of appeal against the plaintiff. It may be that there could be anomalous cases, but, if so, it is not a matter for this court to correct: it would be a matter for the legislature. Moreover, as pointed out by Mr. Titheridge, there must inevitably be cases in which that sort of situation may arise, for instance, where the defendant, in addition to his claim for indemnity against the plaintiffs' claim, may put forward a separate claim of his own in the third party proceedings. In those circumstances, like my Lord, I am abundantly satisfied that in this case, as between the defendants and the third party, there is clearly a right of appeal on fact. [His Lordship then dealt with the other issues in the appeal.]

UPJOHN L.J. Three points arise in this appeal. The first is whether having regard to the terms of section 109 of the County Courts Act, 1959, we have jurisdiction to entertain an appeal on fact. I agree that, in the circumstances of this case, we have such a jurisdiction. I prefer to rest my judgment on the narrow point that this is an appeal between two parties only, the respondents who were the defendants in the court below, and the third party who is the appellant here. As between them, there is an issue of fact as to whether a certain term is incorporated in their contract. The claim made by the defendants in the third party notice is to be indemnified against the claim which they had to meet from the plaintiffs, the plaintiffs having been successful. That claim was for £198 and for an indemnity against the costs which the defendants had to pay the plaintiffs of the action below and of the defendants' proper costs of defending the action. That plainly must be a claim greatly in excess of £200, and I think on that ground there is jurisdiction to entertain an appeal on the facts. I would prefer myself to leave over for consideration when it arises as to what is the effect of a general claim to damages limited to £400.

The defendant sold an airgun to a boy whom he knew or had reasonable ground for believing to be under 17, and was charged with an offence against section 19 (1) of the Firearms Act, 1937.[1] The justices found that the gun was designed to fire pellets and darts. It was incapable of causing more than trivial injury, except probably to the eye at extremely close range. It was the least powerful type of airgun obtainable. When discharged from the gun at a range of a few inches at the surface of a piece of plywood five thirty-seconds of an inch in thickness lying on a hard floor a metal pellet became embedded in the plywood to such an extent as to be visible from the far side and the point of a dart penetrated the wood. The justices held that the gun was not a lethal weapon and, therefore, not a firearm within the meaning of the section and, accordingly, dismissed the information. The prosecutor appealed:— death might result and was, in consequence, lethal and a firearm within the meaning of the section; that the findings of the justices led inevitably to the conclusion that this gun was a firearm; and that the appeal must, therefore, be allowed.

Dicta of Lord Goddard C.J. in Read v. Donovan [1947] K.B. 326, 327, 328; 63 T.L.R. 89; [1947] 1 All E.R. 37, D.C. considered.

Per curiam. Section 19 of the Act is designed to prevent, inter alia, a gun getting into the hands of a very small child who may misuse it by firing it point blank at an eye or an ear, and it is therefore not the right test to ask whether the gun is likely to cause death if properly handled.

Case stated by Lowestoft justices.

On November 9, 1959, an information was preferred by the prosecutor, William Alexander Moore, against the defendant, Stanley John French Gooderham, that he, on August 31, 1959, in the Borough of Lowestoft, sold a certain firearm, namely, a "Diana" airgun, to Michael Alan Holmes, a person whom he knew or had reasonable ground for believing to be under the age of 17 years, contrary to section 19 of the Firearms Act, 1937.

The justices tried the information on November 12, 1959, and found that on August 31 the defendant had sold the gun to Holmes, who was a person under 17 and whom the defendant at the time knew or had reasonable ground for believing to be under 17. The gun was in the form of a barrelled weapon and a missile could be discharged from it. It was designed to discharge small cup-shaped plastic or metal pellets, or small darts with a point at one end and a tuft of fibres at the other. The discharge was effected by air forced into the barrel behind the pellet or dart by releasing a compressed spring. The gun was of a type which was the least powerful which could be obtained. It was offered for sale packed in a carton with instructions which indicated that it was suitable for use indoors. Its power was such that it was capable of causing some injury, but it was incapable of causing death to a human being and incapable of causing more than trivial injury expect, probably, to the eye at extremely close range, and unlikely to cause even trivial injury at a range of more than a few feet. The power of the gun was such that when it was discharged at a range of a few inches at the surface of a piece of plywood five thirty-seconds of an inch in thickness, lying on a hard floor, a metal pellet became embedded in the plywood to such an extent as to be visible from the remote side and the remote surface was penetrated by the point of the dart, the body of which failed to penetrate the nearer surface. No evidence was adduced by the prosecution as to the relative resistance to penetration by the missiles of plywood and human skin.

It was contended for the prosecutor that the gun was a firearm for the purposes of section 19 of the Act.

The justices were of opinion that the gun was not a lethal weapon, and consequently not a firearm for the purposes of section 19. They were of opinion that a lethal weapon must be capable of causing not merely some injury, but the sort of injury which might result in death. The gun appeared to them to be little more than a toy and capable of causing injury only to a very minor degree. They accordingly dismissed the information.

The prosecutor appealed.

Leslie Boreham for the prosecutor.

The defendant did not appear and was not represented.

The only case which was cited in argument is referred to in the judgment.

Lord Parker C.J. stated the facts, referred to sections 19 (1) and 32 (1) of the Firearms Act, 1937, and continued: The sole question for the justices was whether this "Diana" airgun was a firearm within section 19 (1). They held that it was not, and they came to that conclusion on the ground that, having regard to the definition in section 32 and, in particular, the word lethal, the weapon in question must be one likely to cause injury of the sort which might result in death. They rejected a contention that a lethal weapon was one which was merely capable of causing injury which was unlikely to cause death. In saying that, I understand that they were giving to the word lethal this sense, that the weapon must be of a sort which causes injury of a type from which death would in the ordinary way result. I think that they were fully entitled to give to the word lethal the sense that the injury must be of a kind which may cause death. That is the ordinary meaning of the word, but it is to be observed that in this connection one is not considering whether a firearm is designed or intended to cause injury from which death results, but rather whether it is a weapon which, however misused, may cause injury from which death may result. Section 19 is designed to prevent, amongst other things, a weapon getting into the hands of a very small child who may misuse it by firing it point blank, and point blank, say, at an eye or an ear, or some particularly vulnerable part; and if it is capable of causing more than trifling and trivial injury when misused, then it is a weapon which is capable of causing injury from which death may result. It seems to me here that the justices were really looking at the weapon and saying: Is it the sort of weapon which in the ordinary way if properly handled will cause death?

That being the approach to the matter, what were the facts here? This was a barrelled weapon from which missiles could be discharged, the missiles being either plastic or metal pellets or small darts. The justices say that it was the least powerful type of airgun which was obtainable. The power of the gun was such "that it was capable of causing some injury but it was incapable "of causing death to a human being, and incapable of causing "more than trivial injury." Pausing there, if there was nothing more in the case I think the justices would have been justified in coming to the decision they did, but they go on to qualify that by saying, "except probably to the eye at extremely close range, "and unlikely to cause even trivial injury at a range of more than "a few feet." Then they go further and say: "The power of the "said airgun was such that when it was discharged at a range "of a few inches at the surface of a piece of plywood five thirty-"seconds of an inch in thickness, lying on a hard floor a metal "pellet became embedded in the plywood to such an extent as to "be visible from the remote side and the remote surface was "penetrated by the point of a dart, the body of which failed to "penetrate the nearer surface." It is true, as the justices point out, that they did not have evidence before them comparing the resistance of the human skin with the resistance of a piece of plywood, but I find it quite impossible on that finding to say that this was not a weapon which, when misused, was capable of causing injury from which death might result.

I should only add that reference has been made to Read v. Donovan [1] where, in the course of his judgment, Lord Goddard C.J. said [2]: "If a weapon is a lethal weapon, which means a "weapon capable of causing injury, and if such a weapon is bar-"relled and a shot, bullet or other missile can be discharged from "it, it is a firearm." Again, at the end of his judgment, he said [3]: ". . . the question simply is whether the weapon is capable "of inflicting harm." That was a case in which the weapon in question, if misused, was clearly a lethal weapon and, in those circumstances, I do not feel that too much attention can be paid to the definition given in that judgment. But I am far from saying that it is wrong, if one once considers that all that it is necessary to find is a weapon capable of doing something more than trivial harm, because, in those circumstances, death may well result if it is fired at a particularly vulnerable point. I think the justices were wrong and that on their findings there is only one conclusion, namely, that the offence was made out. In those circumstances I would send the case back to the justices with such a direction.

MORTON v. CHRISTOPHER.

Firearms—Certificate—Ambit—"Sporting purposes"—Loan to person not holding certificate with instructions to shoot rats—Firearms Act, 1937 (1 Edw. 8 & 1 Geo. 6, c. 12), s. 4 (7).

Justices—Jurisdiction—Functi officio—Plea of guilty followed by fine—Accused recalled and acquitted—Whether justices have jurisdiction so to act—Whether functi officio.

A. owned a rifle for which he held a firearm certificate. He lent the rifle and some ammunition to B., who did not hold a certificate, with instructions that B. should use the rifle to shoot rats on A.'s caravan site. A. was charged with lending the rifle and ammunition to B., B. not being a registered firearms dealer and not showing that he was by virtue of the Act entitled to acquire the rifle and ammunition, contrary to section 11 of the Firearms Act, 1937.[1] B. was charged with being in unlawful possession of the rifle in that he did not hold a certificate, contrary to section 1 of the Act. The justices first tried the information against B., who pleaded guilty and was fined. They then tried the information against A.,

who contended that the loan of the rifle was for sporting purposes only within the meaning of section 4 (7) of the Act and that he was, therefore, not guilty of an offence under section 11. The justices upheld this submission and acquitted A. They then, being of opinion that B. had, by reason of this holding, been wrongly convicted, recalled him and dismissed the information against him. The prosecutor appealed:—

Held, (1) that the mere fact that some shooting was a sport in the sense that it was enjoyable was not enough to bring it within section 4 (7) of the Act and that, on the facts, the loan was not for sporting purposes only, and that the two cases must, therefore, be sent back with a direction that the offences were proved.

(2) That the action of the justices in recalling B. and finding him not guilty was, on any view, wrong, since after sentencing him they were functi officio.

APPEALS by case stated by Huntingdon county justices sitting at St. Ives.

On October 15, 1959, an information was preferred by the prosecutor, Arthur Thomas Morton, against William James Chaney, that on or about August 25, 1959, at Oldhurst in the county of Huntingdon he did lend a certain firearm and ammunition, namely a .22 rifle to which Part I of the Firearms Act, 1937, applied, to Raymond John Christopher, not being a registered firearms dealer and not showing that he was by virtue of the Act entitled to purchase or acquire the said firearm and ammunition without holding a firearm certificate, contrary to section 11 of the Firearms Act, 1937.

The justices heard the information on November 24, 1959, and found that Chaney was the owner of a caravan site known as The Grove, Oldhurst, and Christopher was a tenant on the site. Chaney was the owner of a .22 rifle for which he held a firearm certificate issued by Huntingdonshire County Police. The certificate was issued to Chaney so that he could kill vermin on the caravan site. On August 25, 1959, Chaney lent the rifle to Christopher with instructions that Christopher should shoot rats on the site. Christopher did not hold a firearm certificate.

It was contended by Chaney that he was not in breach of section 11 of the Act because the loan of the rifle to Christopher was for sporting purposes only within the meaning of section 4 (7).

The justices were of opinion that the loan of the rifle by Chaney to Christopher was within the meaning of section 4 (7) and that the shooting of rats was a sporting purpose and they accordingly dismissed the information.

On October 15, a further information was preferred by the prosecutor against Christopher that on August 26, 1959, at Oldhurst in the county of Huntingdon he unlawfully did have the rifle in his possession, he not then holding a firearm certificate in force at the time, contrary to section 1 of the Act.

The justices heard the information on November 24, when Christopher pleaded guilty and was fined.

After sentencing Christopher the justices tried and dismissed the information against Chaney as described above. They then formed the opinion that, since they had found Chaney not guilty, Christopher had been wrongly convicted, and they accordingly recalled Christopher and dismissed the information against him.

The prosecutor appealed in both cases.

The appeals were heard together.

Edward Gardner Q.C. and Keith Topley for the prosecutor.

The defendants did not appear and were not represented.

The following cases, not referred to in the judgment, were cited in argument: Rex v. Wandsworth Justices, Ex parte Read [2]; Jeffryes v. Evans. [3]

LORD PARKER C.J. stated the facts in the first appeal, read sections 4 (7) and 11 of the Firearms Act, 1937, and continued: The sole question in the first appeal is whether Christopher was in possession of this rifle under instructions from and for the use of Chaney "for sporting purposes only." The justices have held that the instructions given that Christopher should shoot rats made the case into one of having the rifle in his possession for sporting purposes. I find it quite unnecessary and, indeed, inadvisable, to attempt any definition of what is included within the words "for sporting purposes only." There are two things about which I am clear. One is that the mere fact that some sort of shooting is a sport in the sense that someone gets enjoyment out of it is not enough to bring it within those words. The second thing is that, so far as this case is concerned, I am quite satisfied that the shooting of rats is not in the ordinary sense of the term shooting for sporting purposes. Accordingly, so far as the Chaney appeal is concerned, the case must go back to the justices with a direction that the offence was proved.

[His Lordship stated the facts in the second appeal, read section 1 of the Act, referred to the action of the justices in recalling Christopher and finding him not guilty, and continued:] It seems to me that that action of the justices was, on any view, wrong. The moment they had sentenced Christopher they were functi officio and could do nothing more in the matter. In having him back and finding him not guilty they were clearly acting in excess of their jurisdiction. Accordingly this case must also go back to the justices with the direction that they exceeded their jurisdiction in dismissing the information against him, and that he was guilty of the offence.

ASHWORTH J. I agree with my Lord's judgment in both cases.

ELWES J. I also agree.

Animal—Dog—Control—Complaint—Information laid against owner that dog was dangerous and not kept under proper control—Order by justices that dog to be kept under proper control—Whether proceedings correctly instituted—Dogs Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 56), s. 2.

The applicant was charged by way of information that she was the owner of a dangerous dog which was not kept under proper control, contrary to section 2 of the Dogs Act, 1871.[1] She pleaded guilty to the information, and the justices, adjudging the dog to be dangerous, ordered her to keep it under proper control. The applicant moved for an order of certiorari to quash the order of the justices on the ground that the proceedings before them were a nullity, having been started by way of information, whereas they should have been started by complaint:—

Held, that section 2 of the Dogs Act, 1871, envisaged two stages: first, a court of summary jurisdiction, on a complaint being made, could make a summary order; secondly, where that order was disobeyed, the person disobeying was liable to a penalty. The first stage was in the nature of a civil or administrative proceeding and that part of the section spoke of a complaint; it was only in the second stage that an offence was involved and liability to a penalty arose. In the present case the proceedings arose under the first stage of the section and should have been started by complaint; accordingly, having been started by information, they were a nullity; neither the plea of guilty nor section 42 nor section 100 (1) of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952,[2] could cure that invalidity and an order for certiorari would issue.

Application for certiorari.

On October 22, 1959, information was laid before the justices for the City of Nottingham by Alan Campbell, Inspector of Police, for that Betty Brown, the applicant, on September 26, 1959, in the City of Nottingham was the owner of a dangerous dog which was not then and there kept under proper control, contrary to section 2 of the Dogs Act, 1871. The applicant pleaded Guilty to the information and on January 11, 1960, the justices made the following order: "Alan Campbell . . . having "made a complaint that Betty Brown . . . on September 26, "1959 . . . was the owner of a certain dangerous dog, which was "not then, nor now is kept under proper control, contrary to "section 2 of the Dogs Act, 1871.

"On hearing the said complaint the . . . court does adjudge "that the said dog is dangerous, and is not kept under proper "control and that the [applicant] is the owner of the said "dog, and does further adjudge and order that the said dog "shall be kept by the [applicant] under proper control. . . ." The applicant applied for certiorari to bring up and quash the order of the justices on the ground that the proceedings, having been commenced by information and not by complaint, were a nullity.

James Comyn for the applicant.

The justices did not appear and were not represented.

In addition to the cases referred to in the judgment, the following were cited in argument: Rhodes v. Heritage [3]; Reg. v. Shaw.[4]

Lord Parker C.J. Mr. Comyn moves on behalf of Betty Brown for an order of certiorari to remove into this court and quash an order made by justices in petty sessions, sitting at Guildhall, Nottingham, on January 11, 1960, whereby they ordered that the said Betty Brown, being the owner of a dangerous dog, should keep the said dog under proper control. The applicant was charged by way of information for that she "on "September 26, 1959, in the City of Nottingham was the owner "of a dangerous dog which was not then and there kept under "proper control, contrary to section 2 of the Dogs Act, 1871." She pleaded Guilty, and the order to which I have referred was made. She then discovered, presumably by taking legal advice, that there was a doubt as to whether the original proceedings by way of information were properly instituted and, as the result of the advice which she received, she instituted these proceedings. It will be seen, therefore, that this case is not distinguished in any way by merits but raises a highly technical point, though nevertheless a point which is of some importance.

Section 2 of the Dogs Act, 1871, reads in this way: "Any "court of summary jurisdiction may take cognisance of a com- "plaint that a dog is dangerous, and not kept under proper "control, and if it appears to the court having cognisance of "such complaint that such dog is dangerous, the court may "make an order in a summary way directing the dog to be kept "by the owner under proper control or destroyed, and any person "failing to comply with such order shall be liable to a penalty not "exceeding twenty shillings for every day during which he fails to "comply with such order."

Looking at this matter quite apart from authority, it seems to me plain on the wording of that section that there are really two stages envisaged. In the first stage the court of summary jurisdiction, on a complaint being made, may make a certain order in a summary way. The second stage is this, that if the person concerned fails to comply with that order, he shall be liable to a penalty. It seems to me, therefore, that on the wording of that section the first step is really in the nature of a civil or administrative proceeding, quite apart from the fact that it speaks throughout of a complaint. Certainly, there is no offence involved at any stage until there is failure to comply with an order which is made, when a penalty may be inflicted.

The matter has come before the courts in Scotland in Haldane v. Allan.[1] The Lord Justice-General, Lord Clyde, said[2]: "In my view the section contemplates two quite separate pro- "ceedings, both of which may take place before a court of "summary jurisdiction, and both of which may be initiated "by the procurator fiscal. The first is an administrative process "involving no question of any offence or penalty, but involving "an order by the court in regard to what is to be done with the "dog. The second proceeding envisaged in the section is of "quite a different character. It is a criminal process for a "penalty in respect of failure to comply with an administrative "order." I entirely agree with the analysis of the Lord Justice-General.

The next question that arises is whether, although this was by way of information and not by way of complaint, the matter is cured by section 42 of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, which provides: "In any enactment conferring power on a "magistrates' court to deal with an offence, or to issue a "summons or warrant against a person suspected of an offence, "on the complaint of any person, for references to a complaint "there shall be substituted references to an information." No doubt the object of that section was this, that in the older statutes references to complaints and informations in regard to offences were used indiscriminately. In no case was an information used where the matter was a civil proceeding, but in the case of offences sometimes the statute talked of the proceedings being instituted by information and sometimes by complaint. No doubt it was for that reason that section 42 was passed and, indeed, on its face it only applies to offences because it says: "In any enactment conferring power on a magistrates' court to "deal with an offence, or to issue a summons or warrant against "a person suspected of an offence . . ." In other words, it is dealing with offences and saying plainly that in reference to offences there shall be substituted references to an information. That section, therefore, cannot touch this case.

The other section of the Magistrates' Courts Act which, it might be thought, could cure this mistake in the initiation of the process is section 100 (1) which provides: "No objection shall "be allowed to any information or complaint, or to any summons "or warrant to procure the presence of the defendant, for any "defect in it in substance or in form, or for any variance between "it and the evidence adduced on behalf of the prosecutor or "complainant at the hearing of the information or complaint." In other words, if you are dealing with an information no objection shall be allowed if it is deficient in substance or in form. Equally, if you are dealing with a complaint no objection shall be allowed if it is deficient in substance or in form, but there is nothing in that section which would allow an information to be valid and free from objection when the process should have been commenced by way of complaint. Indeed, it is to be observed that some four days after the coming into force of the Magistrates' Courts Act the matter came before Oxford County Sessions,[3] and it was held that section 100 (1) could not validate, as it were, proceedings which were wrongly instituted.

Finally, this court has been very properly referred to a number of cases in an affidavit by the clerk to the justices, who have not appeared on this application. In Lockett v. Withey,[4] which deals with quite a different matter, it does look as if proceedings commenced by information under section 2 of the Dogs Act had come before this court without any objection being taken to the method by which the proceedings had been commenced. Evidently the point was not raised and, indeed, it is not clear from the report whether the information was in regard to what I have called the first stage in section 2, or whether it was in respect of the second stage, namely, disobedience of an order already made.

Other cases were referred to by the clerk to the justices, perhaps the most important of which is Reg. v. Hughes.[5] That was a case in which magistrates perfectly properly dealt with a case which was brought before them on a warrant, and it later appeared that the warrant had been obtained illegally in that there was no written information on oath by the constable concerned. Apparently the defendant did not move to set aside the proceedings and conviction, but proceedings were taken against the constable for perjury. Notwithstanding the fact that the proceedings had been illegally commenced, it was held that there were judicial proceedings properly before the magistrates and that accordingly perjury lay. For myself, I find it unnecessary to go through the case in detail. It is clearly quite a different case from this case. It may well be that whereas the defendant in that case could have moved to set aside his conviction on the ground that the warrant was illegal, yet the constable concerned was guilty of perjury, since, until the conviction was set aside, there were judicial proceedings in which he had given evidence on oath. Indeed, in a later case, Gray v. Commissioners of Customs,[6] Lord Coleridge C.J. said this[7]: "In this case I think the point raised has been "directly ruled in the case of Reg. v. Hughes,[8] which is a case "of great authority, and was decided by no less than nine judges, "and only one of those judges dissented from the judgment. "The point there settled was shortly this, that where a defen- "dant is actually charged and appears before justices, and those "justices have jurisdiction, and though the defendant may have "been brought before the justices by illegal process, yet inasmuch "as the justices have jurisdiction and they adjudicate on the "case, that adjudication cannot afterwards be disputed by raising "objections to the arrest." To my mind, that passage in the judgment of Lord Coleridge points the distinction between the case of Hughes[9] and this case. In the case of Hughes[9] the justices had jurisdiction, whereas here the process from the very beginning was a nullity and they never had any jurisdiction at all. Accordingly, I have come to the conclusion in this case that the proceedings were wrongly initiated. They were a nullity from the beginning, and neither the plea of Guilty nor section 42 nor section 100 of the Magistrates' Courts Act can in any way cure that invalidity. Accordingly, in my judgment the order should go.

ASHWORTH J. I agree, and would only add one small point which seems to me very much to support the application in this case. The applicant's affidavit exhibits documents A and B, the documents issued by the court at Nottingham before which she appeared. The first refers to an information. The second, which is a printed form, obviously appropriate for the Dogs Act and proceedings under section 2, contains in print the expression "[Alan Campbell] . . . having made a complaint that Betty Brown "... was the owner of a certain dangerous dog," and goes on:

Legal Aid—Costs—Taxation—Expert witnesses—Solicitor and client costs—Disallowance of costs allowed on party and party taxation—Items not authorised—Payable by defendants to legal aid fund—Solicitor's right to recover—Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950 (S.I. 1950, No. 1359) (as amended by the Legal Aid (General) (Amendment No. 1) Regulations, 1954 (S.I. 1954, No. 166) and Legal Aid (General) (Amendment No. 2) Regulations, 1955 (S.I. 1955, No. 1829)), reg. 14 (4), (5), (6).

In an action in which a legally-aided plaintiff recovered damages for personal injuries against the defendants, the plaintiff called as witnesses a doctor and a consulting engineer. The solicitor paid (1) 5 guineas to the doctor for his report; (2) 90 guineas to the doctor for three days' attendance at the hearing; and (3) 30 guineas to the consulting engineer for two days' attendance. Those items were allowed on the party and party taxation and had been, or would be, paid in full to the legal aid fund by the defendants. On the solicitor and client taxation the taxing master disallowed the first and second items in part and the third item completely under regulation 14 (6) of the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950,[1] on the ground that they were not authorised. On the doctor's

"(4) The Law Society may give "general authority to solicitors act-"ing for assisted persons in any "particular class of case to obtain the "report or opinion of one expert and "to tender one person's expert evi-"dence, and if so they shall state the "maximum total fee to be paid for "any report or opinion or expert wit-"ness. (5) Where it appears to an "assisted person's solicitor necessary report he allowed 3 guineas, being the maximum fee under the general authority under regulation 14 (4), and 30 guineas for the doctor's fee under a specific authority given to the solicitor by the area committee under regulation 14 (5) (b). On a summons by the plaintiff's solicitor to review the taxation:—

Held, (1) that although the solicitor had specific authority to call the medical witness at a fee of 30 guineas, he had not elected to rely on the specific authority and was therefore entitled to 35 guineas, being the maximum fee for three days under the general authority under regulation 14 (4) (post, p. 1326).

(2) That on the true construction of regulation 14 (6), in order to give an effective meaning to the paragraph, one had to add qualifying words to "no payment may be made" such as "to the "detriment of the fund" and, accordingly, that regulation did not prohibit the allowance under solicitor and client taxation under the Third Schedule to the Act of disbursements made without authority where those disbursements had been allowed as between party and party. Since all the disputed items were allowed upon the party and party taxation, no question of their allowance arose for consideration on the solicitor and client taxation under the Third Schedule, and the taxing master erred in disallowing them. Such items recovered by the fund were payable to the applicant solicitor (post, p. 1330).

SUMMONS.

By a judgment dated March 17, 1959, the plaintiff, Kolim Ullah, an assisted person under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, recovered damages for personal injuries against the defendants, Hall Line Ltd., with costs. party and (b) solicitor and client under the Third Schedule to the Act of 1949. In the party and party taxation three items of disbursements were claimed: (1) "Paid Sir Hugh Griffiths' "[doctor] charges" for a report 5 guineas; (2) "Sir Hugh "Griffiths' fees for attending three days at the hearing" 90 guineas [30 guineas a day]; (3) "Mr. A. V. Evans, consulting "engineer, fees for two days attending at the hearing, 30 guineas. Those items were allowed in full on the party and party taxation, but on the solicitor and client taxation, the taxing master disallowed the first and third items completely and allowed only 30 guineas on the second item. On an objection being laid the taxing master allowed 3 guineas on the first item.

The plaintiff's solicitor took out a summons to review the taxation and the matter came before McNair J. on May 31, 1960, when it was adjourned for the Law Society to be represented. At the hearing before Davies J. the Law Society was not represented but the Lord Chancellor, acting under regulation 21 of the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1960, had appointed as solicitors Messrs. Joynson-Hicks & Co. (who appeared by counsel) to intervene in the review.

The argument was heard in chambers and the judgment given in open court. The relevant facts are more fully stated in the judgment.

Stanley Waldman for the plaintiff's solicitor, the applicant.
Colin Duncan for the Lord Chancellor, to intervene.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 29. Davies J. read the following judgment: This is a summons at the instance of Mr. Sydney Silverman, the plaintiff's solicitor, to review a taxation under the Third Schedule of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949. It came originally before McNair J. on May 31, when it was adjourned for the Law Society to be represented. At the hearing before me, on July 20 and 28, the Law Society were not represented but by that time the Lord Chancellor, acting under regulation 21 of the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1960, had appointed Messrs. Joyson-Hicks & Co. to intervene in the review. Under regulation 21 (4), "The solicitor appointed by the Lord Chancellor to intervene "in a review of taxation shall be entitled to production of all "documents . . . and to . . . be heard on the review, with a "view to ensuring that all considerations which are proper to "be taken into account are placed before the court. . . ." There is also a provision in that regulation that the solicitor so appointed may instruct counsel: accordingly, Messrs. Joynson-Hicks & Co. instructed Mr. Colin Duncan to appear before me at the hearing to put forward the considerations that he thought appropriate. It was agreed by Mr. Duncan and by Mr. Waldman, who appeared for the applicant, that regulation 21 (which came into operation on March 28, 1960), being a procedural regulation, applied to this review, though the questions at issue in the review fall to be decided under the old regulations, namely, the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950, as amended, since the original taxation took place in November of last year pursuant to a judgment dated March 17, 1959.

The action was one in which the legally aided plaintiff, Kolim Ullah, recovered damages against the defendants, the Hall Line Ltd. Under the judgment the plaintiff's solicitor, Mr. Sydney Silverman, brought in his bill for taxation (a) as between party and party and (b) as between solicitor and client, under the Third Schedule to the Act. No question at all arises as to the party and party taxation: it is on the solicitor and client taxation that the taxing master's decision is objected to.

The matter arises in this way. In the party and party bill there were the following items of disbursements claimed: "Paid "Sir Hugh Griffiths'," the well-known doctor, "charges," for a report, 5 guineas; "Sir Hugh Griffiths' fees for attending "three days at the hearing," 90 guineas (that is three lots of 30 guineas); "Mr. A. V. Evans', consulting engineer, fees for "two days attending at the hearing," 30 guineas. The decision to which the taxing master felt himself in the first place to be obliged to come was this: he allowed one fee of 30 guineas for Sir Hugh Griffiths, he disallowed entirely the 5 guineas for Sir Hugh Griffiths' report; and he disallowed entirely the fee of 30 guineas to the engineer, Mr. Evans. However, on the objection to that being laid, the taxing master did alter his decision to this extent (and I will explain in a moment how it arises): namely, he allowed a further 3 guineas in respect of the report given by Sir Hugh Griffiths.

The result in terms of money is this. The solicitor has paid out of his own pocket in respect of these three items a total of 125 guineas (£131 5s.). All these items were allowed on the party and party taxation and have been or will be paid into the Legal Aid Fund, there being no question of any sort or kind as to the solvency of the defendants. Of this sum Mr. Silverman was originally only allowed 30 guineas (£31 10s.). That has been increased (as I have said) by the taxing master after the objections to 33 guineas (£34 13s.). So that if the taxing master's decision stands, Mr. Silverman will be out of pocket by 92 guineas (£96 12s.) and the fund will be unjustifiably enriched by the same amount.

This is obviously a remarkable state of affairs and appears to be a manifest injustice. So strongly did this aspect of the matter strike me at the first hearing that before the argument ended I adjourned the summons in order to see whether it might not be possible for an ex gratia payment to be made to Mr. Silverman in full so as to avoid any injustice, whatever the legal position might be. As a result of this, on July 26, the Law Society wrote to Mr. Silverman offering to pay the disputed amount in full as an ex gratia payment, with the consent of the Lord Chancellor and the Treasury. This offer was, however, refused by the solicitor, on the ground that he wished the legal point to be decided.

To what extent the legal point which I have to try to decide this morning will recur I do not know. It may be that there are various pending cases in which the same point may arise. But so far as the main point is concerned it is unlikely to arise in the same form under the new regulations, for this reason: save as to the question of the employment of two counsel, under the new regulations, even though authority in advance has not been obtained, the taxing master will enjoy an overriding discretion.

I think it is right now that, having referred to the financial aspect of it, I should read the objections and the taxing master's answers. These are the objections: "The taxing master having "held that these disbursements are properly chargeable against "the defendants and allowed them in the party and party bill "of costs so that on proof of payment they will be included in "the party and party certificate of taxation and recovered from "the defendants, has no authority or power to deduct them or "any part of them in the solicitor and client taxation under the "Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, or any regulation validly "made thereunder, or from his certificate of taxation under that "Act. Alternatively, if he had discretion to make any such "deduction, he ought not in respect of these items to have "exercised it. In the further alternative on the true interpre-"tation of the correspondence between the plaintiff's solicitor "and the secretary of the No. 1 (London) Legal Aid Area "Committee, Item No. 2 was in fact authorised by the said "committee. In the yet further alternative, the amounts to be "excluded from the solicitor and client allocatur should be only "£2 2s. in respect of Item 1 and £42 in respect of Item 2, "the sums of £3 3s. for Sir Hugh Griffiths' report and £21 "in respect of his attendance at court on the second and third "days of the hearing being authorised under the general "authority."

To that, the master's answers are in the following terms: "No. 1. I have allowed £3 3s. part of this item"—that is, the 5 guineas for the report—"under the general authority "given by the Law Society pursuant to regulation 14 (4) of the "Legal Aid (General) Regulations.

"No. 2. There is nothing in the Legal Aid and Advice Act "which invalidates regulation 14 (6) of the regulations made "thereunder, which regulation in my view means that no allow-"ance is to be made on taxation under the Third Schedule for "expert evidence which has not been authorised in manner laid "down by the regulations. The Area Committee by the letter "dated December 8, 1958, authorised the calling of Sir Hugh "Griffiths the medical expert to give evidence at the hearing

"at a fee of 30 guineas. This letter in my opinion means 30 "guineas only, and not 30 guineas per day, even when read with "the letter of December 1, 1958, to which it is a reply. The "authority is a specific authority given under regulation 14 (5) "(b) which requires the maximum fee to be stated. It supersedes "the general authority under regulation 14 (4) published in "June, 1952, by the Law Society and is not an extension of "such general authority. The solicitor must be deemed to have "elected to rely on the specific authority relative to calling the "medical expert. The fact that 30 guineas per day has been "allowed on the party and party taxation does not override the "regulations requiring prior authority on a taxation under the "Third Schedule.

"No. 3. There is no authority either general or specific to "cover the consulting engineer. I am not prepared to hold that "regulation 14 (6) does not apply merely because the solicitor "in obtaining a pre-legal aid report from the witness was "impliedly authorised by the plaintiff to call such witness at "the trial. I overrule this objection."

Three questions, therefore, arise. (1) Was the report from and the calling of Sir Hugh Griffiths at a higher figure than that prescribed in the general authority authorised?—that is to say, was the solicitor specifically authorised to engage Sir Hugh Griffiths at 30 guineas a day plus his 5-guinea report? This question does not arise in connection with the fees of the consulting engineer because there is no suggestion that there was any specific authority there.

(2) If not, then is the authority limited to the specific 30 guineas, or can the solicitor rely on the general authority, which would entitle him to the 3 guineas for the report, which has been allowed, plus 15 guineas for the first day, 10 for the second, and 10 for the third? That is to say, he would have been entitled, if the answer to that is "Yes," to 38 guineas (£39 18s.).

But the all-important question, of course, is the third question: if these disbursements have been allowed and recovered or are certain to be recovered on the party and party taxation, is the solicitor ipso facto entitled to them on the solicitor and client taxation?

As to the first question, the specific authority, the facts are quite short. On December 1, 1958, the solicitor wrote to the area secretary in these terms: "It will be necessary to call "as a witness on the plaintiff's behalf Sir Hugh Griffiths. I "have been in communication with Sir Hugh as to fees and he "informs me that he is willing to attend and to accept the fee "which is usually allowed to him in legal aid cases, namely, "25 guineas per day. I do not think that special autho-"rity is required, but nevertheless I should be glad if you "will confirm that there is no objection to calling Sir Hugh "Griffiths as witness on these terms." The answer from the area secretary is the kind of answer one often gets in court: it is not an answer at all. What the letter of December 8 says is: "Your letter of December 1 has now been considered by my "committee, who authorise you to call Sir Hugh Griffiths to "give evidence at the hearing, if this is necessary, at a fee of "30 guineas, subject to any order made by the master on "directions."

So there you have Mr. Silverman asking whether Sir Hugh Griffiths may be called at a fee of 25 guineas a day; and the answer is: "You can call him for 30 guineas."

The regulation which applies to this matter is regulation 14 (5).

One has, of course, to look also at regulation 14 (4) and the general direction made thereunder.

This is a short question of construction as to specific authority on the two letters which I have read; and it seems to me quite impossible to say, when the area secretary, in reply to the question "Can we have Sir Hugh Griffiths at 25 guineas a day?" writes back and says: "You can have Sir Hugh Griffiths at 30 "guineas," that that can possibly mean it is an authority to call Sir Hugh Griffiths at 30 guineas a day. It is said, of course, that they could have called Sir Hugh Griffiths under the general regulation for 35 guineas—15 plus 10 plus 10—the case having lasted three days. But, as was pointed out by Mr. Duncan at the hearing of the summons, non constat that the case was going to last three days; and if the case had finished on the first day they would have been limited under the general direction to 15 guineas. I think that the conclusion is inevitable, seeing that the solicitor must be taken to have known the provisions of regulation 14 (5) that the authority must state the maximum total fee, that—albeit that it was not at all a helpful answer to the inquiry when the area secretary said "30 guineas"—that was the maximum total fee. Therefore, in my judgment, on this question of specific authority Mr. Silverman does not make out any case at all.

The second of the two minor points is the question as to whether, 30 guineas having been authorised by that letter, Mr. Silverman can say: "Oh, but nevertheless I am entitled to have "more than the 30 guineas, namely the 35 guineas authorised "under the general direction—15 plus 10 plus 10"—in addition, of course, to the 3 guineas to which he is entitled for the report. The taxing master has come to the conclusion that he is not so entitled; that he elected to rely on the 30 guineas. I do not think that is right. It seems to me that the taxing master's decision is inconsistent. If the election for 30 guineas applies to the fee for calling Sir Hugh Griffiths in the witness-box or having him present in court, one would have thought it would apply equally to the fee for the report. The taxing master has agreed on reconsideration that 3 guineas is allowable for the report. I cannot see that it is possible to say that Mr. Silverman has elected in any shape or form here. He thought he was right in his construction of the letter. It turned out that he was wrong. In my opinion, therefore, on any view he would be entitled, in addition to the 3 guineas for the report, to the 35 guineas for the three days that Sir Hugh Griffiths was present in court, which would be 38 guineas in all.

But, of course, that is not what makes the matter so important. The important matter is to deal with the problem whether all these amounts, having been allowed in full as reasonable disbursements on the party and party taxation, are to be paid or not out of the pocket of Mr. Silverman.

In addition to the statutory provisions to which I have already referred, I shall refer quite shortly to one or two other provisions; first, section 12 (1) of the Act under which the regulations are made, which provides: "The Lord Chancellor may make such "regulations as appear to him necessary or desirable for giving "effect to this Part of this Act or for preventing abuses thereof." The word "abuses" is perhaps not unimportant in this connection. It is relied on very strongly by Mr. Waldman, for the applicant, because it would appear that if this decision is right, and if the regulations do mean what it is said they mean by Mr. Duncan, so far from preventing abuses they obviously in this case would create a manifest abuse.

That is the section under which the regulations are made. I need not, I think, concern myself with the Lord Chancellor's power to modify the Act under section 17 (4). I will turn to consider the provisions of the Third Schedule to the Act, and I think I need only refer to two paragraphs. First, paragraph 2 (1) of the Third Schedule: "The sums allowed to a solicitor in "connection with proceedings in the House of Lords or the "Supreme Court shall be the full amount allowed on taxation "of the costs on account of disbursements and eighty-five per "cent. of the amount so allowed on account of profit costs: . . ." Then paragraph 4 (1) of the Schedule: "Subject to the last "foregoing paragraph, costs shall be taxed for the purposes of "this Schedule according to the ordinary rules applicable on a "taxation as between solicitor and client where the costs are to "be paid out of a common fund in which the client and others "are interested: Provided that no question shall be raised as to "the propriety of any act for which prior approval was obtained "as required by regulations."

Then one turns finally to regulation 14. I think it is most important, in considering regulation 14 and the relevant parts of it, to observe that it is not a regulation that is dealing only, or indeed primarily, with taxation: it is a regulation which deals (as it is said to deal) with the "Conduct of proceedings on behalf of "assisted persons," and it deals with all manner of things, such as for example the right of solicitor or counsel to give up the case, and so on. The only paragraphs to which I think it necessary to refer are these: first, paragraph (3) of regulation 14,

Ullah
v.
Hall Line

Davies J.

then paragraph (4) which deals with the general authority, then paragraph (5), and, of course, the present matters come directly under that paragraph; Mr. Evans, the engineer, comes under sub-paragraph (a) of regulation 14 (5), and Sir Hugh Griffiths under sub-paragraph (b); then paragraph (6); and finally (and it is only for comparison, because it does not touch the present case), paragraph (6A). As I have said, regulation 14 deals with many other matters.

It being conceded, in view of my finding, that there was no prior authority for the retainer (if that is the right word) or calling of Sir Hugh Griffiths at a fee higher than that in the regulation, and it being beyond question that there was no prior authority in the case of Mr. Evans, the question that I have posed arises for decision. The argument of Mr. Waldman for the applicant is in substance this: (1) That, if a payment of the sort in question here has been allowed on party and party taxation, that payment is ipso facto allowable on a solicitor and client taxation under the Third Schedule, and that there is no occasion for any further consideration or taxation in respect of that matter. (2) That the regulations made by the Lord Chancellor are made (as I have already touched on) for "preventing abuses" of the Act, and that the decision to which the taxing master felt himself driven, so far from preventing an abuse, obviously creates a gross abuse. (3) That if and so far as the regulations are ambiguous the court, while not of course straining the language, should lean towards a construction which is in accordance with justice and common sense.

At one time I thought that Mr. Waldman was asking me to hold that the regulations were ultra vires if in the present circumstances they prevented the solicitor from being reimbursed the moneys which he had decided inter partes he had properly expended. In my judgment it would have been quite impossible so to hold. But in his reply counsel made it plain that that was not his contention. His submission was that on the assumption that the regulation is intra vires a reasonable interpretation is to be preferred to an unreasonable one. On this basis one observes, dealing with the first point, that paragraph 4 (1) of the Third Schedule refers to ". . . the ordinary rules applicable on a taxation "as between solicitor and client where the costs are to be paid "out of a common fund in which the client and others are "interested . . ."; and it is said with some force that if one were to have a solicitor and client taxation following upon a party and party taxation it would be inconceivable that a disbursement which had been allowed as between party and party should be disallowed as between solicitor and client.

Attention was also drawn to the direction of the senior registrar of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division, dated November 17, 1950 (Law Society's Legal Aid Handbook (Revised Edition), pp. 177, 178). That sets out the form in which the bills are to be presented, with parallel columns for solicitor and client and party and party respectively. It says this: "The solicitor "and client columns should show only those items which do not "appear in the party and party columns. After taxation separate "summaries for the two sets of columns should be completed. "The sum of the two totals will give the solicitor and client "costs." That direction in its terms applies, of course, only to the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division, but the form of the bill specified therein appears to have been generally adopted, and certainly was in the present case.

The important points to be noted are: (a) that items in the party and party columns should not be included in the solicitor and client columns; and (b) that the total of the two columns is said to be the solicitor and client costs. The solicitor followed this practice in the present case. The disputed items were in the party and party column but not in the solicitor and client column. But as a result of the disallowance on solicitor and client taxation of the amounts in question, the total of the two columns comes to £607 19s. but the solicitor and client costs come to only £511 7s.

Reference was also made by both sides to other passages in the Legal Aid Handbook; but as these are not authoritative I do not consider it necessary to refer to them.

As to Mr. Waldman's second point, which is really another way of putting his third point, and also his point on what I at first thought was the ultra vires argument, no one would, I apprehend, seek to dispute that if words are ambiguous the preferable construction to put upon them is that which is the more reasonable and the more just.

Mr. Duncan's argument really comes to this. He submits that the words in regulation 14 (6), "no payment shall be made," mean precisely the same as the words in regulation 14 (3), "no "payment shall be allowed on taxation." Indeed, he goes further and submits that precisely the same meaning is to be attached to the words which I have read in regulation 14 (6A)—though in a converse sense—"no question as to the propriety "of the act shall be raised on taxation." This argument from counsel appearing (in effect) for the Lord Chancellor strikes me as a bold one. I find myself quite unable to contemplate that the Lord Chancellor, in framing the regulations, would in such a short space use entirely different words to mean the same thing, and I do not accept that that is the proper construction of the regulations. The material words in this case are the words in regulation 14 (6), "no payment shall be made." I hold that those words do not mean the same as "no payment shall be "allowed on taxation." That is a fairly simple step. What, then, do the words mean? Mr. Duncan concedes that they do not import a prohibition against the payment of Sir Hugh Griffiths or Mr. Evans, the engineer, by Mr. Silverman in the first place. Indeed, if they meant that, it would seem that these payments could not be allowable on a party and party taxation.

It is impossible, in my view, to give any effective meaning to these words unless one writes in some qualifying words. It is plain that the purpose and intent of the regulations is to protect the legal aid fund—or, using the words of section 12, to prevent abuses of the Act. In my opinion, therefore, it is implicit in regulation 14 (6) that the payment may be made if it does not injure the fund. " . . . no payment may be made," therefore, is equivalent to " no payment may be made to the detriment of the " fund." The costs claimed in this case would, of course, fall to be paid out of the fund, but they would not be paid to the detriment of the fund since ex concessis the fund has recovered or will recover them from the defendants.

Regulation 14 (6), therefore, does not, in my opinion, prohibit this allowance upon solicitor and client taxation under the Third Schedule to the Act of disbursements of the sort in question made without prior authority, if those disbursements have been allowed as between party and party. What it does do is to prohibit the payment out of the fund of such disbursements unless the fund recovers or is in a position actually to recover them from the other party to the litigation. If the legally aided litigant has failed, then of course there would be no question of recovering from the other party. Even if the legally aided litigant has won, it would not be by any means certain at the date of the taxation that the party and party costs taxed in favour of the legally aided litigant would actually be recovered. Items such as those in dispute would nevertheless, in my view, be properly included in the solicitor and client costs, having already been " allowed " as between party and party. The prohibition imposed by regulation 14 (6) is, in my view, a prohibition against actual payment to the solicitor out of the fund unless and until it is ascertained that the fund will not suffer by such payment.

How this would work out in practice I do not know. But, rightly or wrongly, this is the interpretation which in my view is the correct one to put upon these not altogether clear regulations.

In the result, therefore, since all the disputed items were allowed upon the party and party taxation no question of their allowance arose for consideration on the solicitor and client taxation under the Third Schedule, and the taxing master erred in disallowing them.

That is all that I have to decide. But in view of the fact that it is admitted here that the fund has recovered or will unquestionably recover those items from the defendants, there can be no question of any detriment or loss to the fund and these items are therefore payable to the applicant solicitor.

Order accordingly with costs.
Leave to appeal.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

The testator, Hastings William Sackville, twelfth Duke of Bedford, made his will on February 21, 1952. By clause 1 he appointed the plaintiffs, the Honourable Victor Alexander Frederick Villiers Russell and Douglas James Watherson Dryburgh to be executors and trustees of his will and bequeathed a legacy of £500 to the Honourable Victor Russell "free of duty" if he proved the will and accepted the trusteeship.

Clause 2 of the will provided "I bequeath to my children the "most Honourable John Robert Russell (commonly known as "'the Marquis of Tavistock') [now the thirteenth Duke of Bed-"ford] the Honourable Daphne Crommelin Russell and Lord "Hugh Hastings Russell (to be fairly and equally distributed "according to value among them in such manner as they shall "agree or in case of difference as shall be settled by my trustees "whose decision shall be final) free of duty all my motor cars "and motor accessories all my plated goods wearing apparel "watches trinkets furniture pictures wines liquors and consum-"able stores and provisions and all other articles and effects of "personal domestic household stable garage or garden use or "ornament or consumption (other than money securities for "money and documents of title) belonging to me at my death "and not otherwise effectually disposed of by me."

By clause 3, the testator bequeathed "free of duty" to the person who should inherit the Woburn Settled Estates certain farm and other stock. By clause 4, he made a specific bequest "free of duty." By clause 5, he devised a certain freehold house "free of all duty." By clauses 6, 7 and 8, he made a number of pecuniary legacies all "free of duty." By clause 13 he devised and bequeathed all his real and personal property to his trustees on trust for sale. Clause 14 provided: "My trustees "shall out of the moneys to arise from the sale calling in and "conversion of or forming part of the said real and personal "property and out of any ready money pay my funeral and "testamentary expenses and debts and the legacies given by this "will or any codicil hereto and pay the estate duty payable on "my death in respect of any part of my estate real or personal "and all legacy succession and other duties payable on my death "on any gifts by this my will or any codicil hereto which are made "free from duty." By clause 15, the testator provided that his trustees should divide his residuary estate into one hundred equal parts and hold it in various proportions for a number of beneficiaries all of whom took absolute interests.

On March 12, 1953, the testator made a codicil revoking two of the pecuniary legacies made by clause 8 of his will and substituted two other pecuniary legacies for them. In all other respects he confirmed his will.

The testator died on October 9, 1953, and his will and the codicil were proved by the executors named therein on November 7, 1953. The general rate of estate duty applicable to property passing on the testator's death was 80 per cent.

The chattels bequeathed to the testator's children by clause 2 of his will included chattels of artistic or historic interest which were valued, for probate purposes, at £11,296 15s.

The trustees took out a summons asking (1) whether the specific legatees of exempt chattels would or would not be entitled to be paid out of the residuary estate the estate duty which would become payable (a) on the sale by any of the specific legatees in his or her lifetime of any exempt chattels or (b) on breach of the statutory undertaking relating to the chattels required by section 48 of the Finance Act, 1950 [2]; (2) if the answer to question (1) was in the affirmative, that directions might be given to the executors as to what provision they should make for the duty contingently payable with a view to the distribution of the balance of the residuary estate.

At the date of the hearing none of the exempt chattels had yet been distributed between the specific legatees and none of them had been sold since the testator's death nor had the statutory undertaking, which had been given by the executors, been broken.

E. G. Wright for the executors.
John Brightman for the specific legatees.

provisions of section 40 of the Finance Act, 1930. The question which arises is whether the duty which would become payable on the proceeds of sale of those chattels in the event of them being sold by any of the three legatees during their lifetime should be borne by those legatees or will have to be provided for out of the testator's residuary estate. The rate of duty on the residuary estate, having regard to the settled property which passed on the testator's death, is the highest rate, 80 per cent.; so that, if the claim of the legatees to have that duty contingently payable provided for out of residue is right, a large part of the residuary estate—possibly all of the residuary estate—will have to be held up to abide the event whether or not the duty becomes payable.

The history of the exemption starts with section 20 of the Finance Act, 1896, and it was then confined to settled chattels. That section, as originally passed, was in the following terms: "(1) Where any property passing on the death of a deceased per-" son consists of such [chattels] not yielding income as appear to " the treasury to be of national, scientific, or historic interest, " and is settled so as to be enjoyed in kind in succession by dif-" ferent persons, such property shall not, on the death of such " deceased person, be aggregated with other property, but shall " form an estate by itself, and, while enjoyed in kind by a " person not competent to dispose of the same, be exempt " from estate duty, but if it is sold or is in the possession of some " person who is then competent to dispose of the same, shall " become liable to estate duty." Subsection (2) provided that the person selling the chattels, or the person who comes into possession and becomes competent to dispose of them, shall be accountable for the duty.

The construction of that section came before the Court of Appeal in 1904 in In re Leconfield.[1] By his will, Lord Leconfield (who died in 1901) directed his trustees to pay out of the residuary proceeds of his estate "so much of the estate duty and other death " duties . . . which . . . shall become payable upon or by reason of " my death in respect of all the estates and property (including as " well real estate as leaseholds, moneys, funds, stocks, shares and " securities) of which I shall immediately before my death be seised " or entitled as tenant for life under or by virtue of or by reference " to the will of the late . . . [Lord] Egremont." The contents of Petworth House of which the testator was tenant for life immediately before his death under Lord Egremont's will were exempt from duty under section 20 of the Finance Act, 1896, because they were of national or historic interest and were settled property. The question which was raised was whether, when estate duty fell to be payable on those chattels, either because of a sale by the next life tenant or when they eventually came into possession of a person competent to dispose of them under the settlement, that estate duty would be payable out of the free estate of the testator under that direction in his will. The Court of Appeal held that the estate duty which eventually might become payable on the exempted chattels would not be payable upon or by reason of the death of Lord Leconfield; it would become payable on the sale of the chattels and in consequence of the sale of the chattels, or alternatively upon the chattels coming into the possession of an absolute owner and in consequence of that fact, but not upon or by reason of the death of Lord Leconfield.

The provisions of section 20 of the Act of 1896 were varied by section 63 of the Finance (1909–10) Act, 1910, in two ways which are material. First, the exemption was extended to legacy duty and succession duty and did not apply only to estate duty; and, secondly, the exemption was extended to cases where the chattels in question were not settled but were the subject of an absolute bequest, but in that case it was provided that "the duty "shall only become chargeable when the property is sold, and then "only in respect of the last death on which the property passed." If, therefore, exempted chattels were given absolutely to a legatee, and he sold them during his lifetime, duty would become payable in respect of the death of the original testator, whereas, if the legatee in question retained the chattels during his lifetime and then died, so that they passed on his death and were sold by the next taker, duty would not be payable in respect of the death of the original testator but in respect of the death of the legatee.

That was the state of the law when In re Scott [2] came before the courts. Sir John Murray Scott, who was domiciled in this country but was possessed of an extremely valuable collection of objects of art in his apartment in Paris which were worth about £300,000, bequeathed those objects to Lady Sackville free of legacy duty. A large part of those chattels was exempted from immediate payment of legacy duty and also estate duty, under the statutory provisions to which I have referred. Lady Sackville in fact sold all those chattels, or the greater part of them, before she was put into possession of them by the executors, and estate duty and legacy duty thereupon became payable. One question which arose, the only question which is material for the decision of this case, was whether or not the gift of the chattels free of legacy duty exempted Lady Sackville from the liability, which she would otherwise be under, to pay the legacy duty which became payable, not on the death of the testator, but on her sale of the chattels. The Court of Appeal distinguished In re Leconfield. [3] They held that a bequest of chattels free of duty is apt to cover duty payable in respect of the death, though not payable immediately on the death, viz., duty which is contingently payable on a sale of the chattels in question by the legatee and is different from a direction to pay duties payable on or as a result of the death, which was the phrase which the Court of Appeal had to construe in In re Leconfield.[4] In In re Scott[5] it was put to the Court of Appeal by Sir Robert Finlay, on behalf of the residuary legatees,[6] that so to decide might in other circumstances cause very great administrative inconvenience, because no one could say at the date of the testator's death, when his residue was ascertained, whether or not the duty in question would eventually become payable. In that case there was no inconvenience, because Lady Sackville sold the chattels very shortly after the death, but she might have retained them for many years and, if that had been done, it would have been necessary for the executors to hold up a sufficient part of the residue to meet the legacy duty contingently payable. It is, however, to be observed that they would, as the law then stood, have known the maximum sum which they had to retain, because the duty was payable by reference to the value of the chattels at the death and by reference to the rate which was then ascertained. Despite that argument of inconvenience which was put to them, the court arrived at the decision that a general bequest free of duty covered the legacy duty contingently payable.

The law now applicable to exempted chattels is to be found in section 40 of the Finance Act, 1930, which repealed the earlier legislation and, in re-enacting it, amended it in this respect, that the duty is now not payable on the value of the chattels at the death of the testator, but on the proceeds of their sale when they come to be sold, a figure which at the date of the testator's death is quite uncertain. Section 40 provides: "(1) Where there pass on the death of a person dying "after the commencement of this Act any objects to which this "section applies,"—that is, objects of national, scientific, historic or artistic interest—"the value of those objects shall not be "taken into account for the purpose of estimating the principal "value of the estate passing on the death or the rate at which "estate duty is chargeable thereon, and those objects shall, while "enjoyed in kind, be exempt from death duties. (2) In the "event of the sale of any objects to which this section applies, "death duties shall, subject as hereinafter provided, become "chargeable on the proceeds of sale in respect of the last death "on which the objects passed . . . and the person by whom or "for whose benefit the objects were sold shall be account-"able. . . ."

In that state of the law, In re Oppenheimer[7] came before Roxburgh J. in 1948. There, the testator had made bequests from his collection of various objects which were exempt from duty as being of national or historic interest, and by clause 5 he directed that "all pecuniary and specific bequests given by this "my will or any codicil hereto shall be free from all duties in "respect of my death." The question arose whether that general direction for payment of "all duties in respect of my "death" covered the duty which would be contingently payable in the event of any legatee of the chattels in question selling them. It was argued that as a result of the change made in the law by the 1930 Act the case could be distinguished from In re Scott,[8] but Roxburgh J. held [9] that it made no difference that the duty was now charged on the proceeds of sale and not on the chattels themselves. It is to be observed that the words used in the will, "all duties in respect of my death," were the very words used in section 40 (2) of the Finance Act, 1930. I do not know what decision Roxburgh J. would have come to had the direction been for payment of "all duties payable on or as a "result of my death," which were the words in In re Leconfield.[10] It may be that there is a distinction to be drawn between the two phrases.

Since the decision in In re Oppenheimer [11] the law has been once more amended, by section 48 of the Finance Act, 1950, which provides, as a condition of the exemption of chattels of historic or artistic interest, that the beneficiary shall give an undertaking to the Treasury that the objects will be kept permanently in the United Kingdom, that reasonable steps will be taken for the preservation of the objects, and that reasonable facilities for examining them will be afforded to persons authorised by the Treasury. The section goes on to provide that, in the event of a breach of that undertaking, duty will become payable in the same way as it would become payable if the objects were sold by the legatee.

A question has been raised in the summons as to whether, assuming that this future duty will be payable out of residue, it will be payable not only if the legatees sell the chattels but also if they break the undertaking which they will have to give. But it is not necessary for me to determine that question, because counsel for the specific legatees does not seek to argue that if duty should become payable by reason of a breach of undertaking by his clients they could claim to throw the duty then payable on residue. He confines his claim to the duty which will become payable in the event of their selling the chattels during their lifetime. Of course, if they retain the chattels during the whole of their lives and they pass on their deaths, then there will be no question of any duty being payable in respect of the death of the testator.

That being the state of the law and the authorities, I come back to the will. I think that counsel for the residuary legatees really conceded that if clause 2 of the will stood alone, and was the only relevant provision in the will, the case would be indistinguishable from In re Scott [12] and the freedom from duty would include the duty contingently payable in the event of a sale of chattels by the legatee. As he pointed out, that construction leads to an even greater inconvenience now than it could have led to in 1916, because the duty is now payable on the proceeds of sale, the amount of which is totally uncertain and may be vastly greater than the probate value of the chattels. Nevertheless, I think he concedes that if one simply had the words "free "of duty," the result would be that the contingent duty would be payable out of residue. But he says, rightly, that the will must be construed as a whole, and argues that reading clause 2 and clause 14 together, the words "free of duty" in clause 2 really mean "free of duty payable on the death of the testator," as opposed to duty payable at some other date. He says that, had clause 2 contained the words "free of duty payable on my death," those words, having regard to the decision in In re Leconfield,[13] would not have covered duty which was payable on another date, namely, on a sale, and he submits that, reading clause 2 and clause 14 together, that is the proper construction to put on the words "free of duty" in clause 2.

In aid of that submission, counsel for the residuary legatees, says that if I am in any doubt on the matter, if I feel that the arguments are evenly balanced, I ought to incline to the construction which would confine the words "free of duty" in clause 2 to duties payable on the death, because of the great administrative inconvenience of the other construction which will result in a great part, if not the whole, of the residue having to be retained for an indefinite time to meet this contingent claim. As an analogy in support of his argument, he referred me to In re Wedgwood,[14] which is the leading case on the question whether, where a settled legacy is given free of all duties, future estate duty payable on the death of a tenant for life is payable out of residue or falls on the legacy. He says that in that case one of the arguments which weighed with the court in confining the words "free of all death duties" to duties payable in consequence of the death of the testator, as opposed to future estate duty payable on the death of a life tenant of a settled legacy, was the great inconvenience which would be caused by the other construction. Counsel for the specific legatees, on the other hand, points out that in In re Wedgwood,[15] although the court held that future estate duty payable on the death of some other person was not prima facie included in a gift free of all death duties, they did hold that legacy duty which might become payable on the death of a life tenant of a settled legacy, where the rates of duty payable by the life tenant were different from those payable by the reversioner and, therefore, the legacy duty could not be paid as a whole at the date of the testator's death, was payable out of residue under a gift free of all death duties, notwithstanding that it was not payable until the death of the life tenant. He contended that it would be wrong to attribute such force to clause 14 as counsel for the residuary legatees said should be attributed to it since it is merely an administrative direction to the trustees to make certain payments out of the net proceeds of sale of the testator's residuary estate and does not on the face of it profess to be making any disposition in favour of anybody.

In my judgment, the argument presented by counsel for the specific legatees on that point is right. I think it would be wrong to read a clause such as clause 14 as cutting down what I think is the prima facie meaning of the phrase "free of duty" in clause 2. It may be that the testator had not in mind the fact that some duty payable in respect of his death would not be payable on his death but would only be payable contingently at some future date. If he had been aware of that, he might have made a different disposition. But, reading the two clauses together, I do not think that I can give effect to the submission of counsel for the residuary legatees. I therefore declare that the duty contingently payable on a sale by a legatee—I say nothing about a breach of undertaking—will be payable out of residue.

Declaration accordingly.
Question 2 of the summons stood over with liberty to apply in the event of no agreement being reached. Costs of plaintiff on the trustee scale and defendants on the common fund basis to be paid out of the estate in due course of administration.

In the first appeal the valuation officer had appealed against a decision of a local valuation court that a hereditament at which a laundry business was carried on was an industrial hereditament and should be transferred to Part II of the valuation list. The second appeal had been against a decision by another valuation court that a laundry business should be included in Part I of the list, not being an industrial hereditament. The issue in both cases was whether the hereditament was excluded from being derated as an industrial hereditament because it was "primarily occupied and used for . . . "the purposes of a retail shop," defined to include "premises of a "similar character where retail trade or business . . . is carried "on," within the proviso to section 3 (1) of the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, as expanded by section 3 (4).[1]

In both cases the greater part of the laundry was collected and delivered by the laundry employees, but individuals could, if they wished, take their laundry to the hereditament and collect it, and a few customers did so. The Lands Tribunal held that each of the hereditaments was not an industrial hereditament:—

Held, (1) that on the facts, and applying the everyday meaning to the words used in the definition, no part of either of the hereditaments was used or occupied for the purposes of a retail shop. Although customers could and did resort to each hereditament, that was not conclusive in favour of the hereditament being a shop, and on the facts, the public were not invited to resort to the hereditament (post, pp. 1351, 1352).

Dolton Bournes and Dolton Ltd. v. Osmond [1955] 1 W.L.R. 621; [1955] 2 All E.R. 258, C.A. applied.

(2) That even if any part of either hereditament had been used or occupied for the purposes of a retail shop, the premises were not primarily so occupied and used. The hereditaments were used for the single unified business of a laundry, which was, admittedly, retail trade or business, but it was not in ordinary language conducted as a retail shop—nor was the laundry work ancillary to the part of the premises to which the public were allowed to come.

Decision of Lands Tribunal in both appeals reversed.

Appeals from the Lands Tribunal (Mr. Erskine Simes Q.C. in the first appeal and Sir William Fitzgerald Q.C. in the second) on cases stated.

In the first appeal Kenneth Roger Almond (hereinafter called "the valuation officer") appealed from a decision of a local valuation court for Birmingham given on August 13, 1958, transferring to Part II of the valuation list for the City of Birmingham rating area a hereditament described as "laundry and premises, 15A,

[1] Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, s. 3: "(1) In "this Act the expression 'industrial "'hereditament' means a heredita- "ment . . . occupied and used . . . "as a factory or workshop: Provided "that the expression 'industrial here- "'ditament' does not include a "hereditament occupied and used "as a factory or workshop if it is "primarily occupied and used for the "following purposes or for any com- "bination of such purposes, that is to "say . . . (b) the purposes of a retail "shop. . . . (4) . . . 'Retail shop' "includes any premises of a similar "character where retail trade or "business (including repair work) is "carried on."

"Finch Road, Handsworth," occupied by the Heathfield Laundry (Birmingham) Ltd. (hereinafter called "the laundry") with net annual value and industrial net annual value £215, industrial and total rateable value £54.

The ground of appeal was that the hereditament was not an "industrial hereditament" within the meaning of section 3 of the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, and should be transferred to Part I of the list and assessed therein at £262 gross value and £215 rateable value. The decision of the Lands Tribunal (Mr. Erskine Simes Q.C.) was given as follows on September 21, 1959: The hereditament was situated in a residential road and access was obtained by a private drive about 66 feet in length between two private houses on the wall of one of which were the words "Heathfield Laundry." At the end of that drive and in rear of the house were two offices which were entered from a lobby with a door opening onto the drive, on which was a plate with the words "registered office." One of these offices numbered 3 on the plan [produced at the hearing] had a sliding glass panel, which could be operated only from the office, forming a hatchway onto the lobby. The drive led into a yard, around three sides of which were what might be called the laundry buildings, including rooms for receiving, sorting, packing and checking and dispatch. . . . The hereditament was occupied and used as a laundry carried on by way of trade and for the purpose of gain, and was, accordingly, a "factory" within the meaning of section 149 (1) of, and the Sixth Schedule to, the Factory and Workshop Act Act, 1901, as amended by section 1 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1907, and is registered as such. The laundry had also a receiving office at 249, Rookery Road, Handsworth, and employed two vans which collected and delivered not only to the receiving office but also to customers direct. The van-drivers delivered the articles collected by them to the receiving room in the laundry and collected the clean laundry for delivery from the dispatch room therein. Except in a few cases where customers had monthly accounts, they collected the money for the clean laundry when they delivered it to customers direct and handed the money so collected with their receipt books to the office numbered 3 through the hatchway. All moneys for laundry left at and collected from the receiving office at Handsworth were dealt with in that office and sent to the other office on the hereditament numbered 1 on the plan. There was a basket placed in the yard adjoining the rear door to the office numbered 3 and customers could and did bring dirty laundry and deposited it in this basket without seeing anyone. After washing, such laundry was collected by the customer at the hatchway in the office numbered 3 and paid there the money due. It was agreed between the parties that the percentages of total turnover attributable to the different ways of dealing with the goods dealt with at the hereditament were as follows: collected and delivered by van-men, 65 per cent.; received from customers calling at the receiving office at

v.

LAUNDRY
(BIRMINGHAM) LTD.

Handsworth, 17 per cent.; received from customers calling at the hereditament, 18 per cent.

There was no display of goods at the hereditament and no notice was displayed there indicating that laundry could be left. A director of the laundry expressed the view that he would rather have the dirty laundry dealt with by the van-men than left and collected by the customers, though he admitted that he would not get their work at all if they could not deliver and collect personally. The total staff employed at the laundry numbered 23, of whom one only was employed in the office numbered 3. She acted as book-keeper for the whole business, but was also required to hand out clean laundry and collect money there from customers who called. She had nothing to do with the dirty laundry left by them, which was collected by the laundry staff from the basket where it was left and went straight to the receiving office in the laundry. After washing, the laundry was packed and checked in the laundry and taken to the office numbered 3 to await collection by the customer. . . . After referring to the submissions of counsel, Mr. Simes Q.C. said that there was no doubt that, as in Dolton Bournes & Dolton Ltd. v. Osborne,[2] applying the ordinary use of words and looking merely at the physical characteristics and appearance of the premises and their size, no one would say that the hereditament was a shop or of the character of a shop. He then said[3] that it was "a place where the public resort for the purpose of having their "particular wants supplied"; but as Lord Evershed M.R. had pointed out, referring to Toogood's case,[4] "the vital point" was not "whether they do resort in fact but whether they really are "invited to come." In the present case there was no display to entice or attract prospective customers; there was no displayed invitation to them to use the premises, and the only indication of its use were the words "Highfield Laundry" at the entrance. But the same state of affairs existed, for example, in some tailors' establishments which were clearly retail shops and it was obvious from the figures that resort by the public was not negligible, and there was no question in the present case, as there was in Dolton Bournes' case,[5] that it was the general public, the man in the street, who constituted the public who did so resort. There was, moreover, what Lord Thankerton in Toogood's case[6] described as "the true element," namely, provision of accommodation in the premises for the public who might so resort, in the shape of the basket and the lobby with hatch to the office numbered 3. That office might be compared with the space behind the counter in the normal shop to which the public were not admitted but which provided storage space for the goods which the customers were seeking.

The tribunal held that it was bound by Toogood's case[6] and the Ritz Cleaners case [7] to find that there was a retail shop on the hereditament within the definition of that expression in section 3 (4) of the Act of 1928.

It was obvious that, looking at the area which could be said to fall within that definition, the proportion of the staff employed there and the proportion of the work brought to and collected by the public who resorted that, looking at the hereditament as a whole, its primary use was not that of a retail shop unless it could be said that this was a unified business as in Finn v. Kerslake,[8] interpreted by the Court of Appeal in Ritz Cleaners Ltd. v. West Middlesex Assessment Committee.[9]

In the present case the laundry, the factory, was ancillary to the "retail shop" and, applying the tests referred to by Greer L.J.,[10] it was impossible to distinguish the present case from Finn's case.[11] In that case and in the Ritz Cleaners case [12] there was something which looked like a shop, but having come to the decision that part of the present hereditament was a "shop" within the definition in section 3 (4), the tribunal was forced to the conclusion that there was a "unified business" and that Finn's case,[13] therefore, applied.

The appeal was, therefore, allowed and a direction given that the valuation list for the City of Birmingham rating area should be amended by transferring the hereditament to Part I of the list with gross value £262, net annual value £215 and rateable value £172, values which had been agreed between the parties as appropriate if the appeal was allowed. If the tribunal had taken the view that the appeal should be dismissed, it was agreed that the decision of the local valuation court should stand. The laundry company appealed.

In the second appeal, G. T. Cushing, trading as Fakenham Steam Laundry (hereinafter called "the appellant"), appealed from a decision of a local valuation court for West Norfolk given on September 26, 1957, reducing the assessment of a hereditament described as "laundry, garage and premises 54–56, Holt "Road, Fakenham" to £184 gross value, £150 rateable value. The ground of appeal was that the hereditament was an industrial hereditament as defined by section 3 of the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, and should be transferred to Part II of the valuation list.

At the hearing before the Lands Tribunal the following facts were proved or admitted and set out in the case stated: (a) The proposal from which these proceedings arose was made on September 19, 1956. . . . (c) The hereditament was situated on the outskirts of the town of Fakenham on the Holt Road; the property on the other side of the road was residential and on the laundry side it was partly industrial and partly residential, quite removed from the shopping centre. The hereditament had frontages of about 190 feet to Holt Road and 428 feet to Westmead Road. There was a sign board at the entrance to the hereditament inscribed with the laundry's name but no other advertisements or invitations to enter the premises were displayed. It was the only laundry in Fakenham or within about 15 miles of the town. (d) . . . The U.S.A.A.F. Base at Sculthorpe was about 4 miles from Fakenham, and in 1952 the laundry was granted a concession by the U.S. Air Force authorities to operate at the base, and a building there was put at his disposal. The American personnel delivered their laundry and dry cleaning work to the laundry's staff in that building. The laundry provided at the base a valet service and a quick washing service for shirts and maintained there the necessary staff and machinery for those services; this, however, represented a small proportion of the work from the base, and the bulk of such work was brought by the laundry's vans to the hereditament for washing or cleaning. After washing or cleaning, the articles were taken back in the laundry's vans to the base and redelivered there to the customers. Payments were made by the American personnel to the laundry's staff in token currency at the base, and banked there daily by the laundry's staff with the U.S.A.A.F. authorities. At the end of each month, the U.S.A.A.F. authorities paid to the laundry in sterling the accumulated takings, less 10 per cent. of the gross receipts retained in consideration of the concession. (e) Payments for laundry or dry cleaning work collected and delivered by the vans from and to private customers were made by the customers to the van-men, who handed in the money at the hereditament, normally at the office. (f) Dirty laundry brought to the hereditament by the vans (whether from the U.S.A.A.F. base or from private customers) was at the material time delivered into the hall-way. . . . Articles brought in by the vans for dry cleaning were delivered to [a different] building, in which all the dry cleaning work on the hereditament was done. (g) No receiving office was provided on the hereditament for customers who brought their laundry or dry cleaning work to the hereditament, and such customers did not go to the office [where the van-men handed in the money]. A number of such customers were regular callers. Customers who brought laundry to the hereditament took it to the dispatch bay and threw their bundles of dirty washing on the floor in one corner, often seeing no member of the staff; . . . No member of the staff supervised the intake of this laundry and no receipt or acknowledgment was given to these customers. The bundles of dirty washing were collected from the dispatch bay at irregular intervals by some member of the staff and taken to the sorting room, where they were added to the dirty washing brought in by the vans. Customers calling to collect clean laundry had to attract the attention of some member of the staff in the adjoining room . . . and ask her to find their bundle for them, and then pay her for the work done.

It was not the duty or function of any particular member of the staff to collect this dirty washing from [the dispatch bay] or to hand out the clean washing or to receive payment for it. There were not at any material time any notices or other directions indicating where customers should leave or collect laundry. (h) Customers bringing dry-cleaning work to the hereditament took it to and collected it from the building [where all dry cleaning was done, referred to under (f)]. This building had only one door, near which was a wooden table on which goods were folded and packed for dispatch by van, and on which calling customers could also deposit their goods. A receipt was given to customers calling personally. Customers calling to collect dry-cleaning work paid the member of the staff in that building from whom they collected it. (i) The laundry did not welcome the calling of customers at the hereditament, because of difficulties arising from lack of lists and names and from insecure bundling, and would have preferred to collect and deliver by van, but felt bound to accept this work, especially as this was the only laundry in or near Fakenham and some of these customers were unable to be at home when the vans called. Some of the customers also had special reasons for calling at the hereditament—for example, that they had been out when the van called, that they wished to have their laundry back sooner than the normal date of delivery by the van or that they wished to make some complaint. (j) The pricing of customers' laundry lists, keeping of ledgers and wages books, and all accounting for the whole of the business was done in the office. (k) The staff employed by the laundry at the hereditament and at the U.S.A.A.F. base in September, 1956, consisted of an adviser and supervisor and of six men and 46 women, of whom one man and 11 women were at the U.S.A. Air Force base and the rest were at the hereditament; of the latter, three were employed in the office, two men and one woman on the vans and the rest were process workers. . . .

On November 9, 1959, the tribunal (Sir William Fitzgerald, Q.C.) gave its decision as follows. The business of this laundry fell into three departments. Two of them were more or less usual to all laundries, that was van collection; and customers calling to leave their laundry at the premises and afterwards to collect it. There was a third department which arose out of a contract with the United States Air Force by which the Fakenham Laundry operated for the United States Air Force partly at the Air Force base and partly in the hereditament. The percentage of turnover of each department was: United States Air Force contract, 46·8 per cent.; van collection, 45·4 per cent.; dry cleaning and customers' collection, 7·8 per cent. It was agreed that the laundry was a "factory" within the meaning of section 149 (1) of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, as amended by the Factory and Workshop Act, 1907, and it was registered as such.

Two questions arose. First, was there a retail shop and was it primarily used as a retail shop? The laundry in this case were immediately confronted with a decision of this tribunal given on September 21, 1959, K. R. Almond (V. O.) v. Heathfield Laundry (Birmingham) Ltd. It could not be denied that the laundries were similar but the appellants contend that they can be distinguished in law. . . . The hereditament there was a laundry similar to this one. It also carried on business under different headings—collection and delivery by van and receiving their customers' laundry at the hereditament. . . . All the cases quoted in this case were considered by Mr. Erskine Simes in the case of the Heathfield Laundry, and following those decisions he felt himself bound to come to the conclusion that there was a retail shop on the hereditament and its primary use was that of a retail shop. . . .

After referring to the first appeal and to the differences between the two cases, the tribunal concluded the differences were insufficient to distinguish the two cases, and that, accordingly, the appeal should be dismissed.

Patrick Browne Q.C. for the laundries.

J. Ramsay Willis Q.C. and J. Raymond Phillips for the valuation officers.

In addition to the cases mentioned in the judgments, the following were cited in argument: Pritchard v. William Lewis & Sons [14]; Barton v. Twining & Co. Ltd.[15]

Lord Evershed M.R. These two cases have raised questions of difficulty which I hope I may not unfairly describe as in some respects artificial. But although the difficulties are there we have reached a clear conclusion and have, therefore, thought that we could with advantage deliver our judgments at once.

Both cases relate to laundry businesses, the one at Handsworth, Birmingham; the other at Fakenham, Norfolk. [His Lordship read section 3 (1) and (4) of the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, and continued:] Applying the expansion of subsection (4) to the original language of subsection (1), a hereditament which is used and occupied as a factory will cease to be an "industrial hereditament" for the purposes of the Act if it is primarily used for the purposes of a retail shop, including premises of a similar character, where retail trade or business, including repair work, is carried on. It is perhaps as well to observe at once that the rather elaborate formula which I have last read is not the same thing as though the subsection had said "if it is primarily occupied for the purposes of retail "trade or business," a point which is emphasised, as will later appear, by Lord Thankerton in Toogood & Sons Ltd. v. Green.[1] If that had been the intention nothing would have been easier than to say so.

In order to discover what is meant by a "factory or workshop" one turns to the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901. The Sixth Schedule to that Act contains language which beyond any doubt covers premises used for a business such as this, namely, laundry work. It is, therefore, conceded that the hereditament here in question is one occupied and used as a factory or workshop. But that, of course, is not conclusive: it still remains to decide whether, being so occupied, it nonetheless is primarily occupied and used for the purposes of a retail shop, etc. I have now stated the problem which these cases present.

It seems that not long after the passing of the Act of 1928 there was a great number of cases to which it gave rise and a group of them came in the year 1931 before the House of Lords. Quite properly we have been referred to many of these cases and to passages from the speeches delivered in them, particularly speeches of Lord Dunedin. I take some comfort as a premise to what follows from two observations which Lord Dunedin made in those cases. The first is an observation made in Sedgwick v. Watney, Combe, Reid & Co.[2] and other cases: "Certain "decisions will, it is hoped, prove of very general application "and so be of service to the local rating authority. But, after "all, the question is an individual one as to each particular "hereditament." I add another citation, an expression of an oft-cited principle[3]: "My Lords, the matter seems to me simply "a question of attributing an everyday meaning to the words "used in the definition"; and the noble Lord is referring to the definition here in question. Those citations do not carry the matter very much further but they do at least justify an approach which I suggest is the right approach, namely, first to consider these cases upon their own facts and in deciding them to apply, so far as one is not prevented by some previous decision, everyday meanings to everyday words.

In the present case, Mr. Patrick Browne, for the appellant laundries, has conceded in this court (though I think I am right in saying he may wish to reserve the opportunity to take another view hereafter) that the conduct of this laundry business is a retail trade or business. That, however, is not the end of the matter, for I have already indicated that the definition introduces two characteristics or qualifications: first, the hereditament must be or contain a retail shop, so called and understood, or premises of a similar character thereto, and, secondly, the hereditament must be primarily occupied and used for the purposes of a retail shop. In these cases it is, I think, plain that there has at times been a conflict between what has been said to be a question of fact and what has been said to be a matter of law. An instance where that conflict was referred to is the tailors' case, if I may so describe it, Wilkinson v. Sibley.[4] That case quarter sessions had decided as one purely of fact by saying that the hereditament consisted in part of a workshop and in part a shop properly so called: that as a fact the former was preponderant in scope and dimensions and, therefore, that one could not say the premises were used primarily for the purposes of a retail shop. It was the view of this court, as expressed by Scrutton L.J., that the decisions in the cases to which I have already made a very brief allusion had made it necessary for the court in the circumstances of that case to hold, not as a matter of fact but as a matter of law, that there was one business carried on upon the hereditament and that it was what I will call a shop business, the workshop being ancillary to the shop premises more strictly so described. It is, of course, quite true that when the facts have been found it is a question of law to say whether they fall or do not fall within the scope of the definition which I have read. But it still remains a question of fact to decide what in truth is the nature or the character, as a matter of fact, of the business which is being carried on. It may be that had Toogood's case[5] been decided by the House of Lords before and not after Scrutton L.J. delivered the judgment I have mentioned, he might somewhat have qualified his language.

[His Lordship stated the facts and continued:] There was a certain part of the business done by customers calling personally at the laundry premises, leaving their belongings to be washed and later collecting them. It is not in doubt that it is the arrangements in relation to this last part of the business that constitute, if at all, a "retail shop" within the meaning of the definition. What has been the burden of the argument for the respondent valuation officer is that if the arrangements I have mentioned and the physical characteristics of the premises connected therewith qualify as a retail shop, then since this is one single uniform business we cannot dissect it, as is said in some of the cases, and we must conclude that the whole laundry is really part of the shop business; it is, in other words, one shop business. [His Lordship stated further facts, and continued:] It is at least true beyond a peradventure that in both the Birmingham and Fakenham cases the part of the business done for customers who personally call in order to leave and later collect their laundry is a small though not a purely minimal part of the whole. It is, I think, also clear that arrangements of that kind are done as a matter of practical business necessity. Not everyone can leave their house with staff in it to deal with the laundry van when it comes but, equally plainly (and as expressly found in the Fakenham case), I would say that though a business necessity, it is not something which the laundry welcome or encourage or make any sort of attempt to expand.

The question is twofold. The first problem is: can it be said that any part of the premises of these two laundries is being used and occupied for the purposes of a retail shop as those words have been expanded? It was pointed out by this court in Dolton Bournes & Dolton Ltd. v. Osmond [6] that, although it was not necessary that the premises should look like a shop as that phrase is used when applied to premises in an ordinary shopping street, still there must be the characteristic that the public do resort to it and are invited so to do. I will not take time by reading from the judgment of the court that I delivered in that case. Dolton Bournes' case [6] was perhaps an extreme one because it was made plain that the occupier discouraged the public from coming to the premises though the necessities of business prevented him from making it impossible that they should. The premises here, if you apply Lord Dunedin's phrase "the everyday meaning" of ordinary words, would not be thought by anybody to be in the least like a shop. Indeed, so far as the tribunal is concerned, it concluded the matter in the way I have indicated in very plain terms. I take the Birminham case, where Mr. Erskine Simes said: "There is no doubt that in this case, as in Dolton Bournes "Ltd. v. Osmond,[7] applying the ordinary use of words and looking "merely at the physical characteristics and appearance of the "premises and their size, no one would say that the hereditament "was a shop or of the character of a shop." But he then went on to say that he felt bound by authority, and particularly by Ritz Cleaners Ltd. v. West Middlesex Assessment Committee,[8] to which I must later make greater reference, to conclude not only that it was a shop but that this was a case in which the premises were occupied and used primarily for the purposes of a retail shop. There is no doubt that the addition in the definition of the words "including repair work" has necessarily expanded the meaning of the word "shop" so as to cover premises which are not at all like the ordinary shop in a shopping street where you go in to buy cigarettes or books or whatever it may be.

The group of cases which came before the House of Lords in the year 1931 included one case called Turpin v. Middlesbrough Assessment Committee,[9] which related to a hereditament used for the repair of motor-cars, and the language used by Lord Dunedin in that case showed that the words "retail shop" must include premises where such repair work was done and where the public was invited to come, and did come, with their motor-cars for repair. Lord Dunedin said [10]: "I do not pause to inquire "whether a person who does such repair work could not properly "be said to be carrying on a retail trade or business. It may be "that in strictness the words 'retail trade or business' are only "applied with complete accuracy to cases of selling goods."

ALMOND v. HEATHFIELD LAUNDRY (BIRMINGHAM) LTD.

Lord Evershed M.R.

Then he says that in the case before the House all doubt is removed by the express inclusion of the repair work, and he went on thus [11]: "Nor do I agree with the view that has prevailed as "to the effect of the words 'of a similar character.' For myself, "I am unable to state what are the physical features the exist-"ence of which is essential to or distinctive of a retail shop. "I am familiar with many physical features which are frequently "and even commonly found in retail shops, such as counters and "shop windows; but I am equally familiar with retail shops "where no such features exist. In my opinion it is not possible "to say that the words 'of a similar character,' even if they "include, are limited to physical features of the premises. They "must, as I read them, include also similarity of character in "other respects. The character of the premises must be similar "to the character of a retail shop. Now if we compare the "hereditament here in question with a retail shop, do we find "any common characteristics? My Lords, I think we do; for "they are both buildings to which the public can resort for the "purpose of having particular wants supplied and services "rendered therein."

I have read that passage because it has been much relied upon by the valuation officer to support a proposition put sometimes as broadly as this: that if on the premises in question there is a place to which the public can resort for the purpose of having particular services rendered, there is a retail shop. I venture to recall what Lord Dunedin had said only nine pages earlier,[12] that one must treat these decisions as relating to the particular facts of the particular cases. It is no doubt established in Turpin's case [13] (and is later followed in another case recently before this court, Meriden Rural District Council v. Standard Motor Co. Ltd.[14]), and it is now clear that premises where the public are invited to go and do go with their motor-cars for repair will be treated as a retail shop. But I am unwilling and quite unable as a matter of the sense of the statutory language to say that it follows that if once one finds on a hereditament a place, room, open space or what one will to which the public can resort for services rendered, it therefore follows of necessity that there is a shop.

Having referred to what Lord Dunedin said in Turpin's case,[15] it will be convenient, though I do not wish to elaborate this judgment by too much citation, to refer to another case decided at the same time, Finn v. Kerslake,[16] which is of more direct importance undoubtedly to the present case. The precise facts in Finn v. Kerslake [16] remain to my mind still a little obscure and it seems to me that judges in later cases have not always taken entirely the same view as to what were in truth the facts.

But broadly this much is clear. The hereditament was that of a baker. He had on the hereditament and as part of it a baker's shop well set up—a baker's shop in the ordinary everyday acceptance of that word. He also had behind it a bakery where he baked his bread and cakes, and it appears from what is stated in the lower courts that there was no direct access between the bakery and the shop. The question which we are now debating arose in that case: was this hereditament primarily used for the purposes of a retail shop? The House of Lords, reversing the view taken in this court, said that it was, and again (because this is so much relied upon by the Crown) I shall read a short passage from Lord Dunedin's speech [17]: "In the present case "the hereditament is all occupied and used for the one trade "or business—namely, a retail trade or business in bread and "confectionery,"—then Lord Dunedin continues with a phrase which, with the utmost possible respect, somewhat surprises me—"for it cannot be doubted that the sale to hotels, clubs, "restaurants, etc., is typical retail trade, and these sales, as also "the orders given to roundsmen, are just part of the ordinary "business of a retail shop. Similarly the bakehouse at the back "of the shop, which makes the goods for the retail business, is "an ordinary part of a retail baker's shop and, in my opinion, "is merely ancillary to the trade or business carried on in the "shop. I have no doubt, on the facts of this business, that the "whole hereditament is used and occupied for the purposes of a "retail baker's shop, and that there is no need to pray in aid "any extended meaning given to 'retail shop' by the special "definition." In my judgment it cannot be said as a matter of law to follow from that passage, or that we are bound in this case to hold, that the mere fact of the presence on these two laundries of places to which the public can and in some degree do resort leads to the conclusion that all the laundry in each case is a retail shop within the expanded definition. I think, without in any way qualifying what Lord Dunedin said in the passage I have read, that it is a question of fact to decide: Is any part of this laundry at Heathfield used as a retail shop at all and to pose and answer the same question as regards Fakenham.

As regards the latter case, I have no doubt that no part of the Fakenham laundry can, with any justice to the language used, be described as used for the purposes of a retail shop. From the passages I have read it is quite plain not only that the laundry proprietor by no means welcomes customers calling, but it is equally plain that there is nothing whatever which could be called an invitation to the public. You could only acquire the means of having your laundry dealt with by personally calling as a result of experience or of being told by somebody how to do it. In my judgment the same is true of the Heathfield laundry, though I agree in that case that there is perhaps a little more to be said

C. A.
1960
Almond v. Heathfield Laundry (Birmingham) Ltd.
Lord Evershed M.R.

for the view that the basket plus the passage and the window which is opened by a particular lady on being called, has some of the characteristics which would be similar to a retail shop. But again I find a singular absence of anything which could be reasonably or sensibly called an invitation. One would, I should have thought, inevitably have to inquire from somebody else in order to find out how you went about it if you wanted to leave your laundry and later to collect it. I, therefore, take the view that nothing in any of the authorities cited before us compels us to hold that in either case there is here any part of the hereditament used for the purposes of a retail shop. Applying the ordinary sense of ordinary language I do not think any part is so used.

If that is right, it is conclusive of the case. But if I am wrong, there still remains the second problem posed by the definition—are the premises primarily occupied and used for the purposes of a retail shop? And, since the matter has been fully argued, I think it right that I should also express my conclusion on the second problem. Let me take now the Birmingham case; and if in truth the right answer is that this little passageway and its adjuncts should properly be treated, being part of the hereditament, as occupied and used for the purposes of a retail shop, still the exclusion from derating benefit applies only if the hereditament as a whole is primarily occupied and used for the purposes of a retail shop. The argument for the Crown has gone the length of saying that when one has, as here, a single uniform or unified business (namely, that of a laundry), and when there is upon part of the premises a shop or its equivalent, then one can no longer dissect the subject-matter one is dealing with; the conclusion is inevitable as a matter of law that the whole hereditament is occupied and used for the purposes of a retail shop, and it is submitted that even though the conclusion appears entirely to make nugatory the use of the adverb "primarily," still the decisions which bind this court compel the conclusion. Particularly it is suggested that the result follows from the Ritz Cleaners case,[18] to which I have briefly alluded already, and further reliance is placed on Finn's case,[19] which I have also mentioned, and the tailors' case, Wilkinson v. Sibley.[20] It is perfectly true that in those cases there are statements which at first blush seem to support the argument. I have mentioned that Scrutton L.J. said that once one has got a single business one cannot dissect it and that the workshop must, to use his language, be treated as ancillary to the trade or business. My first qualification on the prima facie effect of those words shall be based on the decision of the House of Lords in Toogood & Sons Ltd. v. Green,[21] which was later than Wilkinson v. Sibley.[22] It related to a business, admittedly a retail business, of selling seeds which had to be prepared in various ways before sale. From the facts of the case it seems that the bulk of the business was done direct with the customer by correspondence, the seeds being dispatched through the post; but that there was an arrangement and a place at which customers could call and buy their seeds from the hereditament, and it was said that one or two such persons called every week. Nevertheless the House had no difficulty in concluding that, looked at sensibly, broadly and according to the facts of the case, it could not properly be said, notwithstanding the presence of this place of public resort, that the business, this single business, was conducted upon premises which was a hereditament primarily used and occupied for the purposes of a retail shop. Reliance had been placed on Finn's case [23] and on the conclusion expressed in the passage in Lord Dunedin's speech which I have read. But Lord Thankerton, who delivered the leading opinion in the House and delivered it, let me say, in the presence and with the assent of Lord Dunedin, said [24]: "I may pause here to point out, first, that the test as "laid down in Moon v. London County Council [25] "—that was another of the 1931 cases—"is as to what is done on the here-"ditament in question, irrespective of what is done outside the "hereditament, and, secondly, that the test is not whether the "hereditament is mainly occupied and used for the purposes of "'a retail business,' but whether it is mainly occupied and used "for the purposes of a 'retail shop.'" Then a little later he takes up the argument presented on Finn's case [26]: "I observe "a tendency in certain of the judgments in the courts below to "put a wider construction than is justified on the views expressed "in this House in Finn's case [26]; those views—e.g., as to dissec-"tion of a unified business—are expressly confined to the facts "of that case. Admittedly, there was a retail shop on the "hereditament in that case through which the whole production "was disposed of."

I think if that passage is read in conjunction with the passage in Finn's case [26] from Lord Dunedin's speech that the conclusion is clear. The House was there dealing with a retail baker's shop, what Lord Dunedin called an ordinary retail baker's shop, and, once that conclusion had been reached, it followed that the place where the bread was actually baked was part of the shop, an ancillary part of it. The House applied the ordinary standard and said: here is an ordinary retail baker's shop and, as pointed out by Lord Dunedin, through that shop the whole production was disposed of, and the fact that much and, if you will, the majority of the bread was sent by van to the customers and not actually disposed of over the counter of the shop no more derogated from the general proposition than would the fact, for example, that you may, as all the world knows, order from Harrods' stores something which will be sent in Harrods' van to your premises but which does not in the least derogate from the fact that the whole of the business of Harrods in Knightsbridge is that of a retail shop. I think that is fundamental to the conclusion in Finn's case [26] and the deductions which ought to be drawn from it and it does not mean and cannot involve the result that the mere presence on the hereditament of a place to which the public may resort inevitably converts the whole of the hereditament into a retail shop or its equivalent because the business is a single business.

I turn again to the present case and, for simplicity, to the Birmingham laundry. It is not in doubt that this is one single uniform business, a laundry in the ordinary sense. But it would be, I should have thought, an absurdity and an offence against the language to say when the facts of this laundry are borne in mind that you have got here an ordinary laundry "shop." You have, it is true, a place where the public can, if they are instructed or find out, personally call and leave their laundry. But that does not (it seems to me) make this at all analogous to the ordinary baker's shop, which is what Lord Dunedin said was the subject-matter in Finn's case.[27] In the passage already read from Scrutton L.J., there is left for consideration the case where one has got a single business which may have on part of the hereditament and as an adjunct of the business a retail shop in the sense of being a place to which the public can go and buy goods or services if they want; but, as he said, what the result would be if the facts were as I have stated them is a question for further decision when it arises. And unless one is going entirely to disregard and treat as no longer present the word "primarily," one must, it seems to me, in a case such as this still ask the question: is the presence of this place of public resort, this so-called shop, such as to give the shop colour and character to the whole premises or is it a case in which one can fairly ask: looking at the business as a whole, is it primarily one conducted for the purposes of that shop or is it not? And in my judgment on the facts of this case the answer plainly is: it is not primarily conducted as a retail shop and it is quite wrong to suggest that all that goes on on these premises, the laundry work and the rest of it (and particularly in the Fakenham case the United States Army Air Force work) is ancillary in any sort of sense to those parts of the premises where the public can call and can leave and collect their washing.

It only remains for me to refer, as I should do, to Ritz Cleaners Ltd. v. West Middlesex Assessment Committee [28] because it was so much relied upon. It is stated as part of the facts in that case [29]: "The respondents, Ritz Cleaners Ltd., were cleaners and "dyers, and they had entered into occupation of the hereditament

"situate at No. 48, High Street, Uxbridge, on July 14, 1934, under "a lease for 21 years from March 25, 1934, at a yearly rental of "£215. The hereditament in question was situated in a busy "shopping street in Uxbridge and had the external appearance "of a shop." The Divisional Court concluded that quarter sessions had been justified in finding as a fact that what I will call the shop part of the business conducted through these premises in High Street, Uxbridge, was the less part of the business as a whole and therefore that the hereditament was not primarily used for the purposes of a retail shop. This court came to a different conclusion and there is undoubtedly to be found in the judgments in this court some support for this view, that once you have got a uniform business you cannot dissect it. But to my mind, when you study the case and the judgments, it is fundamental to the decision of this court in the Ritz Cleaners case [30] that the subject-matter, the business with which the court was dealing, was a shop business in its totality, and that if one asked what business Ritz Cleaners Ltd. were carrying on at 48, High Street, Uxbridge, one would say a dyers' and cleaners' shop; and that was supported by the view that apparently all the dyeing and cleaning material, the subject-matter of the business, the clothing which had to be dyed and cleaned which had to be collected by vans (and it was a considerable proportion), still went through the shop in the ordinary sense of that word in 48, High Street, Uxbridge. Greer L.J., in the leading judgment, said [31]: "The essential fact which, in my opinion, determines "this appeal in favour of the assessment committee lies in the "statement that the respondents deal direct with members of "the public, and do not work for any other firm. It seems to "me immaterial whether the customers' goods come direct to "the shop in the respondents' vans or whether they are delivered "in depots or agencies on their way to the shop. The determin-"ing fact is that the order comes from a customer, and not from "any merchant or distributing firm, and the delivery is made to "the customer." That passage was relied upon by the tribunal as compelling him, in spite of his own conclusion of fact, to hold that here there was the same result—a place for the public to come, a retail business, a uniform business and, therefore, incapable of dissection. But, as is apparent from what follows, what Greer L.J. was considering was whether this was retail trade or business at all; because he goes on [32]: "I think this is "just as much a retail trade or business as was the business of "the baker's shop in Finn's case.[33]" Then later he said [34]: "In Finn's case [35] it was decided that the fact that the vans in "many cases took the products of the ancillary factory direct "from that part of the hereditament which was a factory within "the Factories Acts, did not cease to make it merely ancillary

"to the work of the baker's shop," and later again[36]: "As they "found that part of the premises constituted a retail shop, they "ought to have gone on to consider whether the factory was "used for any other purposes than supplying the cleaned and "mended goods to the shop for re-delivery to the customers." He concluded that the factory was used for no other purpose than supplying the cleaned and mended goods to the shop. That test, if applied to the present case, could not possibly be accepted. It would be quite untrue to say that the laundry premises as a whole were used for no other purpose than supplying the cleaned laundry to that part of the premises where customers could, if they wished and had been directed, go and collect it.

Similarly, as I think, Slesser L.J. says[37]: "So in the "present case on the facts, seeing that all the goods to be "treated by way of cleaning or repair are brought to and dis-"patched through the shop either by or to customers direct or "by the agency of vanmen, as in Finn's case,[38] and receiving "stations, the business of cleaning and repairing is as much "ancillary to the purposes of the shop as was the cleaning and "repairing in the case of the garage in Turpin's case.[39]" After citing the language of the section, Greene L.J. said[40]—and I think this is a useful passage: "It is not sufficient that retail "business is carried on upon the premises if the premises are "not a shop or similar to a shop. Now the essential element "in a shop is that people can shop in it. If a concern conducts "its business entirely by mail order and does not invite the public "to come to its premises to buy or provide accommodation for "them, the premises from which its business is conducted are "not a shop, even though its business be entirely retail in "character," and then he refers to Toogood's case.[41] He continued[42]: "This is not a case where a defined portion of the "hereditament is allocated to one user exclusively. The user of "the whole hereditament is user for the purposes of a retail "shop since every part of it is used for those purposes." Finally at the very end[43]: "The whole of the business is shop "business conducted from and by the shop, and that in my "judgment disposes of the matter."

So, as I read the real ratio of this court's decision in the Ritz Cleaners case,[44] it can be stated thus: that when one looked at it and heard the facts found as to how the business was done the truth was that the hereditament was a hereditament used for the purposes and only for the purposes of a retail dyers' and cleaners' shop, just as the hereditament in Finn's case[45] was used and used exclusively as an ordinary bakery shop. And if that is right, then it follows no doubt that the dyeing and cleaning machines become necessarily ancillary to the main purpose, namely, that of the shop. In this case those tests cannot by any possibility be sensibly applied in the same sense. On the facts of the case it would appear to me quite impossible to say that these laundries, either of them, could be sensibly described as laundry shops and that the business of them could be so called. The most that one can say is that there is available means for the public at some part to resort though without any real invitation. But it is no less clear to my mind that the laundry business carried on is not carried on as part of a shop conducted from and by the shop or, in the language of Greer L.J. in the Ritz Cleaners case,[46] used for no other purpose than supplying cleaned goods to what I will assume to be the shop part of the laundry premises.

For those reasons, in my judgment, this appeal succeeds and with all respect to the Lands Tribunal—I refer now particularly to Mr. Simes' decision—I do not think he was compelled by the Ritz Cleaners case[46] and the other cases to hold contrary to his own expressed view that here the hereditament was used primarily and indeed exclusively for the purposes of a retail shop.

HARMAN L.J. The practice of these two laundries is typical of the normal type of business of their kind: they send out vans which collect washing from householders up and down the neighbourhood, convey it to the laundry and deliver it again when washed. But in modern conditions people are not always in their houses; nor do they have any domestic help and therefore each of the laundries found it as a matter of business necessary to suffer such persons to come to the laundry premises and dump, so to say, their washing there instead of putting it on the van, and similarly instead of receiving it by the van when clean, to go to the premises and find someone to let them have their washing back. I cannot see that there was any invitation to the public in either case. Business conducted as last described was merely a commercial necessity, but this fact has been seized upon by the valuation officers in the two cases to suggest that though these laundries are on the face of them "industrial here-"ditaments" being workshops within the meaning of the Factory and Workshops Act, as they clearly are, yet they are excepted by the proviso as being primarily used for the purposes of retail shops. As the member of the tribunal who decided the Heathfield case observed, no one would say that the hereditament was a shop or of the character of a shop, but then sliding slowly down the slippery path of authority, though well aware that it is not of the character of a shop, still less primarily used for that purpose, he feels constrained to reach a conclusion which his common sense tells him is ridiculous. Now this is an abuse of authority. I do not say we have not all found ourselves constrained by authority to come to conclusions which we distrust, but when authority leads a man to such a conclusion, he ought to pause and say: Is there not something wrong? The law cannot, as Serjeant Snubbin said, be such "a hass" as that.

Of course all these cases in the end depend upon facts which are slightly different. None of them, therefore, should be used as a kind of bed of Procrustes into which you thrust the facts and if some facts do not fit you lop them off. Authority is not meant to be that kind of instrument; it is meant to be a guide. Get the facts right and you will usually find that the law fits in. The essential difference between this case and the two authorities which are said to point the other way, so it seems to me, is one which in the end depends entirely on the facts. Both in Finn's case [47] and in the Ritz Cleaners case [48] the court reached this conclusion in the end, that on the facts of the case the whole hereditament was used for the purposes of a retail shop. If that were so the fact that there were parts of it behind which had no immediate connection with the shop in front but which existed for supplying the needs of the shop did not of course, make the whole hereditament an industrial rather than a commercial hereditament, and the question about the word "primarily" did not arise because there was only one business, namely, a shop business to which the whole hereditament was devoted.

I do not venture on the dissection of the authorities which my Lord has made. I agree with his analysis, but I do enter my small protest against the artificiality which seems to affict, particularly in rating cases where amongst a sandstorm of authorities words may be found which can be constrained to support almost any broad proposition. What you need to do, if I may say so, is to look very carefully at the particular facts of the particular case and the result will usually, though not perhaps always, be found consonant with the dictates of common sense. Jenkins L.J. in Dolton Bournes & Dolton Ltd v. Osmond [49] had these words to say, after stating what the question was and citing the definition of retail shop: "The question, therefore, is whether the hereditament is prima-"rily used for the purposes of a retail shop or for the purposes of "any premises of a similar character where retail trade or busi-"ness is carried on. These words, relatively simple and "ordinary words as they are, have been the subject of much "judicial discussion, and various attempts have been made to "arrive at definitions or expositions of their meaning; but I hope "I will not be disrespectful to the learned authors of various obser-"vations upon the meaning of this language if I say that to my "mind the most helpful observation, in all the wealth of authority "to which our attention has been directed, appears in the speech "of Lord Dunedin in Turpin v. Middlesbrough Assessment

"Committee[50] in the passage to which my Lord has already "referred, where he said: 'My Lords, the matter seems to me "'simply a question of attributing an everyday meaning to "'the words used in the definition.' One must, therefore, con- "sider the facts and apply an everyday meaning to the words used "in the definition, and see whether that everyday meaning, "applied to those facts, results in the conclusion that the heredi- "tament is being 'primarily occupied and used for the purposes "'of a retail shop,' including in that expression what is included "by the definition clause."

In that case the court reached a conclusion on the facts which, if I may say so, was consonant with reason. The Lands Tribunal in these cases in my judgment has reached conclusions contrary to reason and I am glad to think that the authorities do not compel any such lamentable upshot. I would allow the appeals.

DONOVAN L.J. I agree. In the case of a unified retail business (which I take to mean the same thing as a single retail business) where the whole of such business is physically done in the shop or otherwise done through the medium of the shop, it is easy to see that no question can arise whether the hereditament is primarily occupied and used for the purposes of a retail shop. Ex hypothesi it will be wholly so occupied and used. And this hypothesis in my opinion is the foundation of the decision in Finn's case[51] and the Ritz Cleaners case.[52] It does not exist here because, even assuming there was a "shop" in either of these two cases, only a small fraction of the business is done in the supposed shop or otherwise done through the medium of it. I think these two cases are of the kind that Scrutton L.J. envisaged in Wilkinson v. Sibley[53] as still to be decided, namely, a factory where a small portion of the output is sold in a small shop upon the same hereditament, but the bulk of it is disposed of otherwise. In such a case the primary purpose of the occupation and use falls to be determined, I think, as a question of fact. In both the present cases the answer would clearly be that the premises were not primarily occupied and used for the purposes of a retail shop.

I, therefore, concur in the conclusion that these appeals should be allowed.

Appeals allowed with costs of appeals and costs before the tribunal on the High Court scale.

* PRICE v. ROMILLY.

Agriculture—Agricultural holding—Notice to quit—Partial failure to remedy breach of condition—Reference to arbitration whether partial compliance insufficient to justify notice—Validity of notice to quit—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948 (11 & 12 Geo. 6, c. 63), s. 24 (2) (d).

The landlord of an agricultural holding served the tenant with a notice in writing dated April 21, 1959, requiring him to remedy seven specified breaches of covenant by October 31, 1959. On December 16, 1959, the tenant was served with a notice to quit. The notice purported to have been given pursuant to section 24 (2) (d) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948.[1] The question whether this was a valid notice was referred to arbitration under the Act. By his award, the arbitrator found that the notice was valid as the tenant had not complied with paragraph 1 of the earlier notice of April 21, 1959, and so had broken his tenancy agreement by failing to farm in accordance with the rules of good husbandry. The arbitrator also found that, apart from this omission, the tenant had carried out the requirements of the earlier notice as far as it was possible for him to do. The tenant applied to set aside the award on the ground that a partial failure to comply with the terms of a notice to remedy breaches of covenant was not sufficient to bring the case within section 24 (2) (d) of the Act of 1948, the consent of the Agricultural Land Tribunal not having been obtained:—

Held, that, subject to the de minimis rule, if a tenant failed to comply fully with the requirements set out in the notice for remedying breaches of terms or conditions of his tenancy, which were not inconsistent with the fulfilment of his responsibilities to farm in accordance with the rules of good husbandry, the provisions of section 24 (2) (d) applied, and a substantial compliance with the notice was not sufficient; accordingly, the notice to quit was valid.

MOTION to set aside the award of an arbitrator.

The applicant, the tenant of an agricultural holding moved to set aside the arbitrator's award in an arbitration under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, on the ground of error on the face of the award.

[1] Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, s. 24, (1) (as amended by the Agriculture Act, 1958, s. 8 (1) and Sch. 1, para. 8): "Where notice to quit "an agricultural holding or part of "an agricultural holding is given to "the tenant thereof, and not later "than one month from the giving of "the notice to quit the tenant serves "on the landlord a counter-notice in "writing requiring that this subsec-"tion shall apply to the notice to "quit, then, subject to the provisions "of the next following subsection, "the notice to quit shall not have "effect unless the Minister consents "to the operation thereof."

S. 24 (2): "The foregoing subsec-"tion shall not apply where . . . "(d) at the date of the giving of the "notice to quit the tenant had failed "to comply with a notice in writing "served on him by the landlord requir-"ing him . . . within a reasonable "time or within such reasonable period "as was specified in the notice to "remedy any breach by the tenant "that was capable of being remedied "of any term or condition of his ten-"ancy which was not inconsistent with "the fulfilment of his responsibilities "to farm in accordance with the rules "of good husbandry, and it is stated "in the notice to quit that it is given "by reason of the matter aforesaid."

By a notice in writing, dated April 21, 1959, and served on the tenant by the landlord's agents, the tenant was requested to remedy alleged breaches of his tenancy agreement by October 31, 1959. The works required to be done were enumerated in seven items, item 1 being "Clean out the ditch between ordnance survey Nos. 885 and 918." On December 16, 1959, the landlord's agents served on the tenant a notice to quit the holding on March 25, 1961, or at the expiration of the year of his tenancy which should expire next after the end of twelve months from the date of service of the notice. The notice stated that it was given pursuant to the appropriate paragraph of section 24 (2) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, for the reason that the tenant had failed to comply with the notice, dated April 21, 1959, requiring him within a reasonable time, or within such reasonable time as was specified in the notice, to remedy all the breaches by him that were capable of being remedied of the terms and conditions of the tenancy not inconsistent with the fulfilment of his responsibilities to farm in accordance with the rules of good husbandry as set out in the notice. The tenant served a counter-notice under section 24 (1) of the Act of 1948, and the consent of the Agricultural Land Tribunal to the notice to quit had not been obtained.

The dispute having been submitted to arbitration under section 26 of the Act of 1948 (as substituted by the Agriculture Act, 1958, Sch. 1, para. 10), the arbitrator made his award as follows:

"1. I award and determine that the notice to quit the said "holding dated December 16, 1959 . . . was properly given.

"2. I award and determine that at the date of the giving "of the said notice to quit the . . . tenant had failed to comply "with a part of the notice in writing dated April 21, 1959, "requiring him to remedy the breach of the terms of his tenancy "not inconsistent with the fulfilment of his responsibility to "farm in accordance with the rules of good husbandry by cleaning "out the ditch between ordnance survey Nos. 885 and 918 "[item 1]."

The award went on to deal with all the other items in the notice of April 21, 1959, except two minor items, namely, item 5 (renewing a short length of fence) and item 7 (re-hanging a number of gates) with which the arbitrator did not deal. By paragraph 3 of the award the arbitrator found that at the date of the notice to quit the tenant had complied with the requirements of item 2 and part of item 4. In paragraph 4 he held that the breach referred to in item 3 was not capable of being remedied in the time stated in the notice. He further found, in paragraph 5 of the award, that one of the requests in item 4 was not in accordance with any term of the tenancy, and, in paragraph 6, that the request contained in item 6 had been varied by a later agreement and that the tenant had not failed to remedy that breach.

It was contended on behalf of the tenant that a partial failure to remedy breaches of covenant set out in the notice of April 21, 1959, was not sufficient for the purposes of section 24 (2) (d) of the Act of 1948, and that, as the consent of the Agricultural Land Tribunal had not been obtained, the notice to quit was not valid.

Brian T. Neill for the tenant.

Anthony Cripps Q.C. and P. G. Langdon-Davies for the landlord.

The following cases were cited in argument: French v. Elliott [2] and Edwards v. Woollacott.[3]

Diplock J. This is a motion to set aside the award of an arbitrator for an error of law apparent upon its face. It is not a case stated. It is for the applicant to show error in law upon the face of the award. [His Lordship referred to the relevant portions of section 24 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, and the terms of the two notices to the tenant, read the award, and continued:] Mr. Neill for the tenant put his case most strongly on the contention that a partial failure to fulfil or to comply with the requirements of a notice to remedy breaches of covenant was insufficient under section 24 (2) (d) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, and that, indeed, is the ground set out in the notice of motion. The point is a very short one and is not susceptible of any great elaboration. I have to ask myself whether a tenant, who has done part of the work set out in a notice, but has failed to do another part of it, has "... failed to comply with a notice "in writing ... requiring him ... within such reasonable period "as was specified in the notice to remedy any breach by the "tenant ... of any term or condition of his tenancy ..." It seems to me that, if he had not remedied it and remedied it completely, he has failed to comply with the notice. Mr. Neill contended that it was sufficient if there was a "substantial "compliance" with the terms of the notice. Those words are not in the Act, and I see no reason for reading them into the Act. No doubt, of course, the de minimis rule would apply, but the Act seems to me to be plain in its terms, and, if a tenant fails to comply fully with the requirements set out in the notice, being requirements for remedying breaches of terms or conditions of his tenancy which are not inconsistent with the fulfilment of his responsibilities to farm in accordance with the rules of good husbandry, the provisions of section 24 (2) (d) of the Act are fulfilled. The really substantial argument which has been put forward is that "substantial compliance" with the notice suffices; that argument fails.

Mr. Neill made other verbal criticisms of the award. It is not perhaps as elegantly phrased as it might be, but it seems to me that its meaning is perfectly plain, and there is nothing to suggest in it that the arbitrator has gone wrong in law. Counsel points out, and it is a fair criticism, that in paragraph 2 of the award the arbitrator refers to "a part of the notice in writing," whereas in subsequent paragraphs, where he is dealing with other items, he does not use the words "part of"; it is lacking in elegance, but nothing more, and it is perfectly plain what the arbitrator means. Counsel also contended that an arbitrator ought to set out all of the facts and make a specific finding as to each of the relevant facts. It does not seem to me that there is any statutory requirement that an award should be thus set out, and it seems to me that there are sufficient findings of fact in the award and nothing, indeed, to indicate that the arbitrator has not applied his mind to all the matters to which he should.

[2] [1960] 1 W.L.R. 40; [1959] 3 All E.R. 866.

[3] Chartered Land Agents' Society Journal, Vol. 58 (March, 1959).

Another point made by Mr. Neill is that on the true construction of section 24 (2) (d) of the Act of 1948 the tenant has a locus poenitentiae and that, if, as in this case, the notice sets out a reasonable period in which the work should be done and the tenant does not do the work in that period but does it in between the end of that period and the service of the notice to quit, the requirements of section 24 (2) (d) are not fulfilled. There seem to me to be two difficulties in that argument in its application to this case. First, on the construction of section 24 (2) (d), I think that the construction submitted by counsel for the tenant is plainly a wrong construction in law; but there is the additional difficulty for counsel in the way in which this case comes before me, in that there is no indication in the award of what view the arbitrator has formed on that point of construction, and, therefore, it is impossible to say that, on the face of the award, he has formed a wrong view.

I think that I have dealt with the main points put before me by counsel for the tenant. I should perhaps add an additional point which was made, namely, that it was not apparent whether the arbitrator had considered whether or not the notice gave a reasonable time for doing the work. That point could not be raised in these proceedings if it were not apparent whether the arbitrator had considered the matter, because these are proceedings to set aside the award for an error on its face; but, in fact, it does appear from the terms of the award that the arbitrator has considered that matter, because, in paragraph 4 of the award, he expressly finds that one of the matters was not capable of being remedied in the time stated in the notice. I only mention that because it seems to be right, when the arbitrator's award has received such detailed criticism, to draw attention to the fact that he appears, in his award, to have considered all those matters which he ought to have considered in an arbitration which is obviously one of considerable importance to the tenant and, indeed, to the landlord. In the result, despite the most careful arguments of counsel for the tenant, I am unable to find that the award shows any error on its face, and, accordingly, this motion must be dismissed.

Application dismissed with costs.

In 1956 the local authority, under section 6 of of the Private Street Works Act, 1892,[1] passed a resolution, resolving that the road should be "levelled, paved, metalled, flagged,

They approved a specification, estimates and provisional apportionments made by their surveyor. The specification included provision for new street lighting, which had not been specifically referred to in the resolution, and other works, including "surface "water drainage, gulley pots and connections to soakaways." The cost of the work on the public footpath was to be deducted from the charges made on the premises affected. The occupiers of the affected premises objected to the apportionment pursuant to section 7 (a) to (f) of the Act on the grounds, inter alia, that the road did not form part of a "street" within the meaning of the Act, was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, that certain of the works were not street works, and that there was a material defect in the resolution in that it contained no reference to street lighting so that such work could not be carried out. The county council, as occupiers of school premises included in the apportionment, also objected under section 7 (b) on the ground that the premises fronting, adjoining or abutting on the road were the public footpath and not their premises.

Justices decided that the proposed works were street works within the meaning of the Act, that they had power under section 8 of the Act of 1892 to amend the local authority's resolution to include street lighting, but quashed the resolution and provisional apportionment on the grounds that the whole road, including the public footpath, was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large:—

Held, (1) that if after 1835 land was in fact laid out as a road or occupation way section 23 of the Highway Act, 1835,[2] was applicable to it even though the only public use made of it was as a footpath, and, as in the present case the steps required by section 23 to render the road repairable by the inhabitants at large had not been carried out either when the road was first laid out or since, the justices were wrong in concluding that it was repairable by the inhabitants at large and on that issue the appeal should be allowed (post, p. 1374).

(2) That under section 6 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, it was an essential step for an authority wishing to include street lighting in the works proposed under the section to pass a resolution expressing their dissatisfaction with the existing lighting, and the respondents were entitled to insist on the provisions of the section being strictly observed. In the absence of such a resolution, the justices had no power under section 8 to amend the resolution of the local authority to include street lighting, and therefore all references to street lighting in the specification must be struck out post, p. 1375).

(4) That the "street" in which the works under section 6 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, were to be carried out was the road laid out by T. in 1885 excluding the public footpath, and the premises fronting it were the footpath itself; and as not more than one parcel of land could front on a particular part of a street the premises occupied by the county council did not so front; but that they were premises "adjoining" the street within the meaning of section 6 although there was no physical contiguity therewith, and as section 10 did not preclude the charging under section 6 of premises which, though not fronting on the street could properly be said to adjoin it, in the present circumstances the expense of making good the street was chargeable on premises actually fronting on the street and on those adjoining it. Accordingly, the premises occupied by the county council had been properly charged (post, p. 1379).

CASE STATED by Hertfordshire justices sitting at Ware.

1. On October 6, 1959, a complaint was preferred by the appellants, the Ware Urban District Council, against the respondents, Ernest John Gaunt and twenty-six other occupiers of premises, and the Hertfordshire County Council, the occupiers of a school, in respect of objections made by them under section 7 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, to street works proposed to be executed to Walton Road, a road within the local authority's district and charged to the respondents pursuant to section 6 of the Act.

2. The justices heard the complaint on October 19, 20 and 31, 1959, and found the following facts: (a) Prior to 1885 the road now called Walton Road did not exist, but there was a public footpath along what was now the westerly side of Walton Road from its junction with Hoe Lane to the north-eastern corner of Warner Road and then along an almost straight line in a northerly direction to London Road. (b) In 1885 Walton Road was laid out as a new road by one Arthur Tite. The southern section of the road, between the junction with Hoe Lane and the north-eastern corner of Warner Road, was laid out alongside and undivided from the public footpath. (c) In 1885, by a Diversion Order of the general quarter sessions of the peace at Hertford the northern section of the public footpath was diverted to follow and lie open to the westerly side of Walton Road, which had then been laid out, from its junction with London Road for a distance of 510 feet and then for 320 feet (the non-contiguous section) away from Walton Road in an almost straight line to the north-eastern corner of Warner Road.

Ware Urban District Council v. Gaunt.

(d) On March 7, 1956, the local authority resolved that Walton Road, not being levelled, paved, metalled, flagged, channelled, or made good to their satisfaction, be levelled, paved, metalled, flagged, channelled and made good under and in accordance with the provisions of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, and that the expenses incurred in executing such works be apportioned upon the premises fronting, adjoining or abutting on the street according to the respective frontages of such premises and the greater or less degree of benefit to be derived by any premises from such works, and that the local authority's surveyor should prepare, in conformity with that resolution, and submit to the local authority, a specification, estimate, plans, sections and provisional apportionment. (e) On December 3, 1958, the local authority, by resolution, approved a specification, plan, sections, estimate and provisional apportionment relating to the works proposed to be done in sewering, levelling and making good Walton Road prepared by their surveyor pursuant to the resolution. (f) On January 15 and 16, 1959, the respondents served on the local authority notices of objection to the provisional apportionment under each of paragraphs (a) to (f) of section 7 of the Act of 1892. The Hertfordshire County Council, as occupiers of certain premises known as Ware Grammar School, also objected under paragraphs (b) and (c) of section 7. (g) On May 29 and June 5, 1959, a copy of the resolution of December 3, 1958, was published and copies were served on the owners of the premises shown as liable to be charged in the provisional apportionment. (h) The works comprised in the surveyor's specification in fact included the making up of the westerly footpath (other than the non-contiguous section), the provision of lighting, adjustment of cover levels, alterations to public utility undertakings' apparatus, filling in underground passage, works to private properties, such as adjustments to gates and path levels, and the provision of openings to private entrances. (i) The works relating to lighting, cover levels and public utility undertakings' apparatus included works on or under the westerly footpath (other than the non-contiguous section). (j) A credit of ten shillings per foot in respect of the estimated cost of making up the westerly footpath from London Road to the south-eastern corner of certain premises (but excluding the non-contiguous section) was allowed in the provisional apportionment against the amounts apportioned to the premises fronting, adjoining or abutting the western side of that part of the footpath. (k) The road ends of London Road, Warner Road, Windmill Fields, and Hoe Lane were not included in the provisional apportionment. (l) The expenses were apportioned according to frontage. (m) There was no evidence of the local authority's ever having repaired Walton Road other than the westerly footpath. (n) Walton Road was substantially developed along both sides and was in a bad state of repair. (o) There existed in Walton Road three lamp standards erected by the local authority. (p) There was in the road a limited system of soakaways designed to carry off surface water. The soakaways were at present silted up and ineffective. The local authority could not tell, until the soakaways were cleared, whether they could be restored to use. (q) Ever since the road was laid out the whole length and breadth of it had been open to the public on foot and there was evidence before the justices (which they accepted) that for the last forty years at least the whole width of Walton Road had been used by the public on foot.

3. It was contended by the local authority, inter alia, that save as to the westerly footpath, Walton Road was a street within the meaning of the Act of 1892, and not a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large; that the works alleged not to be street works were street works or necessarily ancillary and incidental thereto; that although the resolution did not in terms provide for street lighting the justices were empowered to amend and should amend the resolution so to provide; that the proposed street works were not unreasonable; that the public footpath did not front, adjoin or abut the street but was in and part of the street; that the provisional apportionment by reference to frontage reflected the greater or less degree of benefit to be derived by any premises from the street works, having regard to the possibility of future additional buildings in those premises with longer frontages.

4. (i) It was contended by the respondents (other than the Hertfordshire County Council), inter alia, that the whole of Walton Road was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large; alternatively, that the proposed street works were premature and therefore unreasonable; in the further alternative, that parts of the proposed works, namely, making up the westerly footpath, adjustment of existing cover levels, alterations to public utility undertakings' apparatus, works to private properties, filling in the underground passage, and the provisions of openings to private entrances, were not street works within the meaning of the Act; that the cost of street lighting, not being provided for in the resolutions and the appellant local authority not having otherwise proved their dissatisfaction with the existing street lighting, could not be charged as street works under the Act; that the provisional apportionment had not been made with regard to the greater or less degree of benefit derived. (ii) The Hertfordshire County Council contended that the westerly public footpath contiguous with Walton Road was repairable by the inhabitants at large; that the power of the appellant local authority under section 6 of the Act of 1892 to make a resolution with respect to a street to do any one or more of the private street works therein mentioned was a power to so resolve in respect of a street not repairable by the inhabitants at large; that the resolution made by the local authority under the section in respect of Walton Road was a resolution in respect of the whole of the road including the westerly public footpath; that the local authority had power to make a resolution under the section in respect of the whole of a street to do one or more but not all of the private street works in that street but the street in respect of which the resolution was made must be a street within the meaning of the Act and might not include a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large; that the justices had no power to amend the resolution of the local authority so as to enable that resolution as amended to take effect as a resolution in respect of the whole of Walton Road to do some only of the private street works, that was, to do such works in that part of Walton Road other than the westerly public footpath; that the resolution of the local authority must therefore be quashed or amended so as to be a resolution in respect of that part of Walton Road other than the westerly public footpath; the premises against which the expenses of the private street works must be apportioned were the premises fronting, adjoining or abutting on that part of Walton Road in respect of which the resolution as amended was made to take effect; that the westerly public footpath fronted, abutted and adjoined that part of Walton Road other than the westerly public footpath and were the premises to be included in the apportionment; that the Ware Grammar School, the property of the county council, fronted on to the westerly public footpath and did not front, adjoin or abut on that part of Walton Road other than the westerly public footpath; that if the local authority's resolution was so amended so as to be a resolution in respect of that part of Walton Road other than the westerly public footpath the resolution was in effect a resolution to make up that part as a street separate from the westerly public footpath and the Ware Grammar School could not front, adjoin or abut both on the footpath and on the part of Walton Road with respect to which the resolution as amended was made to take effect. . . .

6. The justices were of opinion that (a) all the works alleged not to be street works, with the exception of the provision of road name plates, were street works or necessarily ancillary and incidental thereto; (b) the proposed street works were not unreasonable; (c) the public footpath did not front, adjoin or abut the street but was in and part of the street; (d) certain road ends or junctions ought to have been included in the provisional apportionments; (e) the provisional apportionment by reference to frontage was in accordance with the resolution of the local authority in that it reflected the greater or less degree of benefit to be derived by the various premises from the street works; (f) the estimated costs of works for making up the westerly footpath ought to have been deducted from the total amount of the estimated expenses; (g) they had power to amend the resolution of the local authority to enable them to provide street lighting; (h) the local authority had power to make a resolution under section 6 of the Act of 1892, in respect of Walton Road including the public footpath; (i) the Ware Grammar School, the property of the Hertfordshire County Council, fronted, adjoined or abutted on Walton Road including the westerly public footpath; and (j) the whole of Walton Road, including the westerly public footpath, was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, and accordingly they quashed in whole the resolution, plans, sections, estimates and provisional apportionments of the local authority and the surveyor.

Ware Urban District Council v. Gaunt.

Ashworth J. stated the facts, read the definition of "street" in section 5 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, and continued: The appellants contend that Walton Road, excluding the footpath, was a street not repairable by the inhabitants at large and they naturally rely on section 23 of the Highway Act, 1835, one object of which was to protect ratepayers from being saddled with liability to repair roads laid down by private persons and dedicated to the public, unless the conditions prescribed in that section were complied with. In Cababé v. Walton-on-Thames District Council,[1] Hamilton L.J. said[2]: "Upon the face of it section 23 of the Highways Act, 1835, is "enacted in relief of the public. It severs that connection "between the right of the public to use a road as a highway and "the obligation of the public to repair the road, which at common "law was inseverable. It does so by annexing a statutory con-"dition to repairability (see per Blackburn J. in Reg. v. "Dukinfield[3]) while leaving untouched the acquisition of a right "of highway by the public against the owner of the soil. The "occasion which brought before the attention of the Legislature "the need of some enactment was the practice of building "owners who dedicated ways across their building estates with "an eye to the development of the estate irrespective of public "needs, and thereby cast on the parish or its successors in "obligation the cost of repairs which enured almost exclusively "to the advantage of themselves and their tenants or pur-"chasers." It has not been suggested that the conditions prescribed in section 23 were complied with when Walton Road was first laid out in 1885 or since that date, so as to render it repairable by the inhabitants at large. Prima facie, therefore, Walton Road (excluding the public footpath on its westerly side) would appear to fall within the definition of "street" in the Act of 1892.

The respondents concede that if Walton Road (excluding the footpath) is properly to be regarded as a road, the conditions prescribed in section 23 of the Act of 1835 have not at any time been complied with, but they contend that, in spite of its name and in spite of the description given to it in quarter sessions' Order of 1885, Walton Road is and has been for over forty years a footpath, and therefore not within the mischief of section 23. It is argued that for the purposes of that section and the ascertainment of the true character of a public way one must have regard to the rights exercised by the public over it, and that in the present case there was no evidence before the justices of any greater public right than that of walking on Walton Road on foot. In other words, even if a strip of land is dedicated to the public as a road, its legal character is that of a footpath if

[1] [1913] 1 K.B. 481.
[2] Ibid. 494.
[3] (1863) 4 B. & S. 158.

use as a footpath is the only use which the public choose to make of it.

The respondents' contentions were said to derive support from the decision of this court in Robinson v. Richmond (Survey) Borough Council,[4] but, in my judgment, that case is plainly distinguishable from the present. In that case the strip of ground was not laid out as a road and such dedication of it as was proved or presumed was dedication as a footpath. Moreover, it is clear from the later decision of this court in Margate Corporation v. Roach[5] that if the land in question was in fact laid out as a road or occupation way the provisions of section 23 of the Act of 1835 would be applicable to it, even though the only public use made of it was as a footpath. It is only right to mention that the decision in the Margate case[5] was given after the justices' decision in the present case, and therefore could not have been brought to their notice. In my judgment, in spite of Mr. Mottershead's persuasive efforts to suggest the contrary, the decision in the Margate case[5] is binding on this court, and should be followed.

The justices appear also to have been influenced by the decision in Kingston-on-Thames Corporation v. Baverstock.[6] At first sight that case has a similarity to the present case in that an existing footpath was diverted to run along a new road lately made, but in my view there is an important distinction between the two cases. In the Kingston case[6] the justices found that the whole of the new road including the new footpath was taken and agreed to by the public authorities in lieu of the old diverted footpath only and that that then became a highway which was to be repairable by the parish as distinguished from the single strip along the side. This court held that there was sufficient evidence to justify the justices' finding. In my view, not only is there no evidence to justify a similar finding in the present case, but such evidence as there is points in the opposite direction, in particular the evidence as to the precise width of the new footpath alongside Walton Road.

Reliance was also placed by the respondents on the decision in Attorney-General v. Esher Linoleum Co. Ltd.[7] The headnote reads as follows: "Where there is a public footway, and "adjacent land along the same line as the footway, but increas-"ing the width, is laid out by the owner of the soil as a way "for carriage traffic, even for private carriage traffic, the pre-"sumption of law, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, "is that the owner has dedicated to public use as a footway all "the space that he has devoted to traffic in fact." It is to be noted that no question of repairability arose in that case, and it is further to be noted that the new carriageway was laid out alongside an existing public footpath. In his judgment Buckley J. emphasises that the owner of the land who laid out the new carriageway might have taken steps by fencing or otherwise to keep the public to the footpath. In the present case, so far as the northern section of Walton Road is concerned, the diversion order and certificate provided that the diverted footpath should be open to the new road which was already in existence, so that there was no possibility of the footpath being fenced. So far as the southern section is concerned, it is true that the public footpath was in existence before the new road was made and that in the absence of any fence separating the footpath from that section of the new road, it might have been impossible for Arthur Tite or his successors in title to prevent the public from walking over that section. But, in my view, so far as repairability goes, that section of the road retained the character with which it started, namely, that of a road, and remained subject to the provisions of section 23 of the Act of 1835, that is to say, it was not repairable by the inhabitants at large even up to the standard appropriate for a footpath.

For these reasons, I am of opinion that the justices' conclusion, expressed in paragraph 6 (j) of the case, that the whole of Walton Road including the westerly public footpath is a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, was wrong in law, and it follows that, so far as that issue is concerned, the appellants' resolution, plans, sections, estimates and provisional apportionments should not have been quashed.

The remaining issues in the case relating to matters of detail were in substance decided by the justices in favour of the appellants. The respondents were, however, dissatisfied with some of the decisions and (there being no objection to this course by the appellants) submitted that those particular decisions should be reversed or varied.

In the first place, it was submitted that parts of the proposed works were not street works within the meaning of the Act of 1892. In paragraph 4 (1) (c) of the case stated, the works in question are set out, but I do not think it necessary to describe them in detail, as counsel for the appellants agreed that they should be excluded.

It is convenient to deal next with the question of street lighting. The justices' conclusion expressed in paragraph 6 (g) of the case stated was that they had power to amend the appellants' resolution to enable them to provide street lighting notwithstanding the absence of any reference to it in the originating resolution dated March 7, 1956. Under section 8 (1) of the Act of 1892, a court of summary jurisdiction hearing objections to proposed street works is undoubtedly given power to amend a local authority's resolution, but the extent to which that power may be exercised is not unlimited. In Chester

Corpn. v. Briggs [8] it was held in this court that in the absence of a resolution under section 15 of the Act of 1892, justices had no power to insert by way of amendment to a resolution under section 6 of the Act a resolution that the urban authority should contribute in whole or in part to the expenses of private street works. For my part, I see no difference in principle between a request to amend a resolution under section 6 by inserting a matter which should have been the subject of a resolution under section 15 and a request such as was made in the present case, namely, to amend a resolution under section 6 by inserting a matter which under the same section could have been but was not included in the resolution. Section 6 expressly refers to lighting and, in my view, if an authority wishes to include lighting in the works proposed under that section, an essential step is a resolution expressing its dissatisfaction with the existing lighting. That step was not taken in the present case, and I am not prepared to accept the contention that, by approving a surveyor's specification which included proposals regarding lighting, an authority must be taken by implication to have resolved that the existing lighting was unsatisfactory. It is quite possible that the authority's attention was not specifically directed to the question of lighting and, in my view, the respondents, whom it is sought to charge with the expense of (inter alia) new lighting, are entitled to insist that the provisions of section 6 are strictly observed. Accordingly, in my judgment, all references to lighting in the specification and estimate should be struck out.

A somewhat similar point arises in regard to surface water drainage, except that in this instance the justices do not appear to have reached a specific conclusion about it; there is no reference to the point in paragraph 6 of the case stated in which the justices' decisions are set out. The point was, however, argued before them and before us and counsel asked us to deal with it. The appellants contend that these particular works are comprised in the word "channelled" which appears both in section 6 and in the appellants' resolution. The respondents contend that the appropriate word to cover works of the type now under consideration is "sewered," which appears in section 6 but does not appear in the appellants' resolution. I confess that if it were open to me to do so I should give effect to the appellants' argument, on the footing that the works in question, described in the specification as "Provide surface water drain-"age, gulley pots and connections to soakaways," are necessarily or at least reasonably incidental to the channelling and making good of a road. As counsel for the appellants said, there is not much point in channelling a road unless means are provided for taking away such water as flows along the channels. Difficulty, however, arises owing to two decisions of this court,

Ware Urban District Council v. Gaunt.

Wandsworth Borough Council v. Golds[9] and East Barnet Urban District Council v. Stacey.[10] In the latter case the following passage occurs in the judgment of Lord Hewart C.J.[11] "It seems to "me that light is thrown upon the matter by the view which was "expressed—not indeed approved and confirmed, but not dis-"sented from by the other members of the court—by Lord "Alverstone C.J. in the case of Wandsworth Borough Council "v. Golds.[12] Lord Alverstone C.J. said[13] 'The second point "'relied on by Mr. Danckwerts was that the expense of pro-"'viding the gulleys which formed part of the system of sub-"'terranean drainage'—that is a useful phrase, if I may "respectfully say so—'did not come under the head of paving "'or forming the road, and consequently was not properly "'chargeable to the owners. Speaking for myself, I should "'have great difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the "'construction of a gully, that is to say, of the connection of "'the channel with the sewer, is part either of the paving or "'the formation of the road. The paving of the road is one "'thing. The making of improved drainage to take away water "'which will require to be taken away more rapidly in conse-"'quence of that paving is another.' In that particular case "Lord Alverstone C.J. refrains from expressing a decided "opinion on the point. Pickford J. mentions the point, but "without dealing with it. I think Lord Alverstone C.J.'s "observations throw light upon this case, and I think the true "difference which we have to bear in mind is a difference between "what may be called the system of subterranean drainage on "the one hand and the paving of the road and matters "immediately connected with it on the other hand."

In the East Barnet case[14] the respondent frontagers appear to have relied to a large extent on the fact that the existing gullies and connecting pipes had been approved by the urban authority and that improvements and additions to them could not be charged to frontagers under the Act of 1892. In the present case it is found as a fact in paragraph 2 (p) of the case stated that there is in Walton Road a limited system of soakaways designed to carry off surface water, but the respondents have not raised the same contention as was upheld in the East Barnet case[14]; their case is founded on the absence of any reference to sewering in the appellants' resolution.

One of the matters which causes me some concern is the lack of any description of the works actually involved in the item in the specification: "Provide surface water drainage, "gully pots and connections to soakaways." Although it is almost certain that this item involves subterranean drainage, there is nothing in the case stated to establish this, and it may be said against the respondents that, if they wished to challenge this point in this court, it was their responsibility to ensure that the relevant material is fully set out. Alternatively, it would be possible to remit the case to the justices so that they could state additional facts, but it was made clear by all the counsel concerned in the case that this course would not be welcomed by them or their clients. Not without some misgiving, I have come to the conclusion that in principle and in the light of the judgments to which I have referred, the respondents are right, but I do not think that it would be right to strike out the whole item, since it may include some works which can legitimately be charged. In my view it is sufficient to say that in so far as the works included in the item involve subterranean drainage they should be struck out.

The remaining issue is, in a sense, the most troublesome of all, namely, whether it is open to the appellants to apportion part of the expense on premises situate on the westerly side of Walton Road but separated from it by the public footpath. This issue involves as an ancillary problem the question whether part of the expense should in any event be apportioned on the public footpath. Section 6 of the Act of 1892 provides (inter alia) that "The expenses incurred by the urban authority in "executing private street works shall be apportioned (subject "as in this Act mentioned) on the premises fronting, adjoining "or abutting on any such street or part of a street." The respondents, the Hertfordshire County Council, are the owners of premises known as the Ware Grammar School, and those respondents contend that such premises front on the public footpath and do not front, adjoin or abut on Walton Road itself. The premises of the other respondents or some of them are situated, so far as the public footpath and Walton Road itself are concerned, in a similar position to Ware Grammar School, and although those respondents did not expressly put forward the contention advanced on behalf of the county council, Mr. Mottershead on their behalf contrived to include in his able argument a measure of support for that contention. Mr. Frank, for the appellants, argued that although the public footpath is repairable by the inhabitants at large, and therefore not of itself a street within the meaning of the Act of 1892, its existence did not prevent one from treating it and Walton Road together as a street within the meaning of section 5. This argument involves construing section 5 as if it read "'Street' means a street in "so far as it is not a highway repairable by the inhabitants at "large." For my part, I am quite unable to give effect to this argument and, in my view, the problem must be considered on the footing that the street in which the works are to be carried out under the Act of 1892 is Walton Road itself excluding the public footpath.

Assuming that the street for the purposes of the Act of 1892 is Walton Road itself, the next problem is to ascertain what premises front, adjoin or abut on the westerly side of that street. In my view, only one answer is possible so far as the word "front" is concerned, namely, the public footpath. The fact that the fronting premises are a public footpath and not private property creates no difficulty. (Cf. Herne Bay Urban District Council v. Payne and Wood.[15]) For my part, I agree with the submission of Mr. Parrish for the county council that if the premises fronting on Walton Road are the public footpath, it follows that Ware Grammar School does not so front. In my view, not more than one parcel of land can front on a particular part of a street.

The question then arises whether Ware Grammar School can be said to "adjoin" Walton Road. In Mayor of New Plymouth v. Taranaki Electric Power Board[16] Lord Macmillan said[17]; "Their Lordships agree . . . that the primary and exact meaning of 'adjoining' is 'conterminous.' At the same time it cannot be disputed that the word is also used in a looser sense as meaning 'near' or 'neighbouring.'" In each case, as it seems to me, regard must be paid to the context in which the words appear and. quite apart from any decided cases, I am inclined to think that the context in the present case points to an enlarged rather than a restricted meaning of the word "adjoin." I think that the inclusion of the three alternative types of chargeable premises, namely, those "fronting, adjoining or abutting on," suggest that something more than mere physical contiguity was in the mind of the Legislature. This view is in accordance with that expressed by Bowen L.J. in Lightbound v. Higher Bebbington Local Board[18]: "In construing such words as 'front,' 'abut,' and 'adjoin,' in this Act of Parliament, actual contiguity is not necessary in order that the terms should be fulfilled. The case of Wakefield Local Board v. Lee[19] shows that. We have to go further and ascertain what is the true statutory meaning of this term as used in this section; and there is a broad rule of construction, of which the present case, so far as there is any law involved in it (which is very little), is to my mind an illustration. It is that in construing the words you must look at the subject-matter of the section and see what is its scope and object. Here one has a section which presumably is intended to charge persons who are benefited by the work done, and as soon as one finds that, one gets a kind of light shed on the words 'front,' 'abut,' and 'adjoin.' With regard to 'front' and 'abut,' it does not appear to me that these cottages in either plot can be said, in any fair use of language, to front or abut upon the part of the street which has been paved, and it seems to me, though it is not necessary to decide it, that the judgment of Cleasby B. in Wakefield Local Board v.

"Lee[19] is preferable to that of Grove J. There is in this "statute a larger word, 'adjoin,' and we must see whether the "cottages do not fall within the term 'adjoin.' Now, you "cannot define adjoin as meaning benefit of access, or vice versa, "but in considering whether houses adjoin which are placed in "close proximity to the part of the street which is to be paved, "it is a most important fact, and, in many cases, a dominant "fact, to see whether there is a substantial access and advan-"tage which the houses enjoy from that portion of the street "which is to be paved, and a substantial access and advantage "of that kind, coupled with close proximity, may bring the case "within the word 'adjoin,' though there is no actual touch." That case was decided upon section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875, but the material words are the same.

No doubt in many, if not most, cases where an authority seeks to apportion a share of the expense on premises which do not front on the street which is being made good under the Act of 1892, reliance is placed on the provisions of section 10 of the Act relating to premises having access to the street. But in my view those provisions do not preclude the charging under section 6 of premises which, though not fronting on the street, can properly be said to adjoin it: the circumstances in which such a course can be taken are not likely to occur often, but the present case is, in my opinion, a good illustration. When these circumstances do exist, it follows that the expense of making good the street is charged both on the premises actually fronting and on the premises adjoining, in this case the public footpath and Ware Grammar School. In my judgment, therefore, the premises known as Ware Grammar School adjoin Walton Road and are premises upon which the expenses may properly be apportioned.

Highway—Private street works—Footpath—Occupation way—Strip of land laid out as occupation way—Subsequent use by public for right of way on foot only—Whether a highway repairable by inhabitants at large—Highway Act, 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50), s. 23—Private Street Works Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 50), ss. 5, 7.

CASE STATED by Margate justices.

On October 14, 1958, the appellants, the Margate Corporation, by resolution under section 6 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, approved a specification, estimate and provisional apportionment of private street works proposed to be done in part of a street, known as St. James's Terrace, Birchington, in the Borough of Margate. A frontager, Stanley D. Roach, the owner of premises shown in the provisional apportionment as liable to be charged with part of the expenses of executing the works, objected to the proposals on the grounds that the alleged street or part of a street was not and did not form part of a street within the meaning of the Act of 1892; and that the street or part of a street was (in whole or in part) a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large.

The following were among the facts found by the justices: The part of St. James's Terrace, Birchington, the subject of the proposed works, was a section 274 ft. in length and with a width between the front boundaries of the properties abutting thereupon varying between 24 ft. 6 ins. and 28 ft. That section was a street as defined by the Public Health Act, 1835. Part of that street, a strip 10 ft. in width running the full length of the street and situated to the west of its centre line, had been laid out as an occupation way at some date after the Highway Act, 1835, was passed, and had been used as an occupation way only at least until 1898. The houses fronting the west side of the street were built in 1898. Thereafter, the 10 ft. strip had been used by the public for a right of way on foot only, and it was now shown in the draft map and statement prepared by the Kent County Council under section 27 of the National Parks and Access to the Countryside Act, 1949, as a public footpath. The corporation had never repaired or maintained the street or any part of it.

The corporation proposed by their specification, estimate and provisional apportionment to make up the full width of the street including the 10 ft. strip at the expense of the frontagers, subject to a contribution by the corporation under section 15 of the Act of 1892.

It was contended by the corporation that the dedication to the public as a highway of the former occupation way was a dedication to which section 23 of the Highway Act, 1835, applied, notwithstanding that the highway was a footpath only; that Robinson v. Richmond (Surrey) Borough Council [1] was to be distinguished on its facts in that the path there in question had not been made or set out as an occupation way, private driftway or horsepath, but had been trodden down by public user from which the presumption of dedication as a public footpath arose; and that, accordingly, the 10 ft. strip had only become repairable by the inhabitants at large by virtue of section 47 of the Act of 1949, and that section 50 of that Act preserved the right of the corporation to carry out works to the whole street including the 10 ft. strip and recover the expenses thereof under the Act of 1892.

It was contended by the frontager that Robinson v. Richmond (Surrey) Borough Council [1] established that section 23 of the Highway Act, 1835, did not apply to the dedication of a highway as a public footpath and governed the determination of the present case; and that, accordingly, the 10 ft. strip was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large independently of the operation of section 47 of the Act of 1949, so that section 50 of that Act did not apply, and the 10 ft. strip was not within the definition of a street in the Act of 1892.

The justices were of opinion that they were bound to follow and apply the authority of Robinson v. Richmond (Surrey) Borough Council [1]; that section 50 of the Act of 1949 did not, therefore, apply, and that the appellants had no power to make up the 10 ft. strip under the Act of 1892, and, accordingly, they quashed the corporation's resolution.

The corporation appealed.

Nigel Bridge for the corporation.

The frontager did not appear and was not represented.

The following cases were cited in argument: Robinson v. Richmond (Surrey) Borough Council [2] and Reynolds v. Barnes.[3]

LORD PARKER C.J. This is an appeal by way of case stated by justices for the Borough of Margate, who heard an objection by a frontager to a resolution of the Margate Corporation under section 6 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892. The justices' decision, given on April 10, 1959, was that the land to which the resolution applied had become land repairable by the inhabitants at large, and they quashed the resolution.

The circumstances were these. The corporation's resolution related to a section of St. James's Terrace, Birchington, 274 ft. in length, and varying between 24 ft. 6 ins. and 28ft. in width. Included in this section was a strip of land 10 ft. in width which had been laid out a long time ago as an occupation way, and had been used as such until 1898. In 1898 a housing development took place with houses fronting the west side of the street, and thereafter the 10 ft. strip had been used by the public for a right of way on foot only. It is now shown in the draft map and statement prepared by the Kent County Council under the provisions of section 27 of the National Parks and Access to the Countryside Act, 1949, as a public footpath. The corporation had never repaired or maintained the street or any part of it, and the resolution approving specifications, estimates and provisional apportionment was for the purpose of making up the full width of the street, including the 10 ft. strip at the expense of the frontagers. The respondent, who was one of those frontagers, objected, as he was entitled to do, under section 7 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, on two grounds, both being grounds within section 7. The first was that the alleged street or part of a street was not and did not form part of the street within the meaning of the Act of 1892; secondly, that the street or part of the street was in whole or in part a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large.

Section 5 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, defines streets to which that Act applies in this form: "In this Act, if not inconsistent "with the context, . . . the expression 'street' means (unless the con- "text otherwise requires) a street as defined by the Public Health Acts, "and not being a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large."

There is a finding here that the section in question was a street as defined by the Public Health Act, 1875, and the sole question, accordingly, is whether it had become a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large. That the public acquired rights over the strip from 1898 onwards is perfectly clear, and, accordingly, there is a presumption of a dedication to the public. But the real question here is whether the public, although they acquired such rights, became responsible for the repair of the strip by reason of section 23 of the Highway Act, 1835. That section, so far as it is relevant here, is in these terms: "... no road or occupation way made or hereafter to be made by and "at the expense of any individual or private person, body politic or "corporate, nor any roads already set out or to be hereafter set out as "a private driftway or horsepath in any award of commissioners under "an Inclosure Act, shall be deemed or taken to be a highway which "the inhabitants of any parish shall be compellable or liable to repair, "unless the person, body politic or corporate, proposing to dedicate "such highway to the use of the public ..." broadly speaking, shall have made the same up to a certain standard.

Margate Corporation v. Roach.

Lord Parker C.J.

It is said by the corporation that that section applies in the present case. It is said that here was an occupation way laid out a long time ago and after the passing of this Act of 1835. There is an express finding to that effect in the case. Accordingly, if the public thereafter, as they did in 1898, got rights over that occupation way, albeit only for persons on foot, it is said that section 23 prevents the inhabitants at large being liable for its repair.

I confess that, prima facie, it seems to me that the facts of this case come fairly and squarely within section 23. What troubled the justices is clear, and that is the decision of this court in Robinson v. Richmond (Surrey) Borough Council.[1] The justices took the view that that case governed the facts of the present case, that the facts of the present case were indistinguishable, and, accordingly, they felt bound to quash the resolution and to hold that the case did not come within section 23.

In Robinson v. Richmond (Surrey) Borough Council[1] it is to be observed that there never was any form of road or occupation way made at the expense of the individual or private person within section 23. What happened there was that when land was divided into plots a strip was left abutting on to the plots, and at once that strip was used not only as access to the plots which were being developed but was, as was found, trodden down and used as a footpath by the public.

In that state of facts this court held that section 23 did not apply, and, accordingly, there having been a dedication to the public, that the strip had become repairable by the inhabitants at large, and being so repairable, was not a street within the meaning of that term in the Private Street Works Act, 1892. Be it observed that the facts here are very different because, whereas in the Richmond case[2] there had been no previous laying out at all, in the present case this strip with which we are concerned was originally an occupation way. Accordingly, this case, unlike the Richmond case,[2] does come within section 23 unless it can be said that the mere fact that the subsequent dedication is in respect of a footpath makes a difference. In my judgment it makes no difference. I have come to the conclusion that, while the Richmond case[2] is binding on this court, the facts here are entirely different, and that, on the facts in this case, section 23 applies. The conditions of section 23 have never been fulfilled. Accordingly, this strip has never become repairable by the inhabitants at large and is, therefore, a street within the Act of 1892. I would allow this appeal and the case should go back with a direction that the justices' conclusion was wrong in law.

Cassels J. I agree. I was a party to the decision in Robinson v. Richmond (Surrey) Borough Council,[2] and I agree that that case is distinguishable for the reasons set out in the judgment which has just been delivered by my Lord, that the facts of this case are very different from the facts in that case.

v.

Semble, that the third party could have applied under Order 16, r. 11,[2] to join the fifth party as an additional fourth party.

Appeal from Elwes J.

An action brought by the plaintiff, Mrs. Ada May Piddock, against the defendants, Clifford Products Ltd., was commenced on September 13, 1957, and the statement of claim was delivered on October 1, 1957. Leave was given to the defendants on November 14, 1957, to serve a third party notice on Industrial Guarding Equipment Ltd. On January 6, 1958, the third party was given leave to serve a fourth party notice on Baldwin Instrument Co. Ltd., and on December 9, 1958, leave was given to the fourth party to serve a fifth party notice on B.A.L. Ltd.

On December 15, 1958, judgment was given for the plaintiff against the defendants, and for the defendants against the third party; the issue between the third and fourth parties had been adjourned and the fourth party notice was only served on the fifth party after that. On April 20, 1960, the third party took out the present summons to issue a fourth party notice against the fifth party, which would have had the effect of making the fifth party a co-defendant of the fourth party. The application was refused by Master Lawrence on June 14, 1960, and on appeal his decision was reversed by Elwes J. on July 27, 1960. The fifth party appealed from that decision.

Bernard Caulfield for the fifth party.
E. Ryder Richardson Q.C. and Ian Fife for the third party.

The following cases were cited in argument: Birmingham and District Land Co. Ltd. v. London and North Western Railway Co.[3]; Caister v. Chapman.[4]

Sellers L.J. One of the complaints which appealed to the master was that the interval of time was so long that no order should be made. That is a factor which also has a bearing in this court, which has to consider all the circumstances of the case. It appears (and this is how the appeal was advanced before us) that, although not in terms so stated, the summons was taken out under, and reliance was placed on, R.S.C., Ord. 16a, r. 11. [His Lordship read R.S.C., Ord. 16a, r. 11, and continued:]

[2] Ord. 16, r. 11: "No cause or matter shall be defeated by reason of the misjoinder or nonjoinder of parties, and the court may in every cause or matter deal with the matter in controversy so far as regards the rights and interests of the parties actually before it. The court or a judge may, at any stage of the proceedings, either upon or without the application of either party, and on such terms as may appear to the court or a judge to be just, order that the names of any parties improperly joined . . . be struck out, and that the names of any parties . . . who ought to have been joined, or whose presence before the court may be necessary in order to enable the court effectually . . . to adjudicate upon and settle all the questions involved in the cause or matter, be added."

[4] [1884] W.N. 31.

Notwithstanding the argument advanced by Mr. Caulfield that this rule could not be applied because here there was no action having regard to the termination of the proceedings as between the plaintiff, the defendants, and the third party, I have come to the conclusion that that argument does not require any detailed consideration because on the facts of this case the rule is not applicable at all as the fifth party against whom these proceedings have been taken was already a party to the proceedings and to the action to which reference is made in that regulation.

The argument against that was really to accept that the summons was wrongly issued if that order and rule had to be relied on, that it was not expressly relied on, and that the right claimed to join the fifth party as a fourth party, or a co-defendant to the third party's proceedings in effect, was to be derived from section 39 (1) (b) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation), 1925.[1] It may well be that the proceedings could have been taken under Order 16, r. 11, which seems to embrace, together with Order 16a, the rules to carry out the provisions of the section of the Act to which reference is made. But the procedure in reliance of Order 16, r. 11, in order to join the fifth party in the way that is intended, has not been followed, and in my view the method adopted has been misconceived and the appeal should be allowed on that ground—that whilst the rights of the third party against the fifth party might have been achieved in this particular way, the procedure has not been adopted. I would accede to the submission of Mr. Caulfield that in all the circumstances of this case it would be more appropriate, having regard to the state of this procedure at the present time, to leave the third party to proceed by way of original writ and to consolidate the proceedings, if it is so desired, with those that are already in being.

I do not think it an appropriate occasion to deal in greater detail with the submissions which were made with regard to the rules as to whether or not there is any lacuna or gap in them (which I very much doubt) or as to whether they could properly have been called to the aid of the claim which is made by the third party to exercise its rights against the fifth party. On the facts of this case a writ is the appropriate remedy.

I would allow the appeal.

(b) all such relief "relating to or connected with the "original subject of the cause or "matter, claimed in like manner "against any other person, whether "already a party to the cause or "matter or not, who has been duly "served with notice in writing of the "claim pursuant to rules of court or "any order of the court, as might "properly have been granted against "that person if he had been made a "defendant to a cause duly instituted "by the same defendant for the like "purpose."

Piddock v. Clifford Products Ltd.

Pearce L.J. I agree. In my view, since the fifth party are already a party, the proposed fourth party proceedings against them cannot properly be allowed under Order 16a, r. 11. It appears that section 39 of the Judicature Act, 1925 (to which my Lord has referred) gives to the third party the rights which, under the proposed fourth party notice, they seek to assert against the fifth party. It may well be that they could apply under Order 16, r. 11, as Sellers L.J. has suggested during the argument, to add the fifth party as a defendant in the existing third party proceedings, although that course would create certain difficulties under the later rules of Order 16. But, be that as it may, there has been great delay in starting these fourth party proceedings and no hardship will be caused if they are refused to the third party: they can at any time issue a writ against the fifth party and apply to consolidate that action with the third party proceedings that are already in existence against the fourth party; and in the end that course may well save costs.

I agree with what my Lord has said.

Devlin L.J. Order 16a, r. 3 provides that "The third party "shall, as from the time of the service upon him of the notice, "be a party to the action with the same rights in respect of his "defence against any claim made against him and otherwise as "if he had been duly served in the ordinary way by the defen-"dant." That rule, therefore, expressly gives to the third party all the rights of a defendant. It seems to me that it must, by necessary implication, give to the defendant in the action all the rights of a plaintiff in the third party proceedings. You cannot have a defendant without a plaintiff, and you cannot give to the defendant all the rights of a defendant without letting the plaintiff have all the rights of a plaintiff.

Rule 11 of Order 16a allows a third party to bring in a fourth party, and says that " . . . the preceding Rules of this order "shall apply mutatis mutandis . . . ," and accordingly the position is that, under Order 16a, r. 3, if the third party brings in a fourth party, the fourth party has all the rights of a defendant and the third party has all the rights of a plaintiff. One of the rights of a plaintiff is to be able to apply under Order 16, r. 11, to join another defendant. It follows from that, in my view, that one of the rights of a third party who has joined a fourth party must be to be able to apply to the court for leave to join an additional fourth party. In my judgment, that is the course which the third party ought to have taken in this case when they wished to join Mr. Caulfield's clients as an additional fourth party. They did not, however, do so: they applied (as if there were no fourth party in existence) under Order 16a, r. 11, for leave to serve a fourth party notice. Now the inherent vice in that is that, whether Order 16a, r. 11 applies or not (and I shall deal with that in a minute), it is not the right procedure if there is a fourth party, with the rights of a defendant, already in existence; for when a plaintiff applies to join another defendant, the existing defendant has a right to be heard and therefore the procedure is that a summons should be taken out as against him under Order 16, r. 11. He may object that it is unnecessary for the trial of his action and that it would embarrass him if another defendant were joined, and his objection may be sustained. If it is not sustained, then the order is that the writ should be amended and served on the additional defendant. Just the same procedure ought, in my judgment, to be followed if a third party wants to add another fourth party. It was not followed in this case.

Apart from that, another objection has been raised to the course taken by the third party here—an objection which is based on what I may call the incidental fact that Mr. Caulfield's clients happen to be fifth parties. It is not, as it were, inevitable that they should be. A third party might well want to join as an additional fourth party someone who is not in the action at all. But, as it happens, Mr. Caulfield's clients are in the action—if "the action" is given the broader meaning of including the whole set of proceedings—as a fifth party. Therefore, it is said that Order 16a, r. 11 cannot apply because it says "Where a "third party makes as against any person not already a party "to the action. . . ."

This emphasises that Order 16a, r. 11 is intended to apply only to a notice which takes the place of an originating writ and not to one which is sought to be used as an alternative to amending a writ. But I think it is sufficient to say that the third party, having failed to take the proper step of issuing a summons under Order 16, r. 11, cannot now succeed in his application.

I appreciate that that is a very technical ground upon which to defeat the application, because although the third party did not take out his summons under Order 16, r. 11, it so happened that the fourth party was a party to all the hearings, and was heard, and presumably had the opportunity of raising any objection, if he desired to raise it, against the joinder of a co-fourth party with him. It is, therefore, a technical ground. But, for the reasons which my Lords have given, in the circumstances of this case I think it is right that the technical argument should prevail and that no relief should be given to the third party in this case such as might have been given if the nature of his application had been more meritorious.

I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Will—Construction—"Money in bank"—Whether confined to credit balance—Whether inclusive of travellers' cheques.

By his will a testator bequeathed to his two godchildren "any "monies that I have in the bank." He then bequeathed a cottage and its contents and the contents of his flat and his car to his executrix to dispose of as she thought fit. The will contained no residuary gift. At the date of his death the testator had a credit balance on a drawing account at his bank and there were deposited at the bank in his name (inter alia) some national savings certificates, some share certificates, a pass book showing the testator's title to some shares in a building society and some post-war credit certificates. Some uncashed travellers' cheques bought from the bank were found in the testator's flat.

On a summons to determine what assets were comprised in the gift to the testator's godchildren:—

Held that, on the true construction of the will, the bequest of "any monies that I have in the bank" must be given its prima facie meaning and referred simply to the testator's credit balance on his drawing account at the bank, but that it included the uncashed travellers' cheques bought from the bank with part of that credit balance. Accordingly, the cash in the drawing account at the bank and the travellers' cheques passed under the gift to the godchildren but the other items did not.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

By his will, dated September 26, 1956, the testator, Guy Marcus Trundle, appointed Vera Emanuel to be his executrix and directed that all his just debts, funeral and testamentary expenses should be paid as soon as conveniently might be after his decease. The will continued "I give and bequeath unto "Sonya Paynter . . . and Penelope Bray . . . [his godchildren] "any monies that I have in the bank to be divided between them. "My cottage in Cornwall and contents—the contents of my flat "at 816, Chelsea Cloisters and my car I leave to [the executrix] "to dispose of as she considers fit." The will contained no residuary gift. The testator died on December 3, 1958, and his will was proved by the executrix on January 21, 1959.

At the date of his death the testator had a credit balance on his drawing account at Lloyd's Bank Ltd. of £336 3s. 1d. and there were deposited at the bank in his name 1,000 national savings certificates, some certificates of shares in various companies, a pass book showing his title to some shares in the Leeds Permanent Building Society, some post-war credit certificates and a diamond ring. His estate also included, inter alia, arrears of salary and sick pay due from his employers, the General Electric Co. Ltd., a sum of £1,507 11s. 10d. representing the repayment of contributions to a pension scheme of his employers, a Hillman Minx car, personal effects and uncashed travellers cheques worth £50 bought by the testator from the bank and found, at his death, in his flat.

By an originating summons dated February 23, 1960, the executrix asked that it might be determined which of the assets were comprised in the gift to the testator's godchildren.

S. W. Templeman for the executrix.
John Brightman for the testator's next-of-kin.
Martin Jacomb for the testator's godchildren.

The following case, not referred to in the judgment, was cited in argument: In re Lowe's Estate.[1]

CROSS J. referred to the will of the testator and his death and continued: There is no doubt that the car and the other personal chattels go to the executrix. They are worth about £675. Some property cannot on any footing come under the gift to the godchildren. The principal item which is undoubtedly undisposed of is the sum of £1,507 representing the repayment of the testator's contributions under the pension scheme of the General Electric Co. Ltd. by whom he was employed. He died in employment, and, therefore, that sum became due to him. Then there were some other relatively small sums of money that were due to him from various sources which were also, without doubt, undisposed of.

TRUNDLE, DECD., In re.

CROSS J.

The difficulty arises with regard to a number of assets which were, to use a neutral phrase, connected with his bank. First there were 1,000 national savings certificates deposited in the bank. There were certificates of shares in various companies worth together a few hundred pounds which were also deposited in the bank. Then there was his Leeds Permanent Building Society passbook showing his title to some shares in that society, and some post-war credit certificates, which are simply a record of the liability of the state to pay a sum of money to the holder in the future, which were deposited at the bank. He had a credit balance on his drawing account of £336 3s. 1d. There was a diamond ring also deposited in the bank, and, finally, there were some travellers' cheques which he had bought from the bank which were not in the bank but were in his flat. It is agreed by Mr. Brightman, who appears for the next-of-kin, that the cash balance on the drawing account passes to the godchildren under the gift. It is also conceded by Mr. Jacomb, who appears for the godchildren, that the diamond ring does not pass under the gift because it cannot in any sense be said to be an investment of money. The contest between them is with regard to the other items which I have mentioned.

Apart from authority, I should say that a phrase such as "my "money at the bank" or "my money in the bank" prima facie refers simply to the credit balance which the testator may have in his account at the bank. If authority is needed it is to be found in In re Prater,[1] where the Court of Appeal drew a distinction between the gift of "half my property at R's bank" which they held, differing from Chitty J. to include shares, the certificates of which were deposited in the bank, and a gift "of my "money at the bank," which they plainly thought would only cover bank balances.

I do not think that there is anything in Perrin v. Morgan[2] which tells against this view. Perrin v. Morgan[2] laid down that the word "money" by itself has no prima facie meaning, whereas before that decision it had been laid down in a number of cases that "money" meant prima facie only cash and debts due, and that in order to extend it beyond that you had to find a particular context. But what Lord Simon said[3] indicates that he accepted the view that "money in the bank" has a prima facie meaning. He said[3]: "Again, . . . it is a matter of common speech to refer "to one's 'money at the bank,' although in a stricter sense the "bank is not holding one's own money and what one possesses is "a chose in action which represents the right to require the bank "to pay out sums held at the call of its customer." That suggests that Lord Simon would not have thought that the phrase "money "at the bank" prima facie covered anything beyond bank balances. But the context of a particular will may show that the words "money at the bank" are equivalent to such a phrase as "property at the bank" which the Court of Appeal was dealing with in In re Prater.[4]

Mr. Jacomb, who has put the case very persuasively for the godchildren, submitted that here there is sufficient context to show that these words "any monies that I have in the bank" ought to be construed in this will as including all choses in action the documents of title to which are at the bank. The grounds on which he suggested that are that a gift of a bank balance is a somewhat capricious disposition because of its fluctuating character and that the court should incline against a construction which would confine the words to a fluctuating gift of that sort, especially in a case where there is no residuary gift and any property not covered by the disposition would be undisposed of. He argued that the property which is undoubtedly undisposed of by this will all consists of items which the deceased may well not have had in mind as belonging to him when he made his will. As I said, the largest item is the £1,500 which became due at his death in respect of his contributions under the pension scheme. It is likely enough that the testator would not expect to die while still in employment and would not have been thinking of that sum or the other relatively small sums which are undisposed of as being likely to form part of his estate. Mr. Jacomb pointed out if you exclude those items, then, on his construction, everything that the testator had would be disposed of, and he suggested that the scheme of the will was to give the real property and personal effects to his executrix and to give the rest of the personal property to the godchildren. He went on to point out that the words used are not "my money at the bank" or "my "money in the bank" but are "any monies that I have in the "bank." He said that is a vaguer phrase and, in the particular circumstances, can reasonably be held to include all investments the documents of title to which were at the bank and even the future debt from the Government, the record of which was in the bank in the form of post-war credit certificates. It may very well be that this testator did intend this phrase "any monies that "I have in the bank" to include all those items. On the other hand, it is not my function to guess at what he meant. I must construe the words he has used; and, as I have said, I think that "any monies that I have in the bank" mean, naturally, simply the credit balance and I cannot find here any context which would justify me in giving them a wider meaning.

I must now deal with the travellers' cheques which stand on a different footing. Mr. Brightman argued that there is a distinction to be drawn between a credit balance on a drawing account and travellers' cheques, and that, although travellers' cheques undoubtedly represent a debt due from the bank, they are really more like banknotes. He said, therefore, that as the cheques themselves were not deposited at the bank but were found in the testator's flat they were not included in the gift. I cannot accept that argument. I think that if a man asks himself what money he has at the bank he may reasonably include in his answer not only his credit balance but also any uncashed travellers' cheques which he has bought from the bank with part of that credit balance.

I therefore propose to declare that the cash in the drawing account and the travellers' cheques pass under the gift to the godchildren but that the other items in dispute are undisposed of.

Declaration accordingly.

The defendant was summoned before justices for failing to pay a contribution which he was liable to pay under the National Insurance Acts, 1946 to 1957, as a self-employed person, contrary to section 2 (6) of the National Insurance Act, 1946. A notice was also served on the defendant, together with the summons, under regulation 19 of the National Insurance (Contributions) Regulations, 1948,[1] that, in the event of his being convicted of the offence, it was intended to give evidence of his failure to pay other contributions, which together with the contribution, the subject of the summons, amounted to £19 16s. The defendant pleaded guilty to the offence and the justices found that he had failed to pay contributions which he was liable to pay amounting to £19 16s. The justices imposed a fine and, taking into consideration the defendant's financial circumstances, reduced the sum of £19 16s. to £5 and ordered the latter sum to be paid at the rate of 5s. a week, purporting to do so by virtue of powers conferred on them by section 27 (1) of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952.[2] On appeal by the prosecutor against the reduction of the order:—

Held, allowing the appeal, that the words "shall be recoverable "as a penalty" in regulation 19 (5) of the regulations did not mean that the arrears ordered to be paid were a penalty, but that they were to be recovered in like manner as if they were a penalty. Accordingly, the order for arrears in no sense being a penalty or a fine, section 27 (1) of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, did not apply and the justices had no power to reduce the order.

CASE STATED by the justices for the petty sessional division of Godalming sitting at Guildford.

The following facts and summary of the case stated are taken from the judgment of Lord Parker C.J. On December 9, 1959, an Information was preferred by the prosecutor, Maurice Albert Leach, an inspector of the Ministry of Pensions and National Insurance, against the defendant, Harry Leonard Litchfield, that he did fail to pay a certain contribution in respect of the week commencing on October 5, 1959, which he was liable to pay under the National Insurance Acts, 1946 to 1957, as a self-employed person, contrary to section 2 (6) of the National Insurance Act, 1946.

The justices found the offence proved and inflicted a fine, upon which nothing turns, but the prosecution, at the same time as the summons was served, had given notice under regulation 19 of the National Insurance (Contributions) Regulations, 1948 (S.I. 1948, No. 1417) that in the event of the defendant being convicted of the offence, it was their intention to give evidence of his failure to pay certain other contributions. The total of those other contributions, together with the contribution in respect of which he was prosecuted, amount to £19 16s. Those arrears of contributions were proved, but when the justices came to sentence the defendant they purported to exercise powers unedr section 27 of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, to mitigate, not merely the fine that had been imposed as a result of the conviction, but also the arrears of contributions, on the basis that they were a penalty which under that section they had power to mitigate, and they mitigated the order for arrears to £5, to be paid at the rate of 5s. a week, having regard to the defendant's financial circumstances. The question on the appeal was whether section 27 of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, empowered the justices to mitigate the arrears of contributions.

"mons or warrant, evidence may be "given— . . . (b) in the case of an "insured person (other than an employed person), of the failure on his "part to pay other contributions . . . "and on proof of such failure . . . "the insured person shall be liable to "pay to the National Insurance Fund ". . . a sum equal to the total of all "the contributions under the Act . . . "which he is so proved to have failed "to pay. . . . (5) Any sum ordered to "be paid to the National Insurance "Fund . . . under this regulation "shall be recoverable as a penalty. ". . . (8) Nothing in this regulation "shall be construed as preventing the "Minister from recovering any sums "due to the National Insurance Fund ". . . by means of civil proceedings."

J. R. Cumming-Bruce for the prosecutor.

The defendant did not appear and was not represented.

In addition to the cases referred to in the judgment, the following were cited in argument: Reg. v. Master[3]; Shilvock v. Booth[4]; Reg. v. Marlow (Bucks) Justices, Ex parte Schiller.[5]

Lord Parker C.J. stated the facts, summarised the case stated and continued: To decide this question it is necessary to look at the relevant legislation. We are here concerned with the National Insurance Act, 1946, alone, and not the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946. Section 2 (1) of the former Act provides that contributions shall be payable by insured persons. I interject that I leave out all references to "employers" because this respondent was self-employed. Subsection (6) of that section provides: "If any . . . insured person fails to pay any contribu-"tion which he is liable under this Act to pay, he shall be liable "on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding £10." Section 54 (1) provides: "All sums due to the National Insurance Fund "shall be recoverable as debts due to the Crown, and without "prejudice to any other remedy may be recovered by the Minister "summarily as a civil debt." Be it observed that that is providing for civil proceedings to recover sums due.

As long ago as 1913, however, it had been found convenient that, where a man was being prosecuted for failure to pay a contribution, the justices at the same time should be able to deal with arrears, and it was provided that notice might be given that he had failed to pay other contributions, leaving it to the justices to find out what was due and to order payment. Accordingly, in the Act of 1946, by section 8 (1), it was provided that: "Regu-"lations may provide— . . . (e) (without prejudice to any other "remedy) for the recovery, on prosecutions brought under or by "virtue of this Act, of contributions under this Act or under the "Industrial Injuries Act."

Pursuant to that power, regulations were made, and are now in force, entitled The National Insurance (Contributions) Regulations, 1948 (S.I. 1948, No. 1417). Regulation 19 deals with the matters for which power had been given under section 8 (1) (e), to which I have referred. Paragraph (1) provides: "In any case "where . . . an insured person has been convicted of the offence "under subsection (6) of section 2 of the Act of failing to pay a "contribution, he shall be liable to pay to the National Insurance "Fund a sum equal to the amount which he failed to pay." Paragraph (3) provides: "On any such conviction as is mentioned "in [paragraph 1], if notice of intention to do so has been served "with the summons or warrant, evidence may be given— . . . "(b) in the case of an insured person (other than an employed "person),"—in other words, a self-employed person—"of the "failure on his part to pay other contributions as such an insured "person during those two years"—that is, the preceding two years. Then it goes on: "and on proof of such failure . . . the "insured person shall be liable to pay to the National Insurance "Fund . . . a sum equal to the total of all the contributions under "the Act . . . which he is so proved to have failed to pay." Paragraph (5) then provides: "Any sum ordered to be paid to "the National Insurance Fund . . . under this regulation shall "be recoverable as a penalty." Paragraph (8) provides: "Nothing in this regulation shall be construed as preventing the "Minister from recovering any sums due to the National Insur-"ance Fund . . . by means of civil proceedings."

Pausing there, the vital question is as to the effect of paragraph (5) when it provides that any sum ordered to be paid shall be recoverable as a penalty. Quite shortly, the point is whether those words "shall be recoverable as a penalty" mean that the sum ordered to be paid is a penalty, or whether it is merely saying that the sum ordered to be paid shall be recoverable in like manner as if it was a penalty, which penalty it is not.

It is convenient to consider the matter first in the light of the position before there was any such paragraph as paragraph (5) providing that any sum ordered to be paid shall be recoverable as a penalty. The matter was fully considered by this court in Fishwick v. Gyani,[1] the headnote of which reads: "Where orders "are made against an employer under section 34 (3) of the "National Insurance Act, 1913, and section 22 (3) of the Un-"employment Insurance Act, 1920, for the payment by him to "the Insurance Commissioners and the unemployment fund "respectively of sums equal to the total amount of his unpaid "contributions in respect of an employee, the sums so ordered to "be paid are recoverable only as a civil debt." In other words, it was there held that under this procedure for giving notice in regard to failure to pay arrears the justices had no power to deal with the matter of the arrears, except in the course of civil proceedings as a civil debt. The argument had been that there was a link, if I may put it in that way, between the provision for the collection of arrears, which prima facie were merely matters of civil debt, and the prosecution, the whole matter was therefore a criminal matter, and could be dealt with by the justices in the criminal proceedings.

v.

Lord Parker C.J.

Lord Hewart C.J., in his judgment, went into the matter very fully, and he came to the clear conclusion, with which the other members of the court concurred, that throughout, and notwithstanding that the matter arose in criminal proceedings, these arrears were merely a matter of a civil debt. I find it unnecessary to go through the judgment in detail. His view can be summed up in the last few words of his judgment, where he said [2]: "In the statutes we are considering there is no such "mixing or binding together [of civil and criminal procedure]. "That which is civil remains civil, that which is criminal "remains criminal; there are no words linking them together and "stamping them with one and the same character." That, as I have said, was before there was any such paragraph as paragraph (5) stating that the arrears were recoverable as a penalty.

What, then, is the meaning of those words "recoverable as a "penalty"? Approaching this apart from authority altogether, and as a matter of construction, I take the view that those words are clearly saying not that the arrears are a penalty, but that they are to be recoverable in like manner as if they were a penalty, the whole basis of it being that they are not a penalty. There is, however, some authority on the matter. In Fishwick's case,[3] Lord Hewart referred to Reg. v. Kerswill.[4] There the court was considering the effect, in section 66 of the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, of words which provided that the fare for a hackney carriage might be recovered before a justice "as a "penalty." Mathew J. held that those words did not stamp the arrears, or the fare, in that case, with any criminal character. He said [5]: "But it is said that the last words of the section, "'as a penalty,' stamp the non-payment with a criminal "character. The words are, 'to be recovered as a penalty'— "that is, to be recovered in the same way as a penalty. Those "words do not, in my opinion, alter the nature of the obligation "itself, which remains a purely civil obligation, . . ."

Finally on this point, one cannot shut one's eyes to the fact that it was as a result of the decision of this court in Fishwick's case [6] that the words now under consideration were introduced. In other words, the object of the draughtsman was to cure the position which arose as a result of Fishwick's case,[6] that the justices were unable to deal with the arrears at the time of the prosecution. The draughtsman, with Fishwick [6] in mind, and with Kerswill [7] in mind, inserted the words which are now to be found in paragraph (5) providing that the arrears "shall be "recoverable as a penalty." In my judgment, as I have said, it seems to be perfectly clear that those words are not making the arrears a penalty.

One comes then, finally, to section 27 of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952. That section provides, in subsection (1), so far as it is material: "Where under any enactment passed before "the commencement of this Act a magistrates' court has power "to sentence an offender to imprisonment for a period specified "by the enactment, or to a fine of an amount specified by the "enactment, then [except in certain circumstances] the court "may sentence him to imprisonment for less than that period or, "as the case may be, to a fine of less than that amount."

As I have already said, I take the view that the arrears are in no sense a penalty or a fine, at any rate in the ordinary sense of the word.

There being nobody representing the respondent in this case, Mr. Cumming-Bruce quite rightly has thought it proper to draw our attention to certain provisions upon which an argument to the contrary might be based. He refers us to the definition section, section 126 (1) of the Act, under which: "'Fine' includes "any pecuniary penalty or pecuniary forfeiture or pecuniary "compensation payable under a conviction." It might be argued that those words are at any rate extending the ordinary meaning of the word "fine," and I suppose it might be said that "pecuniary compensation" was apt to cover an order for the payment of the arrears, albeit it was in the nature of a civil debt. For my part, I do not think that the arrears come within any part of that definition. The reference to "pecuniary compensation" is clearly necessary to deal with the case, not uncommon, where under the relevant legislation a court is empowered, in the case of damage, to make an order for compensation to be paid by the prisoner to third parties. It seems to me that the reference to "pecuniary compensation" there is designed and designed only to deal with such a case.

Finally, reference was made to section 126 (3) [8] upon which it was said that some argument might be based. I find it unnecessary to deal with that subsection. It is enough for me to say that I can see no argument that could be based on that subsection, which in any way would alter the opinion I have already expressed.

For those reasons, which I have endeavoured to state shortly, I would allow this appeal, and remit the case to the justices, with a direction that they have no power to mitigate any part of the sums ordered to be paid, other than the fine itself.

Rating—Rateable occupation—Intermittent use—Playing field used by sports club.

A friendly society on October 18, 1950, entered into an agreement with the officers of its sports club whereby it granted them leave and licence exclusively to use and occupy its sports ground, which had on it a pavilion and other appurtenances, for a term determinable on three months' notice by the society for the sum of £400 for the first year and thereafter of £500 a year. The agreement provided that the ground should only be used as a sports ground and for no other purpose and only from 4.30 p.m. on weekdays and all day on Saturdays, Sundays and bank holidays, and at no other time without the consent of the society. On March 18, 1951, the society entered into a written agreement with a county council whereby it granted to the council a licence to use and occupy the sports ground during the morning and early afternoon on Mondays to Fridays inclusive, to provide a playing field for schools in the area: that licence was for five years from June 1, 1950, for the yearly sum of £530; and by another written agreement made on January 25, 1955, it was followed by another similar licence for five years from July 23, 1955, for the yearly sum of £365. By each agreement the society agreed to pay the rates. From May, 1955, until December, 1957, the society granted a licence to a school to use the ground for one or two hours a week for sums amounting to between £11 and £13 a term.

On a summons taken out by the trustees of the society to determine whether, inter alia, on the true construction of section 8 (1) (c) of the Rating and Valuation (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1955,[1] the hereditament was one to which section 8 of that Act had applied from and including the rating year 1955–56:—

Held, that on the true construction of section 8 (1) (c) of the Rating and Valuation (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1955, the word "occupied" bore its ordinary significance in a rating Act and referred to rateable occupation, and that the words "for the "purposes of" a "club" meant in carrying on the activities of the club, denoting continuous use by the club coterminous in time with the rateable occupation, and that, therefore, the intermittent use of the sports ground by the club was not an "occupation for "the purposes of a club" within the meaning of section 8 (1) (c).

Royal London Mutual Insurance Society Ltd. v. Hendon Borough Council (1958) 51 R. & I.T. 285, D.C. distinguished.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

The following statement of facts is taken substantially from the judgment: In 1921 the Liverpool Victoria Friendly Society acquired a property at Gunnersbury Lane, in the borough of Ealing, which then represented some 11 acres and comprised a sports ground with a pavilion and other appurtenances usually attached to playing grounds. Some time in 1946 the society caused a block of flats to be erected on the western part of the property, leaving something over eight acres for use as a playing field. In 1947 the Middlesex County Council made certain proposals to the society suggesting an intention to acquire the property compulsorily. That threat was repelled on the terms that the county council should have the use of the ground on certain terms, except at week-ends. In 1949 the society spent some £8,000 to £9,000 on the rehabilitation of the ground. On October 18, 1950, the society entered into a licence agreement with certain individuals as the officers of the Liverpool Victoria Sports and Social Club (the "tenants"). By that agreement the society granted to the tenants from June 1, 1950, leave and licence "exclusively to use and occupy their sports ground . . . "for the purposes and during the periods hereinafter mentioned "or such other times as may be mutually agreed" between the society and the club. The licence was determinable on three months' notice by the society, and the tenants agreed to pay £400 per annum during the first year of the licence and £500 per annum thereafter. The agreement provided that neither the ground nor any part thereof should be used for any purpose "other than that of a sports ground for the purpose of playing "football cricket tennis hockey netball and other outdoor games "and athletic sports and for no other purpose from 4.30 p.m. on "weekdays and all day on Saturdays Sundays and bank holidays "and at no other times except with the consent of the [society] "in writing." There was a provision that "The groundsman of "the landlords shall have the right to decide whether play is

"shall not apply to any hereditament "to which section seven of this Act "applies, or to any hereditament occupied by an authority having, within "the meaning of the Local Loans "Act, 1875, power to levy a rate."

"possible owing to the state of the ground." The society agreed to pay all rates in respect of the premises.

On March 18, 1951, the society entered into a written agreement with the Middlesex County Council under which the society granted to the council a licence to use and occupy the sports ground for the purpose of providing playing fields for schools in the area during periods specified in the schedule "excluding all "Saturdays, Sundays and bank holidays or such other times as "may be mutually agreed between the Council's Chief Education "Officer" and the society: the schedule set out in detail the hours during which the ground might be used, and those hours were, broadly, in the morning and early afternoon on the days from Monday to Friday inclusive. That licence was for five years from June 1, 1950, at the rent of £530 per annum; it also contained a provision that the society's groundsman should have the right to decide when play was possible owing to the state of the ground, and again the society agreed to pay the rates.

That agreement was superseded by another agreement in broadly, similar terms, between the society and the Middlesex County Council dated January 25, 1956, granting a licence to the county council to use the playing fields for five years from July 23, 1955: the amount payable by way of rent was £365 a year after the first six months, and the schedule set out in detail periods, similar to those contained in the first agreement, during which the county council might use the ground, which, again, were certain hours in the morning and early afternoons of the days from Monday to Friday inclusive.

The evidence showed that the combined rents payable by the club and the county council were such as to result in a substantial loss to the society as landlords of the ground. The only other licence given by the society in respect of the ground was to Beacon House School, which used the ground from May, 1955, to December, 1957, for one or two hours a week for sums amounting to between £11 and £13 a term.

The trustees of the society took out a summons to determine whether, on the true construction of section 8 (1) (c) of the Rating and Valuation (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1955, the hereditament was one to which section 8 of the Act had applied from and including the rating year 1955–56, and, if so, whether the failure of the rating authority to give the relief provided by section 8 (2) in making and levying their rate for the years 1956–57 and 1957–58 precluded the trustees from the benefit of section 8 (2) in subsequent years.

Cur. adv. vult.

December 2. PENNYCUICK J. read the following judgment: This is an originating summons which raises certain questions under section 8 of the Rating and Valuation (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1955. The plaintiffs are the trustees of the Liverpool Victoria Friendly Society, and the defendants are the mayor, aldermen and burgesses of the borough of Ealing. The question, summarily, is whether a certain hereditament used as a sports ground qualifies for partial exemption under section 8 of the Act as being occupied for the purposes of a club.

[His Lordship stated the facts and continued:] I need not read the whole of section 8, but for present purposes the part directly in point is section 8 (1): "This section applies to the "following hereditaments, that is to say . . . (c) any hereditament "consisting of a playing field (that is to say, land used mainly "or exclusively for the purposes of open-air games or of open-air "athletic sports) occupied for the purposes of a club, society or "other organisation which is not established or conducted for "profit and does not (except on special occasions) make any "charge for the admission of spectators to the playing field." Then there follows a proviso which I shall read later. Subsection (2) provides for partial relief from rates in the case of hereditaments to which subsection (1) applies. It is conceded for the present purpose that the society is the rateable occupier of the ground: that the ground is a playing field within the meaning of section 8 (1) (c); and that the club is an organisation "which "is not established or conducted for profit and does not (except "on special occasions) make any charge for the admission of "spectators to the playing field."

The question, therefore, is: Is the ground occupied for the purposes of this club? It seems to me that in paragraph (c) the word "occupied" must bear its ordinary significance in a Rating Act and refer to rateable occupation. I think that the words "for the purposes of" in this paragraph must in their context refer to the mode of use of the hereditament and may be paraphrased as "in carrying on the activities of." For example, a hereditament is occupied for the purposes of a shop, factory or school, if its use is in the carrying on of the activities of a shop, factory or school. The same expression "occupied for the "purposes of" appears in subsection (1) (a), where it must, I think, have that meaning.

Pennycuick J.

A simple construction of paragraph (c) would be that the paragraph only applies where the club, society or other organisation in question is itself, or a trustee for it is the rateable occupier of the hereditament. That simple construction is excluded, as Mr. Patrick Browne for the corporation admits, by the decision of the Queen's Bench Divisional Court in Royal London Mutual Insurance Society Ltd. v. Hendon Borough Council.[1] In accordance with that decision is must be at least possible where a hereditament is used under licence by an organisation other than the rateable occupier for the hereditament to be occupied for the purposes of the licensee.

It remains to consider where a hereditament is used for the purposes of a licensee organisation, whether in order to come within paragraph (c), the use by the organisation during any given period must be continuous throughout that period, or whether it is sufficient that the use should take place intermittently during the period. On its natural meaning the expression "occupied for the "purposes of" an organisation appears to me to indicate continuous use by the organisation. The occupation by the occupier is from its nature continuous and the whole expression "occupied "for the purposes of an organisation" seems to me to denote, and to denote only, use by the organisation coterminous in time with the occupation by the occupier. Equally, the expression seems to me inapt to denote whole-time occupation by the rateable occupier coupled with the part-time use by the organisation.

The only logical alternative would be to say that use by the licensee during any stretch or stretches of time, however short or discontinuous, is sufficient, for example, the paragraph would apply where the field is licensed for one day during the year to an organisation for the purposes of a show. On the face of it this is an absurd result, and Mr. Rink for the society does not attempt to support it. On the other hand, Mr. Rink has, it seems to me, been unable to suggest any line of demarcation which is logically tenable.

Apart from authority, my conclusion is that the use of this ground for the purposes of the club limited to evenings during the first five days of the week and to Saturdays, Sundays and bank holidays cannot be regarded as constituting occupation of the hereditament by the society for the purposes of the club.

It has, however, been contended by Mr. Rink with much force that the point is concluded in his favour by Royal London Mutual Insurance Society Ltd. v. Hendon Borough Council,[1] to which I have referred. The headnote to that case is as follows: "A sports ground with pavilion was owned and was rated as "being occupied by an insurance society. It was managed and "controlled by a committee formed jointly by two clubs of "employees of the society on behalf of the society and of the two "clubs. The clubs were not established or conducted for profit.

"It was used solely by employees of the company and was used "for open-air games, no other activity taking place there. It "was financed by contributions from subscriptions of members of "the clubs, by an annual grant from the society, and by the "society's payment of rates, water rates, insurance and Schedule "A tax." The case stated shows that in respect of the ground occupied by the club under licence no rent had been payable to the society: it further appears that "there was no evidence of "actual occupation of the ground by the society." On those facts the society contended that the ground was within paragraph (c). The local authority resisted the claim on grounds which are important in considering the judgment. The contentions of the rating authority were, inter alia: "(ii) that 'for the purpose of a club, "'society or other organisation' within the meaning of section 8 "(1) (c) of the Act meant 'wholly or exclusively for the purposes "'of a club, society or other organisation'; (iii) that the "ground was occupied partly for the purposes of the society in "that: (a) the inception and the continuing use of the ground by "employees of the society depended on the financial grant to the "committee made by the society; (b) the payment of the grant "could only be intra vires the society if covered by its purposes "or objects; (c) the purpose of the grant was, inter alia, to "facilitate the recruitment and retention of staff, to maintain "good staff relations and to promote the health and welfare of "the staff; (d) further or alternatively, the rules of the committee and in particular the rule that the stated object of "the committee was to manage the ground partly on behalf of the "society provided for the direct interest of the society in the "occupation of the ground." It is against those facts and those grounds of argument that the judgment of the Divisional Court must be read.

Lord Goddard C.J., after summarising the issues, said [2]: "The "whole point that is raised here is this: It is said that this is one "of the schemes by which the society seeks to attract and benefit "its staff, and, if it benefits its staff with a view to making them a "contented and efficient staff, it shows it is occupied for the purposes of the society. Quarter sessions have said that considerations of that sort are too remote, and I agree with them. I think "the only thing we have to consider here is: "Is the ground being "used as a playing field? Is it occupied for the purposes of a club? "The argument of counsel for the rating authority really asks us to "read into the section 'occupied exclusively for the purposes of "'the club,' or 'occupied substantially for the purposes of the "'club.' I do not think we can read in those words, though for "myself, I am not satisfied that if that word 'exclusively' had "been put in it would have made any difference in this case. It "seems to me that this is a sports ground."

Hilbery J. said [3]: "The argument apparently is that, because a

"purpose of the society becoming the occupier of the land in question was the formation of such a club, which might be of benefit to its staff who joined it, the occupation of the premises of that club was not exclusive occupation for the purposes of the club but was partly for the purposes of the society. In my view, that is far too remote and this is exactly the sort of case that this sub-section was intended to cover. I agree with the conclusion arrived at by quarter sessions that the suggested purposes or advantages to the respondent society were too remote." Donovan J. said[4]: "I agree. I think quarter sessions were clearly right, because this ground is admittedly occupied for the purposes of such a club as is described in section 8 (1) (c). But the rating authority want the words read as 'occupied 'exclusively for the purposes of the club.' The word 'substantially' would not do. What the rating authority must have read in if they want to succeed is the word 'exclusively,' and they support that contention on these grounds: they say that this land was bought by the insurance society. It was bought to fulfil a commercial purpose, namely, a contented, healthy staff, and it is conceded that that is so. Obviously, in order to spend this money the society had to fulfil some purpose within the four corners of its memorandum of association, but of itself that does not justify the court writing in the word 'exclusively' where the rating authority want it written into this section, that is, as qualifying the words 'occupied for the 'purposes of the club,' which is admittedly the case here. Another argument against writing in that word 'exclusively' is this, that in the earlier sub-paragraph of the section dealing with the use of the hereditament the words are: 'any heredita-'ment consisting of a playing field (that is to say, land used 'mainly or exclusively for the purposes of open-air games,' and so on. If Parliament had meant the word 'exclusively' also to govern the expression 'purposes of a club,' it clearly would have said so. Quarter sessions have taken the view that the alleged purpose or advantage to the insurance society is too remote, and I agree, but I would prefer to put it in this way, that this case is within the expression 'occupied for the pur-'poses of the club,' and that is enough. Furthermore, although the land was bought and equipped in the first place to fulfil the purposes of the society, the actual occupation seems to me to be for the purposes of the club, and the benefit to the society is really a by-product of their occupation, albeit a by-product that no doubt was envisaged from the outset."

It seems to me that the ratio decidendi of that case was that the hereditament was occupied for the purposes of the club within the natural meaning of those words, and that the hereditament was not taken out of the paragraph by the concurrent purpose in favour of the society, assuming that those purposes existed at all.

In order to have taken the hereditament out of the paragraph, a qualification of the words would have been required, for example, as suggested by the court, the word "exclusively." The decision was not at all addressed to the position where the use by the organisation is intermittent, and I do not think that there is anything in the decision which is inconsistent with the view which I have taken here, namely, that in such circumstances this intermittent use of the hereditament is not an occupation for the purposes of the club organisation within the natural meaning of the words in paragraph (c). If the hereditament is not so occupied within the natural meaning of the words, then, so far from express words being required to take it out of the paragraph, express words would have been required to bring it into the paragraph. Mr. Rink suggested the introduction of such words as "main" or "dominant" before the word "purposes" in order to get the hereditament within the paragraph, but those words are not there.

Before leaving this case I desire to add that I respectfully share the doubts expressed by Lord Goddard C.J. when he said [5]: "I am not satisfied that if that word 'exclusively' had been put "in it would have made any difference in this case," and by Donovan J.[5]: " . . . the actual occupation seems to me to be for "the purposes of the club, and the benefit to the society is really a "by-product of their occupation"; in other words, the so-called purposes which were relied upon by the local authority in that case were not purposes in the sense that that word bears in paragraph (c).

For the reasons which I have endeavoured to give, it seems to me that this ground is not within paragraph (c) of section 8 (1).

In the course of the argument Mr. Rink at one point suggested that the test of whether a hereditament was occupied for the purposes of a club might be a subjective one depending in effect on the motive of the rateable occupier, namely, here, the society; but Mr. Rink gave up that contention, rightly as it seems to me, and I need not deal with it further.

For the purposes of this judgment, I have treated the use by the club as if it were a gratuitous user having regard to the fact that the society is out of pocket in respect of the ground. It seems to me that different questions would arise where the occupier received a profitable rent from the licensee, but those questions do not arise here, and it is not necessary to consider them.

Mr. Browne advanced an alternative contention under the proviso to subsection (1). The proviso is in these terms: "Pro-"vided that this section shall not apply to any hereditament to "which section seven of this Act applies, or to any hereditament "occupied by an authority having, within the meaning of the "Local Loans Act, 1875, power to levy a rate." The Middlesex County Council is such an authority. The argument was that in the present case both the licensee, that is, the club, and the Middlesex County Council, can be treated as occupying the ground and, therefore, the proviso applies. It seems to me, for the reasons which I have already given, that the ground is occupied by the society, and neither by the club nor by the county council, and therefore that argument would fail.

Turning now to the originating summons, the question asked is: "Whether on a true construction of section 8 (1) (c) of the "said Act the hereditament aforesaid is one to which section 8 "has applied at all material times from and including the rating "year 1955–1956 until the date hereof." That question I answer in the negative. The second question: "Whether the failure of "the defendant rating authority to give the relief from rates "provided by section 8 (2) in making and levying their rate for "the rating years 1956–1957 and 1957–58 precludes the plaintiffs "from such benefit of section 8 (2) in subsequent years" does not arise on the view which I have taken of the first question: in any event I have heard no argument on it for the reason that I understand the point is decided in this court against the local authority by the decision of Salmon J. in Waterson v. Hendon Borough Council[6] but Mr. Patrick Browne has mentioned the point in order to keep it open in case this case goes further.

Order accordingly.

[Plaint No. P. 355.]

Landlord and Tenant—Rent restriction—Personal occupation—Mental illness—Prolonged absence therefrom—Animus revertendi—Test—Onus of proof.

An elderly lady, the statutory tenant of a rent-controlled house in which she lived with her unmarried daughter, went on a temporary visit to another daughter in July, 1954. While there, she had a breakdown and was admitted to a mental hospital under a summary reception order, suffering from paranoid schizophrenia. She remained in the hospital continuously thereafter, though by November, 1959, when she was 73, she had so far improved as to be regraded to voluntary status and became entitled to discharge herself at short notice. Her unmarried daughter continued to maintain the house as their home.

In December, 1959, landlords, who had purchased the house in January of that year, brought proceedings against the tenant and her daughter, claiming that in view of her long absence the tenant was no longer entitled to the protection of the Rent Restriction Acts, and as the daughter's right to occupation depended on that of her mother, she was similarly disentitled from remaining in possession.

The county court judge found that, though it was unlikely in view of the tenant's age and condition that she would ever leave the hospital, she had always regarded the house as her home and frequently expressed the hope of going back there, and that in view of the advances in medical treatment and her own improvement the possibility of her return to her home one day could not be ruled out. He held that the evidence was just sufficient to discharge the onus on the tenant, and had satisfied him that there had been no real abandonment of possession. On the landlords' appeal:—

Held, dismissing the appeal, that there was evidence on which the judge could find an intention to return to live in the house.

Per Ormerod L.J. In such cases there must be a real hope of return coupled with the practical possibility of its fulfilment within a reasonable time (post, p. 1410).

Per Willmer L.J. Once the tenant's absence is explained by proof of facts which do not of themselves involve an actual intention on his part to abandon possession, the landlord must prove affirmatively that the tenant has in fact abandoned possession (post, p. 1413).

Per Upjohn L.J. After a long absence the onus lies on the tenant of establishing an intention to return. Whether he has abandoned possession is not the relevant test (post, pp. 1415, 1416).

Brown v. Brash and Ambrose [1948] 2 K.B. 247; 64 T.L.R. 266; [1948] 1 All E.R. 922, C.A. applied.

APPEAL from Judge Sir Donald Hurst, sitting at Aylesbury County Court.

On January 22, 1959, a house known as "Quetta," Buckland, near Aylesbury, was bought by Albert Edward Tickner and his wife from its previous owner, one Thorne, who had become the owner on November 3, 1957. The house had been occupied for many years on a weekly tenancy by a Mr. and Mrs. Hearn and their family. In January, 1954, Mr. Hearn died and Mrs. Hearn and her daughter, Miss Daisy Blanche Hearn, continued to live in the house, Mrs. Hearn remaining in occupation as a statutory tenant protected by the Rent Restriction Acts.

In June, 1954, Mrs. Hearn, who had nursed her husband through a long illness, went to visit her married daughter in Devizes for a rest and a change. While she was at Devizes she had a mental breakdown, and on August 4, 1954, she was admitted to Devizes Mental Hospital under a summary reception order, suffering from schizophrenia, and remained there up to and including the date of the present proceedings. In November, 1959, she was regraded to voluntary status. It was not in dispute that up to the time of her illness, Mrs. Hearn had every intention of returning to "Quetta."

In December, 1959, the new landlords, the Tickners, applied to the county court for an order for possession of the house, the defendants to the action being Mrs. Hearn by her guardian ad litem, Miss Daisy Blanche Hearn, and Miss Hearn herself. The landlords alleged that as Mrs. Hearn had left the premises in 1954 and never returned her possession had ceased. It was not in dispute that her daughter had no independent right of her own.

The only medical evidence called at the hearing was that of Dr. Russell, the medical superintendent of the hospital at Devizes, who was called on behalf of the landlords. His evidence as recorded in the judge's notes was that the first defendant, Mrs. Hearn, was a patient admitted on August 4, 1954: "summary "reception order—schizophrenia—73 years. Date of birth "November 25, 1886. Regraded to voluntary status November, "1959; not because cured—present condition, still schiz. while "some degree improvement there is no question of cure. Form "23; not recommended she leave—90 per cent. females voluntary "or informal under new Act. Most unlikely that she will ever "leave hospital—bearing in mind status. Voluntary patient—"this means she can leave in 72 hours; she has not mentioned to "me intention to leave. She requires constant psychiatric care—"day and night nurses. This will continue unless remission of "symptoms—which I do not anticipate." The evidence then discussed the visits paid by the daughters regularly to see their mother. In cross-examination the medical superintendent said: "Patients have home address on record—names, address in case "of necessity. Many times talked to her; she regards 'Quetta' "as her home. She has said like to go back if gets better. "She has spoken about getting better, she has genuine hope of "getting better—remarkable strides in treatment, one cannot say "that there will not be development in treatment to help, but "there is her age to consider. Her age is factor in assessing "chances of recovery." In re-examination he said: "Fair "physical condition—does not mean she is breaking up." Then, in reply to question by the court: "Have had radical cure after "30—ages 40, 50. She has been slightly better in six years—"not fundamental—better behaviour in relationship with other "people and staff. Not able to make decisions as to management "of affairs—if asked to consent to any proposition I would not "allow her to do so. Interviewed her prior to this case—said, "'Do you understand I have to go to court?' She understood "and gave consent. She appreciated that this house was being "considered. She expressed hope she would one day leave "hospital, but appreciated she was not well enough at that time. "She showed a little anxiety; difficult to say whether this was "relative to proceedings—suffers from personal delusions of "persecution."

The judge rgarded the case as one very near the borderline. He said in his judgment on February 3, 1960: "The onus has "been on the defendant in this trying case to establish that there "has been an intention to return or conversely no intention to "leave." After careful consideration of the medical evidence, the judge said: "The evidence is just sufficient in this case to "discharge the onus and has satisfied me that there has been no "real abandonment of possession"; and he refused to make an order for possession in favour of the plaintiff landlords.

The landlords appealed, asking for that judgment to be set aside or, alternatively, for a new trial. The defendants entered a notice of cross-appeal asking for the affirmation of the county court judgment on other grounds, namely, that the burden of proof was on the plaintiffs to show abandonment of possession.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 22. ORMEROD L.J., reading his judgment, stated the facts set out above, and said that the question in the appeal was whether Mrs. Hearn was now entitled to the protection of the Rent Restriction Acts. If she was still the occupying tenant, she was protected. The right of Miss Hearn to continue to live in the premises depended on whether her mother was still a statutory tenant. His Lordship continued: It was submitted on behalf of the landlords by Mr. Leggatt that if Mrs. Hearn was to be allowed to remain as tenant there must be shown to be present not only corpus possessionis but also animus revertendi. Having herself been away from the house for so long a time the burden was on her to establish a positive intention to return. It was argued that the effect of the medical evidence was that she was incapable of forming an intention and therefore it was impossible for her to discharge the burden which her long absence from the house had caused to be laid on her. Mr. Leggatt went further. He argued, on the authority of Asquith L.J.'s definition of "intention" in Cunliffe v. Goodman, [1] that the intention must be one which could reasonably be carried out, and the medical evidence in this case was that it was extremely unlikely.

On behalf of the respondents [Mrs. Hearn and her daughter] it was argued that once the absence was explained, as it had been in this case, the burden was again cast on the landlord to establish that Mrs. Hearn had abandoned the tenancy, and in view of the fact that she had been unable to form any intention the burden in consequence could not be discharged. Put in a simple form, the argument is that up to the time of being taken ill Mrs. Hearn had every intention of returning. By reason of her infirmity she has at no time since then been capable of changing that intention and therefore has not abandoned the tenancy. This is an attractive argument but cannot, I think, be the right approach to the problem. Otherwise the same reasoning would apply if Mrs. Hearn was in such a hopeless condition that there was no possible chance of her ever being able to leave the hospital. It cannot, I think, be the intention of the Rent Restriction Acts that in such circumstances the statutory tenancy should be allowed to continue. The judge appears to have accepted this argument at one stage of his judgment when he said: "On the "evidence her intention is to return and she has never been in a "position mentally to alter that intention." There cannot be an intention if the mind is no longer capable of forming one. I cannot see the difference between being unable mentally to alter an intention and being unable to form or to have an intention, and if that were the real foundation of the judge's judgment I should be in serious doubt whether it could stand.

Asquith L.J. in Brown v. Brash and Ambrose,[2] where the question was whether the tenant had in the circumstances retained any corpus possessionis, said: "The question is one of "fact and of degree." It must first be determined, of course, what the question is. I think there must be evidence of something more than a vague wish to return. It must be a real hope coupled with the practicable possibility of its fulfilment within a reasonable time. The judge has said this, and it appears to be in accordance with the medical evidence: "Her hopes are all in "line with the intention not to go away from this home [namely, "'Quetta'] and return when she is better. People are "astonished at the strides that have been made in mental illness. "The doctors cannot rule out the possibility that there may be "something which will help this lady, and there is this to be "said: she is on the road in that direction, because it is no longer "thought necessary by the hospital authorities that she should "remain a compulsory patient, but she has recovered sufficiently "to be a voluntary patient and she could give 72 hours' notice "to the hospital authorities and she can leave the hospital if she "wishes. True, the authorities would probably try their best to "persuade her otherwise, but if she made up her mind she could "go. What is there to say that she won't take a desire to try "and put it into action to go back into this house? And I must "take this fact into account: she is improving her relations with "other people and improving the state of schizophrenia which "is the cause of her delusion of persecution by other people "with whom she comes into contact. Who am I to say that "the stage might not be reached within a reasonable time "when the authorities would say that her relationship had so "improved as to make it safe to let her out to the care of her "daughters? I cannot say that she is incurable. It is true that "the doctor very fairly said that this was unlikely in view of "her age but she is a voluntary patient. She has never been in "a position to alter that intention to have any legal consequences. "She likes to hear talk of home and what people are doing at "home and what her daughter is doing at home, and she would "like to return there, and she regards 'Quetta' as her home, "with the hope of going back."

He then goes on to say: "The evidence is just sufficient in "this case to discharge the onus and has satisfied me that there "has been no real abandonment of possession." Put the other way, I think the judge is saying that Mrs. Hearn has shown that she still looks on "Quetta" as her home, and has always done so and has a real hope of returning there, and this is an intention to which he should have regard. In view of the fact that she is now a voluntary patient, and of the advances that have been made and are still being made in the treatment of mental illness, it might well become practicable within a reasonable time for her to leave and return home in the care of her daughter.

Although I agree with the judge that this is a borderline case, I think there was evidence on which he could find an intention to return to live in the house, and that is the conclusion to which I think he came. I would, therefore, dismiss the appeal.

A question was raised on behalf of Mrs. Hearn that in any event the landlords were estopped from asserting that the tenancy had ceased by reason of the conduct of their predecessors in title. In view of the conclusion to which I have come, it is unnecessary to consider this question, which does not appear to be without difficulty.

WILLMER L.J. I, too, find myself unable to differ from the conclusion at which the county court judge arrived. [His Lordship also stated the facts and continued:] The plaintiffs' claim is founded on an allegation that, the first defendant having left the premises in 1954 and never returned, her possession thereof has accordingly ceased. It is not in dispute that the second defendant has no independent right of her own.

The case for the landlords is that the passage of so long a time during which the tenant has been absent from the premises raises a presumption against her that she has abandoned her possession. This, it is said, she can only rebut by proving affirmatively (a) that she has retained an animus revertendi and (b) that she has in the meantime maintained what is described as a corpus possessionis. No question arises as to the latter in this case, for it is conceded that the continued occupation of the premises by her daughter, the second defendant, with her furniture would amount to a sufficient corpus possessionis. But as to the former it is contended that, so far from any intention to return being proved, the tenant, by reason of her mental condition, has been throughout, and still is, incapable of forming any intention at all. In this connection it is argued that it is not enough to prove merely a vague, general desire to return. There must, it is said, be something which is reasonably likely to be capable of practical fulfilment, and reliance is placed on Asquith L.J.'s well-known definition of "intention" in Cunliffe v. Goodman.[3]

C. A.

Tickner v. Hearn.
Willmer L.J.

On the other side, counsel for the defendants has argued that where, as here, the tenant's prolonged absence from the disputed premises has been due to mental illness, the mere fact of such prolonged absence raises no presumption against her or, if there is any such presumption, it is immediately rebutted on proof of the tenant's mental incapacity. For in the absence of capacity to form any intention there could not ever have been in law any abandonment of possession. Alternatively, it has been contended that on the facts, if and in so far as this tenant has been shown to have formed any intention at all, her intention throughout has been to return to "Quetta," which she has always regarded, and still regards, as her home.

The judge, while holding that the onus was on the tenant to prove that she had an intention to return or conversely no intention of leaving, came to the conclusion on the facts that she had discharged the onus that was on her. According to the note of his judgment he said: "On evidence such as this there is no "intention to abandon the premises at all. On the evidence "her intention is to return and she has never been in a position "mentally to alter that intention." In reaching his conclusion the judge relied on evidence given by the second defendant and by the medical superintendent of the hospital to the effect that the tenant always regarded, and spoke of, "Quetta" as her home, and frequently expressed the hope of going back there. The judge recognised that on the medical evidence it was unlikely that she would ever leave hospital, but having regard to the advances that have been made in medical treatment he declined to rule out the possibility that she might one day be able to give effect to her desires and return home. In such circumstances he expressed himself as satisfied that there had been no real abandonment of possession, and that, therefore, the landlords' claim must fail.

We have been referred to a number of authorities in which consideration has been given to the effect of prolonged absence from the disputed premises on the part of a tenant. This, however, appears to be the first occasion on which it has been necessary for this court to consider the effect of such an absence in the context of mental illness, though decisions either way have been arrived at by county court judges in cases to which our attention has been called. The argument for the landlords has been largely based on the judgment of this court delivered by Asquith L.J. in Brown v. Brash and Ambrose.[4] In that case the tenant's absence, for a period of something like 15 months, was due to the fact that he was serving a prison sentence as the result of a crime committed by him. The actual decision of the court in favour of the landlord was based on the fact that shortly after the tenant's imprisonment, his mistress, whom he had left in occupation, left the premises and removed most of the furniture, so that it was no longer possible to say that the tenant retained any corpus possessionis. In the course of delivering the judgment of the court, however, Asquith L.J. said[5]: "... absence "may be sufficiently prolonged or unintermittent to compel the "inference, prima facie, of a cesser of possession or occupation. "The question is one of fact and of degree. Assume an absence "sufficiently prolonged to have this effect: The legal result seems "to us to be as follows: (1) The onus is then on the tenant to "repel the presumption that his possession has ceased. (2) In "order to repel it he must at all events establish a de facto "intention on his part to return after his absence."

I do not read this statement on the part of Asquith L.J. as meaning that in all cases of prolonged absence, where a tenant appears as defendant to resist a landlord's claim to possession, the burden of proof is on the tenant throughout. What is meant, as I understand it, is no more than what has been described as a provisional onus, such as may arise in the course of any case where facts are proved which call for an explanation. The fact of long absence on the part of a tenant is a fact which calls for explanation, and which, in the absence of explanation, may, and will normally, prompt the inference of an intention to abandon possession. That this is the true view is, I think, confirmed by the way in which Lord Evershed M.R. expressed his decision in favour of the landlord in Bushford v. Falco,[6] when he said that "the tenant had not explained what must, on the facts, be "otherwise taken as an abandonment of occupation." These words of Lord Evershed, like the opening words of Asquith L.J. in the passage which I have cited, support the view, which for my part I am disposed to think is the right view, that the question which has to be determined in a case of this sort is whether there has or has not been a cesser or abandonment of possession or occupation. In determining this question the fact of prolonged absence is necessarily a potent circumstance, but it is not of itself sufficient. The intention of the tenant in thus absenting himself still has to be considered; and such intention may, of course, have to be inferred from all the circumstances of the case. This being so, it seems to me that once the tenant's absence is explained by proof of facts which do not of themselves involve an actual intention on his part to abandon possession, the plaintiff landlord is left where he started, and he must prove affirmatively that the tenant has, in fact, abandoned possession. The fact of prolonged absence, once it is thus explained, loses its compelling significance.

If this be the true view, it appears to me that the landlords' claim here must inevitably fail. The only witnesses whose evidence was relevant to this part of the case were the medical superintendent of the hospital (Dr. Russell), the male plaintiff (Mr. Tickner) and the second defendant (Miss Hearn). Miss Hearn's evidence made it clear that when her mother originally left "Quetta" in June, 1954, she did so only for the purpose of paying a temporary visit to her other daughter. There was clearly no evidence of any intention to abandon possession at that stage. As to the effect of the evidence with regard to the period since the onset of the tenant's mental illness, two views are possible. Either she has been so ill that she has not so far been capable of forming any fresh intention at all, in which case I think the evidence falls short of proving that up to date she has abandoned possession. Alternatively, if during her time in hospital she has been capable of forming any intention, the evidence of Dr. Russell and of Miss Hearn showed that she has remained throughout of the same mind, and that she still regards "Quetta" as her home to which she hopes one day to return. Equally, on this view, it is impossible to say that the landlords have proved anything amounting to abandonment of possession on the part of the tenant.

I have not forgotten that in the view of Dr. Russell it is most unlikely that she will ever be fit enough to leave hospital. But, as pointed out by the judge, it is quite impossible in this case, having regard to the improvement already achieved and to the advances which have been made in methods of treatment, to rule out the possibility altogether. Had the evidence showed that in no conceivable circumstances could the tenant ever hope to leave hospital again, a different and, as I think, a difficult question would have arisen. It might well be held that in such circumstances the landlord had sufficiently discharged the onus of proof. That is a question which may possibly have to be considered on some future occasion, and I prefer to express no concluded view about it. It is not a question which arises in this case, where the evidence is far from proving anything of the sort. On the evidence given in this case I find it impossible to disagree with the conclusion reached by the judge. In my judgment the plaintiff landlords have failed to prove the case which they set out to prove, namely, that this tenant has abandoned her possession of the premises.

A further point was taken on behalf of the tenant, namely, that the landlords were estopped by reason of their own and their predecessors' conduct from alleging that the defendant's possession of the premises had ceased. This was countered on behalf of the landlords by a submission that a claim to the protection of the Rent Restriction Acts cannot be founded on an estoppel. We were referred to a number of authorities from which it became clear that the point raised was one of some difficulty. For my part, having regard to the conclusion at which I have arrived on the main part of the case, I find it unnecessary to express any opinion on the question of estoppel.

UPJOHN L.J. As the county court judge recognised more than once in his judgment, this is a difficult and borderline case.

A statutory tenant in possession of rent-controlled premises has only a personal right of occupation; he has no estate or property as tenant at all, no right which he can transmit to others. This has been decided over and over again.

If he ceases to occupy the premises then he does not fall within the policy of the Rent Acts, which was to enable a person paying the proper rent fixed by Parliament to remain in occupation; see Skinner v. Geary,[7] per Scrutton L.J.

Whether a person is in occupation for the purposes of the Rent Acts is, however, essentially a question of fact and degree. If a man is personally absent from his house, he does not thereby necessarily cease to be entitled to the protection of the Acts. A man may be temporarily absent for business or holiday purposes, and he does not thereby cease to be in occupation. When absence is more prolonged a more difficult question arises. It was put in this way by Asquith L.J. in Brown v. Brash and Ambrose[8]: "Nevertheless, absence may be sufficiently prolonged "or unintermittent to compel the inference, prima facie, of a "cesser of possession or occupation. The question is one of fact "and of degree. Assume an absence sufficiently prolonged to "have this effect: The legal result seems to us to be as follows: "(1) The onus is then on the tenant to repel the presumption "that his possession has ceased. (2) In order to repel it he must "at all events establish a de facto intention on his part to return "after his absence."

In addition, of course, a tenant who is de facto out of possession must prove an animus possidendi, that is to say, he must clothe his inward intention with some formal and outward visible sign of it. It is, however, conceded that in this case that condition is satisfied by virtue of the continued occupation of the premises by the tenant's daughter and it is unnecessary, therefore, to consider that aspect of the matter further.

Counsel for the appellant landlord, relying on the passage in the judgment of Asquith L.J. which I have just quoted, has submitted to us that the onus is on the tenant to establish a de facto intention to return.

Counsel for the tenant has argued that the real question to be determined is whether the tenant has abandoned possession.

Speaking for myself, I accept the argument that where absence is more prolonged than is to be explained by holiday or ordinary business reasons and is unintermittent, the onus lies on the tenant of establishing an intention to return if he seeks the protection of the Acts.

[7] [1931] 2 K.B. 546, 560; 47 T.L.R. 597, C.A.

I do not think that the question whether the tenant has abandoned possession is the relevant test. It is true, I think, that in a number of the reported cases abandonment of possession has been treated as synonymous with failing to show an intention to return, and it is clear that in the case before us the county court judge did use the term "abandonment" as a short synonymic for expressing the idea that there was no intention to return. However, abandonment of possession and proving an intention to return are not the same thing. It would, I think, be easy to postulate circumstances where it could not be said that a tenant had abandoned possession, yet his intention to return was so vague and undetermined that he could not be said to have established an intention to return for the purposes of the Rent Acts.

The arguments of both counsel then proceed on the footing that by reason of the tenant's insanity, she has become incapable of expressing any further intention. Counsel for the tenant argues that she must be deemed to continue to have her last proved intention, namely, that to return to "Quetta." Counsel for the landlord argues that she can have no intention at all and, therefore, cannot establish any intention to return.

I cannot accept either of these submissions. To certify a person as mentally unsound does not necessarily make him incapable of forming an intention upon such a matter as this. It is a question of fact in each case whether his mental disease is such as to render him incapable of forming any intention or whether the disease falls short of that. Many persons who have been certified as insane are mentally incapable only in relation to certain matters or for certain periods and in relation to other matters or during lucid intervals they are perfectly capable of contracting, or making a will, or forming an intention to return home when fit. It is a question of fact in the light of the medical evidence in each case.

For my part, however, I am of opinion that to establish an intention to return by itself is not necessarily sufficient to obtain the protection of the Acts. The ultimate fact to be established is the fact of occupation, for it is only those in occupation whom the Act protects. If a tenant is out of occupation for some time he must at least prove an intention to return; but if the circumstances of the case are such that by reason of mental or physical illness or for some other reason the intention, even if clearly and bona fide held, seems most unlikely to be achieved within a reasonable time, it must surely be open to the judge in a proper case to find as a fact that the tenant is not in occupation. It seems to me that some of the reported cases have gone very far in the protection of the tenant.

The judge, in the course of his careful and full judgment, at one stage undoubtedly expressed the view that, having been certified, the tenant was not in a position mentally to alter her previous intention to return. For the reasons which I have given, I am unable to agree with that and, had the matter rested there, I should find myself unable to support his judgment. But the matter did not rest there. He went on to review the evidence very carefully in the greatest detail. He considered not only the tenant's present position but her future. Having dealt with her improvement so that she had become a voluntary patient, he said this: "Who am I to say that the stage might not be "reached within a reasonable time when the authorities would "say that her relationships had so improved as to make it safe "to let her out to the care of her daughters? I cannot say that "she is incurable." He concluded by saying: "The evidence is "just sufficient in this case to discharge the onus and has satis-"fied me that there has been no real abandonment of possession "and, therefore, the claim must fail."

I have already pointed out that, looking at the judge's judgment as a whole, it is plain that he is using the phrase "no real "abandonment" as being synonymous with stating the view that there was an intention to return. As I read his judgment, the conclusion which he reached was that, looking at all the facts during her mental illness, he regarded it as a borderline case, but he came to the conclusion on those facts that she had established an intention to return and, at least, a real possibility of her return within a reasonable time.

I think there was evidence on which the county court judge could come to the conclusion that as a fact the tenant had not ceased to occupy the premises for the purposes of the Rent Acts and, for this reason, I would not disturb his judgment and would dismiss the appeal.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

schedules—Three tier price system—Small retailers large proportion of wholesalers' market—Confectionery only part of general trade of small retailers—Whether benefits or advantages conferred on public by restrictions—Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956 (4 & 5 Eliz. 2, c. 68), s. 21 (1) (b).

The Wholesale Confectioners Alliance of Great Britain and Northern Ireland was a trade association of 1,980 of a total of 3,500 wholesalers of chocolate and sugar confectionery throughout the United Kingdom. Most wholesalers dealt in other goods as well as confectionery; some wholesalers were also manufacturers and some retailers. Members of the alliance handled about 90 per cent. of all confectionery sold by wholesalers, and 500 large firms handled 80 per cent. of confectionery sold wholesale. Sales of confectionery through wholesalers had declined substantially, the proportion of such sales in 1959 being almost half what it was in 1953, when confectionery was derationed. Since 1953, there had been a substantial increase in direct sales by manufacturers to large retailers or retailer buying groups, and those sales now accounted for over 50 per cent. of the confectionery sold in the United Kingdom. The most numerous group of retail outlets were the back street and village shops which comprised the bulk of the wholesalers' customers; practically all those retailers dealt in other goods and they were the least price conscious and most unbusinesslike. Main street shops, chain stores, multiples, supermarkets, cinemas and restaurants generally bought direct from manufacturers; secondary retail shops, public-houses, cafés, petrol stations and school tuck-shops generally bought partly from manufacturers and partly from wholesalers. Manufacturers normally ticketed their confectionery with either fixed or recommended consumer prices. There was great competition between manufacturers and the market in confectionery was a buyers' market.

The alliance issued a schedule of prices at which members were recommended to buy confectionery from manufacturers, known as the "white buying price schedule," and a schedule of prices at which members were recommended to resell to retailers, known as the "yellow price schedule." The white schedule operated on a normal wholesalers' 3 cwt. purchase, and set out three maximum buying rates, "A," "B" and "C," at which members were recommended to buy confectionery from manufacturers; and the yellow schedule contained three comparable reselling price rates, "A," "B" and "C." Whenever a member bought goods at an "A" rate, he was recommended to resell at the comparable "A" rate in the yellow schedule. The schedules were designed to divide the total distributor's margin so as to give 25 per cent. to the wholesaler and 75 per cent. to the retailer in weigh-out goods, and 28 per cent. and 72 per cent. respectively in other goods. The National Union of Retail Confectioners disapproved of the yellow schedule, and issued its own schedule of recommended prices to be paid by retailers to wholesalers. Both the distributors' overall and the wholesalers' margins were not unreasonable.

The alliance contended that removal of the restrictions comprised in its schedules would deny to the public specific and substantial benefits within paragraph (b) of section 21 (1) of the Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956,[1] in that the schedules

[1] Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956, s. 21: "(1) For the purposes "of any proceedings before the court "... a restriction accepted in pursu- "ance of any agreement shall be "deemed to be contrary to the public "interest unless the court is satisfied "of any one or more of the following "circumstances, that is to say— ... "(b) that the removal of the restric-

(1) enabled wholesalers to sell confectionery in populous and in sparsely populated areas at uniform margins, whereas under price competition the higher costs of distribution in sparsely populated areas would require wholesalers to increase their margins in those areas to such an extent that retailers in sparsely populated areas would go out of business or increase prices substantially; (2) enabled manufacturers to increase trade prices without increasing consumer prices; (3) enabled retailers, particularly the smaller retailers, to avoid having to "shop" for confectionery; and (4) avoided "disputes" between wholesalers and retailers:—

Held, (1) that the fact that the overall margins were not unreasonable did not exclude the possibility of manoeuvre, embracing also manufacturers such as in the absence of the schedule would ensure the continued supply of confectionery to and by retailers in the more sparsely poulated areas and at the overall ticket prices; the relevant retailers almost invariably stocked confectionery as a part only of a general trade, there were indications of elasticity in the retailers' share of the distributors' margin, and it was to be expected that in the absence of the schedules the less efficient wholesalers would go out of business, and that those who remained would be more capable of ensuring that their retail outlets would be maintained (post, pp. 1426, 1427).

(2) That the court was not satisfied that it would follow from the loss of the schedules that any increase in price by manufacturers would necessarily lead to an increase in the consumer price (post, pp. 1427, 1428).

(3) That the court was not satisfied that in a free market small retailers would be incapable of profitably comparing the differing prices of the different wholesalers seeking to sell them the same goods, and that such time and trouble as might now be saved to the small retailer by the operation of the schedules was not a substantial benefit or advantage (post, pp. 1428, 1429).

In re Black Bolt and Nut Association's Agreement (1960) L.R. 2 R.P. 50; [1960] 1 W.L.R. 884; [1960] 3 All E.R. 122 distinguished.

(4) That, whatever was meant by "disputes," the existence of the schedules did not avoid a general attitude of opposition between wholesalers and retailers, for retailers in fact disliked it, preferring their own schedule; but that, in any event, the avoidance of differences of opinion in the course of bargaining, was not a specific and substantial benefit to retailers, particularly when most of them were likely to benefit from such bargaining by a reduction in prices (post, p. 1429).

The alliance, therefore, had failed to establish its case under paragraph (b) of section 21 (1), and the restrictions comprised in the schedules must be declared contrary to the public interest.

WHOLESALE CONFECTIONERS ALLIANCE'S AGREEMENT, In re.

The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment of the court.

The Wholesale Confectioners Alliance of Great Britain and Northern Ireland is a trade association. It is an alliance of four members: these are the British Federation of Wholesale Confectioners, the Scottish Federation of Wholesale Confectioners' Associations, the South Wales and Monmouthshire Federation of Wholesale Confectioners, and the Belfast and Northern Ireland Wholesale Confectioners Association. The three federations have as their constituent members local associations of local wholesalers, and the association has as its members wholesale confectioners in Northern Ireland. These wholesalers deal by wholesale either in part or sometimes solely with confectionery, that is chocolate and sugar confectionery (sweets). Wholesale members of the alliance (through the federations and associations) total 1,980 odd, being divided approximately 220 Scottish, 80 South Wales and Monmouthshire, 110 Belfast and Northern Ireland, and 1,560 English.

The purposes of the alliance include that of formulating policy and advancing agreed views on behalf of all wholesale confectionery interests, and also the encouraging of the maintenance of standard prices and terms in the distributive sections of the confectionery industry, and the issuing of price lists.

There are some 500 confectionery manufacturers, producing some 20,000 lines. About 80 per cent. is produced by fifty of these manufacturers, and 200 manufacturers have a national distribution of their goods. On the chocolate side ten manufacturers produce over 80 per cent.; on the sugar confectionery side twenty-five manufacturers produce over 50 per cent. There is great competition among manufacturers. The market now and in the foreseeable future must be regarded as a buyers' market. Since the termination of confectionery rationing in 1953, the proportion of confectionery sold through wholesalers has sharply declined, there being a substantial increase in direct sales by manufacturers to the larger retailers, or chain stores, or retailer buying groups. Normally manufacturers are prepared to sell to anyone who will buy enough at a time; their price lists are commonly on a sliding scale related to quantity and applicable to wholesaler and retailer alike. The wholesalers' proportion has been estimated at 35 to 40 per cent. in 1959 (225,000 tons) as compared with 60 to 70 per cent. (390,000 tons) in 1953–54.

The alliance membership consists of nearly 2,000 wholesalers, out of some 3,500 who handle confectionery to some extent. About 1,000 of these do so to such a small extent that they are primarily wholesalers in some other line or lines and are likely to be members of other comparable trade associations. Members of the alliance probably handle about 90 per cent. of confectionery tonnage sold by wholesale, and about 500 big firms handle 80 per cent. of such tonnage. Confectionery wholesalers handling confectionery only are probably less than 20 per cent. of the total members. Some wholesalers also manufacture; some wholesalers also retail. Far the largest group of wholesalers deal in other commodities as well, such as tobacco, groceries, stationery, dry goods, chemists sundries and so forth. In some of these mixed businesses confectionery predominates.

Retail confectionery outlets vary considerably in character. Main street confectionery shops tending to specialise in confectionery ordinarily buy from manufacturers direct. So also do chain stores, multiples, supermarkets, cinemas and restaurants. Retail outlets such as public-houses, cafés, petrol stations, school tuck-shops, buy partly from manufacturers and partly from wholesalers; and so do secondary thoroughfare retail shops, which usually deal also in other goods. The most numerous group, and that which absorbs the greater part of the wholesalers' total tonnage, consists of back street shops and village shops which cannot order in quantities which make delivery by manufacturers worth while: all these may for practical purposes be regarded as dealing also in goods other than confectionery. It is estimated that there may be as many as 250,000 retail confectionery outlets in the United Kingdom (excluding automatic vending machines), the greater number being in the category of small mixed shops served predominantly by the wholesaler. There is a retail trade association, the National Union of Retail Confectioners, with about 8,300 members. Though perhaps half that number are small retailers, it is nevertheless not regarded by the alliance's secretary as very representative of those retailers who form the majority of the wholesalers' customers. Retail prices to the consumer are normally either fixed or recommended by the manufacturer.

Confectionery from 1941 to 1953 was subject to rationing and consumer price control, the three sections of the trade being left to settle trade prices together. At the end of price control, the three sections agreed price schedules which were issued in 1953 and 1954 by the alliance. These incorporated a broad division of the distributors' margin between wholesaler and retailer of 25 : 75 for weigh-out goods and 28 : 72 for other goods, which broad division had been basically accepted in the wartime agreements

In 1955, the leading, or "A," chocolate manufacturers were persuaded by the wholesalers to investigate distribution costs with a view to increasing the total distributors' margin. In the result these chocolate manufacturers increased the margin, and the alliance in 1956 produced a new schedule of prices, whose details need not be canvassed, since this was later superseded by the 1958 price schedules the subject of the reference. In 1957, the alliance again took the view that increases in costs justified an increase in the distributors' margin, and approached the leading chocolate manufacturers with costs figures. In the result those manufacturers agreed an increase in the distributors' margin of 1 per cent. and lowered their prices to the trade accordingly. The alliance ultimately produced the yellow price schedule (prices of wholesaler to retailer) and the white buying price schedule (manufacturer to wholesaler). It will be convenient to describe the operation and nature of these schedules —which involve the restrictions now before the court—and then revert to the manner in which they were produced. The key schedule is the white buying price schedule. This is divided into four categories of confectionery, namely, (1) weigh-out lines; (2) prepacked lines; (3) chocolate blocks, bars and other count lines; (4) sugar confectionery count lines. In each category is given in ascending order fixed or ticket price rates to the consumer: against each such consumer price rate is set, marked "A," a manufacturer to wholesaler price rate, which (as is indicated later) the alliance recommends should be the maximum price rate which a wholesaler should pay to any manufacturer for a normal wholesaler's order of about 3 cwt. for confectionery in that category retailing at that consumer price rate. This recommendation as to maximum prices to be paid by wholesaler to manufacturers is not intended to apply to special circumstances or special lines, when (though rarely) wholesalers may pay more than the "A" price rate. In addition there are in the buying price schedule (for most of its range) "B" and "C" manufacturer price rates in respect of each consumer price rate, "B" being lower than "A," and "C" than "B." This price schedule in setting out the "B" and "C" price rates does not impose directly a restriction: those rates are designed to form a basis for working the yellow price schedule, since not all manufacturers' goods retailing in any particular category at the same consumer price rate can command the top "A" trade price rate (as can, for example, the leading chocolate manufacturers with their intensive advertising leading to heavy demand and quick turnover), and those who cannot will charge at a lower trade price rate, which may be anywhere down to and below the "C" figure, "B" and "C" being only labelled steps in a downward trend. The principle of the yellow price schedule is this: in respect of each item in each category (again listed by increasing consumer price rates) prices are set out as the recommended trade reselling prices to retailers. Wherever in the white buying price list there are "A," "B" and "C" manufacturers' trade selling price rates, there are comparable "A," "B" and "C" trade selling price rates by wholesalers to retailers in the yellow price schedule. The recommendations are that when a wholesaler has bought a particular consumer price rate line at "A," he should resell at the comparable yellow schedule "A"; when at "B," similarly at "B"; when at "C," similarly at "C"; when between "A" and "B," then at "A"; when between "B" and "C," then at "B"; when below "C," then at "C"; when (exceptionally) at above "A," then at "A," plus the appropriate increase. The yellow price schedule "A," "B" and "C" figures are, in relation to the white buying price schedule "A," "B" and "C" figure and in relation to the relevant consumer prices, designed to reproduce the rates of 28 : 72 and 25 : 75 already mentioned. The calculations are made to the nearest upward coin denomination, but are recalculated in the various weights or quantities which are set out in the yellow schedule for convenience as a ready reckoner.

The alliance white buying schedule works upon a manufacturer's price rate to wholesalers for approximately a 3 cwt. purchase. Should a wholesaler buy less, he is not restricted in the price he pays, nor in the price he charges to retailers. Also, if by reason of buying more than 3 cwt. he receives a quantity reduction from the manufacturer, he is not permitted to give to any retailer a quantity reduction, subject to federation modifications later mentioned. Next it is understood that if a wholesaler receives a special bargain by a manufacturer giving him a discount in kind (for example, one free package in ten), the schedules do not restrict him on resale at all. Lastly, the schedule is calculated on the assumption that the wholesaler receives from the manufacturer a discount of 1¼ per cent. or 3d. in the £ and gives to the retailer the same rate of discount.

The yellow schedule evolved thus. In some parts of the country it was already the practice of wholesalers to give the 1¼ per cent. discount to retailers. In other parts it was not. Originally the alliance suggested two wholesalers' reselling price schedules, one for the non-discount areas and one for the discount areas. The former assumed no discount to retailers. The latter assumed the discount throughout the whole range, but equivalently stepped up the trade reselling prices throughout the whole range. However, the inconveniences of the division into discount and non-discount areas led to the production of the compromise yellow schedule, which assumed the 1¼ per cent. discount throughout, but in part of the range did not step up the prices to offset it. The National Union of Retail Confectioners did not (and does not) approve of this schedule, and has its own white schedule of recommended prices to be paid by retailers to wholesalers; this works upon the same "A," "B," "C," principle: the prices are different, and are intended to be diminished by 1¼ per cent. discount where that can be obtained, though not everywhere. In summary, the retailers' union prefers its own schedule because it considers that it is more profitable for retailers; and, indeed, we think on the whole it is. Notwithstanding the views of the National Union of Retail Confectioners, the alliance insisted on bringing their yellow schedule into operation, though some retailers, on the evidence, manage to persuade wholesalers to sell on the N.U.R.C. schedule and to allow the 1¼ per cent. discount.

The alliance sought to justify the restrictions under paragraph (b) of section 21 (1) of the Act of 1956.

Further facts are stated in the judgment.

Guy Aldous Q.C., Bryan Clauson and William Aldous for the alliance.

Neville Faulks Q.C. and Arthur Bagnall for the registrar.

The following case was cited in argument in addition to that referred to in the judgment: In re Doncaster and Retford Co-operative Societies Agreement.[2]

Cur. adv. vult.

December 9. RUSSELL J. read the following judgment of the court, which stated the facts as set out above and continued: The facts set out above are the general background against which we have to consider the relevant restrictions.

There was a certain amount of dispute as to the relevant restrictions and the correct method of their statement. We consider that they are correctly stated in the list of restrictions filed on behalf of the registrar. These are five in number and are: "1. Not to acquire from manufacturers chocolate or sugar "confectionery, the buying price of which exceeds the 'A' buy-"ing price shown in the price list as appropriate to the consumer "price indicated by the manufacturer. 2. If, exceptionally, choco-"late or sugar confectionery is acquired from a manufacturer at "prices exceeding the 'A' buying price shown in the price list "as appropriate to the consumer price indicated by the manufac-"turer, not to offer or supply same to retailers save at the appro-"priate 'A' selling price proportionately increased. 3. Not to "offer or supply chocolate or sugar confectionery bought by the "offerer or supplier at the appropriate 'A' buying price, or at a "price lower than the appropriate 'A' buying price but exceed-"ing the appropriate 'B' buying price, except at the appropriate "'A' reselling price. 4. Not to offer or supply chocolate or sugar "confectionery bought by the offerer or supplier at the appro-"priate 'B' buying price, or at a price lower than the "'appropriate 'B' buying price but exceeding the appropriate 'C' "buying price, except at the appropriate 'B' reselling price. "5. Not to offer or supply chocolate or sugar confectionery "bought by the offerer or supplier at the appropriate 'C' buying "price except at the appropriate 'C' reselling price."

For the alliance it was suggested that the first restriction no longer existed, having regard to the absence from the 1958 lists of a phrase present in those of 1956; and that, though the alliance's evidence was that the restriction was intended to remain as a recommendation, nevertheless it was not found in the documents referred to the court. We do not agree with the suggestion. It was, however, made plain for the alliance that it had no wish to continue the first recommendation, and that if it was before the court it could not be justified under the Act of 1956. In the circumstances the first restriction must be declared contrary to the public interest. It is right to add that the alliance contended that this was a harmless restriction, while accepting that this was no defence under the Act of 1956: we need express no opinion on that contention.

In respect of the remaining restrictions, the alliance sought to justify them under section 21 (1) (b) of the Act of 1956 by satisfying the court that their removal would deny to the public, as purchasers or consumers of confectionery, specific and substantial benefits or advantages enjoyed or likely to be enjoyed by them as such by virtue of the restrictions or of any arrangements or operations resulting therefrom. No distinction was made between the four remaining restrictions, which stand or fall together.

A great deal of ground was covered in the course of the hearing, but it finally emerged that the alliance rested its case under section 21 (1) (b) under four heads. First head: that the removal of the restrictions would have the result that in the more sparsely populated, but substantial areas of the United Kingdom, where costs of distribution are relatively high, the margin available to retailers of confectionery would fall so low that no one would continue to retail confectionery in those areas; alternatively, that in those areas confectionery would be sold above the ticket prices, so that the general public as consumers and purchasers living in or visiting those areas would either be deprived of confectionery or would have to pay more for it. Second head: that the existence of the price schedules, with their three-tier system of prices, enable the manufacturer to make more than trivial increases in his price to the wholesaler to cover increased manufacturer's costs without increasing the ticket price of the articles to the consumer. Here again the sweet-eating public is the relevant public. Third head: that the existence of the price lists makes it unnecessary for retailers of confectionery (many of whom are in a small way of business and lack business experience) to "shop" for their goods, and makes it possible for them to ascertain quickly and easily, when any goods are offered to them, whether the price being charged is a reasonable one. Here the relevant public is a substantial section of the many retailers of confectionery as purchasers. Fourth head: that the removal of the restrictions would inevitably lead to disputes between retailers and wholesalers over the division between them of the distributors' margin—the difference between the manufacturers' price to the wholesaler and the ticket price to the public.

As to the first head. The basis of this contention is as follows: (a) It is agreed by the registrar that the overall position revealed in the trade—operating for the most part under the relevant restrictions—is that hitherto, and now, the total distributors' margin is not unreasonable, that the total wholesalers' share thereof is not unreasonable, and that the total retailers' share thereof is not unreasonable. (b) The cost of distribution by wholesalers in populous areas must be lower than their costs of distribution in sparsely populated areas. (c) In populous areas it is to be expected that, in a free market, with competition between wholesalers, there would be a cutting of the wholesalers' share of the distributors' margin in favour of the retailers in those areas, but this would mean that in the sparsely populated areas the wholesalers would have to demand a larger share of that margin in order to compensate for the diminution in the populous areas, the increase being so substantial that there would be left to the retailer in the sparsely populated areas no sufficient inducement for him to continue to sell confectionery at the ticket prices. (d) The result would, it is submitted, be probably no confectionery in those areas, or possibly sales in those areas at above normal ticket prices.

While we are satisfied that, without the restrictions, competition between wholesalers—the market in confectionery being a buyers' market—will tend to reduce the prices charged by wholesalers to retailers in many areas, we are not satisfied that either of the results submitted would follow in sparsely populated areas. Reliance was placed on the evidence of a wholesaler from the north of Scotland whose company is a member of the Aberdeen and District Wholesale Confectioners' Association, and deals by wholesale in confectionery, groceries, tea, hardware, toys and fancy goods. The company to a minor extent manufactures and retails confectionery. The company deals with 2,900 retailers of, inter alia, confectionery, in wide areas of Scotland including sparsely populated areas. In his statement, he said (in effect) that if his total share of the distributors' margin in confectionery were reduced, he would, if continuing in business in the remote areas, have to send confectionery there carriage forward, involving a very big increase in prices to the retailers, with the results submitted above. This was challenged in cross-examination, at a time when it was far from obvious that this point about sparsely populated areas was to find its place in the forefront of the alliance's submissions, and the witness produced the much qualified statement that if the abandonment of the schedule affected (by price cutting) his share of distributors' margins in Aberdeen and 30 miles around—the more profitable areas—(I quote) "we might find that we were "in difficulties in carrying on at the same prices to the more "distant places." Without quoting further, it suffices to say that he was no more definite in re-examination.

It appears to us that the fact that the overall margins are admittedly "not unreasonable" does not exclude the possibility of manoeuvre (embracing also manufacturers, who must maintain their outlets) such as will ensure the continued supply of confectionery, to and by retailers in the more sparsely populated areas and at the overall ticket prices. The relevant retailers almost invariably stock confectionery as a part only of a general trade—such mixture of activities being reflected also in the wholesalers. It is difficult to envisage such a retailer closing down the confectionery side of his business while any profit remained in it. It is to be observed that in some remoter parts the same wholesale company in the north of Scotland already charges more to retailers than in other parts—by not giving a discount of 1¼ per cent. or 3d. in the £—without affecting the retail availability or price of confectionery, which indicates elasticity in the retailers' share. He also obtains special terms from certain manufacturers, which indicates elasticity in the manufacturers' margins of profit. Moreover, particularly in the light of the fact that it was generally agreed that there are too many wholesalers in this industry, it is to be expected that in the absence of the schedule the less efficient wholesalers will go out of business and those who remain are to be expected to be, as a result, more capable of ensuring that their retail outlets will be maintained. We are, accordingly, not satisfied that this first head has been established.

As to the second head. It is to be observed that in order to fit the section this contention must be rewritten. It is necessary for the alliance to satisfy the court that without the restrictions contained in the schedule the manufacturer would not be able to make any increase (other than trivial) in his price to wholesalers to cover an increase in his costs, unless he simultaneously increased the consumer or ticket price.

So stated the proposition seems to us plainly wrong. The argument is put thus. A wholesaler deprived of the schedule would have to have some system of fixing his prices to retailers. The system he would choose would be the cost to him (manufacturers' charge) plus a percentage. If a manufacturer made an increase such as is envisaged the whole of that increase plus a percentage thereon would therefore be passed on to the retailer, whose share of the distributors' margin would be so reduced that in given cases he would not take the goods unless the ticket price were increased to compensate him. On the other hand (it is said) if the price schedule operates, a manufacturer can increase his price (to cover his increased costs) from (say) "C" to "A," and this diminution of the distributors' margin will be borne proportionately by the wholesaler and the retailer, and the increase in consumer price will not in any given case be required.

This argument appears to us to presuppose that a manufacturer would be forced to increase his ticket price by virtue of a system which was described by counsel for the alliance as lunatic —a system by which any increase in a manufacturer's price due to an increase in his costs is automatically added to the price to the retailer, plus, for good measure, a percentage. If a manufacturer's charges must be increased to an extent which under existing ticket price rates cannot produce a sufficient total distributors' margin, the consumer must, of course, pay more. But if they are increased to a lesser extent we cannot accept—particularly in a buyers' market—that without the price schedule the result will, on the grounds urged, be the same. We are not satisfied under this head for the purposes of section 21 (1) (b).

1960

WHOLESALE CONFECTIONERS ALLIANCE'S AGREEMENT, In re.

We add that no doubt the three-tier system has advantages that might be lacking in a single-price system. But that is not, of course, sufficient. It has certain obvious disadvantages (probably impossible of solution) in that, while flexible in some respects, it is rigid in others: for example, a move in the manufacturer's charge from fractionally below "B" to fractionally above "B" in the buying price schedule would mean a move under the yellow schedule in the charge to the retailer from "B" to "A." But such considerations would be relevant only under the balancing provisions of section 21 (1).

As to the third head. This ground was introduced at the hearing by amendment, no doubt as a result of the decision of this court in In re Black Bolt and Nut Association's Agreement.[1] That case was very special, and the circumstances totally different from those in the present case. Indeed counsel for the alliance did not suggest the contrary, his reference to it being no more than to indicate that the avoidance of "shopping" is capable of being a relevant benefit or advantage, dependent of course on the circumstances.

We have heard—and accept—a good deal of evidence to the effect that the majority of those who retail confectionery are not experienced in business matters. The argument on this point is, shortly, that with the existence of the schedule—which admittedly allows a not unreasonable share to the retailer—all that the small retailer needs to do is to check that he is being charged the schedule price: and for this he does not need the actual schedule, he need only ask the wholesaler's traveller to confirm that it is the approved trade price. Without such a yardstick he would (it is said) have to compare wholesalers' price lists, whose contents, due to possible differences in methods of layout, might be difficult truly to compare. Moreover, it is said, the comparisons would take time which the small retailer cannot afford. It may well be true that these small retailers, by and large, are in one sense not price conscious, in that they do not normally inquire as to prices, but accept the price quoted to them for goods they want. But as things stand at present, and have stood for many years, they have operated in a field in which substantially one price only has ruled for a given line, based on the schedule. We are not persuaded that in a free market these small retailers are incapable of profitably comparing the differing prices of the different (though numerically limited) wholesalers whose travellers seek to sell them the same lines. Indeed it appears to be accepted under the first head that in populous areas competition between wholesalers will have the effect of reducing prices to retailers, which presupposes that retailers will compare prices either of their own volition or at the instance of wholesalers. Such time and trouble as may now be saved to the small retailer by the operation of the schedule does not appear to us to be a substantial benefit or advantage, and we are not under this head satisfied that the case for the alliance under section 21 (1) (b) is established.

As to the fourth head. This was, in our judgment, rightly referred to by counsel for the alliance as perhaps a "minor "point." We do not exactly know what is meant by "disputes," and the analogy which was introduced of two dogs at one dinner bowl only suggests a breach of the peace which we do not envisage in the distributors' section of the trade. If disputes means differences of opinion in the course of bargaining, we cannot regard their avoidance as a specific and substantial benefit or advantage to the relevant parties (the retailers), particularly when most of them are likely to benefit from such bargaining by a reduction in prices. If by disputes is meant a general attitude of opposition between organised retailers and organised wholesalers, we only comment that this exists now, the one preferring the National Union of Retail Confectioners' white schedule, the other preferring the yellow schedule. An attempt was made to suggest by a process of mathematics that the difference between the two was negligible (if the retailers could only have the sense to see it), so that such "dispute" was unreal: but in our view that mathematical process was founded on a false assumption. Accordingly, under this fourth and last head, the alliance also fails to satisfy the court under section 21 (1) (b).

Having regard to the limitation, in the end, of the alliance's case to those four heads, and to the fact that under none of them is the court satisfied, it is unnecessary to consider a number of aspects of the case which were fully canvassed in argument and evidence, some of which would or might have required review under the "balancing" provisions of section 21 (1).

We have not referred, so far, to the fact that certain of the federations, constituent members of the alliance, have from time to time introduced modifications of the alliance restrictions, as constitutionally they are entitled to do. Generally speaking these modifications are designed to permit within the federation's area certain quantity discounts by wholesalers to retailers, or to retail buying groups, or to permit special terms to cash-and-carry retailers. Strictly the restrictions came before us without those area modifications, and in so far as those area modifications are in themselves restrictions under the Act of 1956 they are not strictly before the court. But if we are to treat (in the relevant areas) the alliance restrictions as so modified, there is, in our judgment, nothing in the modifications which can improve the case for the alliance under the four heads mentioned. Taken by themselves, the area modifications cannot, of course, survive the abolition of the restrictions considered by us.
